Yet the dictator was entering a struggle in which he relied more on the spirit of his troops than on their strength. He began therefore to cast about and every way to consider how he might strike terror into the enemy by some stratagem. His cleverness produced a new expedient, which many generals both of our own and foreign countries—some even in the present age—have since employed.[1] Commanding the muleteers to remove the pack-saddles from the mules, leaving only a pair of saddle-cloths on each, and arming them, partly with captured weapons, partly with those belonging to the sick, he mounted them. Having in this way made out near a thousand, he mixed a hundred cavalrymen with them and ordered them to go up by night on to the mountains above the camp and conceal themselves in the woods, and not to stir from thence until they received a signal from him. The dictator himself, as soon as it was light, began to deploy his front along the lower slopes, on purpose to make the enemy take their stand facing the mountains where the preparations had been made for inspiring them with a fear which, groundless veris viribus profuit. Primo credere duces Gallorum non descensuros in aequum Romanos; deinde, ubi degressos repente viderunt, et ipsi avidi certaminis in proelium ruunt, priusque pugna coepit quam signum ab ducibus daretur.

A.U.C. 95–396

XV. Acrius invasere Galli dextro[1] cornu; neque sustineri potuissent, ni forte eo loco dictator fuisset, 2 Sex. Tullium nomine increpans rogitansque sicine pugnaturos milites spopondisset? Ubi illi clamores sint arma poscentium, ubi minae iniussu imperatoris proelium inituros? En ipsum imperatorem clara voce vocare ad proelium et ire armatum ante prima signa; ecquis sequeretur eorum qui modo ducturi fuerint, 3 in castris feroces, in acie pavidi? Vera audiebant; itaque tantos pudor stimulos admovit, ut ruerent in hostium tela alienatis a memoria periculi animis. Hic primo impetus prope vecors turbavit hostes, 4 eques deinde emissus turbatos avertit. Ipse dictator, post quam labantem una parte vidit aciem, signa in laevum cornu confert, quo turbam hostium congregari cernebat, et iis qui in monte erant signum quod 5 convenerat dedit. Ubi inde quoque novus clamor though it was, yet served the Romans almost better than actual strength. At first the Gallic leaders supposed that the Romans would not come down into the plain; then, when they saw that they had suddenly begun to descend, they also, being themselves eager for the combat, rushed into battle, and the fighting began before the signal could be given by the generals. B.C. 359–358

[1] dextro Drakenborch (cf. §§ 4 and 6): dextrum Ω.

XV. The right wing of the Gauls attacked fiercely, and it would have been impossible to stop them, if the dictator had not happened to be there. Calling out to Sextus Tullius by name, he chid him and asked if this was the kind of fighting he had promised that the men should do. Where were those shouts with which they had called for arms? Where were their threats that they would begin the battle without the general's orders? Here was their general himself, who with a loud voice summoned them to fight, and advanced, sword in hand, in the very van! Of those who but now were ready to lead, was there none to follow? They might swagger in camp; in the field they were arrant cowards. What he said was the truth, and so stung them with shame that they rushed on the weapons of the enemy in utter forgetfulness of danger. This well-nigh frenzied onset first threw their enemies into disarray, and before they could recover their confusion the cavalry charged and routed them. The dictator himself, as soon as he saw that a part of their line was wavering, turned the infantry attack against their left, where he descried a throng of the enemy gathering, and made the appointed signal to those on the mountain. And when they too raised a shout and were seen to ortus est[1] et tendere obliquo monte ad castra Gallorum visi sunt, tum metu ne excluderentur omissa pugna est cursuque effuso ad castra ferebantur. 6 Ubi cum occurrisset eis M. Valerius magister equitum, qui profligato dextro[2] cornu obequitabat hostium 7 munimentis, ad montes silvasque vertunt fugam plurimique ibi a fallaci equitum specie agasonibusque excepti sunt; et eorum quos pavor pertulerat[3] in silvas atrox caedes post sedatum proelium fuit. 8 Nec alius post M. Furium quam C. Sulpicius iustiorem de Gallis egit triumphum. Auri quoque ex Gallicis spoliis satis magnum pondus saxo quadrato saeptum in Capitolio sacravit.

A.U.C. 395–396

9 Eodem anno et a consulibus vario eventu bellatum; nam Hernici a C. Plautio devicti subactique sunt. Fabius collega eius incaute atque inconsulte adversus 10 Tarquinienses pugnavit. Nec in acie tantum ibi cladis acceptum quam quod trecentos septem milites Romanos captos Tarquinienses immolarunt, qua foeditate supplicii aliquanto ignominia populi Romani 11 insignitior fuit. Accessit ad eam cladem et vastatio Romani agri, quam Privernates, Veliterni deinde, incursione repentina fecerunt.

12 Eodem anno duae tribus, Pomptina et Publilia,

[1] ortus est Luterbacher: ortus (hort' H) Ω.
[2] dextro Ω: sinistro Glareanus.
[3] pertulerat $D^3\varsigma$: perculerat Ω.

[1] Bringing up the total number at this time to twenty-seven.

be moving obliquely down the mountain in the direction of the Gallic camp, the enemy, fearing to be shut out, ceased fighting and rushed pell-mell for their entrenchments. There however they were met by Marcus Valerius, the master of the horse, who, having scattered the enemy's right wing, was then riding up to their works; whereupon they turned and fled towards the mountains and the woods, where very many of them were intercepted by the muleteers masquerading as cavalry; and those whose fright had carried them into the woods were pitilessly slaughtered, after the battle had died down. Not since the time of Marcus Furius has anyone celebrated a Gallic triumph that was better deserved than that of Gaius Sulpicius. He also collected from the spoils a considerable weight of gold, which he walled up with hewn stone in the Capitol, and so dedicated. B.C. 359–358

In the same year the consuls, too, waged war with varying success. Gaius Plautius defeated the Hernici and reduced them to subjection; his colleague Fabius showed neither prudence nor skill in his battle with the Tarquinienses. And yet the disaster experienced on the field was overshadowed by the fact that the Tarquinienses slew three hundred and seven captured Roman soldiers as a sacrifice—an act of savage cruelty that greatly emphasized the humiliation of the Roman People. In addition to this defeat, the Romans suffered the devastation of their fields in sudden incursions made by the Privernates, and afterwards by the Veliterni.

In the same year two tribes were added;[1] the Pomptine and the Publilian; the votive games, additae; ludi votivi, quos M. Furius dictator voverat, facti; et de ambitu ab C. Poetelio[1] tribuno plebis auctoribus patribus tum primum ad populum latum 13 est; eaque rogatione novorum maxime hominum ambitionem, qui nundinas et conciliabula obire soliti erant, compressam credebant.

A.U.C. 395–396

A.U.C. 397

XVI. Haud aeque laeta patribus insequenti anno C. Marcio Cn. Manlio consulibus de unciario fenore a M. Duillio[2] L. Menenio tribunis plebis rogatio est perlata; et plebs aliquanto eam cupidius scivit.[3]
2 Ad bella nova priore anno destinata Falisci quoque hostes exorti duplici crimine, quod et cum Tarquiniensibus iuventus eorum militaverat et eos qui Falerios perfugerant cum male pugnatum est, repetentibus
3 fetialibus Romanis non reddiderant. Ea provincia Cn. Manlio obvenit. Marcius exercitum in agrum Privernatem, integrum pace longinqua, induxit militemque praeda implevit. Ad copiam rerum addidit munificentiam, quod nihil in publicum secernendo
4 augenti[4] rem privatam militi favit. Privernates cum ante moenia sua castris permunitis consedissent, vocatis ad contionem militibus "Castra nunc" inquit "vobis hostium urbemque praedae do, si mihi polli-

[1] Poetelio C.I.L. i², pp. 126, 130: poetilio (or petilio) Ω.
[2] Duillio edd.: duilio (and other corruptions) Ω.
[3] scivit Weissenborn and Madvig: sciuit accepit M: sciuit accepitque (or accepi- or accepti-) Ω.
[4] augenti ς: augendi (wanting in O) Ω.

[1] Tacitus tells us (Annals VI. xvi.) that the twelve Tables had forbidden a higher rate of interest. If so, the tribunes were merely reviving an obsolete enactment. The words unciarium fenus clearly mean a rate of one twelfth but just how that rate was applied is very doubtful. It may be $\frac{1}{12}$ of the whole principal or $\frac{1}{12}$ of 1 per cent.; the period may be one month or one year; and, finally, the year may be 10 months or 12. The rate in modern terms may then be 1 per cent. (as translated here), 8⅓ per cent. as assumed by Frank, Economic Survey of which Marcus Furius had vowed as dictator, were given; and a statute against bribery was then for the first time laid before the people by Gaius Poetelius, tribune of the plebs, with the approbation of the senate. By this measure they thought to have suppressed corrupt practices, particularly on the part of men risen from the people, who were wont to haunt the country fairs and gathering-places. B.C. 359–358

XVI. Less agreeable to the senate was a measure which came up in the following year, in the consulship of Gaius Marcius and Gnaeus Manlius. It fixed the rate of interest at one per cent., and was carried through by Marcus Duillius and Lucius Menenius, tribunes of the plebs. The commons ratified it much more eagerly than they had done the other law.[1] B.C. 357

Besides the new wars determined on in the previous year, the Faliscans also rose up as enemies. They were charged with two offences: their youth had fought on the side of the Tarquinienses; and they had refused the demand of the fetials that they should give up the Romans who had taken refuge in Falerii, after the defeat. This command was assigned to Gnaeus Manlius. Marcius led an army into the territory of Privernum, unravaged during a long period of peace, and loaded his troops with booty. This abundance he administered bountifully, and sequestering nothing to the public treasury, encouraged the men to augment their private fortunes. The Privernates having encamped in front of their town, within strong intrenchments, Marcius called his soldiers together and thus addressed them: "I give you now for booty the camp and city of our enemies, if you promise me Ancient Rome, I. 282), 10 per cent. (cf. Weissenborn ad loc.) or 100 per cent. (so apparently Last, Camb, Anc. Hist. VII. 476).

A.U.C. 397

"vobis hostium urbemque praedae do, si mihi pollicemini vos fortiter in acie operam navaturos nec praedae magis quam pugnae paratos esse." Signum poscunt ingenti clamore celsique et spe haud dubia feroces in proelium vadunt. Ibi ante signa Sex. Tullius, de quo ante dictum est, exclamat "Aspice, imperator" inquit, "quemadmodum exercitus tuus tibi promissa praestet," piloque posito stricto gladio in hostem impetum facit. Sequuntur Tullium antesignani omnes primoque impetu avertere hostem; fusum inde ad oppidum persecuti, cum iam scalas moenibus admoverent, in deditionem urbem acceperunt. Triumphus de Privernatibus actus.

Ab altero consule nihil memorabile gestum, nisi quod legem novo exemplo ad Sutrium in castris tributim de vicensima eorum qui manumitterentur tulit. Patres, quia ea lege haud parvum vectigal inopi aerario additum esset, auctores fuerunt; ceterum tribuni plebis, non tam lege quam exemplo moti, ne quis postea populum sevocaret, capite sanxerunt; nihil enim non per milites iuratos in consulis verba, quamvis perniciosum populo, si id liceret, ferri posse.

Eodem anno C. Licinius Stolo a M. Popilio Laenate sua lege decem milibus aeris est damnatus, quod mille iugerum agri cum filio possideret emancupandoque filium fraudem legi fecisset.

---

[1] Within a distance of one mile from the walls a citizen might appeal from the decision of a consul, but beyond that point the consul's authority was absolute.

[2] From his paternal authority.

[3] By the Licinio-Sextian legislation of 367 it had been forbidden that anybody should hold more than 500 iugera. cf. VI. XXXV. 5.

that in the battle you will play the part of men, B.C. 357 and be not more ready to plunder than to fight." They clamoured loudly for the signal and entered the battle with spirit, emboldened by no uncertain expectations. There in the fore-front Sextus Tullius, who has been mentioned before, cried out, "Look, general, and see how your army keeps the promises it gave you!" Then, laying down his javelin, he drew his sword and charged the foe. All of the front line followed Tullius, and putting the enemy to flight at the first shock, pursued them to the town, where the Romans were already bringing up their scaling ladders to the wall, when the place surrendered. A triumph was celebrated over the Privernates.

The other consul accomplished nothing worth recording, except that without precedent he got a law passed in his camp before Sutrium—the men voting by tribes—which levied a tax of one-twentieth on manumissions. The Fathers ratified this law, since it brought in no small revenue to the empty treasury; but the tribunes of the plebs, troubled less by the law than by the precedent established, had it made a capital offence for anyone thereafter to summon the people to the comitia away from Rome. If this should be permitted, there was nothing, they argued, however baneful to the people, which could not be carried through by the votes of soldiers sworn to obey their consul.[1]

In the same year Gaius Licinius Stolo was prosecuted under his own statute by Marcus Popilius Laenas, and condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand asses, on the charge that he held with his son a thousand iugera of land, and by emancipating his son[2] had evaded the law.[3]

A.U.C. 398–399

XVII. Novi consules inde, M. Fabius Ambustus
2 iterum et M. Popilius Laenas iterum, duo bella habuere, facile alterum cum Tiburtibus, quod Laenas gessit, qui hoste in urbem compulso agros vastavit; Falisci Tarquiniensesque alterum consulem prima
3 pugna fuderunt. Inde terror maximus fuit quod sacerdotes eorum facibus ardentibus anguibusque praelatis incessu furiali militem Romanum insueta turbaverunt specie. Et tum quidem velut lymphati et attoniti munimentis suis trepido agmine inci-
4 derunt; deinde, ubi consul legatique ac tribuni puerorum ritu vana miracula paventes inridebant increpabantque, vertit animos repente pudor, et in
5 ea ipsa quae fugerant velut caeci ruebant. Discusso itaque vano apparatu hostium cum in ipsos armatos se intulissent, averterunt totam aciem; castrisque etiam eo die potiti praeda ingenti parta victores reverterunt, militaribus iocis cum apparatum hostium
6 tum suum increpantes pavorem. Concitatur deinde omne nomen Etruscum, et Tarquiniensibus Faliscisque ducibus ad Salinas perveniunt. Adversus eum terrorem dictator C. Marcius Rutulus[1] primus de plebe dictus magistrum equitum item de plebe C. Plau-
7 tium dixit. Id vero patribus indignum videri, etiam dictaturam iam in promiscuo esse; omnique ope

[1] Rutulus Conway (cf. chap. xxxviii. § 8 and Conway's note at iii. vii. 6): rutilius UHA[2]: utilius (omitted by O) Ω.

XVII. New consuls now came in, Marcus Fabius Ambustus and Marcus Popilius Laenas, each for the second time. They had two wars. One of these was easy; it was waged by Laenas against the Tiburtes, and he shut up the enemy within their city and pillaged their fields. The other consul was routed by the Faliscans and Tarquinienses in his first engagement. The panic was chiefly due to this, that their priests, bearing serpents and blazing torches before them, came rushing on like Furies, and utterly dismayed the Roman soldiers with the extraordinary sight. At first they were like men frantic and distraught, and flung themselves in a disordered mob into their own works. Then when the consul, the lieutenants and the tribunes laughed at them and upbraided them for being scared like children at idle tricks, shame caused a sudden revulsion in their feelings, and they rushed, as if blinded, on the very objects from which they had fled. In this spirit they brushed aside the enemy's vain paraphernalia, and hurling themselves on his real fighting men, they routed the whole army, and even captured the camp that day. As they returned victorious with the rich plunder they had won, they jested in soldier-fashion and scoffed not only at the enemy's devices but at their own fright as well. All who bore the Etruscan name then rose in arms, and led by the men of Tarquinii and Falerii, advanced as far as Salinae. To meet this fearful danger Gaius Marcius Rutulus was made dictator, the first that was ever appointed from the plebs, and he named a plebeian also, Gaius Plautius, to be master of the horse. But the patricians thought it shameful that even the dictatorship should now

B.C. 356–355

A.U.C. 398–399 impediebant ne quid dictatori ad id bellum decerneretur parareturve. Eo promptius cuncta ferente
8 dictatore populus iussit. Profectus ab urbe utraque parte Tiberis, ratibus exercitu, quocumque fama hostium ducebat, traiecto multos populatores agrorum
9 vagos palantes oppressit; castra quoque necopinato adgressus cepit et octo milibus hostium captis, ceteris aut caesis aut ex agro Romano fugatis sine auctoritate patrum populi iussu triumphavit.
10 Quia nec per dictatorem plebeium nec per consulem comitia consularia haberi volebant et alter consul Fabius bello retinebatur, res ad interregnum
11 redit. Interreges deinceps Q. Servilius Ahala M. Fabius Cn. Manlius C. Fabius C. Sulpicius L. Aemi-
12 lius Q. Servilius M. Fabius Ambustus. In secundo interregno orta contentio est, quod duo patricii consules creabantur, intercedentibusque tribunis interrex Fabius aiebat in duodecim tabulis legem esse ut quodcumque postremum populus iussisset, id ius ratumque esset; iussum populi et suffragia esse.
13 Cum intercedendo tribuni nihil aliud quam ut differrent comitia valuissent, duo patricii consules creati sunt, C. Sulpicius Peticus tertium M. Valerius Publi-
A.U.C. 400 cola, eodemque die magistratum inierunt, (XVIII.)

[1] Compare the story of Valerius and Horatius at III. lxiii. 11.

[2] Perhaps identical with the M. Fabius Ambustus of VI. xxii., xxxiv., xxxvi.; perhaps with the M. Fabius Dorsuo of VII. xxviii.

be common; and they exerted all their influence to prevent anything being decreed or made ready for the dictator, to carry on that war. For which reason the people voted the more promptly everything that the dictator proposed. Marching out from the City and setting his army across the Tiber by means of rafts, wherever a rumour of the enemy called him, he surprised many straggling pillagers as they roamed about the fields, on both sides of the river; he also captured their camp in a surprise attack, and with it eight thousand soldiers; and having slain the rest, or driven them out of Roman territory, was granted a triumph by the people, but without the authorization of the senate.[1] B.C. 356–355

The patricians were not willing that a consular election should be held by a plebeian, whether dictator or consul, and the other consul being detained by the war, the state relapsed into an interregnum. The office of interrex was held successively by Quintus Servilius Ahala, Marcus Fabius,[2] Gnaeus Manlius, Gaius Fabius, Gaius Sulpicius, Lucius Aemilius, Quintus Servilius, and Marcus Fabius Ambustus. In the second interregnum a controversy arose because two patricians were on the point of being named as consuls; and when the tribunes sought to veto the announcement, the interrex Fabius declared that the Twelve Tables enacted that whatsoever the people decreed last should have the binding force of law, and their votes were also a decree. The tribunes gained nothing more by their intervention than a postponement of the comitia, and two patrician consuls were elected, namely Gaius Sulpicius Peticus (for the third time) and Marcus Valerius Publicola. They entered office that very day, (XVIII.) B.C. 354

A.U.C. 400 quadringentesimo anno quam urbs Romana condita erat, quinto tricesimo quam a Gallis reciperata, ablato post undecimum[1] annum a plebe consulatu.[2] 2 Empulum[3] eo anno ex Tiburtibus haud memorando certamine captum, sive duorum consulum auspicio bellum ibi gestum est, ut scripsere quidam, seu per idem tempus Tarquiniensium quoque sunt vastati agri ab Sulpicio consule, quo Valerius adversus Tiburtes legiones duxit.
3 Domi maius certamen consulibus cum plebe ac tribunis erat. Fidei iam suae non solum virtutis ducebant esse, ut accepissent duo patricii consu-
4 latum, ita ambobus patriciis mandare: quin aut toto cedendum esse, ut[4] plebeius iam magistratus consulatus fiat, aut totum possidendum quam possessionem
5 integram a patribus accepissent. Plebes contra fremit: quid se vivere, quid in parte civium censeri, si, quod duorum hominum virtute, L. Sexti ac C. Licini, partum sit, id obtinere universi non possint?
6 Vel reges vel decemviros vel si quod tristius sit imperii nomen patiendum esse potius, quam ambos
7 patricios consules videant, nec in vicem pareatur atque imperetur, sed pars altera in aeterno imperio locata plebem nusquam alio natam quam ad servi-
8 endum putet. Non desunt tribuni auctores turbarum, sed inter concitatos per se omnes vix duces eminent.

[1] undecimum Sigonius and Glareanus: nonum (or some corruption of nonum) Ω.
[2] consulatu Walters and Conway: consulatu patricii consules ambo ex interregno magistratum iniere, C. Sulpicius Peticus tertium M. Valerius Publicola Ω.
[3] Empulum ς: emaepulum (and other corruptions) Ω.
[4] esse ut Madvig: esset si (est si DL) Ω.

in the four hundredth year from the founding of Rome and the thirty-fifth from its recovery from the Gauls, depriving the plebs of the consulship they had enjoyed for ten years. Empulum was won that year from the Tiburtes without any memorable battle being fought; whether, as some writers state, the campaign was conducted there under the auspices of the two consuls; or whether the lands belonging to Tarquinii were ravaged by the consul Sulpicius at the same time that Valerius led his legions against the Tiburtes. B.C. 354

The consuls had a harder struggle at home, with the plebs and the tribunes. They held that honour as well as courage required of them that, even as two patricians had received the consulship, so they should hand it over to successors who were both patricians: indeed they ought rather to withdraw from the consulship altogether, that it might at once become a plebeian magistracy, or else retain undivided that control which they had inherited entire from their fathers. On the other side, the plebeians were asking angrily why they lived, why they were counted a part of the state, if they were unable by their collective efforts to maintain what the courage of two men, Lucius Sextius and Gaius Licinius, had won for them. It were better to put up with kings or decemvirs, or —if possible—a more stern type of government than theirs, rather than see the consuls both patricians and have no turns at obeying and commanding, while a part of the people thought themselves established forever in authority and the commons born for no other end than servitude. There was no lack of tribunes to promote disturbances, but where all were so excited, to begin with, the leaders were hardly to 9 Aliquotiens frustra in campum descensum cum esset multique per seditiones acti comitiales dies, postremo vicit[1] perseverantia consulum: plebis eo dolor erupit ut tribunos actum esse de libertate vociferantes relinquendumque non campum iam solum sed etiam urbem captam atque oppressam regno patriciorum maesta[2] sequeretur. Consules relicti a parte populi per infrequentiam comitia nihilo segnius perficiunt. Creati consules ambo patricii, M. Fabius Ambustus tertium T. Quinctius. In quibusdam annalibus pro T. Quinctio M. Popilium consulem invenio.

A.U.C. 400

A.U.C. 401

XIX. Duo bella eo anno prospere gesta. Cum Tarquiniensibus Tiburtibusque[3] ad deditionem pugnatum. Sassula ex his urbs capta; ceteraque oppida eandem fortunam habuissent, ni universa gens positis armis in fidem consulis venisset. Triumphatum de Tiburtibus; alioquin mitis victoria fuit. In Tarquinienses acerbe saevitum; multis mortalibus in acie caesis ex ingenti captivorum numero trecenti quinquaginta octo delecti, nobilissimus quisque, qui Romam mitterentur; volgus aliud trucidatum. Nec populus in eos qui missi Romam erant mitior fuit: medio in foro omnes virgis caesi ac securi percussi. Id pro immolatis in foro Tarquiniensium Romanis poenae

[1] vicit Conway: uicta (victa O) Ω: uictae ς.
[2] maesta ς (Alschefski): maesta plebs Ω.
[3] Tarquiniensibus Tiburtibusque Walters: Tarquiniensibus Tiburtibusque cum Tiburtibus A^2: Tarquiniensibus Tiburtibusque cum Tiburtibus usque Frag. Haverk.: Tarquiniensibus Tiburtibusque usque cod. Gaertn.: Tiburtibus usque Madvig: Tiburtibusque Ω.

[1] Where the voting took place.

be discerned. After the people had several times gone down to the Campus Martius [1] to no purpose, and many meeting days had been spent in rioting, the persistence of the consuls finally prevailed. The plebs, thereupon, in a burst of resentment, followed their tribunes, who cried out that liberty was lost and that they ought now to leave not only the voting-field but the City, too, which was taken captive and enslaved by the tyranny of the patricians. The consuls, being deserted by half the people, nevertheless, despite the paucity of voters, completed the election. The successful candidates were both patricians, Marcus Fabius Ambustus (for the third time) and Titus Quinctius. In certain annals I find Marcus Popilius given as consul instead of Titus Quinctius. B.C. 354

XIX. Two wars were successfully prosecuted this year, and the Tarquinienses and Tiburtes were forced to make submission. From the latter their city of Sassula was taken, and the rest of their towns would have met with the same fortune, had the whole nation not laid down their arms and cast themselves upon the mercy of the consul. A triumph was celebrated over them, but in all other respects the victory was used with clemency. The men of Tarquinii were shown no ruth; many were slain in the field of battle, and out of the vast number taken prisoners three hundred and fifty-eight were selected—the noblest of them all—to be sent to Rome, and the rest of the populace were put to the sword. Neither were the People less stern towards those who had been sent to Rome, but scourged them all with rods in the middle of the Forum and struck off their heads. Such was the vengeance they exacted of their enemies for the Romans sacrificed B.C. 353

A.U.C. 401

4 hostibus redditum. Res bello bene gestae ut Samnites quoque amicitiam peterent effecerunt. Legatis eorum comiter ab senatu responsum; foedere in societatem accepti.

5 Non eadem domi quae militiae fortuna erat plebi Romanae. Nam etsi unciario fenore facto levata usura erat, sorte ipsa obruebantur inopes nexumque inibant; eo nec patricios ambo consules neque comitiorum curam publicave studia prae privatis incom-
6 modis plebs ad animum admittebat. Consulatus uterque apud patricios manet; consules creati C. Sulpicius Peticus quartum M. Valerius Publicola iterum.

In bellum Etruscum intentam civitatem, quia Caeritem populum misericordia consanguinitatis Tarquiniensibus adiunctum fama ferebatur, legati Latini ad Volscos convertere, nuntiantes exercitum conscriptum armatumque iam suis finibus imminere; inde populabundos in agrum Romanum venturos
7 esse. Censuit igitur senatus neutram neglegendam rem esse; utroque legiones scribi consulesque sortiri
8 provincias iussit. Inclinavit deinde pars maior curae in Etruscum bellum, postquam litteris Sulpici con-

[1] Chap. xv. § 10.

in the market-place of Tarquinii.[1] Their success in war induced the Samnites also to apply for their friendship. The senate made a courteous answer to their ambassadors, and granted them a treaty of alliance. B.C. 353

The Roman commons were not so fortunate at home as in the field. For notwithstanding they had been relieved of usury by the adoption of a one per cent. rate, the very poor found even the principal sum a crushing burden, and were being bound over to their creditors. Hence it was that neither the incumbency of two patrician consuls, nor concern for the elections or affairs of state, could divert the thoughts of the plebeians from their personal distresses. Accordingly both consulships continued in the hands of the patricians; Gaius Sulpicius Peticus was elected for the fourth time, and Marcus Valerius Publicola for the second.

While the citizens were occupied with thoughts of an Etruscan war—for it was rumoured that the people of Caere, out of compassion for their kinsmen of Tarquinii, had made common cause with them—came envoys from the Latins and turned their thoughts upon the Volsci, with a report that they had mustered and equipped an army, which was even then descending upon Latium, from whence it would invade and devastate the territory of the Romans. The senate therefore resolved that neither threat must be neglected; and ordered that legions should be enrolled for both campaigns, and that the consuls should decide the commands by lot. But the Etruscan war afterwards came to be their chief concern, on the receipt of a dispatch from the consul Sulpicius, who had received the assignment

A.U.C. 401 sulis, cui Tarquinii provincia evenerat, cognitum est depopulatum agrum circa Romanas salinas praedaeque partem in Caeritum fines avectam et haud dubie iuventutem eius populi inter praedatores fuisse. 9 Itaque Valerium consulem, Volscis oppositum castraque ad finem Tusculanum habentem, revocatum inde senatus dictatorem dicere iussit. T. Manlium 10 L. filium dixit. Is cum sibi magistrum equitum A. Cornelium Cossum dixisset, consulari exercitu contentus ex auctoritate patrum ac populi iussu Caeritibus bellum indixit.

XX. Tum primum Caerites, tamquam in verbis hostium vis maior ad bellum significandum quam in suis factis, qui per populationem Romanos lacessierant, esset, verus belli terror invasit, et quam non 2 suarum virium ea dimicatio esset cernebant; paenitebatque populationis et Tarquinienses exsecrabantur defectionis auctores; nec arma aut bellum quisquam apparare, sed pro se quisque legatos mitti iubebat 3 ad petendam erroris veniam. Legati senatum cum adissent, ab senatu reiecti ad populum deos rogaverunt, quorum sacra bello Gallico accepta rite procurassent, ut Romanos florentes ea sui misericordia caperet quae se rebus adfectis quondam populi 4 Romani cepisset; conversique ad delubra Vestae hospitium flaminum Vestaliumque ab se caste ac to Tarquinii, with the news that the countryside lying near the Roman salt-works had been pillaged, and a part of the booty carried into the borders of the Caerites, whose soldiers had, without question, been amongst the depredators. And so the senate recalled Valerius the consul, who was opposing the Volsci and had his camp close to the Tusculan frontier, and ordered him to nominate a dictator. His choice fell upon Titus Manlius,[1] the son of Lucius, who appointed as master of the horse Aulus Cornelius Cossus. Asking for no more than the consular army, the dictator, by the senate's authority, and at the bidding of the people, proclaimed war on the Caerites. B.C. 353

[1] sc. Torquatus. See chap. v. § 3 and chap. x. § 13.
[2] See v. xl. 7 and l. 3.

XX. It was then that the Caerites realized for the first time the full danger of war, as if the words of their enemies conveyed a more emphatic hint of it than their own acts, though they had pillaged the Romans and harried them. Beginning then to perceive how inadequate was their strength to such a quarrel, they repented of their raid, and cursed the Tarquinienses, who had encouraged them to fall away. Nobody made ready his arms and prepared for war, but one and all bade dispatch ambassadors to Rome, to beg forgiveness for their error. The envoys, having approached the senate, were sent by them to be dealt with by the people. Calling on the gods whose sacred emblems they had received and religiously protected in the Gallic war, they besought them to inspire the Romans in their prosperity with such compassion for the men of Caere as they themselves had formerly shown for Rome in her time of tribulation.[2] Then, turning to the shrine of Vesta, they invoked the flamens and Vestals whom they had

A.U.C. 401

5 religiose cultum invocabant: eane meritos crederet quisquam hostes repente sine causa factos? aut, si quid hostiliter fecissent, consilio id magis quam furore lapsos fecisse, ut sua vetera beneficia, locata praesertim apud tam gratos, novis corrumperent maleficiis, florentemque populum Romanum ac felicissimum bello sibi desumerent hostem, cuius adflicti amicitiam petissent?[1] Ne appellarent consilium quae 6 vis ac necessitas appellanda esset. Transeuntes[2] agmine infesto per agrum suum Tarquinienses, cum praeter viam nihil petissent, traxisse quosdam agrestium populationis eius, quae sibi crimini detur, 7 comites. Eos seu dedi placeat, dedere se paratos esse, seu supplicio adfici, daturos poenas. Caere, sacrarium populi Romani, deversorium sacerdotum ac receptaculum Romanorum sacrorum, intactum inviolatumque crimine belli hospitio Vestalium cultisque 8 dis darent. Movit populum non tam causa praesens quam vetus meritum, ut maleficii quam beneficii potius immemores essent. Itaque pax populo Caeriti data, indutiasque in centum annos factas in aes[3]

[1] petissent M: cepissent Ω: coepissent HTD: . . pissent O.

[2] transeuntes A^1 or A^2: tanseuntes H: transeuntiq PFTDLA: transeundis M: wanting in O.

[3] aes Madvig: senatus consultum (sc̄) Ω.

entertained with a pure and scrupulous hospitality. B.C. 353
Could anyone, they asked, believe that those who had deserved so well of the Romans had suddenly turned enemies without reason? or that if they had in fact committed an act of hostility, it had been deliberately planned, and had not rather been owing to a fit of madness? Would they undo their own kindness of old, especially kindness to such grateful friends, with new misdeeds; and choose to be enemies of the Roman People in their flourishing state and at the height of their success in war, when they had sought their friendship in the hour of their adversity? Let them not give the name of "purpose" to what should properly be called "force" and "necessity." The Tarquinienses, marching in hostile array through their territories, had sought nothing of them save permission to pass, but had drawn certain rustics after them in their train, who had borne a part in the pillaging with which the people of Caere were now taxed. If it pleased the Romans that these men should be surrendered, they would surrender them; if they would have them punished, they should be made to suffer. But Caere, the sanctuary of the Roman People, the hostel of its priests and refuge of the Roman religion, let them preserve intact and unstained by the imputation of making war, for the sake of the hospitality it had shown their Vestals and the reverence it had paid their gods. The people were moved, not so much by their present claims as by their ancient merits, and chose rather to forget an injury than a kindness. So peace was granted to the people of Caere, and it was resolved that a truce of a hundred years be made, and recorded on a table of bronze. The 9 referri placuit. In Faliscos eodem noxios crimine vis belli conversa est; sed hostes nusquam inventi. Cum populatione peragrati fines essent, ab oppugnatione urbium temperatum; legionibusque Romam reductis reliquum anni muris turribusque reficiendis consumptum et aedis Apollinis dedicata est.

A.U.C. 401

A.U.C. 402

XXI. Extremo anno comitia consularia certamen patrum ac plebis diremit, tribunis negantibus passuros comitia haberi ni secundum Liciniam legem haberentur, dictatore obstinato tollere potius totum e re publica consulatum quam promiscuum patribus
2 ac plebi facere. Prolatandis igitur comitiis cum dictator magistratu abisset, res ad interregnum rediit. Infestam inde patribus plebem interreges cum accepissent, ad undecimum interregem seditioni-
3 bus certatum est. Legis Liciniae patrocinium tribuni iactabant; propior dolor plebi fenoris ingravescentis erat, curaeque privatae in certaminibus publicis
4 erumpebant. Quorum [1] taedio patres L. Cornelium Scipionem interregem concordiae causa observare legem Liciniam comitiis consularibus iussere. P. Valerio Publicolae datus e plebe collega C. Marcius
5 Rutulus.[2] Inclinatis semel in concordiam animis novi consules fenebrem quoque rem, quae distinere

[1] quorum $O\varsigma$: quarum Ω.
[2] Rutulus Conway: rutilius Ω.

[1] Brother of the Marcus Valerius of chap. xxiii. § 3.

brunt of the war was turned against the Faliscans, B.C. 353 who lay under the same accusation; but the enemy were nowhere encountered. Having ranged over their lands and laid them waste, the Romans refrained from attacking their cities, and led their legions home. The rest of the year was consumed in repairing the walls and towers, and a temple was dedicated to Apollo.

XXI. In the latter part of the year the consular B.C. 352 election was broken off by a quarrel between the patricians and the plebs: the tribunes refused to permit the assembly to be held unless it were held agreeably to the Licinian law, and the dictator was obstinately determined rather to remove the consulship root and branch out of the state than to throw it open to patricians and plebs without distinction. The assembly was therefore repeatedly adjourned, until the dictator's term had expired, and the state reverted to an interregnum. The interreges found the commons hostile to the patricians, and the factional struggle continued until there had been eleven interreges. The tribunes continually vaunted their backing of the Licinian law: the plebs were more concerned with the distress they suffered from the increasing weight of usury, and their private worries broke out into public quarrels. Worn out with these, the senate ordered Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the interrex, for harmony's sake to observe the Licinian law at the consular election. Publius Valerius Publicola[1] was elected, with a plebeian colleague named Gaius Marcius Rutulus. Now that the minds of men were once inclined to concord, the new consuls set themselves to obtain relief in the matter of usury also, which appeared to be the sole

A.U.C. 402 una animos[1] videbatur, levare adgressi solutionem alieni aeris in publicam curam verterunt quinqueviris creatis quos mensarios ab dispensatione pecuniae
6 appellarunt. Meriti aequitate curaque sunt, ut per omnium annalium monumenta celebres nominibus essent; fuere autem C. Duillius[2] P. Decius Mus
7 M. Papirius Q. Publilius[3] et T. Aemilius. Qui rem difficillimam tractatu et plerumque parti utrique, semper certe alteri gravem cum alia moderatione tum impendio magis publico quam iactura sustinue-
8 runt. Tarda enim nomina et impeditiora inertia debitorum quam facultatibus aut aerarium mensis cum aere in foro positis dissolvit, ut populo prius caveretur, aut aestimatio aequis rerum pretiis liberavit, ut non modo sine iniuria sed etiam sine querimoniis partis utriusque exhausta vis ingens aeris alieni sit.

9 Terror inde vanus belli Etrusci, cum coniurasse duodecim populos fama esset, dictatorem dici coegit. Dictus in castris—eo enim ad consules missum senatus consultum est—C. Iulius, cui magister equitum adiectus L. Aemilius. Ceterum foris tran-
A.U.C. 403 quilla omnia fuere: (XXII.) temptatum domi per dictatorem ut ambo patricii consules crearentur rem
2 ad interregnum perduxit. Duo interreges C. Sulpi-

[1] una animos ς Jenicke: unanimos Ω: in animos DfA.
[2] Duillius A^{a}: duellius Ω.
[3] Publilius Glareanus: publius Ω.

obstacle to harmony. They made the discharge of B.C. 352 debts a concern of the state, appointing five commissioners, whom they called bankers, from their having the disposition of the money. These men by their impartiality and diligence fairly earned the distinction which attaches, in all the histories, to the names of Gaius Duillius, Publius Decius Mus, Marcus Papirius, Quintus Publilius, and Titus Aemilius. In the discharge of a very difficult duty, involving always a hardship for one of the parties, and in most instances for both, they managed matters wisely in other respects, and, in particular, they expended without throwing away the public funds. For with long-standing accounts, embarrassed more by the debtors' neglect than by their lack of means, they dealt in one of the following ways: either they paid them out of the treasury—taking security for the people first—at the banking tables they had set up in the Forum; or they settled them upon a valuation, at fair prices, of the debtor's effects. And so, not only without injustice, but even without complaint from either side, a vast amount of indebtedness was cleared off.

A groundless fear of war with Etruria, on a report that the twelve nations had conspired, compelled the appointment of a dictator. The appointment was made in camp—for thither had the resolution of the senate been sent to the consuls—and Gaius Julius became dictator, with Lucius Aemilius for master of the horse. But abroad all was serene, (XXII.) while at home an attempt, made through the B.C. 351 dictator, to obtain the return of patricians to both consulships, brought the state to an interregnum. The two interreges who were put in, Gaius Sulpicius

A.U.C. 403

cius et M. Fabius interpositi obtinuere, quod dictator frustra tetenderat, mitiore iam plebe ob recens meritum levati aeris alieni, ut ambo patricii consules
3 crearentur. Creati ipse C. Sulpicius Peticus, qui prior interregno abiit, et T. Quinctius Poenus; quidam Caesonem, alii Gaium praenomen [1] Quinctio
4 adiciunt. Ad bellum ambo profecti, Faliscum Quinctius, Sulpicius Tarquiniense, nusquam acie congresso hoste cum agris magis quam cum hominibus urendo
5 populandoque gesserunt bella; cuius lentae velut tabis senio victa utriusque pertinacia populi est, ut primum a consulibus, dein permissu eorum ab senatu
6 indutias peterent. In quadraginta annos impetraverunt.

Ita posita duorum bellorum quae imminebant cura, dum aliqua ab armis quies esset, quia solutio aeris alieni multarum rerum mutaverat dominos,
7 censum agi placuit. Ceterum cum censoribus creandis indicta comitia essent, professus censuram se petere C. Marcius Rutulus,[2] qui primus dictator de plebe
8 fuerat, concordiam ordinum turbavit; quod videbatur quidem tempore alieno fecisse, quia ambo tum forte patricii consules erant, qui rationem eius se
9 habituros negabant; sed et ipse constantia inceptum obtinuit et tribuni omni vi, ut reciperaturi [3] ius con-

[1] Gaium praenomen (i. e. c̄pnomen) Walters: cognomen Ω: c. cognomen Gelenius ("vetus lectio"): C. nomen Sigonius (Diod. XVI. liii. 1, has Γάϊος).

[2] Rutulus Conway: rutilius Ω.

[3] vi ut reciperaturi Conway: vi reciperaturi Weissenborn: ni reciperantur M: ui recuperandos O: ui reci (or -cu-) perando Ω: ui recuperatū A^2: vi ut reciperaretur Alschefski.

and Marcus Fabius, brought to pass what the dictator had vainly striven for; and the plebs being now grown more tractable, thanks to the help lately granted them in the relief of debt, both men elected consuls were patricians. These were that very Gaius Sulpicius Peticus, who was the earlier of the two interreges, and Titus Quinctius Poenus. (Some give Caeso, others Gaius, as the praenomen of Quinctius.) Both marched out to fight, Quinctius against the Faliscans, Sulpicius against the Tarquinienses; but nowhere encountering their enemies in battle, they warred rather with the land, which they burnt and pillaged, than with men; until the obstinacy of both peoples was overcome, as by the wasting of a lingering illness, and they requested a truce, first of the consuls, and later, by their permission, of the senate. They were granted one for forty years. B.C. 351

The anxiety arising from two threatening wars being thus allayed, it was resolved that while there was some rest from arms they would take the census; for the settlement of debts had brought about the change of ownership in many properties. But when notice had been given of an assembly for the election of censors, an announcement that he should be a candidate on the part of Gaius Marcius Rutulus, who had been the first plebeian dictator, played havoc with the harmony of the orders; for he seemed to have taken this step at an untoward time, since both the consuls, as it fell out, were then patricians, who declared that they would receive no votes for him; but Rutulus himself held firmly to his purpose, and the tribunes aided him with all their power, in the hope of re-

A.U.C. 403 sularibus comitiis amissum, adiuverunt, et cum ipsius viri maiestas nullius honoris fastigium non aequabat, tum per eundem qui ad dictaturam aperuisset viam censuram quoque in partem vocari plebes volebat. 10 Nec variatum comitiis est, quin cum Manlio Naevio censor Marcius [1] crearetur.

Dictatorem quoque hic annus habuit M. Fabium nullo terrore belli, sed ne Licinia lex comitiis consularibus observaretur. Magister equitum dictatori 11 additus Q. Servilius. Nec tamen dictatura potentiorem eum consensum [2] patrum consularibus comitiis A.U.C. 404 fecit, quam censoriis [3] fuerat. XXIII. M. Popilius Laenas a plebe consul, a patribus L. Cornelius Scipio datus.

Fortuna quoque inlustriorem plebeium consulem 2 fecit; nam cum ingentem Gallorum exercitum in agro Latino castra posuisse nuntiatum esset, Scipione gravi morbo implicito Gallicum bellum Popilio extra 3 ordinem datum. Is impigre exercitu scripto, cum omnes extra portam Capenam ad Martis aedem convenire armatos iuniores iussisset signaque eodem quaestores ex aerario deferre, quattuor expletis legionibus quod superfuit militum P. Valerio Publi- 4 colae praetori tradidit, auctor [4] patribus scribendi

[1] Naevio (or neuio or ne uio or le uio or naebio or cnaebio) Ω. The names are evidently corrupted: Walters thinks Livy wrote cum Cn. Manlio T. f. C. Marcius crearetur.

[2] consensum ς: consensu Ω: wanting in O.

covering what they had lost in the election of B.C. 351 consuls; and not only was the man's own greatness equal to any honour, however lofty, but the plebs desired that they might be called to share the censorship by the same man who had opened up for them a path to the dictatorship. There was no dissenting opinion shown at the assembly, and Marcius was elected, along with Manlius Naevius.

There was a dictator in this year also, namely, Marcus Fabius, not because of any threatened war, but to prevent the observance of the Licinian law in the consular election. Quintus Servilius was assigned to the dictator as master of the horse. But the dictatorship made the unanimity of the patricians no more potent in the election of consuls than it had been in the election of censors. XXIII. B.C. 350
Marcus Popilius Laenas was chosen from the plebs, Lucius Cornelius Scipio from the patricians.

Fortune even made the plebeian consul the more illustrious, for the news that a huge army of Gauls had encamped in Latium found Scipio afflicted with a grave disorder, and the conduct of the war was entrusted by special arrangement to Popilius. He levied troops with energy, and ordered all the young men to assemble under arms outside the Porta Capena, at the temple of Mars, commanding the quaestors to convey the standards thither, from the treasury. After filling up four legions, he turned over the supernumeraries to the praetor, Publius Valerius Publicola, urging the senators to enroll

---

[3] censoriis ς: censoris HT: censoris Ω: wanting in O.
[4] auctor Ω: auctori ς Alschefski: auctoribus ς.

A.U.C. 404 alterius exercitus, quod ad incertos belli eventus
5 subsidium rei publicae esset. Ipse iam satis omnibus instructis comparatisque ad hostem pergit. Cuius ut prius nosceret vires quam periculo ultimo temptaret, in tumulo quem proximum castris Gallorum capere
6 potuit vallum ducere coepit. Gens ferox et ingenii avidi ad pugnam cum procul visis Romanorum signis ut extemplo proelium initura explicuisset aciem, postquam neque in aequum demitti [1] agmen vidit et cum loci altitudine tum vallo etiam tegi Romanos, perculsos pavore rata, simul opportuniores quod intenti tum maxime operi essent, truci clamore ad-
7 greditur. Ab Romanis nec opus intermissum—triarii erant qui muniebant—et ab hastatis principibusque, qui pro munitoribus intenti armatique steterant,[2]
8 proelium initum. Praeter virtutem locus quoque superior adiuvit, ut pila omnia hastaeque non tamquam ex aequo missa vana, quod plerumque fit, caderent, sed omnia librata ponderibus figerentur;
9 oneratique telis Galli, quibus aut corpora transfixa aut praegravata inhaerentibus gerebant scuta, cum cursu paene in adversum subissent, primo incerti
10 restitere; dein, cum ipsa cunctatio et his animos minuisset et auxisset hosti, impulsi retro ruere alii

[1] demitti Sigonius: dimitti Ω.
[2] steterant ς: steterunt Ω: steterit H.

a second army as a national reserve against the B.C 350 uncertain emergencies of war. Having at length concluded all the necessary preparations, he himself marched against the enemy; and that he might first learn their strength before putting it to the test of a decisive battle, he seized and began to fortify an eminence as close as he could find to the camp of the Gauls. These, being a fierce people and by nature eager for the combat, on beholding the Roman ensigns in the distance, at once drew out their line, as if for instant battle. But perceiving that the Romans did not descend into the plain, but sought to protect themselves not only by their position but even with a rampart, they supposed them to be panic-stricken and at the same time the more open to attack for being just then taken up with their task. They advanced, therefore, with hideous yells. The Romans without a pause in their work, on which the reserves were engaged, began the action with their troops of the first and second lines, who had been standing alert and armed in front of the working party. Besides their valour, they had an advantage from the elevation, for their javelins and spears, instead of falling without effect, as they mostly do when thrown on a level field, were steadied by their own weight and all struck home. The Gauls were burdened with the missiles which had either transfixed their bodies, or, sticking in their shields, had made them very heavy; their dash had carried them almost up the slope, but first they halted, uncertain what to do, and then—for the mere delay had abated their ardour and increased that of their foes—they were thrown back, and falling one upon

A.U.C. 404 super alios stragemque inter se caede ipsa foediorem dare; adeo praecipiti turba obtriti plures quam ferro necati.

XXIV. Necdum certa Romanis victoria erat; alia 2 in campum degressis supererat moles; namque multitudo Gallorum, sensum omnem talis damni exsuperans, velut nova rursus exoriente acie integrum 3 militem adversus victorem hostem ciebat; stetitque suppresso impetu Romanus, et quia iterum fessis subeunda dimicatio erat, et quod consul, dum inter primores incautus agitat, laevo umero matari prope 4 traiecto cesserat parumper ex acie. Iamque omissa cunctando victoria erat, cum consul volnere alligato revectus ad prima signa "Quid stas, miles?" inquit; "non cum Latino Sabinoque hoste res est, quem 5 victum armis socium ex hoste facias; in beluas strinximus ferrum; hauriendus aut dandus est sanguis. Propulistis a castris, supina valle praecipites egistis, stratis corporibus hostium superstatis; complete eadem strage campos qua montes replestis. 6 Nolite exspectare, dum stantes vos fugiant; inferenda 7 sunt signa et vadendum in hostem." His adhortationibus iterum coorti pellunt loco primos manipulos Gallorum; cuneis deinde in medium agmen perrumanother wrought greater carnage than even their enemies had done; for so headlong was the rout, that more were trodden under foot than slain with the sword. B.C. 350

XXIV. But the Romans were not yet sure of victory; on descending into the plain they found another fight awaiting them. For the Gallic host, superior to any feeling for such losses, sprang up like a new army, and urged their fresh troops against the victorious foe. The Romans, slowing down, came to a halt, for they were confronted, weary as they were, with a second struggle, and the consul, rashly exposing himself in the van, had received a javelin in his left shoulder that had like to have gone clean through it, and had withdrawn for a brief space from the fight. And now the delay had almost lost them the victory, when the consul, whose wound had been dressed, rode up again to the front. "Why are you standing there, my men?" he exclaimed. "You have no Latin or Sabine foe to deal with, whom you may overcome in fight and transform from an enemy into an ally; we have drawn the sword against wild beasts, and we must have their blood or yield them ours. You have repulsed them from your camp, you have driven them headlong down a sloping valley, you stand on heaps of your slain enemies; cover the plain with the same carnage you have spread upon the mountains. Do not wait for the enemy to flee from you, while you stand still; you must move forward and attack them." Roused once more to action by these exhortations, they drove back the foremost of the Gallic maniples, and then, forming in wedges, burst through into the midst of the main

A.U.C. 404 8 punt. Inde barbari dissipati, quibus nec certa imperia nec duces essent, vertunt impetum in suos; fusique per campos et praeter castra etiam sua fuga praelati, quod editissimum inter aequales tumulos 9 occurrebat oculis, arcem Albanam petunt. Consul non ultra castra insecutus, quia et volnus degravabat et subicere exercitum tumulis ab hoste occupatis nolebat, praeda omni castrorum militi data victorem exercitum opulentumque Gallicis spoliis Romam 10 reduxit. Moram triumpho volnus consulis attulit eademque causa dictatoris desiderium senatui fecit, ut esset qui aegris consulibus comitia haberet. 11 Dictator L. Furius Camillus dictus, addito magistro equitum P. Cornelio Scipione, reddidit patribus possessionem pristinam consulatus. Ipse ob id meritum ingenti patrum studio creatus consul collegam Ap. Claudium Crassum dixit.

A.U.C. 406 XXV. Prius quam inirent novi consules magistratum, triumphus a Popilio de Gallis actus magno favore plebis; mussantesque inter se rogitabant 2 num quem plebeii consulis paeniteret; simul dictatorem increpabant, qui legis Liciniae spretae mercedem[1] privata cupiditate quam publica iniuria foediorem cepisset, ut se ipse consulem dictator crearet.

[1] mercedem Doering: mercedem (or mercede) consulatum Ω.

[1] Livy seems to have in mind the summit now called Monte Cavo, though it is strangely described as editissimum inter aequales tumulos.

[2] Probably, at this time, on the 1st of July.

array; whereat the barbarians were thrown into confusion, having no definite orders nor commanders, and, turning, charged upon their fellows; and so, dispersed about the fields, and even carried past their own camp in the rout, they made for the highest point in the range of hills that met their eyes, namely, the Alban Citadel.[1] The consul did not pursue them beyond their camp, for his wound was troubling him, and he was unwilling to send his troops against the hills which the enemy had occupied. Giving over to his soldiers the entire booty of the camp, he led back his army, flushed with victory and enriched with the Gallic spoils, to Rome. The consul's triumph was delayed by reason of his wound, which also made the senate wish for a dictator, that there might be someone—in the illness of the consuls—who could hold the election. Lucius Furius Camillus was appointed to that office, and Publius Cornelius Scipio was made his master of the horse. Camillus restored to the patricians their ancient possession of the consulship, and in recognition of this service was himself, with their warm support, elected consul, and announced the election of Appius Claudius Crassus as his colleague. B.C. 350

XXV. Before the new consuls entered office,[2] Popilius celebrated his triumph over the Gauls, with great enthusiasm on the part of the plebeians, who, muttering low, would often ask each other if anyone regretted the choice of a plebeian consul. At the same time they railed against Camillus, who by declaring himself elected consul, when he was dictator, had got a reward, they said, for his contempt of the Licinian law more disgraceful for his personal cupidity than for the injury done the commonwealth. B.C. 348

A.U.C. 406

3 Annus multis variisque motibus fuit insignis: Galli ex Albanis montibus, quia hiemis vim pati nequiverant, per campos maritimaque loca vagi 4 populabantur; mare infestum classibus Graecorum erat oraque litoris Antiatis Laurensque tractus et Tiberis ostia, ut praedones maritimi cum terrestribus congressi ancipiti semel proelio decertarint[1] dubiique discesserint in castra Galli, Graeci retro ad 5 naves, victos se an victores putarent. Inter hos longe maximus exstitit terror concilia populorum Latinorum ad lucum Ferentinae habita responsumque haud ambiguum imperantibus milites Romanis datum, absisterent imperare iis,[2] quorum auxilio 6 egerent: Latinos pro sua libertate potius quam pro 7 alieno imperio laturos arma. Inter duo simul bella externa defectione etiam sociorum senatus anxius, cum cerneret metu tenendos quos fides non tenuisset, extendere omnes imperii vires consules dilectu habendo iussit: civili quippe standum exercitu esse, 8 quando socialis coetus desereret. Undique, non urbana tantum sed etiam agresti iuventute, decem legiones scriptae dicuntur quaternum milium et 9 ducenorum[3] peditum equitumque trecenorum,[4] quem nunc novum exercitum, si qua externa vis ingruat,

[1] decertarint ς: decertarent Ω.
[2] iis ς: is MDL: hiis A: his Ω.
[3] ducenorum ς: ducentorum Ω.
[4] trecenorum ς: c c c Ω.

The year was signalized by many and various B.C. 348 disturbances. The Gauls came down from the Alban hills, having been unable to endure the sharpness of the winter, and ranging over the plains and sea-coast, laid waste the country. The sea was infested by fleets of Greeks, and so were the seaboard of Antium, the Laurentine district, and the mouth of the Tiber. It happened once that the sea-robbers encountered the land-raiders, and a hard-fought battle ensued, from which the Gauls withdrew to their camp and the Greeks to their ships, alike uncertain whether they had been defeated or victorious. But by far the greatest of these alarms was occasioned by councils of the Latin tribes, assembled at the grove of Ferentina, and the unambiguous reply vouchsafed by them to a demand for soldiers. Let the Romans, they said, have done with issuing commands to those whose assistance they required: the Latins would sooner bear arms in behalf of their own liberty than of an alien domination. Involved in two foreign wars at once, and worried besides by the defection of their allies, the senate perceived that those whom loyalty had not restrained must be restrained by fear, and bade the consuls exert the full extent of their authority in levying troops: for they must depend on a soldiery of citizens, when their allies were leaving them. They say that soldiers were enlisted everywhere, not in the City alone but in the country, and ten legions were embodied, each of four thousand two hundred foot and three hundred horse. The raising of a new army of this size to-day, in case of any aggression from abroad, could not easily be compassed by the concentration on one object of the

A.U.C. 406 hae vires populi Romani, quas vix terrarum capit orbis, contractae in unum haud facile efficiant; adeo in quae laboramus sola crevimus, divitias luxuriamque.

10 Inter cetera tristia eius anni consul alter Ap. Claudius in ipso belli apparatu moritur; redieratque [1]
11 res ad Camillum, cui unico consuli vel ob aliam dignationem haud subiciendam dictaturae vel ob omen faustum ad Gallicum tumultum cognominis dictatorem adrogari haud satis decorum visum est
12 patribus. Consul duabus legionibus urbi praepositis, octo cum L. Pinario praetore divisis, memor paternae virtutis Gallicum sibi bellum extra sortem sumit, praetorem maritimam oram tutari Graecosque arcere
13 litoribus iussit. Et cum in agrum Pomptinum descendisset, quia neque in campis congredi nulla cogente re volebat, et prohibendo populationibus quos rapto vivere necessitas cogeret satis domari credebat hostem, locum idoneum stativis delegit.

XXVI. Ubi cum in stationibus [2] quieti tempus tererent, Gallus processit magnitudine atque armis insignis; quatiensque scutum hasta cum silentium fecisset, provocat per interpretem unum ex Romanis
2 qui secum ferro decernat. M. erat Valerius tribunus militum adulescens, qui haud indigniorem eo decore

[1] redieratque $F^2\zeta$: redierant Ω.
[2] in stationibus Madvig: stationibus Ω.

[1] His father, the great Camillus, had defeated the Gauls after their capture of Rome (v. xlix.).

existing resources of the Roman People, though B.C. 348
the world hardly contains them; so strictly has our growth been limited to the only things for which we strive,—wealth and luxury.

Among the untoward occurrences of this year was the death of one of the consuls, Appius Claudius, in the midst of the preparations for war. The administration of the state passed to Camillus, over whom, as sole consul,—whether owing to his general high standing, which deserved not to be subordinated to the dictatorship, or to the happy omen, in a Gallic rising, of his surname,[1]—the Fathers concluded it not meet to set a dictator. The consul appointed two legions to defend the City, and divided the other eight with Lucius Pinarius the praetor. Having a lively recollection of his father's prowess, he took upon himself, without drawing lots, the conduct of the Gallic war, and commanded the praetor to secure the seaboard and prevent the Greeks from landing. Then, marching down into the Pomptine district, he chose a suitable site for a permanent camp; for he had no mind to meet the enemy in the field, unless compelled to do so, believing that he should effectually subdue them if he kept them from making raids, since they subsisted necessarily on plunder.

XXVI. While they were there quietly passing the time in guard-duty, a Gaul came out to them, remarkable for his great stature and his armour, and, smiting his spear against his shield and thereby obtaining silence, challenged the Romans, through an interpreter, to send a man to fight with him. There was a young tribune of the soldiers, named Marcus Valerius, who, regarding himself as no less se quam T. Manlium ratus, prius sciscitatus consulis

A.U.C. 406

3 voluntatem in medium armatus processit. Minus insigne certamen humanum numine interposito deorum factum; namque conserenti iam manum Romano corvus repente in galea consedit, in hostem
4 versus. Quod primo ut augurium caelo missum laetus accepit tribunus, precatus deinde, si divus si diva esset qui sibi praepetem misisset, volens pro-
5 pitius adesset. Dictu mirabile, tenuit non solum ales captam semel sedem, sed quotienscumque certamen initum est, levans se alis os oculosque hostis rostro et unguibus appetit, donec territum prodigii talis visu oculisque simul ac mente turbatum Valerius obtruncat; corvus ex conspectu elatus orientem petit.
6 Hactenus quietae utrimque stationes fuere; postquam spoliare corpus caesi hostis tribunus coepit, nec Galli se statione tenuerunt et Romanorum cursus ad victorem etiam ocior fuit. Ibi circa iacentis Galli corpus contracto certamine pugna atrox con-
7 citatur. Iam non manipulis proximarum stationum sed legionibus utrimque effusis res geritur. Camillus laetum militem victoria tribuni, laetum tam praesentibus ac secundis dis ire in proelium iubet; ostentansque insignem spoliis tribunum, "hunc imitare, miles" aiebat, "et circa iacentem ducem sterne
8 Gallorum catervas." Di hominesque illi adfuere worthy of that honour than Titus Manlius had been, B.C. 348 first ascertained the consul's wishes, and then armed himself and advanced into the midst. But the human interest of the combat was eclipsed by the intervention of the gods; for the Roman was in the very act of engaging, when suddenly a raven alighted on his helmet, facing his adversary. This the tribune first received with joy, as a heaven-sent augury, and then prayed that whosoever, be it god or goddess, had sent the auspicious bird might attend him with favour and protection. Marvellous to relate, the bird not only held to the place it had once chosen, but as often as the combatants closed, it rose on its wings and attacked the enemy's face and eyes with beak and talons, till he was terror-struck with the sight of such a portent, and bewildered at once in his vision and his mind, was dispatched by Valerius,—whereupon the raven flew off towards the east and was lost to sight. Hitherto the outguards on either side had stood quietly by; but when the tribune began to despoil the corpse of his fallen foe, the Gauls remained no longer at their station, and the Romans ran up even more swiftly to the victor. There a scuffle, arising over the body of the prostrate Gaul, led to a desperate fight that was not long confined to the maniples of the nearest outposts, for the legions, rushing out on both sides, carried on the battle. Camillus ordered his soldiers to fall on, elated as they were by the tribune's victory, elated too by the present assistance of the gods; and pointing to the tribune, decked out in his spoils, he cried, "Here is your pattern, soldiers! Bring down the Gauls in troops around their prostrate leader!"

A.U.C. 406 pugnae, depugnatumque haudquaquam certamine ambiguo cum Gallis est; adeo duorum militum eventum, inter quos pugnatum erat, utraque acies animis
9 praeceperat. Inter primos,[1] quorum concursus alios exciverat, atrox proelium fuit; alia multitudo, priusquam ad coniectum teli veniret, terga vertit. Primo per Volscos Falernumque agrum dissipati sunt; inde Apuliam ac mare inferum [2] petierunt.
10 Consul contione advocata laudatum tribunum decem bubus aureaque corona donat; ipse iussus ab
11 senatu bellum maritimum curare cum praetore iunxit castra. Ibi quia res trahi segnitia Graecorum non committentium se in aciem videbantur,[3] dictatorem comitiorum causa T. Manlium Torquatum ex auctoritate senatus dixit. Dictator magistro equitum A.
12 Cornelio Cosso dicto comitia consularia habuit aemulumque decoris sui absentem M. Valerium Corvum—id enim illi deinde cognominis fuit—summo favore populi, tres et viginti natum annos, consulem renun-
13 tiavit. Collega Corvo de plebe M. Popilius Laenas, quartum consul futurus, datus est. Cum Graecis a Camillo nulla memorabilis gesta res; nec illi terra 14 nec Romanus mari bellator erat. Postremo cum litoribus arcerentur, aqua etiam praeter cetera neces-

[1] inter primos Ω: in primos Harant.
[2] inferum Ω: superum ς.
[3] videbantur Ω: uidebatur H.

Both gods and men helped in that battle, and they B.C. 348 fought it out with the Gauls to a conclusion that was never doubtful, so clearly had each side foreseen the result implicit in the outcome of the single combat. Between those who began the fray, and by their conflict drew in the others, there was a bitter struggle; but the rest of the Gallic host turned tail ere they came within the cast of a javelin. At first they scattered among the Volsci and through the Falernian countryside; from there they made their way into Apulia or to the Tuscan Sea.

The consul assembled his soldiers, and having eulogized the tribune, bestowed on him ten oxen and a golden coronet; Camillus himself was commanded by the senate to take charge of the operations on the coast, and accordingly joined forces with the praetor. The campaign there seemed likely to be long drawn out, for the Greeks were poltroons and refused to risk an engagement. He therefore, on the authorization of the senate, appointed Titus Manlius Torquatus to be dictator, that an election might be held. The dictator, after naming Aulus Cornelius Cossus master of the horse, presided over a consular election, and announced, amid great popular rejoicings, that the choice had fallen—in his absence—upon a youth of twenty-three, the Marcus Valerius Corvus—for this was his surname from that time—who had rivalled Manlius's own glorious achievement. As colleague of Corvus they elected the plebeian Marcus Popilius Laenas to be for the fourth time consul. With the Greeks, Camillus fought no memorable action; they were no warriors on land, nor were the Romans on the sea. In the end, being kept off shore, and their

A.U.C. 406 15 saria usui deficiente Italiam reliquere. Cuius populi ea cuiusque gentis classis fuerit nihil certi est. Maxime Siciliae fuisse tyrannos crediderim; nam ulterior Graecia ea tempestate intestino fessa bello iam Macedonum opes horrebat.

A.U.C. 407–408 XXVII. Exercitibus dimissis cum et foris pax et domi concordia ordinum otium esset, ne nimis laetae res essent pestilentia civitatem adorta coegit senatum imperare decemviris ut libros Sibyllinos inspicerent;
2 eorumque monitu lectisternium fuit. Eodem anno Satricum ab Antiatibus colonia deducta restitutaque urbs quam Latini diruerant. Et cum Carthaginiensibus legatis Romae foedus ictum, cum amicitiam ac societatem petentes venissent.
3 Idem otium domi forisque mansit T. Manlio Torquato [1] C. Plautio consulibus. Semunciarium tantum ex unciario fenus factum, et in pensiones aequas triennii, ita ut quarta praesens esset, solutio aeris
4 alieni dispensata est; et sic quoque parte plebis adfecta fides tamen publica privatis difficultatibus potior ad curam senatui fuit. Levatae maxime res, quia tributo ac dilectu supersessum.
5 Tertio anno post Satricum restitutum a Volscis M. Valerius Corvus [2] iterum consul cum C. Poetelio factus, cum ex Latio nuntiatum esset legatos ab

[1] T. Manlio Torquato ς: T. Manlio Torquato, (·ii·) Ω. (Walters thinks this a corruption of l. f., i. e. Luci filio.)
[2] Corvus Ω: coruinus U.

[1] For these commissioners see VI. xlii. 2.
[2] See v. xiii. 6 and note there.
[3] This is the first mention in Livy of a treaty with the Carthaginians, and Diodorus (XVI. lxix.) also speaks of it as the first, but Polybius (III. xxii.) tells of a treaty between Rome and Carthage made in the first year of the Republic (509 B.C.).
[4] cf. chap. xvi. § 1 and note.

water giving out, as well as other necessaries, they abandoned Italy. To what people or race their fleet belonged is uncertain. I am most inclined to think that they were Sicilian tyrants; for Greece proper was at that time exhausted with civil wars and trembled, even then, at the power of the Macedonians. B.C. 348

XXVII. When the armies had been disbanded, and there was peace with other nations, and—thanks to the goodwill betwixt the orders—quietness at home, that the happiness of the citizens might not pass all bounds, a pestilence attacked them and the senate was compelled to order the ten commissioners[1] to consult the Sibylline Books. By their direction a lectisternium[2] was held. In the same year a colony was sent out to Satricum by the Antiates, and that city, which had been destroyed by the Latins, was rebuilt. Further, a treaty was entered into at Rome with envoys of the Carthaginians, who had come seeking friendship and an alliance.[3] B.C. 347-346

The same peaceful conditions continued at home and abroad during the consulship of Titus Manlius Torquatus and Gaius Plautius. But the rate of interest was reduced from one to one-half per cent.,[4] and debts were made payable, one-fourth down and the remainder in three annual instalments; even so some of the plebeians were distressed, but the public credit was of greater concern to the senate than were the hardships of single persons. What did the most to lighten the burden was the omission of the war-tax and the levy.

In the second year after the rebuilding of Satricum by the Volsci, Marcus Valerius Corvus became consul for the second time, with Gaius Poetelius. A report having come out of Latium that emissaries of the

A.U.C. 407–408

Antio circumire populos Latinorum ad concitandum
6 bellum, priusquam plus hostium fieret Volscis arma inferre iussus, ad Satricum exercitu infesto pergit. Quo cum Antiates aliique Volsci praeparatis iam ante, si quid ab Roma moveretur, copiis occurrissent, nulla mora inter infensos diutino odio dimicandi
7 facta est. Volsci, ferocior ad rebellandum quam ad bellandum gens, certamine victi fuga effusa Satrici moenia petunt. Et ne in muris quidem satis firma spe cum corona militum cincta iam scalis caperetur urbs, ad quattuor milia militum [1] praeter multitudi-
8 nem imbellem sese dedidere. Oppidum dirutum atque incensum: ab aede tantum matris Matutae abstinuere ignem. Praeda omnis militi data. Extra praedam quattuor milia deditorum habita; eos vinctos consul ante currum triumphans egit; venditis deinde
9 magnam pecuniam in aerarium redegit. Sunt qui hanc multitudinem captivam servorum fuisse scribant, idque magis veri simile est quam deditos venisse.

A.U.C. 409–411

XXVIII. Hos consules secuti sunt M. Fabius Dorsuo Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus. Auruncum inde
2 bellum ab repentina populatione coeptum; metuque ne id factum populi unius consilium omnis nominis Latini esset, dictator—velut adversus [2] armatum iam

[1] ad $\overline{\text{IIII}}$ (or IIII milia) militum (militum omitted by OHLA) Ω.
[2] adversus ς: aduersum Ω.

[1] An Italian goddess associated with birth and the dawn, and widely worshipped; in Satricum apparently the chief deity. cf. Warde Fowler, Festivals, p. 155.

Antiates were circulating amongst the Latin peoples with a view to stir up war, Valerius was ordered to deal with the Volsci before more enemies should arise, and marched to the attack of Satricum. There he was opposed by the Antiates and the other Volsci, with forces which they had levied in advance, in case any measures should be taken by the Romans; and both sides being actuated by inveterate hatred, the battle was joined without delay. The Volsci, a race more spirited in beginning than in prosecuting war, were defeated in the struggle and fled in disorder to the walls of Satricum. Indeed, they put no great reliance even in their walls, for when the city had been encircled with troops and was on the point of being escaladed, they surrendered, being in number about four thousand soldiers, besides the unarmed populace. The town was dismantled and burnt; only the temple of Mater Matuta[1] was saved from the flames. All the booty was given to the soldiers. The four thousand who had surrendered were not reckoned a part of the spoils; these the consul sent in chains before his chariot when he triumphed, and they were subsequently sold, and brought in a great sum to the treasury. Some think that this multitude of captives consisted of slaves, and this is more likely than that surrendered men were sold. B.C. 347–346

XXVIII. These consuls were succeeded by Marcus Fabius Dorsuo and Servius Sulpicius Camerinus. War then broke out with the Aurunci, in consequence of a raid which they unexpectedly executed. It was feared that this act of a single nation might be the joint design of all of the Latin name, and a dictator was appointed—as though to B.C. 345–343

A.U.C. 409–411

Latium—L. Furius creatus magistrum equitum Cn. 3 Manlium Capitolinum dixit; et cum—quod per magnos tumultus fieri solitum erat—iustitio indicto dilectus sine vacationibus habitus esset, legiones quantum maturari potuit in Auruncos ductae. Ibi praedonum magis quam hostium animi inventi; 4 prima itaque acie debellatum est. Dictator tamen, quia et ultro bellum intulerant et sine detractatione se certamini offerebant, deorum quoque opes adhibendas ratus inter ipsam dimicationem aedem Iunoni Monetae vovit; cuius damnatus voti cum victor 5 Romam revertisset, dictatura se abdicavit. Senatus duumviros ad eam aedem pro amplitudine populi Romani faciendam creari iussit; locus in arce destinatus, quae area aedium M. Manli Capitolini fuerat. 6 Consules dictatoris exercitu ad bellum Volscum usi Soram ex hostibus, incautos adorti, ceperunt.

Anno postquam vota erat aedes Monetae dedicatur C. Marcio Rutulo [1] tertium T. Manlio Torquato 7 iterum consulibus. Prodigium extemplo dedicationem secutum, simile vetusto montis Albani prodigio; namque et lapidibus pluit et nox interdiu visa intendi; librisque inspectis cum plena religione oppose a Latium already up in arms—in the person of Lucius Furius. After naming Gnaeus Manlius Capitolinus to be his master of the horse, he suspended the courts, and having levied troops without exemptions—as was customary in great emergencies—he led them with all possible speed against the Aurunci. These he discovered to possess the spirit of freebooters rather than of enemies, and so brought the war to a conclusion in the first engagement. Howbeit the dictator, considering that they had been the aggressors in the war and were accepting battle without shrinking, saw fit to summon even the gods to help him, and in the heat of the encounter vowed a temple to Juno Moneta. This vow the result made binding, and the dictator having returned to Rome victorious, resigned his authority. The senate ordered that two commissioners should be designated to erect the temple in a style becoming to the grandeur of the Roman People, and a site was appointed for it in the Citadel, where once had stood the house of Marcus Manlius Capitolinus. The consuls, employing the dictator's army for the Volscian war, made a surprise attack upon the enemy and captured Sora. B.C. 345–343

[1] Rutulo Conway: rutilo Ω: rutilio UO.

[1] I. xxxi. 1.
[2] i. e. the Sibylline Books.

The temple of Moneta was dedicated the next year after it was vowed, when Gaius Marcius Rutulus was consul for the third time and Titus Manlius Torquatus for the second. The dedication was immediately followed by a prodigy like the one which had happened long before on the Alban Mount;[1] for a shower of stones fell, and a curtain of night seemed to stretch across the sky; and when the Books[2] had been consulted and the City was filled with forebodings of divine displeasure, the

A.U.C. 409–411

civitas esset, senatui placuit dictatorem feriarum
8 constituendarum causa dici. Dictus P. Valerius Publicola; magister equitum ei Q. Fabius Ambustus datus est. Non tribus tantum supplicatum ire placuit sed finitimos etiam populos, ordoque iis, quo quisque
9 die supplicarent, statutus. Iudicia eo anno populi tristia in feneratores facta, quibus ab aedilibus dicta dies esset, traduntur. Et res haud ulla insigni ad
10 memoriam causa ad interregnum redit; ex interregno, ut id actum videri posset, ambo patricii consules creati sunt, M. Valerius Corvus tertium A. Cornelius Cossus.

XXIX. Maiora iam hinc bella et viribus hostium et vel longinquitate regionum vel temporum spatio [1] quibus bellatum est dicentur. Namque eo anno adversus Samnites, gentem opibus armisque
2 validam, mota arma; Samnitium bellum ancipiti Marte gestum Pyrrhus hostis, Pyrrhum Poeni secuti. Quanta rerum moles! Quotiens in extrema periculorum ventum, ut in hanc magnitudinem quae vix
3 sustinetur erigi imperium posset! Belli autem causa cum Samnitibus Romanis, cum societate amicitiaque iuncti essent, extrinsecus venit, non orta inter ipsos
4 est. Samnites Sidicinis iniusta arma, quia viribus plus poterant, cum intulissent, coacti inopes ad opu-

[1] et vel longinquitate regionum vel temporum spatio Cornelissen: et longinquitate uel regionum uel temporum spatio Ω (but U transposes regionum and temporum: L has religionum uel templorum: HTD have religionum).

senate resolved on the appointment of a dictator, to establish days of worship. The choice fell on Publius Valerius Publicola, who was given Quintus Fabius Ambustus as master of the horse. They determined that not only the Roman tribes but the neighbouring peoples also should offer supplications; and they appointed an order for them, on what day each should make entreaty. It is handed down that during this year the people rendered severe judgments against usurers, who had been brought to trial by the aediles. The state—for no specially memorable reason—reverted to an interregnum, which was followed—so that this might appear to have been intended—by the election to both consulships of patricians, namely Marcus Valerius Corvus, for the third time, and Aulus Cornelius Cossus. B.C. 345–343

XXIX. Wars of greater magnitude, in respect both of the forces of our enemies and of the remoteness of their countries and the long periods of time involved, now fall to be related. For in that year the sword was drawn against the Samnites, a people powerful in arms and in resources; and hard upon the Samnite war, which was waged with varying success, came war with Pyrrhus, and after that with the Carthaginians. How vast a series of events! How many times the extremity of danger was incurred, in order that our empire might be exalted to its present greatness, hardly to be maintained! Now the cause of the war between the Romans and the Samnites, who had been united in friendship and alliance, was of external origin and not owing to themselves. The Samnites had unjustly attacked the Sidicini, because they happened to be more powerful than they, and the Sidicini, driven in their

A.U.C. 409–411

lentiorum auxilium confugere Campanis sese coniun-
5 gunt. Campani magis nomen ad praesidium sociorum quam vires cum attulissent, fluentes luxu ab duratis usu armorum, in Sidicino pulsi agro in se deinde
6 molem omnem belli verterunt. Namque Samnites, omissis Sidicinis ipsam arcem finitimorum Campanos adorti, unde aeque facilis victoria, praedae atque gloriae plus esset, Tifata, imminentes Capuae colles, cum praesidio firmo occupassent, descendunt inde quadrato agmine in planitiem quae Capuam Tifataque
7 interiacet. Ibi rursus acie dimicatum; adversoque proelio Campani intra moenia compulsi, cum robore iuventutis suae acciso nulla propinqua spes esset, coacti sunt ab Romanis petere auxilium.

XXX. Legati introducti in senatum maxime in hanc sententiam locuti sunt. "Populus nos Campanus legatos ad vos, patres conscripti, misit amicitiam in perpetuum, auxilium praesens a vobis petitum.
2 Quam si secundis rebus nostris petissemus, sicut coepta celerius ita infirmiore vinculo contracta esset; tunc enim, ut qui ex aequo nos venisse in amicitiam meminissemus, amici forsitan pariter ac nunc, subiecti
3 atque obnoxii vobis minus essemus; nunc, miseri-

need to fly for succour to a more wealthy nation, had attached themselves to the Campanians. The Campanians had brought reputation rather than real strength to the defence of their allies; enervated by luxury, they had encountered a people made hardy by the use of arms, and being defeated in the territory of the Sidicini, had then drawn down the full force of the war upon themselves. For the Samnites, disregarding the Sidicini and attacking the Campanians—the very stronghold of their neighbours,—from whom they would gain full as easy a victory and more plunder and renown, had seized and with a strong force occupied Tifata—a range of hills looking down on Capua—and thence had descended in battle-order into the plain that lies between. There a second battle had been fought, and the Campanians, being worsted, had been shut up within their walls; and having, after the loss of their choicest troops, no prospect of relief at hand, had been driven to seek assistance of the Romans. B.C. 345–343

XXX. Their ambassadors, on being introduced into the senate, spoke substantially as follows: "The Campanian people has sent us to you as ambassadors, Conscript Fathers, to solicit your lasting friendship and present help. Had we sought this amity when our affairs were prosperous, though it had been begun more quickly, yet had it been contracted with a weaker bond; for in that case, as those who remembered that they had joined with you in friendship on an equal footing, though perhaps as much your friends as now, we should have been less subject and beholden to you; as it is, attached to you by your compassion cordia vestra conciliati auxilioque in dubiis rebus defensi, beneficium quoque acceptum colamus oportet, ne ingrati atque omni ope divina humanaque indigni videamur. Neque hercule, quod Samnites priores amici sociique vobis facti sunt, ad id valere arbitror ne nos in amicitiam accipiamur, sed ut ii [1] vetustate et gradu honoris nos praestent; neque enim foedere Samnitium, ne qua nova iungeretis foedera, cautum est.

A.U.C. 409–411

"Fuit quidem apud vos semper satis iusta causa amicitiae velle eum vobis amicum esse qui vos appeteret: Campani, etsi fortuna praesens magnifice loqui prohibet, non urbis amplitudine, non agri ubertate ulli populo praeterquam vobis cedentes, haud parva, ut arbitror, accessio bonis rebus vestris in amicitiam venimus vestram. Aequis Volscisque, aeternis hostibus huius urbis, quandocumque se moverint, ab tergo erimus; et quod vos pro salute nostra priores feceritis, id nos pro imperio vestro et gloria semper faciemus. Subactis his gentibus quae inter nos vosque sunt, quod propediem futurum spondet et virtus et fortuna vestra, continens imperium usque ad nos habebitis. Acerbum ac miserum est, quod fateri nos fortuna nostra cogit: eo ventum est, patres conscripti, ut aut amicorum aut inimicorum Campani simus. Si defenditis, vestri, si deseritis, Samnitium erimus; Capuam ergo et Campaniam and defended in our time of trouble by your aid, B.C. 345–343

[1] ut ii Walters: ut hi U: ut Ω.

we must lovingly remember the benefit also, lest we appear as ingrates and undeserving of any help, divine or human. Nor do I think, in sober truth, that the circumstance of the Samnites having become your allies and friends before ourselves should make against our being received into your friendship, though it entitle them to an advantage over us in respect of priority and rank; and indeed there was no stipulation in your treaty with the Samnites that you should make no further treaties.

"It has ever been with you a sufficiently just cause for friendship that he who sought you desired to be friends with you. We Campanians, though our present plight will not suffer us to boast, are inferior neither in the splendour of our city, nor yet in the fertility of our soil, to any people but yourselves; and in associating ourselves with you we bring, as I think, no small accession to your prosperity. As often as the Aequi and the Volsci—perpetual enemies of this city—shall stir abroad, we shall be upon their backs, and what you will have done first for our preservation, that we will ever do for your empire and your glory. When once you have subdued these nations that lie between our boundaries and your own—a thing which your valour and good fortune guarantee will speedily come to pass—your rule will extend unbroken all the way to our frontier. Grievous and pitiful is the confession that our misfortune obliges us to make: to that pass, Conscript Fathers, are we Campanians come that we must be the chattels either of our friends or of our enemies. Defend us, and we are yours; desert us, and the Samnites will possess us. Consider thereomnem vestris an Samnitium viribus accedere malitis, deliberate.

A.U.C. 409–411

11 "Omnibus quidem, Romani, vestram misericordiam vestrumque auxilium aequum est patere, iis[1] tamen maxime, qui, ea[2] implorantibus aliis[3] dum supra vires suas praestant, ante omnes[4] ipsi in hanc 12 necessitatem venerunt. Quamquam pugnavimus verbo pro Sidicinis re pro nobis, cum videremus finitimum populum nefario latrocinio Samnitium peti et, ubi conflagrassent Sidicini, ad nos traiecturum 13 illud incendium esse. Nec enim nunc quia dolent iniuriam acceptam Samnites, sed quia gaudent obla- 14 tam sibi esse causam, oppugnatum nos veniunt. An, si ultio irae haec et non occasio cupiditatis explendae esset, parum fuit quod semel in Sidicino agro iterum 15 in Campania ipsa legiones nostras cecidere? Quae est ista tam infesta ira quam per duas acies fusus sanguis explere non potuerit? Adde huc populationem agrorum, praedas hominum atque pecudum actas, incendia villarum ac ruinas, omnia ferro ignique 16 vastata. Hiscine ira expleri non potuit? Sed cupiditas explenda est. Ea ad oppugnandam Capuam rapit; aut delere urbem pulcherrimam aut ipsi pos- 17 sidere volunt. Sed vos potius, Romani, beneficio vestro occupate eam quam illos habere per maleficium sinatis. Non loquor apud recusantem iusta bella

[1] iis ς: hiis A: his Ω.
[2] ea Madvig: eam Ω: etiam *UO*ς.
[3] aliis Madvig: aliis auxilium (wanting in O) Ω.
[4] ante omnes Buettner: omnes Ω.

fore whether it be your preference that Capua and all Campania augment Rome's power, or that of Samnium. B.C. 345–343

"It is meet that your compassion, Romans, and your succour should be open to all mankind, but especially to those who in endeavouring beyond their strength to grant these blessings to the prayers of others, have come themselves to require them most of all. And yet we fought but ostensibly for the Sidicini, in reality for ourselves, since we saw that a people on our borders was being cruelly despoiled by the brigand Samnites, and that, once that conflagration had consumed the Sidicini, it would spread to us. Nor at this very moment are the Samnites come to attack us out of resentment for any injury received, but rejoicing rather that a pretext has been afforded them. Otherwise, if this were the satisfaction of revenge and not an opportunity to appease their greed, was it not enough that first in the territory of Sidicinum, and again in Campania itself, they made slaughter of our legions? What wrath is this, that is so implacable that the blood two armies have poured out cannot appease it? Add to this the devastation of our lands and the booty they have driven off, both men and cattle; add the burning and destruction of our farm-houses and the general havoc fire and sword have wrought. Could not all this placate their wrath? Nay, but their greed must be appeased. It is this that hurries them to the siege of Capua; they must needs either destroy the fairest of cities, or themselves become its masters. But do you, Romans, sooner gain it by your generosity than suffer them to have it by their malice. I am not speaking before a people that populum; sed tamen, si ostenderitis auxilia vestra, 18 ne bello quidem arbitror vobis opus fore. Usque ad nos contemptus Samnitium pervenit, supra non ascendit; itaque umbra vestri auxilii, Romani, tegi possumus, quidquid deinde habuerimus, quidquid

A.U.C. 409-411

19 ipsi fuerimus,[1] vestrum id omne existimaturi. Vobis arabitur ager Campanus, vobis Capua urbs frequentabitur; conditorum, parentium, deorum immortalium numero nobis eritis; nulla colonia vestra erit, quae nos obsequio erga vos fideque superet.

20 "Adnuite, patres conscripti, nutum numenque[2] vestrum invictum Campanis et iubete sperare incolu-
21 mem Capuam futuram. Qua frequentia omnium[3] generum multitudinis prosequente creditis nos illinc profectos? Quam omnia votorum lacrimarumque plena reliquisse? In qua nunc exspectatione senatum populumque Campanum, coniuges liberosque nostros
22 esse? Stare omnem multitudinem ad portas viam hinc ferentem prospectantes certum habeo. Quid illis nos, patres conscripti, sollicitis ac pendentibus
23 animi[4] renuntiare iubetis?[5] Alterum responsum salutem victoriam lucem ac libertatem; alterum— ominari horreo quae ferat. Proinde ut aut de vestris futuris sociis atque amicis aut nusquam ullis futuris nobis consulite."

XXXI. Summotis deinde legatis cum consultus senatus esset, etsi magnae parti urbs maxima opulentissimaque Italiae, uberrimus ager marique propin-

[1] quidquid ipsi fuerimus A^2 (or A^1)ς: quidquid id ipsi fuerimus (but M omits the whole phrase and H everything between quidquid and arabitur) Ω.
[2] numenque Ω: nomenque $M\varsigma$.
[3] omnium M^3A^2: ominum D^2: hominum Ω.
[4] animi Florebellus: animis Ω: wanting in O.
[5] iubetis? Madvig: iubeatis Ω.

refuses righteous wars; still, if you make but a show of helping us, you will have, I think, no need of going to war. As far as to ourselves does the scorn of the Samnites reach, it mounts not higher; accordingly the shadow of your help is able, Romans, to protect us, and whatever thereafter we shall have, whatever we ourselves shall be, we shall consider wholly yours. For you shall be ploughed the Campanian plain, for you shall the city of Capua be crowded; you shall be to us as founders, parents, and immortal gods; you shall have no colony that surpasses us in obedience and loyalty. B.C. 345-343

"Grant the favour of your countenance, Conscript Fathers, and of your unconquered might, to the Campanians, and bid them hope that Capua will be saved. With what thronging crowds of every sort were we accompanied, think you, at our setting out? How did we leave on every hand prayers and tears! In what suspense are now the senate and the people of Campania, our wives and our children! Well I know that all the people are standing at the gates, their eyes fixed on the northern road. What message, Conscript Fathers, do you bid us carry back to their perplexed and troubled spirits? One answer would bring salvation, victory, light, and liberty; the other—I shrink from the ominous prediction! Do you therefore deliberate regarding us, as regarding those who shall either be your allies and friends, or else have no being anywhere."

XXXI. The ambassadors were then made to withdraw while the senate considered their request. It was evident to many that the largest and wealthiest city of Italy, with a very fertile territory near the quus ad varietates annonae horreum populi Romani fore videbatur, tamen anta utilitate fides antiquior fuit, responditque ita ex auctoritate senatus consul.

A.U.C. 409–411

2 "Auxilio vos, Campani, dignos censet senatus; sed ita vobiscum amicitiam institui par est, ne qua vetustior amicitia ac societas violetur. Samnites nobiscum foedere iuncti sunt; itaque arma, deos prius quam homines violatura, adversus Samnites vobis negamus; legatos, sicut fas iusque est, ad socios atque amicos precatum mittemus, ne qua vobis
3 vis fiat." Ad ea princeps legationis—sic enim domo mandatum attulerant—"Quando quidem" inquit, "nostra tueri adversus vim atque iniuriam iusta vi
4 non voltis, vestra certe defendetis; itaque populum Campanum urbemque Capuam, agros, delubra deum, divina humanaque omnia in vestram, patres conscripti, populique Romani dicionem dedimus, quidquid deinde patiemur, dediticii vestri passuri."
5 Sub haec dicta omnes, manus ad consules tendentes, pleni lacrimarum in vestibulo curiae
6 procubuerunt. Commoti patres vice fortunarum humanarum, si ille praepotens opibus populus, luxuria superbiaque clarus, a quo paulo ante auxilium finitimi

---

[1] i. e. the gods who were witnesses and guardians of the treaty.

sea, would in times of scarcity be a store-house for the Roman People. Yet this great advantage was of less moment with them than their honour, and the consul, being so instructed by the senate, returned the following answer to the ambassadors: "Men of Campania, the senate holds you worthy of assistance; but on such terms only can we become your friends as shall not violate an older friendship and alliance. The Samnites and we are united by a covenant; we must therefore refuse to make war in your behalf upon the Samnites, for this would be to wrong first gods,[1] and then men; we will, however, dispatch envoys, as is right and just, to entreat our allies and friends to do you no violence." To this the leader of the delegation answered—in accordance with instructions they had brought with them:—"Since you decline to use a righteous violence to protect from violence and injustice what belongs to us, you will at least defend your own; to your sovereignty, therefore, Conscript Fathers, and to the sovereignty of the Roman People, we surrender the people of Campania and the city of Capua, with our lands, the shrines of our gods, and all things else, whether sacred or profane; whatever we endure henceforth, we shall endure as your surrendered subjects." B.C. 345–343

When these words had been pronounced, they all stretched forth their hands in supplication to the consul, and weeping bitterly, threw themselves face downwards on the floor of the entrance to the Curia. The Fathers were profoundly moved by the vicissitudes of human fortune, considering how that great and opulent people, famed for its luxury and pride, of whom a little while before its neighbours

A.U.C. 409–411

petissent adeo infractos gereret animos ut se ipse
7 suaque omnia potestatis alienae faceret. Tum iam fides agi visa deditos non prodi; nec facturum aequa Samnitium populum censebant, si agrum urbemque per deditionem factam populi Romani oppugnarent.
8 Legatos itaque extemplo mitti ad Samnites placuit. Data mandata ut preces Campanorum, responsum senatus amicitiae Samnitium memor, deditionem
9 postremo factam Samnitibus exponerent; peterent pro societate amicitiaque, ut dediticiis suis parcerent neque in eum agrum qui populi Romani factus esset
10 hostilia arma inferrent; si leniter agendo parum proficerent, denuntiarent Samnitibus, populi Romani senatusque verbis, ut Capua urbe Campanoque agro 11 abstinerent. Haec legatis agentibus in concilio Samnitium adeo est ferociter responsum ut non solum gesturos se esse dicerent id bellum, sed magistratus eorum e curia egressi stantibus[1] legatis praefectos cohortium vocarent iisque clara voce
12 imperarent ut praedatum in agrum Campanum extemplo proficiscerentur.

XXXII. Hac legatione Romam relata positis omnium aliarum rerum curis patres fetialibus ad res repetendas missis belloque, quia non redderentur, sollemni more indicto decreverunt ut primo quoque

[1] stantibus Ω: astantibus unknown scholar in marg. ed. Curionis.

---

[1] The Samnites were a loose federation comprising the following tribes: the Hirpini, the Caudini, the Pentri, the Caraceni, and perhaps the Frentani (Weissenborn).

[2] For the fetials and their procedure in declaring war, see I. xxiv. 4 and xxxii. 5, with notes.

had sought assistance, was become so broken in spirit as to yield itself up with all its possessions to the dominion of another. They now held it to be a point of honour not to betray those who were become their subjects; neither did they think that the Samnite people would deal justly, if they attacked a country and a city, which, by surrendering, had become the property of the Roman People. The senate accordingly voted to dispatch ambassadors to the Samnites, without loss of time. Their instructions were to inform the Samnites what the Campanians had asked, how the senate, mindful of the friendship of the Samnites, had replied to them, and lastly how they had surrendered; they were then to request that the Samnites, out of regard for the friendship and alliance of the Romans, would spare their subjects, and make no hostile incursion into a territory which belonged now to the Roman People; if soft words proved ineffectual, they were to warn the Samnites, in the name of the Roman People and the senate, not to meddle with the city of Capua or the Campanian domain. But the Samnites, when these things were represented to them in their council[1] by the envoys, behaved so insolently as not only to declare that they meant to carry on the war, but their magistrates stepping out of the senate-house—while the envoys stood by—summoned the commanders of their cohorts, and with a loud voice gave them orders to proceed at once to make a raid upon Campania. B.C. 345–343

XXXII. When the news of this embassy reached Rome, the Fathers, putting aside all other business, sent fetials to demand redress, and failing to obtain it, declared war after the customary fashion.[2] They

A.U.C. 409–411

2 tempore de ea re ad populum ferretur; iussuque populi consules ambo cum duobus exercitibus[1] profecti, Valerius in Campaniam Cornelius in Samnium, ille ad montem Gaurum[2] hic ad Saticulam[3] 3 castra ponunt. Priori Valerio Samnitium legiones—eo namque omnem belli molem inclinaturam censebant—occurrunt; simul in Campanos stimulabat ira tam promptos nunc ad ferenda nunc ad accersenda 4 adversus se auxilia. Ut vero castra Romana viderunt, ferociter pro se quisque signum duces poscere; adfirmare eadem fortuna Romanum Campano laturum opem qua Campanus Sidicino tulerit.

5 Valerius levibus certaminibus temptandi hostis causa haud ita multos moratus dies signum pugnae 6 proposuit, paucis suos adhortatus ne novum bellum eos novusque hostis terreret: quidquid ab urbe longius proferrent arma, magis magisque in imbelles 7 gentes eos prodire. Ne Sidicinorum Campanorumque cladibus Samnitium aestimarent virtutem; qualescumque inter se certaverint, necesse fuisse alteram partem vinci. Campanos quidem haud dubie magis nimio luxu fluentibus rebus mollitiaque sua quam vi 8 hostium victos esse. Quid autem esse duo prospera in tot saeculis bella Samnitium adversus tot decora

[1] exercitibus ς Walters and Conway: ab urbe exercitibus Ω: exercitibus ab urbe $M\varsigma$: wanting in O.

[2] Gaurum D^4A^2 Frag. Haverk. ς: caurum UHT^2A: c. aurum MTDL: caubrum P: claurum F: illegible in O.

[3] Saticulam Sigonius: satriculam Ω: satriaculam T satriculum A.

then voted that the people be asked to ratify this action at the earliest possible moment; and being commanded so to do, both consuls took the field; and Valerius marching into Campania and Cornelius into Samnium, the one encamped at the foot of Mount Gaurus, the other near Saticula. It was Valerius whom the Samnite levies encountered first —for that was the direction which they expected the invasion to take. The Campanians moreover had incurred their sharp resentment, having been so ready now to render aid against them, now to invoke it. But when they beheld the Roman camp, they began, every man for himself, to call loudly on their leaders for the battle-signal, affirming that the Romans would have no better fortune in helping the Campanians than these had experienced in helping the Sidicini. B.C. 345–343

Valerius, having delayed not many days for the purpose of testing the enemy in small skirmishes, hung out the signal for a battle. But first he spoke a few words of encouragement to his soldiers, bidding them have no fear of a strange war and a strange enemy. With every advance of their arms from Rome, he said, they came to nations that were more and more unwarlike. They must not judge of the courage of the Samnites by the defeats they had administered to the Sidicini and Campanians. Whatever their respective qualities, it was inevitable that when they fought together, one side should be vanquished. As for the Campanians, there was no question they had been beaten rather by the enervation resulting from excessive luxury and by their own effeminacy, than by the strength of their enemies. Furthermore, what were the Samnites' two successful wars in so many ages, as populi Romani, qui triumphos paene plures quam annos ab urbe condita numeret; qui omnia circa se, 9 Sabinos Etruriam Latinos Hernicos Aequos Volscos Auruncos, domita armis habeat [1] qui Gallos tot proeliis caesos postremo in mare ac naves fuga com- 10 pulerit? Cum gloria belli ac virtute sua quemque fretos ire in aciem debere, tum etiam intueri cuius ductu auspicioque ineunda pugna sit, utrum qui, 11 audiendus dumtaxat, magnificus adhortator sit, verbis tantum ferox, operum militarium expers, an qui et ipse tela tractare, procedere ante signa, versari media 12 in mole pugnae sciat. " Facta mea, non dicta vos, milites " inquit, " sequi volo, nec disciplinam modo sed exemplum etiam a me petere. Non factionibus [2] nec per coitiones [3] usitatas nobilibus, sed hac dextra mihi tres consulatus summamque laudem peperi. 13 Fuit cum hoc dici poterat: " Patricius enim eras et a liberatoribus patriae ortus, et eodem anno familia ista consulatum quo urbs haec consulem habuit ": 14 nunc iam nobis patribus vobisque plebei promiscuus consulatus patet nec generis, ut ante, sed virtutis est praemium. Proinde summum quodque spectate, 15 milites, decus. Non, si mihi novum hoc Corvini

A.U.C. 409—411

[1] habeat A^1: habeant Ω: habebant (habebat D^2) D.
[2] factiones Glareanus: factionibus modo Ω.
[3] coitiones ς: c̄tiones (or c̄ciones, or conciones) Ω.

[1] This, the later form of the name, is found here and in chap. xl. § 3, though in other places Livy gives the earlier form, Corvus.

against the many glorious achievements of the Roman People, who could count almost more triumphs than the years since their City had been founded; who had subjugated by their arms all the nations round about them, the Sabines, Etruria, the Latins, the Hernici, the Aequi, the Volsci, and the Aurunci; who after beating the Gauls time after time in battle, had ended by compelling them to flee to the sea-board and their ships? He said that they ought, as they went into action, not only to rely every man on his own courage and martial glory, but also to consider under whose command and auspices they would have to fight; whether he were one who only merited a hearing as a brilliant orator, warlike only in his words, and ignorant of military operations, or one who knew himself how to handle weapons, to advance before the standards, and to play his part in the press and turmoil of a battle. "Soldiers," he cried, "it is my deeds and not my words I would have you follow, and look to me not only for instruction but for example. Not with factions, nor with the intrigues common amongst the nobles, but with this right hand, have I won for myself three consulships and the highest praise. Time was when it might have been said: 'Ah, but you were a patrician and sprung from the liberators of your country, and your family held the consulship in the very year that saw the institution of that office.' But now the consulship lies open on equal terms to us, the nobles, and to you plebeians, nor is it any longer a reward of birth, but of merit. Have regard, therefore, soldiers, in every instance, to great honours. Though you men have given me, with Heaven's sanction, my surname of Corvinus,[1] I have B.C. 345–343

A.U.C. 409–411

cognomen dis auctoribus homines dedistis, Publicolarum vetustum familiae nostrae cognomen memoria
16 excessit; semper ego plebem Romanam militiae domique, privatus, in magistratibus parvis magnisque, aeque tribunus ac consul, eodem tenore per omnes
17 deinceps consulatus colo atque colui. Nunc, quod instat, dis bene iuvantibus novum atque integrum de Samnitibus triumphum mecum petite."

XXXIII. Non alias militi familiarior dux fuit omnia inter infimos militum haud gravate munia obeundo.
2 In ludo praeterea militari, cum velocitatis viriumque inter se aequales certamina ineunt, comiter facilis; vincere ac vinci voltu eodem, nec quemquam asper-
3 nari parem qui se offerret; factis benignus pro re, dictis haud minus libertatis alienae quam suae dignitatis memor; et, quo nihil popularius est, quibus
4 artibus petierat magistratus iisdem gerebat. Itaque universus exercitus incredibili alacritate adhortationem prosecutus ducis castris egreditur.
5 Proelium, ut quod maxime unquam, pari spe utrimque, aequis viribus, cum fiducia sui sine con-
6 temptu hostium commissum est. Samnitibus ferociam augebant novae res gestae et paucos ante diei geminata victoria, Romanis contra quadringentorum annorum decora et conditae urbi aequalis victoria;

[1] i. e. "Friends of the People." See II. viii. 1.

not forgot the ancient surname of our family—the Publicolae:[1] at home and in the field, as a private citizen, in little magistracies and in great ones, as consul no less than as tribune, and with the same undeviating course through all my successive consulships, have I cherished, and cherish still, the Roman plebs. Now, with Heaven's good help, to the work we have in hand! Seek with me a novel triumph never yet won from the Samnites!" B.C. 345–343

XXXIII. There was never a commander who more endeared himself to his men by cheerfully sharing all their duties with the meanest of the soldiers. At the military sports, too, in which those of a like age contend with one another in strength and swiftness, he was easy-going and good-natured; he would win or lose without changing countenance, nor did he scorn to match himself with anyone who challenged him; in his acts his kindness was suited to the circumstances, in his speech he had regard to the liberty of others no less than to his own dignity; finally—and nothing can be more popular than this—he was the same in office that he had been while a candidate. It was therefore with incredible eagerness that the whole army, after listening to the general's speech, marched out of camp.

The battle began, if ever battle did, with like hopes on both sides and equal strength, and a self-confidence which yet was not mixed with contempt for the enemy. The Samnites were emboldened by their recent exploits and by their double victory of a few days before, the Romans on their part by the glories of four centuries and a victorious career that dated from the founding of

A.U.C. 409–411

7 utrisque tamen novus hostis curam addebat. Pugna indicio fuit quos gesserint animos; namque ita conflixerunt ut aliquamdiu in neutram partem inclina-
8 rent acies. Tum consul trepidationem iniciendam ratus, quando vi pelli non poterant, equitibus im-
9 missis turbare prima signa hostium conatur. Quos ubi nequiquam tumultuantes in spatio exiguo volvere turmas vidit nec posse aperire in hostes viam, revectus ad antesignanos legionum cum desiluisset ex equo,
10 "Nostrum" inquit "peditum illud, milites, est opus; agitedum, ut me videritis, quacumque[1] incessero in aciem hostium, ferro viam facientem, sic pro se quisque obvios sternite; illa omnia, qua nunc erectae
11 micant hastae, patefacta strage vasta cernetis." Vix haec[2] dicta dederat, cum equites consulis iussu discurrunt in cornua legionibusque in mediam aciem aperiunt viam. Primus omnium consul invadit hostem et cum quo forte contulit gradum obtruncat.
12 Hoc spectaculo accensi dextra laevaque ante se quisque memorandum proelium cient[3]; stant obnixi Samnites, quamquam plura accipiunt quam inferunt vulnera.

13 Aliquamdiu iam pugnatum erat, atrox caedes circa signa Samnitium, fuga ab nulladum parte erat: adeo
14 morte sola vinci destinaverant animis. Itaque

[1] quacumque $F^2A^3\varsigma$: quacū; MFO: quacum Ω: quācū H.
[2] vix haec Luchs: haec Ω.
[3] cient ς Gronov. (L^3 ?): ciet Ω.

the City; each side nevertheless experienced some anxiety at meeting an untried foe. The engagement testified how resolute they were, for they so fought that for some time neither battle-line gave ground. Then the consul, thinking that he must inspire his enemies with fear, since he could not drive them back by force, attempted by sending in the cavalry to throw their front ranks into disorder. But when he saw that nothing came of the confused fighting of the squadrons, as they tried to manœuvre in a narrow space, and that they could not break the enemy's line, he rode back to the front ranks of his legions, and, dismounting from his horse, exclaimed, "Soldiers, it is for us, the infantry, to accomplish yonder task! Come, as you shall see me making a path for myself with my sword wherever I advance against the enemy's line, so do you every man strike down whom you encounter; all that array where now uplifted spears are glancing you shall see laid open with great carnage." No sooner had he said these words, than the horsemen, by the consul's order, drew off towards the wings and left the legions room to attack the centre. The consul was the very foremost in the charge, and slew the man he chanced to meet with. Kindled by this sight, the Romans on the right and on the left pushed forward, every man of them, and fought a memorable combat; the Samnites stood manfully at bay, but they took more strokes than they delivered. B.C. 345–343

The battle had now lasted a considerable time; there was dreadful slaughter about the standards of the Samnites, but as yet no retreating anywhere, so determined were they to be overcome by naught but death. And so the Romans, who saw that their

A.U.C. 409–411

Romani cum et fluere iam lassitudine vires sentirent et diei haud multum superesse, accensi ira concitant
15 se in hostem. Tum primum referri pedem atque inclinari rem in fugam apparuit; tum capi, occidi Samnis; nec superfuissent multi, ni nox victoriam
16 magis quam proelium diremisset. Et Romani fatebantur nunquam cum pertinaciore hoste conflictum, et Samnites, cum quaereretur quaenam prima causa
17 tam obstinatos movisset in fugam, oculos sibi Romanorum ardere visos aiebant vesanosque voltus et furentia ora; inde plus quam ex alia ulla re terroris ortum. Quem terrorem non pugnae solum eventu
18 sed nocturna profectione confessi sunt. Postero die vacuis hostium castris Romanus potitur, quo se omnis Campanorum multitudo gratulabunda effudit.

XXXIV. Ceterum hoc gaudium magna prope clade in Samnio foedatum est. Nam ab Saticula[1] profectus Cornelius consul exercitum incaute in saltum cava valle pervium circaque insessum ab hoste induxit
2 nec prius quam recipi tuto signa non poterant im-
3 minentem capiti hostem vidit. Dum id morae Samnitibus est, quoad totum in vallem infimam demitteret agmen, P. Decius tribunus militum conspicit unum editum in saltu collem, imminentem hostium strength was fast ebbing away in weariness and that little daylight yet remained, were filled with rage, and hurled themselves against the enemy. Then for the first time were there signs of giving way and the beginning of a rout; then were the Samnites captured or slain; nor would many have survived, if night had not ended what was now a victory rather than a battle. The Romans admitted that never had they fought with a more stubborn adversary; and the Samnites, on being asked what it was that first had turned them, resolute as they were, to flight, replied that it was the eyes of the Romans, which had seemed to blaze, and their frenzied expression and infuriated looks; this it was more than anything else that had caused their panic. And this panic stood confessed not alone in the outcome of the fight but in the night-retreat that followed. On the morrow the Romans took possession of the deserted camp, and thither the whole population of Capua streamed out to congratulate them. B.C. 345-343

[1] Saticula Sigonius (cf. chap. xxxii. § 2): satricula Ω.

XXXIV. But this rejoicing came near to being marred by a great reverse in Samnium. For the consul Cornelius, marching from Saticula, had unwarily led his army into a forest which was penetrated by a deep defile, and was there beset on either hand by the enemy; nor, until it was too late to withdraw with safety, did he perceive that they were posted on the heights above him. While the Samnites were only holding back till he should send down the whole column into the bottom of the valley, Publius Decius, a tribune of the soldiers, espied a solitary hill, which rising above the pass, commanded the enemy's camp, and though arduous

A.U.C. 409–411

castris, aditu arduum impedito agmini, expeditis haud 4 difficilem. Itaque consuli territo animi "Videsne tu" inquit, "A. Corneli, cacumen illud supra hostem?
Arx illa est spei salutisque nostrae, si eam, quoniam
5 caeci reliquere Samnites, impigre capimus. Ne tu mihi plus quam unius legionis principes hastatosque dederis; cum quibus ubi evasero in summum, perge hinc omni liber metu, teque et exercitum serva;
neque enim moveri hostis, subiectus nobis ad omnes 6 ictus, sine sua pernicie poterit. Nos deinde aut fortuna populi Romani aut nostra virtus expediet."
7 Conlaudatus ab consule accepto praesidio vadit occultus per saltum; nec prius ab hoste est visus quam loco 8 quem petebat appropinquavit. Inde admiratione paventibus cunctis cum omnium in se vertisset oculos, et spatium consuli dedit ad subducendum agmen in aequiorem locum et ipse in summo con-9 stitit vertice. Samnites dum huc illuc signa vertunt utriusque rei amissa occasione neque insequi con-sulem nisi per eandem vallem, in qua paulo ante subiectum eum telis suis habuerant, possunt, nec erigere agmen in captum super se ab Decio tumu-10 lum; sed cum ira in hos magis, qui fortunam gerendae rei eripuerant, tum propinquitas loci atque ipsa

---

[1] The legion was drawn up in three lines; in the first were the hastati, in the second the principes, and behind these the triarii.

of access to an army encumbered with baggage, was not difficult for men in light marching order. He accordingly said to the consul, who was much perturbed: "Do you see, Aulus Cornelius, that summit that rises above the enemy? It is the fortress of our hope and safety, if we are prompt to seize it, since the Samnites have been so blind as to neglect it. Give me no more than the first and second lines of a single legion;[1] when with these I have mounted to the top, do you go forward fearlessly and save yourself and the army; for the enemy, exposed to all our missiles, will not be able to stir without bringing destruction on themselves. As for us, thereafter the fortune of the Roman People or our own manhood will extricate us." Being commended by the consul and receiving his detachment, he advanced under cover through the wood, nor did the enemy perceive him till he had nearly reached the place which he wished to gain. They were then all overcome with astonishment and dread, and while they turned, every man of them, and gazed at him, the consul was given time to withdraw his army to more favourable ground, and Decius himself took his post on the top of the hill. The Samnites, turning their standards now this way and now that, threw away both opportunities; they could not pursue the consul, except through the same defile where a little before they had held him at the mercy of their javelins, nor could they charge up the hill which Decius had captured over their heads. But not only did their resentment urge them rather against those who had snatched victory from their grasp, but so also did the nearness of the place and the fewness of its 11 paucitas incitat; et nunc circumdare undique collem armatis volunt, ut a consule Decium intercludant, nunc viam patefacere, ut degressos in vallem adoriantur. Incertos quid agerent nox oppressit.

B.C. 345–343

A.U.C. 410–411

12 Decium primum [1] spes tenuit cum subeuntibus in adversum collem ex superiore loco se pugnaturum; deinde admiratio incessit quod nec pugnam inirent nec, si ab eo consilio iniquitate loci deterrerentur, 13 opere se valloque circumdarent. Tum centurionibus ad se vocatis: "Quaenam illa inscitia belli ac pigritia est, aut quonam modo isti ex Sidicinis Campanisque victoriam pepererunt? Huc atque illuc signa moveri ac modo in unum conferri modo educi [2] videtis; opus quidem incipit nemo, cum iam circumdati vallo 14 potuerimus esse. Tum vero nos similes istorum simus, si diutius hic moremur quam commodum sit. Agitedum, ite mecum ut, dum lucis aliquid superest, quibus locis praesidia ponant, qua pateat hinc exitus, 15 exploremus." Haec omnia sagulo gregali amictus centurionibus item manipularium militum habitu ductis,[3] ne ducem circumire hostes notarent, perlustravit.

XXXV. Vigiliis deinde dispositis ceteris omnibus tesseram dari iubet, ubi secundae vigiliae bucina da- 2 tum signum esset, armati cum silentio ad se conveni-

[1] primum (wanting in O) Ω: primo Häggström "dubitanter."
[2] educi Ω: diduci Weissenborn.
[3] ductis (ductus OL) Ω: secum ductis M. Mueller.

defenders; and first they would be for surrounding the hill with troops, so as to cut Decius off from the consul, and next for leaving his road open, so that they might attack him when he was got down into the valley. Before they had made up their minds, night overtook them. B.C. 345–343

Decius at first had hopes of fighting from the higher ground, as they mounted the hill; then he marvelled that they neither began to attack, nor, if they were deterred from that design by the difficulty of the ground, attempted to shut him in with trench and rampart. Then, calling the centurions to him, he said: "What want of military skill, what slothfulness can that be? How did those people conquer the Sidicini and Campanians? You see their standards moving now this way, now that, first closing in together, then deploying, while no man falls to work, though we might ere this have been fenced in with a palisade. Then in truth should we be no better than they, were we to tarry here longer than suits our interest. Come on then and follow me, so that while there is yet a little light we may find out where they post their guards, and where the way out from this place lies open." Wrapped in a common soldier's cloak and accompanied by his centurions, who were also dressed like privates, lest the enemy should notice that the general was on his rounds, he investigated all these matters.

XXXV. Next, having disposed the sentries, he commanded that the word be passed to everybody, that on hearing the trumpet sound for the second watch they should silently arm and present themselves before him. When they had assembled there rent. Quo ubi, sicut edictumerat, taciti convenerunt, "Hoc silentium, milites," inquit, "omisso militari adsensu in me audiendo servandum est. Ubi sententiam meam vobis peregero, tum quibus eadem placebunt in dextram partem taciti transibitis; quae pars 3 maior erit, eo stabitur consilio. Nunc quae mente agitem audite. Non fuga delatos nec inertia relictos hic vos circumvenit hostis: virtute cepistis 4 locum, virtute hinc oportet evadatis. Veniendo huc exercitum egregium populo Romano servastis: erumpendo hinc vosmet ipsos servate; digni estis qui pauci pluribus opem tuleritis, ipsi nullius auxilio 5 egueritis. Cum eo hoste res est qui hesterno die delendi omnis exercitus fortuna per socordiam usus non sit, hunc tam opportunum collem imminentem capiti suo non ante viderit quam captum a nobis, 6 nos tam paucos tot ipse[1] milibus hominum nec ascensu arcuerit[2] nec tenentes locum, cum diei tantum superesset, vallo circumdederit. Quem videntem ac vigilantem sic eluseritis, sopitum oportet 7 fallatis, immo necesse est; in eo enim loco res sunt nostrae, ut vobis ego magis necessitatis vestrae 8 index quam consilii auctor sim. Neque enim maneatis an abeatis hinc deliberari potest, cum praeter arma et animos armorum memores nihil vobis fortuna reliqui fecerit fameque et siti moriendum sit, without a word, as he had ordered, he thus began: B.C. 345–343

A.U.C. 409–411

[1] ipse ς: ipsi (corrected by A from ipsis) Ω.
[2] arcuerit ς: arcuerint A^2: arguerit PFU: arguerint Ω.

"You must preserve this silence, soldiers, as you listen to me, omitting all soldier-like acclaim. When I have finished explaining my plan, then those of you who find it good will quietly pass over to the right; on whichever side the majority shall be, we will abide by their decision. Hear now what I have in mind. The enemy has not invested you here as men who ran away or were left behind through laziness: it was by valour that you took the place, and by valour you must escape from it. By coming hither you saved a splendid army for the Roman People; save yourselves by breaking out. You are worthy to have carried help, though few, to greater numbers, and to have needed no man's help yourselves. You have an enemy to deal with who neglected yesterday through indolence an opportunity of destroying our whole army; who failed to see the importance of this hill by which he is commanded, until we had taken it; who, though we were so few and his own thousands so many, neither kept us from gaining the ascent, nor, when the place was ours and much daylight still remained, surrounded us with entrenchments. An enemy whom you thus eluded while he was wide awake and watching, you ought to baffle when he is overcome with sleep. Indeed it is necessary that you do so, for our situation is such that I am rather pointing out your necessity to you than advocating a plan. Nor truly can it be a debatable question whether you should stay or go away from here, since Fortune has left you nothing but your arms and the spirit to employ them, and we must die of hunger and thirst, if we dread the si plus quam viros ac Romanos decet ferrum time-9 amus. Ergo una est salus erumpere hinc atque abire; id aut interdiu aut nocte faciamus oportet.

A.U.C. 409–411

10 Ecce autem aliud minus dubium; quippe si lux exspectetur, quae spes est non vallo perpetuo fossaque nos saepturum hostem, qui nunc corporibus suis subiectis undique cinxerit, ut videtis, collem? Atqui si nox opportuna est eruptioni, sicut est,
11 haec profecto noctis aptissima hora est. Signo secundae vigiliae convenistis, quod tempus mortales somno altissimo premit; per corpora sopita vadetis vel silentio incautos fallentes vel sentientibus clamore
12 subito pavorem iniecturi. Me modo sequimini, quem secuti estis; ego eandem quae duxit huc sequar fortunam. Quibus haec salutaria videntur, agitedum, in dextram partem pedibus transite."

XXXVI. Omnes transierunt, vadentemque per
2 intermissa custodiis loca Decium secuti sunt. Iam evaserant media castra, cum superscandens vigilum strata somno corpora miles offenso scuto praebuit sonitum; quo excitatus vigil cum proximum movisset erectique alios concitarent, ignari cives an hostes essent, praesidium erumperet an consul castra
3 cepisset, Decius, quoniam non fallerent, clamorem sword's point more than it is fitting men and Romans should. Our one way of safety, then, is to break through and get away. We must do this either in the day-time or at night. But this, look you, is a question that is even less in doubt, for if we should wait for dawn, what hope is there that the enemy would not hem us in with a continuous trench and rampart, who has now, as you see, encompassed the hill on every hand with the bodies of his men lying below us. And yet, if night is favourable for our sally, as it is, this is surely the fittest hour of the night. You have come together on the signal of the second watch, when sleep lies heaviest on mortals: you will make your way among drowsy forms, either eluding them unsuspected in your silence, or ready, if they should perceive you, to affright them with a sudden shout. Do but follow me, whom you have followed hitherto; I will follow that same Fortune that has led us hither. Now then let those who approve my plan step over to the right."

B.C. 345–343

XXXVI. They all crossed over. Decius then made his way through the spaces left unguarded, and they followed him. They had already got half way through the camp, when a soldier in stepping over the bodies of some sleeping sentries struck his shield and made a sound. A sentry was awakened by this, and having shaken his neighbour, they stood up and began to rouse the rest, not knowing whether they had to do with friends or foes, whether the party on the hill were escaping, or the consul had captured the camp. Decius, seeing that they were discovered, gave the order to his men, and they set up such a shout that the Samnites, tollere iussis militibus torpidos somno insuper pavore exanimat, quo praepediti nec arma impigre capere 4 nec obsistere nec insequi poterant. Inter trepidationem tumultumque Samnitium praesidium Romanum obviis custodibus caesis ad castra consulis pervadit.

A.U.C. 409–411

5 Aliquantum supererat noctis iamque in tuto videbantur esse, cum Decius "Macte virtute" inquit, "milites Romani, este;[1] vestrum iter ac reditum 6 omnia saecula laudibus ferent; sed ad conspiciendam tantam virtutem luce ac die opus est, nec vos digni estis quos cum tanta gloria in castra reduces silentium ac nox 7 tegat; hic lucem quieti opperiamur." Dictis obtemperatum; atque ubi primum inluxit, praemisso nuntio ad consulem castra ingenti gaudio concitantur et tessera data incolumes reverti, qui sua corpora pro salute omnium haud dubio periculo obiecissent, pro se quisque obviam effusi laudant, gratulantur, singulos universos servatores suos vocant, dis laudes 8 gratesque agunt, Decium in caelum ferunt. Hic Deci castrensis triumphus fuit incedentis per media castra cum armato praesidio coniectis in eum omnium oculis et omni honore tribunum consuli aequantibus. 9 Ubi ad praetorium ventum est, consul classico ad contionem convocat orsusque meritas Deci laudes 10 interfante ipso Decio distulit contionem; qui auctor who had been stupefied with sleep, were now in addition breathless with terror, which prevented them from either arming promptly or making a stand against the Romans or pursuing them. During the fright and confusion amongst the Samnites, the Romans cut down such guards as they came across, and proceeded towards the consul's camp. B.C. 345–343

[1] Romani, este A^2: r̄ (or r.) este M^2 or M^1 (r este M) PFOT^{2}: recte HTDLA.

It wanted yet some time till daylight, and they now appeared to be in safety, when Decius said, "All honour to your courage, Roman soldiers! Your expedition and return shall be renowned through all the ages. But the light of day is needed to set off such gallantry, nor do you merit that your glorious return to camp should be accomplished in silence and under cover of night. Let us wait here quietly until the dawn." They did as he said. With the first rays of light they sent forward a courier to the consul, and the camp was woke with loud rejoicings. When word was sent round that those were returning safe and sound, who in behalf of the general safety, had exposed their bodies to no uncertain peril, they all poured out to meet them, and, each for himself, praised and congratulated them, calling them their saviours, one and all. To the gods they offered praise and thanks, and Decius they extolled to the skies. Now followed a triumph for Decius in the camp, as he marched through the midst with his battalion under arms. All eyes were directed towards him, and paid the tribune equal homage with the consul. When they reached headquarters, the consul bade the trumpet sound an assembly, and fell to lauding Decius, as he deserved. But Decius, interrupting him, induced him to defer his speech;

A.U.C. 409–411

omnia posthabendi dum occasio in manibus esset, perpulit consulem ut hostes et nocturno pavore attonitos et circa collem castellatim dissipatos adgrederetur: credere etiam aliquos ad se sequendum
11 emissos per saltum vagari. Iussae legiones arma capere egressaeque castris, cum per exploratores notior iam saltus esset, via patentiore ad hostem
12 ducuntur; quem incautum improviso adortae, cum palati passim Samnitium milites, plerique inermes, nec coire in unum nec arma capere nec recipere intra vallum se possent, paventem primum in castra compellunt, deinde castra ipsa turbatis stationibus
13 capiunt. Perfertur circa collem clamor fugatque ex suis quemque praesidiis. Ita magna pars absenti hosti cessit: quos intra vallum egerat pavor — fuere autem ad triginta milia[1] — omnes caesi, castra direpta.

XXXVII. Ita rebus gestis consul advocata contione P. Deci non coeptas solum ante sed cumulatas nova virtute laudes peragit et praeter militaria alia dona aurea corona eum et centum bubus eximioque
2 uno albo opimo auratis cornibus donat. Milites qui

[1] triginta milia Ω: tria milia conj. Walters, assuming that ꝏ ꝏ ꝏ was corrupted to XXX or xxx mil.

then, urging that all other considerations should be postponed whilst they had such an opportunity at hand, he persuaded him to attack the enemy. They were now, he said, bewildered by the night alarm and dispersed about the hill in separate detachments, and he doubted not that a party would have been sent out after him and would be wandering through the forest. The troops were commanded to arm, and marching out of camp, were led by a more open route—for, thanks to their scouts, the forest was now better known to them—in the direction of the enemy. These they caught quite off their guard by a surprise attack, for the Samnite soldiers were scattered far and wide, and most of them were without their weapons. Unable either to assemble or to arm or to regain their works, they were first driven headlong into their camp, and then the outposts were routed and the camp itself was taken. The shouting was heard all round the hill and sent the detachments flying from their several stations. Thus a great part of the Samnites fled without coming into contact with the enemy. Those whom panic had driven within the enclosure—to the number of some thirty thousand—were all put to the sword, and the camp was spoiled. B.C. 345–343

XXXVII. The battle having sped thus, the consul called an assembly, and pronounced a panegyric upon Decius, in which he rehearsed, in addition to his former services, the fresh glories which his bravery had achieved. Besides other military gifts, he bestowed on him a golden chaplet and a hundred oxen, and one choice white one, fat, and with gilded horns. The soldiers who had been on the

A.U.C. 409–411

in praesidio simul fuerant duplici frumento in perpetuum, in praesentia bubus privis binisque tunicis [1] donati. Secundum consulis donationem legiones gramineam coronam obsidialem, clamore donum approbantes, Decio imponunt; altera corona, eiusdem honoris index, a praesidio suo imposita est. 3 His decoratus insignibus bovem eximium Marti immolavit, centum boves militibus dono dedit qui secum in expeditione fuerant. Iisdem militibus legiones libras farris et sextarios vini contulerunt; omniaque ea ingenti alacritate per clamorem militarem, indicem omnium adsensus, gerebantur. 4 Tertia pugna ad Suessulam commissa est, quia fugatus a M. Valerio Samnitium exercitus omni robore iuventutis domo accito certamine ultimo fortunam experiri statuit. 5 Ab Suessula nuntii trepidi Capuam, inde equites citati ad Valerium consulem 6 opem oratum veniunt. Confestim signa mota relictisque impedimentis castrorum cum [2] valido praesidio raptim agitur agmen; nec procul ab hoste locum perexiguum, ut quibus praeter equos ceterorum iumentorum calonumque turba abesset, castris cepit. 7 Samnitium exercitus, velut haud ulla mora pugnae futura esset, aciem instruit; deinde, postquam nemo obvius ibat, infestis signis ad castra hostium succedit. 8 Ibi ut militem in vallo vidit missique ab omni parte

[1] bubus privis binisque tunicis Weissenborn: singulis bobus binisque priuis $O\varsigma$: singulis b. priuisque binisque (bonisque T) HT^1DLAR: singulis b. binisque $MPFUT^2$ (or T^1) A^2 (or A^3) R^2 (but P^1 has priuisque in marg.).

[2] castrorum cum ς: cum castrorum Madvig: ac castrorum Weissenborn: castrorum Ω: castrorumque Klock.

[1] This decoration was next in importance to the corona aurea or triumphalis. It was made of green grass plucked from the place which had been beleaguered.

hill with him were rewarded with a double ration in perpetuity, and for the present an ox apiece and two tunics. Following the consul's award, the legions, accompanying the gift with their cheers, placed on Decius's head a wreath of grass,[1] to signify his rescuing them from a siege; and his own detachment crowned him with a second wreath, indicative of the same honour. Adorned with these insignia, he sacrificed the choice ox to Mars, and presented the hundred others to the soldiers who had served with him on the expedition. To these same soldiers the legions contributed a pound of spelt and a pint of wine for each man. All these awards were carried out amid the greatest cheerfulness, the shouts of the soldiers testifying to the general approval. B.C. 345–343

A third engagement was fought at Suessula, for the Samnites, after the rout inflicted on them by Marcus Valerius, had called out all the men they had of military age, determined to try their fortune in a final encounter. From Suessula the alarming news was carried to Capua, whence gallopers were dispatched to Valerius the consul, to implore assistance. The troops were immediately set in motion, and leaving behind the baggage and a strong garrison for the camp, made a rapid march, and being got within a short distance of the enemy, encamped in a very small compass, for they had only their horses with them and neither beasts of burden nor a crowd of camp-followers.

The Samnites, assuming that the battle would not be delayed, formed up in line; then, as no one came out to meet them, they advanced against the enemy's camp. When they saw the soldiers on the rampart, and when the scouts whom they had exploratum quam[1] in exiguum orbem contracta castra essent — paucitatem inde hostium colligentes 9 — rettulerunt, fremere omnis acies complendas esse fossas scindendumque vallum et in castra inrumpendum; transactumque ea temeritate bellum foret, 10 ni duces continuissent impetum militum. Ceterum, quia multitudo sua commeatibus gravis et prius sedendo ad Suessulam et tum certaminis mora haud procul ab rerum omnium inopia esset, placuit, dum inclusus paveret hostis, frumentatum per agros 11 militem duci: interim quieto[2] Romano, qui expeditus quantum umeris inter arma geri posset frumenti secum attulisset, defutura omnia.

A.U.C. 409–411

12 Consul palatos per agros cum vidisset hostes, stationes infrequentes relictas, paucis milites adhor- 13 tatus ad castra oppugnanda ducit. Quae cum primo clamore atque impetu cepisset, pluribus hostium in tentoriis suis quam in portis valloque caesis, signa captiva in unum locum conferri iussit relictisque duabus legionibus custodiae et praesidii causa gravi edicto monitis ut, donec ipse revertisset, 14 praeda abstinerent, profectus agmine instructo, cum praemissus eques velut indagine dissipatos Samnites 15 ageret, caedem ingentem fecit. Nam neque quo dispatched to spy out the camp on every hand reported how straitened its dimensions were, inferring thence the paucity of their foes, the whole army began to murmur that they ought to fill up the trenches, breach the rampart, and burst into the enclosure; and their rashness would have brought the war to a conclusion, had not the commanders restrained the ardour of their men. But since their numbers were a burden on the commissariat, and since, owing first to their sitting down before Suessula and afterwards to the delay in fighting, they were almost reduced to want for everything, they decided that while the enemy were cowering within their works, they would send their soldiers over the country-side to forage: meantime the Romans, remaining inactive, would be reduced to destitution, for they had come in light marching order, with only so much corn as they could carry, along with their armour, on their shoulders. B.C. 345–343

[1] quam ς: quamquam Ω: quia F^2: postquam quam Alschefski.

[2] quieto A^2 or A^1ς: quia et Ω: quia M: et A; deleted by Madvig.

Seeing the Samnites dispersed about the fields, and their stations thinly manned, the consul addressed a few words of encouragement to his soldiers and led them to the assault of the enemy's camp. Having taken it at the first shout and rush, and slain more men in their tents than at the gates and on the breastworks, he ordered the captured standards to be collected in one spot. Then, leaving two legions to guard them and defend the place,—with strict injunctions to refrain from spoiling until he himself returned,—he marched out in serried column, and sending the cavalry on before to surround the scattered Samnites, as with a cordon of hunters, and so drive them in, he made a prodigious slaughter of them. For in their terror they were

A.U.C. 409–411

signo coirent [1] inter se neque utrum castra peterent an longiorem intenderent fugam, territis constare 16 poterat; tantumque fugae ac formidinis fuit ut ad quadraginta milia scutorum — nequaquam tot caesis — et signa militaria cum iis [2] quae in castris capta erant ad centum septuaginta ad consulem defer-17 rentur. Tum in castra hostium reditum ibique omnis praeda militi data.

A.U.C 412

XXXVIII. Huius certaminis fortuna et Faliscos, cum in indutiis essent, foedus petere ab senatu coegit et Latinos iam exercitibus comparatis ab
2 Romano in Paelignum vertit bellum. Neque ita rei gestae fama Italiae se finibus tenuit, sed Carthaginienses quoque legatos gratulatum Romam misere cum coronae aureae dono, quae in Capitolio in Iovis cella poneretur; fuit pondo viginti quinque.
3 Consules ambo de Samnitibus triumpharunt sequente Decio insigni cum laude donisque, cum incondito militari ioco haud minus tribuni celebre nomen quam consulum esset.
4 Campanorum deinde Suessulanorumque [3] auditae legationes, precantibusque datum ut praesidium eo in hiberna mitteretur, quo Samnitium excursiones arcerentur.
5 Iam tum minime salubris militari disciplinae Capua instrumento omnium voluptatium delenitos

[1] coirent $T^2A^2{}_?$: coire Ω.
[2] cum iis M?: cum is M^1 or M^2 (over erasure): cum hiis A^2 (over erasure): cum his PFOT^{2}: cunctis HTDL.
[3] Suessulanorumque A^3 Sigonius: Suessanorumq. (illegible in O) Ω.

unable to agree either under what standard they should rally, or whether they should make for their camp or direct their flight towards some more remote place; and so great was their discomfiture and panic, that the Romans brought in to the consul no less than forty thousand shields—though not near so many men were slain—and of military standards, including those which had been captured in the camp, no fewer than a hundred and seventy. The victors then returned to the enemy's camp and there the plunder was all given to the soldiers. B.C. 345–343

XXXVIII. The fortunate outcome of this war not only impelled the Faliscans, with whom there was a truce, to ask the senate for a treaty, but caused the Latins, whose armies were ready to take the field, to transfer their attack from Rome to the Paeligni. Nor was the fame of this success confined to Italy; even the Carthaginians sent their envoys to Rome, with congratulations and the gift of a golden crown, weighing five and twenty pounds, to be placed in the shrine of Jupiter on the Capitol. Both consuls triumphed over the Samnites, and after them came Decius, conspicuous in his decorations and so renowned, that the soldiers in their rude jests named the tribune no less often than the consuls. B.C. 342

The deputations of the Campanians and the Suessulani were then heard, and a favourable reply was made to their petition that a garrison should be dispatched, to remain through the winter with them and protect them against inroads by the Samnites.

Capua was even then a far from wholesome place for military discipline, and with its means for gratimilitum animos avertit a memoria patriae inibanturque consilia in hibernis eodem scelere adimendae Campanis Capuae per quod illi eam antiquis cul-

6 toribus ademissent: neque immerito suum ipsorum exemplum in eos versurum. Cur autem potius Campani agrum Italiae uberrimum, dignam agro urbem, qui nec se nec sua tutari possent, quam victor exercitus haberet qui suo sudore ac sanguine
7 inde Samnites depulisset? An aequum esse dediticios suos illa fertilitate atque amoenitate perfrui, se militando fessos in pestilenti atque arido circa urbem solo luctari aut in urbe insidentem labem[1] crescentis in dies fenoris pati?
8 Haec agitata occultis coniurationibus necdum volgata in omnes consilia invenit novus consul C. Marcius Rutulus,[2] cui Campania sorte provincia even-9 erat, Q. Servilio collega ad urbem relicto. Itaque cum omnia ea, sicut gesta erant, per tribunos comperta haberet et aetate[3] et usu doctus, quippe qui iam quartum consul esset dictatorque et censor fuisset, optimum ratus differendo spem quandocumque vellent consilii exsequendi militarem impetum frustrari,[4] rumorem dissipat in iisdem oppidis

A.U.C. 412

[1] labem Ω: tabem $I^2T^2\varsigma$.
[2] Rutulus H: rutilus Ω: rutilius F.
[3] haberet et aetate $H^1T^1A^2$ (or A^3)ς: et aetate haberet Ω: et aetate omittent b$_{\eta}$ D^2A.
[4] frustrari T^2D^2: frustrare Ω: frustrarem omnem A^2 (frustrare A ?): frustare U.

[1] i. e. the Etruscans, see IV. XXXVII. 2.

fying every pleasure proved so fascinating to the soldiers that they forgot their native land, and formed a project, while in winter quarters, for taking the city away from the Campanians by the same wicked practice by which the Campanians had taken it from its ancient inhabitants.[1] There would be a certain justice, they argued, in turning their own example against them. Besides, why should the most fertile land in Italy, and a city worthy of the land, belong to the Campanians, who were incapable of defending either themselves or their possessions? Why, rather, should it not belong to the conquering army, which had toiled and bled to drive the Samnites out of it? Was it fair that their surrendered subjects should enjoy that fertile and agreeable tract, while they, exhausted with campaigning, wrestled with the arid and noxious soil in the neighbourhood of Rome, or endured the ruinous usury that had fastened on the City and was increasing from one day to the next? B.C. 342

These schemes, discussed in secret cabals and not yet communicated to all the troops, were discovered by the new consul, Gaius Marcius Rutulus, to whom the lot had assigned Campania for his province, leaving Quintus Servilius, his colleague, in charge at Rome. And so having found out through his tribunes exactly what had taken place, Rutulus, who was of ripe years and experience,—for the present consulship was his fourth and he had been both dictator and censor—thought that his best course would be to frustrate the men's impetuosity, by encouraging the hope that they would be able at any time they chose to carry out their plan. He accordingly set on foot a rumour that the garrisons a.u.c. 412 10 et anno post praesidia hibernatura — divisa enim erant per Campaniae urbes, manaverantque a Capua consilia in exercitum omnem. Eo laxamento cogitationibus dato quievit in praesentia seditio.

XXXIX. Consul educto in aestiva milite, dum quietos Samnites habebat, exercitum purgare missionibus turbulentorum hominum instituit, aliis emerita dicendo stipendia esse, alios graves iam 2 aetate aut viribus parum validos. Quidam in commeatus mittebantur, singuli primo, deinde et cohortes quaedam, quia procul ab domo ac rebus suis hibernassent; per speciem etiam militarium usuum, cum 3 alii alio mitterentur, magna pars ablegati. Quam multitudinem consul alter Romae praetorque alias 4 ex aliis fingendo moras retinebat. Et primo quidem ignari ludificationis minime inviti domos revisebant; postquam neque reverti ad signa primos nec ferme alium quam qui in Campania hibernassent praecipueque ex his seditionis auctores mitti viderunt, primum admiratio, deinde haud dubius timor incessit 5 animos consilia sua emanasse: iam quaestiones, iam indicia, iam occulta singulorum supplicia impotensque et crudele consulum ac patrum in se regnum 6 passuros. Haec qui in castris erant occultis sermoni-

would winter in the same towns in the following B.C 342
year also,—for they had been distributed among the cities of Campania and from Capua their designs had spread to the entire army,—and the conspirators being thus afforded time for breathing, the sedition subsided for the present.

XXXIX. The consul having led out his troops to the summer encampment, and finding the Samnites quiet, resolved to purge the army of its trouble-makers by discharging them. Of some of them he said that they had served out their time; of others, that they were now too old or deficient in sturdiness. To some he granted furlough, singling out individuals at first, but later dismissing certain cohorts, on the ground that they had passed the winter far from their homes and their affairs. Many, too, were sent off on some pretext of military employment, some one way, some another. All these the other consul and the praetor detained at Rome, alleging a variety of reasons. And at first, not suspecting a trick, they were far from sorry to visit their homes again. Later on, when they saw that the first to go failed to rejoin the colours, and that practically none were dismissed but those who had wintered in Campania, and particularly such of these as had encouraged the conspiracy, they marvelled at first, and presently began to entertain very definite fears that their designs had come to light: soon there would be investigations, soon informations would be lodged, they would soon be punished in secret, one by one, and would be made to feel the unrestrained and cruel despotism with which the consuls and the senate governed them. Such were the fears that were secretly put about by the soldiers bus serunt, nervos coniurationis electos [1] arte consulis cernentes.

A.U.C. 412

7 Cohors una, cum haud procul Anxure [2] esset, ad Lautulas saltu angusto inter mare ac montes consedit ad excipiendos quos consul aliis atque aliis, ut ante 8 dictum est, causis mittebat. Iam valida admodum numero manus erat nec quicquam ad iusti exercitus formam praeter ducem deerat. Incompositi itaque praedantes in agrum Albanum perveniunt et sub 9 iugo Albae Longae castra vallo cingunt. Perfecto inde opere reliquum diei de imperatore sumendo sententiis decertant, nulli ex praesentibus satis 10 fidentes: quem autem ab Roma posse exciri? quem patrum aut plebis esse qui aut se tanto periculo sciens offerat aut cui ex iniuria insanientis exercitus 11 causa recte committatur? Postero die cum eadem deliberatio teneret, ex praedatoribus vagis quidam compertum attulerunt T. Quinctium in Tusculano 12 agrum colere, urbis honorumque immemorem. Patriciae hic vir gentis erat, cui cum militiae magna cum gloria actae finem pes alter ex volnere claudus fecisset, ruri agere vitam procul ambitione ac foro 13 constituit. Nomine audito extemplo agnovere virum et, quod bene verteret, acciri iusserunt. Sed parum

[1] electos Gebhard: eiectos Ω Frag. Havn. ς: exsectos Claud Dupuy.

[2] Anxure ς: anxur ς: anxyr Ω.

---

[1] Later called Tarracina.

[2] As Livy has mentioned no particular grievance, it is supposed that he refers to the oppressive usury.

in the camp, for they saw that the sinews of their B.C. 342 plot had been plucked out by the consul's artifice.

One cohort which was stationed not far from Anxur[1] went into camp near Lautulae, in the narrow pass between the sea and the mountains, where they could intercept those whom the consul continued to dismiss, on one pretext or another, as has been said before. They were soon a very numerous body, and lacked no essential element of an army except a general. And so, without order, and pillaging as they went, they proceeded as far as the Alban country, and under the ridge of Alba Longa encamped and threw up a rampart. Having finished the work, they employed the remainder of the day in wrangling over the choice of a general, for they had no great confidence in anyone there present. But whom could they summon from Rome? What patrician or plebeian was there who would wittingly expose himself to so great a danger, or to whom the cause of the army, maddened by its wrongs,[2] could fitly be committed? On the following day, while they were debating the same question, certain of their roving foragers reported having learned that Titus Quinctius was living on a farm near Tusculum, with no thoughts of the City or its honours. This man, who belonged to a noble family, had won great distinction in the wars, but a lameness in one of his feet, resulting from a wound, had put an end to his campaigning, and had determined him to take up his residence in the country, far from the Forum and from politics. On hearing his name they remembered the man at once, and bade send for him, invoking a blessing on this step. But there being little prospect that

A.U.C. 412 spei erat voluntate quicquam facturum; vim adhiberi
14 ac metum placuit. Itaque silentio noctis cum tectum villae qui ad id missi erant intrassent, somno gravem Quinctium oppressum, nihil medium aut imperium atque honorem aut ubi restitaret mortem ni seque-
15 retur denuntiantes, in castra pertraxerunt. Imperator extemplo adveniens appellatus, insigniaque honoris exterrito subitae rei miraculo deferunt et 16 ad urbem ducere iubent. Suo magis inde impetu quam consilio ducis convolsis signis infesto agmine ad lapidem octavum viae quae nunc Appia est
17 perveniunt; issentque confestim ad urbem, ni venire contra exercitum dictatoremque adversus se M. Valerium Corvum dictum audissent et magistrum equitum L. Aemilium Mamercum.

XL. Ubi primum in conspectum ventum est et[1] arma signaque agnovere, extemplo omnibus memoria
2 patriae iras permulsit. Nondum erant tam fortes ad sanguinem civilem nec praeter externa noverant bella, ultimaque rabies secessio ab suis habebatur; itaque iam duces, iam milites utrimque congressus
3 quaerere ac conloquia;—Quinctius, quem armorum etiam pro patria satietas teneret, nedum adversus

[1] est et Duker: est (wanting in O) Ω.

he would voluntarily assist them, they resolved on B.C. 342 employing threats and violence. Coming therefore to his farm-house in the silence of the night, those who had been dispatched upon this errand caught Quinctius sound asleep, and offering him no choice but authority and rank, or death,—with which, when he held back, they threatened him, unless he would go along with them—they carried him off to the camp. Once there they immediately hailed him General, and dazed as he was by the astounding suddenness of it all, conferred on him the insignia of that office and bade him lead them to the City. Then, more on their own impulse than by the counsel of their general, they pulled up their standards and marched in warlike array as far as the eighth milestone, on what is now the Appian Way; whence they would at once have gone on to the City, had they not learned that an army was coming to oppose them, under Marcus Valerius Corvus, who had been created dictator for that purpose, with Lucius Aemilius Mamercus as master of the horse.

XL. As soon as they came within sight of one another and recognized one another's arms and ensigns, all were at once reminded of their fatherland, and their anger cooled. Men were not yet so hardy in shedding the blood of countrymen; they knew no wars but those with outside nations, and thought that frenzy could go no further than secession from their people. And so on either side both the leaders and their men began to seek for ways to meet and confer together. For Quinctius was sated with war, even war in behalf of his country, to say nothing of fighting against it; patriam, Corvinus omnes caritate cives, praecipue milites, et ante alios suum exercitum, complexus. 4 Is ad[1] conloquium processit. Cognito ei extemplo haud minore[2] ab adversariis verecundia quam ab suis silentium datum.

A.U.C. 412

"Deos" inquit "immortales, milites, vestros[3] meosque ab urbe proficiscens ita adoravi veniamque supplex poposci ut mihi de vobis concordiae partae 5 gloriam non victoriam darent. Satis fuit eritque unde belli decus pariatur: hinc pax petenda est. Quod deos immortales inter nuncupanda vota exposposci, eius me compotem voti vos facere potestis, 6 si meminisse voltis non vos in Samnio nec in Volscis, sed in Romano solo castra habere, si illos colles quos cernitis patriae vestrae esse, si hunc exercitum civium vestrorum, si me consulem vestrum, cuius ductu auspicioque priore anno bis legiones Sam- 7 nitium fudistis, bis castra vi cepistis. Ego sum M. Valerius Corvus, milites, cuius vos nobilitatem beneficiis erga vos, non iniuriis, sensistis, nullius superbae in vos legis, nullius crudelis senatus consulti auctor, in omnibus meis imperiis in me severior quam in 8 vos. Ac si cui genus, si cui sua virtus, si cui etiam maiestas, si cui honores subdere spiritus potuerunt, iis[4] eram natus, id specimen mei dederam, ea aetate consulatum adeptus eram, ut potuerim tres et viginti

[1] is ad Madvig: ad Ω.
[2] minore Perizonius: minor Ω: minor eius L.
[3] vestros H. J. Mueller: uestros publicos Ω
[4] iis ς: his U: is Ω.

and the affection of Corvinus embraced all his B.C. 342 fellow-citizens, particularly the soldiers, and above all others, his own army. He now came forward to parley, and being recognized, was instantly accorded a silent attention, in which his opponents showed as great respect for him as did his followers.

"Soldiers," he began, "as I was setting forth from the City, I adored your gods and mine, and humbly besought them of their goodness to vouchsafe to me the glory of reconciling, not of conquering you. There have been wars in plenty, and will be others, where men may win renown: in this crisis we must seek for peace. The petition which I made to the immortal gods, as I offered up my prayer, you are able of yourselves to grant me, if you are willing to reflect that your camp is pitched not in Samnium nor among the Volsci, but on Roman soil; that those hills which you see are in your native land; that this army is made up of your fellow-citizens; that I am your consul, under whose command and auspices you twice last year defeated the Samnite legions, and twice stormed their camp. I am Marcus Valerius Corvus, soldiers, whose patrician blood has declared itself in kindnesses done you, not in injuries; I have urged no insolent law against you, no cruel senatorial resolution; in every position of authority I have been sterner to myself than to you. And in truth if any man's family, if any man's own worth, if any man's dignities and honours have been able to inspire pride in him, my birth was such, I had given such proof of my capacity, and had achieved so young the highest magistracy, that I might easily, on becoming consul at the age of three and twenty, annos natus consul patribus quoque ferox esse non 9 solum plebi. Quod meum factum dictumve consulis gravius quam tribuni audistis? Eodem tenore duo insequentes consulatus gessi, eodem haec imperiosa dictatura geretur; ut neque[1] in hos meos et patriae meae milites sim mitior[2] quam in vos — horreo

A.U.C. 412

10 dicere — hostes. Ergo vos prius in me strinxeritis ferrum quam in vos ego; istinc signa canent, istinc clamor prius incipiet atque impetus, si dimicandum
11 est. Inducite in animum quod non induxerunt patres avique vestri, non illi qui in Sacrum montem secesserunt, non hi qui postea Aventinum insederunt.
12 Exspectate, dum vobis singulis, ut olim Coriolano, matres coniugesque crinibus passis obviae ab urbe veniant! Tum Volscorum legiones, quia Romanum habebant ducem, quieverunt: vos, Romanus exer-
13 citus, ne destiteritis impio bello? T. Quincti, quocumque istic loco seu volens seu invitus constitisti, si dimicandum erit, tum tu in novissimos te recipito; fugeris etiam honestius tergumque civi dederis quam
14 pugnaveris contra patriam. Nunc ad pacificandum bene atque honeste inter primos stabis et conloquii huius salutaris interpres fueris. Postulate aequa et ferte; quamquam vel iniquis standum est potius quam impias inter nos conseramus manus."

[1] ut neque Ω: neque Heusinger.
[2] sim mitior Walters and Conway: mitior sim $A^2\varsigma$: mitior Ω: militio H.

[1] See II. xxxii and III. l. [2] See II. xl.

have been overbearing even towards the nobles, not merely towards the plebs. But what have you heard that I said or did, when consul, more tyrannical than my words and deeds as tribune? In that same spirit I administered two subsequent consulships; in that same spirit shall this dictatorship with its dread power be administered; so that I shall be no gentler to these my soldiers and the soldiers of my country, than to you—I shudder to say the word,—our enemies. You shall therefore sooner draw sword on me than I on you. It is on your side that the trumpets will sound, on your side that the battle-cry will be raised and the attack begin, if fight we must. Steel your hearts to do that which neither your fathers nor yet your grandfathers could resolve upon—neither those who seceded to the Sacred Mount, nor those who later encamped upon the Aventine.[1] Wait until to each of you—as once to Coriolanus[2]—your mothers and wives come forth from the City with dishevelled hair. On that day the legions of the Volsci ceased fighting, because they had a Roman leader: will you, an army of Romans, not relinquish this impious war? Titus Quinctius, whatever be your position over there—whether you have taken it voluntarily or against your will,—if we must do battle, do you retire to the rear; you will even flee with less discredit, turning your back upon your fellow-citizens, than you will incur in fighting against your country. Now, however, to make peace you will stand with honour and credit amongst the foremost, and will be a salutary mediator at this conference. Let your men ask what is reasonable, and receive it; yet must we rather put up with what is not, than join together in impious strife."

B.C. 342

A.U.C. 412

15 T. Quinctius plenus lacrimarum ad suos versus "Me quoque" inquit, "milites, si quis usus mei
16 est, meliorem pacis quam belli habetis ducem. Non enim illa modo Volscus aut Samnis sed Romanus verba fecit, vester consul, vester imperator, milites, cuius auspicia pro vobis experti nolite adversus vos
17 velle experiri. Qui pugnarent vobiscum infestius, et alios duces senatus habuit: qui maxime vobis, suis militibus, parceret, cui plurimum vos, imperatori
18 vestro, credaretis, eum elegit. Pacem etiam qui vincere possunt volunt; quid nos velle oportet?
19 Quin omissis ira et spe, fallacibus auctoribus, nos ipsos nostraque omnia cognitae permittimus fidei?"

XLI. Approbantibus clamore cunctis T. Quinctius ante signa progressus in potestate dictatoris milites fore dixit; oravit ut causam miserorum civium susciperet susceptamque eadem fide qua rem publi-
2 cam administrare solitus esset tueretur: sibi se privatim nihil cavere; nolle alibi quam in innocentia spem habere; militibus cavendum, quod apud patres semel plebi iterum legionibus cautum sit ne fraudi secessio esset.

3 Quinctio conlaudato, ceteris bonum animum habere iussis, dictator equo citato ad urbem revectus auctori-

---

[1] Livy said nothing of such a stipulation at the time of the first reconciliation; for the circumstances attending the second, see II. liv.

Titus Quinctius turned with streaming eyes and B.C. 342
addressed his people: "I, too, soldiers, if I am of any use to you, can better lead you to peace than into war. For it was no Volscian or Samnite that just spoke those words, but a Roman. It was your consul, your general, soldiers. You have proved his auspices in your own behalf; seek not to prove their worth against you. The senate had other leaders who would have made more ruthless war on you; but they have chosen him who would deal most mercifully with you, his men; one in whom, as in your general, you might place the most utter confidence. Peace is the goal desired even by those who are able to conquer: what then ought our desire to be? Nay, let us abandon wrath and hope—deceitful counsellors—and commit ourselves and all our cause to a man of known fidelity!"

XLI. A shout of approval burst from every throat, and Titus Quinctius, advancing in front of the standards, announced that the soldiers would submit to the dictator's authority. He begged him to undertake the cause of his wretched fellow-citizens, and having done so to forward it with the same fidelity with which he had been used to deal with the interests of the state. For himself privately, he said, he demanded no assurance, he had no wish to found a hope on aught but innocence. But the soldiers must be assured, as in their fathers' day the plebs had been, and, on a second occasion, the legions, that they should not be punished for secession.[1]

After praising Quinctius and bidding the rest be of good cheer, the dictator galloped back to the City, and having secured the authority of the

A.U.C. 412 bus patribus tulit ad populum in luco Petelino,[1] ne cui militum fraudi secessio esset. Oravit etiam bona venia Quirites ne quis eam rem ioco seriove 4 cuiquam exprobraret. Lex quoque sacrata militaris lata est ne cuius militis scripti nomen nisi ipso volente deleretur; additumque legi ne quis, ubi tribunus militum fuisset, postea ordinum ductor 5 esset. Id propter P. Salonium postulatum est ab coniuratis, qui alternis prope annis et tribunus militum et primus centurio erat, quem nunc primi pili 6 appellant. Huic infensi milites erant, quod semper adversatus novis consiliis fuisset et, ne particeps 7 eorum esset, ab Lautulis fugisset.[2] Itaque cum hoc unum propter Salonium ab senatu non impetraretur, tum Salonius obtestatus patres conscriptos ne suum honorem pluris quam concordiam civitatis aesti- 8 marent, perpulit ut id quoque ferretur. Aeque impotens postulatum fuit ut de stipendio equitum — merebant autem triplex ea tempestate — aera demerentur, quod adversati coniurationi fuissent.

XLII. Praeter haec invenio apud quosdam L. Genucium tribunum plebis tulisse ad plebem ne

[1] Petelino ς: petillini Ω: petelini U: pollutum O.
[2] fugisset Rubenius: fugissent (with qui before ab Lautulis) Ω: nothing after qui in O.

[1] cf. VI. XX. 11 and note there.
[2] Whoever broke a lex sacrata was ipso facto consecrated to the lower gods, and became an outlaw.
[3] The law protected insolvent debtors, whose goods might not be seized so long as they were in the service, and also assured the soldier of his rightful share of such emoluments as the campaign might produce. With regard to the addition, the commentators are doubtful what its object was; perhaps it was felt as unfair to the rest that one who had enjoyed the (elective) tribuneship should next year be

Fathers, got the people to enact a law, in the Peteline Wood,[1] that none of the soldiers should be held to answer for the secession. He begged them also, as citizens, to grant him the favour that none would make the incident a matter of reproach to any, either in jest or in earnest. There was also passed a military law, under penalty of devotion,[2] to the effect that the name of no one enrolled as a soldier might be struck off the list, except with his own consent. To this a provision was added that no one might later command a century in the legion where he had been a military tribune.[3] This clause was demanded by the conspirators on account of Publius Salonius, who in almost regular alternation was tribune of the soldiers one year, and chief centurion—whom they now call "centurion of the first javelin"—the next. The men were incensed at Salonius because he had always opposed their mutinous schemes, and had fled from Lautulae that he might not share in them. And so, when this one provision would have failed of enactment by the senate, out of consideration for Salonius, he himself besought the Fathers not to think more highly of his distinction than of harmony in the state, and induced them to pass this also. An equally shameless demand was made that the pay of the cavalry should be reduced—they served at that time for treble pay—on the ground that they had opposed the conspiracy. B.C. 342

XLII. In addition to these transactions, I find in certain writers that Lucius Genucius, a tribune of the plebs, proposed to the plebs that it should be appointed to the but slightly less desirable post of first centurion.

A.U.C. 412

2 fenerare liceret; item aliis plebi scitis cautum ne quis eundem magistratum intra decem annos caperet neu duos magistratus uno anno gereret utique liceret consules ambos plebeios creari. Quae si omnia concessa sunt plebi, apparet haud parvas vires de-
3 fectionem habuisse. Aliis annalibus proditum est neque dictatorem Valerium dictum sed per consules omnem rem actam, neque antequam Romam veniretur sed Romae eam multitudinem coniuratorum
4 ad arma consternatam esse nec in T. Quincti villam sed in aedes C. Manli[1] nocte impetum factum eumque a coniuratis comprehensum ut dux fieret; inde ad quartum lapidem profectos loco munito
5 consedisse; nec ab ducibus mentionem concordiae ortam sed repente, cum in aciem armati exercitus
6 processissent, salutationem factam et permixtos dextras iungere ac complecti inter se lacrimantes milites coepisse coactosque consules, cum viderent aversos a dimicatione militum animos, rettulisse
7 ad patres de concordia reconcilianda. Adeo nihil praeterquam seditionem fuisse eamque compositam inter antiquos rerum auctores constat.

8 Et huius fama seditionis et susceptum cum Samnitibus grave bellum aliquot populos ab Romana societate avertit, et praeter Latinorum infidum iam diu foedus Privernates etiam Norbam[2] atque Setiam, finitimas colonias Romanas, incursione subita depopulati sunt.

[1] Manli ς: manili Ω: manilii U^2O: mallii U: malli D^2.
[2] Norbam A^2 (or A^4) ς: norbē F^2: norbę $MPOT$: norbae U: orbe LA.

unlawful to lend at interest. Also that it was B.C. 342 provided in other plebiscites that no one might hold the same office twice within ten years, nor two offices in one year; and that it should be legal for both consuls to be chosen from the plebs. If all these concessions were made to the commons, it is evident that the revolt possessed no little strength. Other annalists have recorded that Valerius was not made dictator, but that the whole affair was managed through the consuls, and that it was not before they came to Rome, but in Rome, that this great company of conspirators was dismayed into arming; further, that the night attack was made, not on the farm of Titus Quinctius, but on the town house of Gaius Manlius, and that it was he whom the conspirators seized and made their leader. Thence they proceeded —according to this account—to the fourth milestone, where they entrenched a camp. Nor was it the leaders who suggested a reconciliation, but suddenly, when the two armies had marched out in battle array, salutations were exchanged, and the soldiers, mingling together, began tearfully to clasp hands and embrace each other, so that the consuls, seeing the men to be in no mood for fighting, had been compelled to lay proposals before the senate for the re-establishment of harmony. Thus in no single instance do the ancient authorities agree, except that there was a sedition, and that it was composed.

The report of this sedition, in conjunction with the dangerous war entered upon with the Samnites, caused several nations to forsake their alliance with the Romans, and not only were the Latins unfaithful to the treaty—as they had been for some time—but the Privernates even, in a sudden raid, laid waste the neighbouring Roman colonies of Norba and Setia.

LIBRI VII PERIOCHA

Duo novi magistratus adiecti sunt, praetura et curulis aedilitas. Pestilentia civitas laboravit, eamque insignem fecit mors Furi Camilli. Cuius remedium et finis cum per novas religiones quaereretur, ludi scaenici tunc primum facti sunt. Cum dies L. Manlio dicta esset a M. Pomponio tribuno pl. propter dilectum acerbe actum et T. Manlium filium rus relegatum sine ullo crimine, adulescens ipse cuius relegatio patri obiciebatur venit in cubiculum tribuni strictoque gladio coegit eum in verba sua iurare se non perseveraturum in accusatione. Tunc omnia pretiosa missa sunt in praealtam voraginem urbis Romanae. In eam Curtius armatus sedens equo praecipitavit; ita expleta.[1] T. Manlius adulescens, qui patrem a tribunicia vexatione vindicaverat, contra Gallum provocantem aliquem ex militibus Romanis in singulare certamen descendit[2] eique occiso torquem aureum detraxit, quem ipse postea tulit et ex eo Torquatus vocatus est. Duae tribus adiectae, Pomptina et Publilia. Licinius Stolo lege lata damnatus est, quod plus quingentis iugeribus agri possideret. M. Valerius tribunus militum Gallum a quo provocatus erat, insidente galeae corvo et unguibus rostroque hostem infestante, occidit et ex eo Corvi nomen accepit consulque proximo anno, cum annos xxiii habe-

[1] ita expleta Weissenborn: ex plet or expletat or expleta. t. or exiit MSS.

[2] descendit omitted by all the MSS. but one (r): processit coni. Rossbach (Liv. VII. XXVI. 2).

SUMMARY OF BOOK VII

Two new magistracies were added, the praetorship and the curule aedileship. The citizens were afflicted with a pestilence, and this the death of Furius Camillus rendered memorable. While a remedy for stopping it was being sought in new religious observances, scenic exhibitions were given for the first time. Lucius Manlius having been cited by Marcus Pomponius, tribune of the plebs, to answer for his ruthless conduct of the levy and for having relegated his son to the country without making any charge against him, the young man himself whose relegation was being used against his father entered the bed-room of the tribune, and drawing his sword, compelled him to swear, after a form which he dictated to him, that he would not go on with the prosecution. At this time all sorts of precious things were cast into a chasm which had opened to a great depth in Rome. Into it leaped Curtius, fully armed and bestriding his horse; and so it was closed over. Titus Manlius, the youth who had saved his father from the persecution of the tribune, went down to confront a Gaul who had challenged any Roman soldier to single combat; and, having slain him, took from him a golden necklace, which he afterwards wore himself and from it was given the name of Torquatus. Two tribes were added, the Pomptina and the Publilia. Licinius Stolo was condemned, under a statute that had been enacted, because he possessed more than five hundred iugera of land. Marcus Valerius, a tribune of the soldiers, killed a Gaul by whom he had been challenged, while a raven perched on the Roman's crest and with beak and talons attacked his enemy; from this circumstance he received the name of Corvus, and the next year was, for his bravery, elected ret, ob virtutem creatus est. Amicitia cum Carthaginiensibus iuncta est. Campani cum a Samnitibus bello urgerentur, auxilio adversus eos a senatu petito, cum id non inpetrarent, urbem et agros populo R. dediderunt. Ob quam causam ea quae populi Romani facta essent, defendi bello adversus Samnites placuit. Cum ab Aulo Cornelio cos. exercitus in locum inicum deductus in magno discrimine esset, P. Deci Muris[1] tribuni militum opera servatus est, qui occupato colle super id iugum in quo Samnites consederant occasionem consuli in aequiorem locum evadendi dedit; ipse ab hostibus circumsessus erupit.[2] Cum milites Romani qui Capuae in praesidio relicti erant de occupanda ea urbe conspirassent et detecto consilio metu supplici a populo R. defecissent, per M. Valerium Corvum dictatorem, qui consilio suo eos a furore revocaverat, patriae restituti sunt. Res praeterea contra Hernicos et Gallos et Tiburtes et Privernates et Tarquinienses et Samnites et Vulscos prospere gestas continet.

[1] P. Deci Muris Sigonius (ex vet. libro): Deci Muris MSS.
[2] erupit edd.: eripuit MSS.

consul, at the age of twenty-three. Friendship was made with the Carthaginians. The Campanians, when hard pressed in war by the Samnites, asked aid against them from the senate, and, failing to obtain it, surrendered their city and territory to the Roman People. In view of this action, the Roman People voted to go to war with the Samnites, to defend these their possessions. The army was led by Aulus Cornelius, the consul, into a difficult position, and was in great danger, but was saved by the act of Publius Decius Mus, a tribune of the soldiers, who by occupying a hill which commanded the ridge on which the Samnites had encamped, afforded the consul an opportunity of withdrawing to more favourable ground; after which, though encircled by the enemy, Decius himself broke through. The Roman soldiers who had been left in garrison at Capua conspired to seize the city, and fearful of punishment, on the detection of their crime, revolted from the Roman People, but were restored to their country through the influence of the dictator, Marcus Valerius Corvus, who by his counsel had recalled them from their madness. The book also comprises victorious campaigns against the Hernici, Gauls, Tiburtes, Privernates, Tarquinienses, Samnites, and Volsci.

LL
L7884
.62

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION BY

B. O. FOSTER, PH.D.
OF STANFORD UNIVERSITY

IN THIRTEEN VOLUMES

IV

BOOKS VIII—X

234645
19.7.29

LONDON : WILLIAM HEINEMANN
NEW YORK : G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS MCMXXVI

CONTENTS

	PAGE
TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE	v
THE MANUSCRIPTS	ix
BOOK VIII	1
SUMMARY OF BOOK VIII	158
BOOK IX	161
SUMMARY OF BOOK IX	354
BOOK X	359
SUMMARIES OF BOOKS X—XX	544
INDEX OF NAMES	563
MAPS—
THE CAUDINE FORKS	At end
ITALY AT THE TIME OF THE SAMNITE WARS	,,

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER VIII

A.U.C. 413

I. Iam consules erant C. Plautius iterum L.[1] Aemilius Mamercus, cum Setini Norbanique Romam nuntii defectionis Privernatium cum querimoniis 2 acceptae cladis venerunt. Volscorum item exercitum duce Antiati populo consedisse ad Satricum allatum 3 est. Utrumque bellum Plautio sorte evenit. Prius ad Privernum profectus extemplo acie conflixit. Haud magno certamine devicti hostes; oppidum captum redditumque Privernatibus praesidio valido 4 imposito; agri partes duae ademptae. Inde victor exercitus Satricum contra Antiates ductus. Ibi magna utrimque caede atrox proelium fuit; et cum tempestas eos neutro inclinata spe dimicantes diremisset, Romani nihil eo certamine tam ambiguo fessi 5 in posterum diem proelium parant. Volscis recensentibus quos viros in acie amisissent haudquaquam idem animus ad iterandum periculum fuit; nocte

[1] L. (lucius) D^x: licius $D?L$: titus (or t.) Ω.

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK VIII

I. The consuls were now Gaius Plautius (for the second time) and Lucius Aemilius Mamercus, when the men of Setium and Norba brought tidings to Rome that the Privernates were in revolt, with complaints of a defeat suffered at their hands. It was also reported that a Volscian army, conducted by the Antiates, had encamped at Satricum. Both wars were by lot assigned to Plautius. He marched first on Privernum and at once gave battle. Without much ado he overcame the enemy, captured Privernum, and putting in it a strong garrison, restored it to the inhabitants, but deprived them of two-thirds of their territory. Thence he led his victorious army towards Satricum, to oppose the Antiates. The battle there, which was desperately fought, with heavy losses on both sides, was interrupted by a storm before victory had inclined to either army. The Romans, not a whit discouraged by so indecisive a struggle, prepared to do battle on the morrow; but the Volsci, when they reckoned up the men they had lost in the fighting, were by no means so eager to incur the danger a second time, and in the night marched off like beaten men B.C. 341

a.u.c. 413

pro victis Antium agmine trepido sauciis ac parte
6 impedimentorum relicta abierunt. Armorum magna vis cum inter caesa hostium corpora tum in castris inventa est. Ea Luae Matri dare se consul dixit finesque hostium usque ad oram maritimam est depopulatus.

7 Alteri consuli Aemilio ingresso Sabellum agrum non castra Samnitium, non legiones usquam oppositae. Ferro ignique vastantem agros legati
8 Samnitium pacem orantes adeunt; a quo reiecti ad senatum, potestate facta dicendi, positis ferocibus animis pacem sibi ab Romanis bellique ius adversus
9 Sidicinos petierunt, quae se eo iustius petere, quod et in amicitiam populi Romani secundis suis rebus, non adversis ut Campani, venissent, et adversus Sidicinos sumerent arma, suos semper hostes, populi
10 Romani nunquam amicos, qui nec ut Samnites in pace amicitiam nec ut Campani auxilium in bello petissent, nec in fide populi Romani nec in dicione essent.

II. Cum de postulatis Samnitium T. Aemilius praetor senatum consuluisset reddendumque iis
2 foedus patres censuissent, praetor Samnitibus respondit nec quo minus perpetua cum eis amicitia esset per populum Romanum stetisse, nec contradici quin, quoniam ipsos belli culpa sua contracti taedium

[1] i. e. as he burnt them: captured arms were sometimes burnt as an offering to Vulcan (I. xxxvii. 5), or to Jupiter Victor (X. xxix. 18). Lua Mater, wife of Saturn, was a goddess of atonement; at XLV. xxxiii. 1 she is associated in this rite with Mars and Minerva.

[2] Sabellus ager usually includes the territories in Central Italy inhabited by the Samnites, Sabines, Picentines, Vestini, Marsi, Paeligni, and Marrucini. Livy uses it here in a restricted sense of the country of the Samnites.

for Antium, with fear and trembling, abandoning B.C. 341 their wounded and a part of their baggage. A great quantity of arms was found, not only amongst the slain but also in the enemy's camp. Declaring[1] that he gave these arms to Lua Mater, the consul proceeded to lay waste the enemy's country as far as the coast.

The other consul, Aemilius, having entered the Sabellian[2] territory, nowhere encountered a Samnite camp or levies. As he was ravaging their fields with fire and sword, he was approached by Samnite envoys, who begged for peace. Being referred by Aemilius to the senate, they obtained an audience, and giving over their air of arrogance, besought the Romans to grant them peace and the right to war against the Sidicini. These requests, they said, were the more justifiable, inasmuch as they had become friends of the Roman People when their state was flourishing and not, like the Campanians, in their adversity; moreover, it was against the Sidicini that they were drawing the sword, a people always their enemies and never friendly to the Romans, of whom they had never, like the Samnites, sought friendship in time of peace, nor assistance, like the Campanians, in time of war; neither were they under the protection of the Roman People, nor yet their subjects.

II. Titus Aemilius the praetor laid the petition of the Samnites before the senate, and the Fathers voted to renew the treaty with them. The praetor then replied to the ambassadors that the Roman People had not been to blame for the interruption of the friendship, and that, since the Samnites were themselves grown weary of a war contracted through

u.c. 413

3 ceperit, amicitia de integro reconcilietur; quod ad Sidicinos attineat, nihil intercedi quo minus Samniti
4 populo pacis bellique liberum arbitrium sit. Foedere icto cum domum revertissent, extemplo inde exercitus Romanus deductus, annuo stipendio et trium mensum frumento accepto, quod pepigerat consul ut tempus indutiis daret quoad legati redissent.
5 Samnites copiis iisdem quibus usi adversus Romanum bellum fuerant contra Sidicinos profecti, haud in dubia spe erant mature urbis hostium potiundae,
6 cum[1] ab Sidicinis deditio prius ad Romanos coepta fieri est; dein, postquam patres ut seram eam ultimaque tandem necessitate expressam aspernabantur, ad Latinos iam sua sponte in arma motos
7 facta est. Ne Campani quidem—adeo iniuriae Samnitium quam beneficii Romanorum memoria
8 praesentior erat—his se armis abstinuere. Ex his tot populis unus ingens exercitus duce Latino fines Samnitium ingressus plus populationibus quam proeliis cladium fecit; et quamquam superiores certaminibus Latini erant, haud inviti, ne saepius dimicandum
9 foret, agro hostium excessere. Id spatium Samnitibus datum est Romam legatos mittendi; qui cum adissent senatum, conquesti eadem se foederatos pati
10 quae hostes essent passi, precibus infimis petiere ut

[1] cum A^1 or A^x: tum (before which P^2F^2O have a stop) Ω.

their own fault, they had no objection to renewing B.C. 341
the covenant; as for the Sidicini, the Romans would not interfere with the free judgment of the Samnite People regarding peace and war. On the ratification of the treaty, the ambassadors went home, and the Roman army was at once recalled, after receiving a year's pay and rations for three months, which the consul had stipulated should be the price of a truce, to last until the envoys should return.

The Samnites marched against the Sidicini with the same forces which they had employed in the war with Rome, and were confidently hoping to capture the city of their enemies in a little while, when the Sidicini attempted to anticipate them by surrendering to the Romans. Then, after the Fathers had rejected their offer, on the ground that it came too late and had been wrung from them only by the direst necessity, they carried it to the Latins, who had already risen in arms on their own account. Even the Campanians—so much more vivid was their recollection of the injury done them by the Samnites than of the kindness of the Romans—could not refrain from joining in this expedition. One great army, gathered out of all these nations, invaded the borders of the Samnites, under a Latin general, but wrought more havoc by pillage than in battle; and although the Latins came off best in all encounters, they were not unwilling to retire from the enemy's country, that they might not have to fight so often. The Samnites thus had time to send ambassadors to Rome. Appearing before the senate, they complained that they were suffering the same treatment as allies that they had experienced while enemies, and besought the Romans, with the utmost humility,

U.C. 413 satis ducerent Romani victoriam quam Samnitibus ex Campano Sidicinoque hoste eripuissent, ne vinci 11 etiam se ab ignavissimis populis sinerent; Latinos Campanosque, si sub dicione populi Romani essent, pro imperio arcerent Samniti agro, sin imperium 12 abnuerent, armis coercerent. Adversus haec responsum anceps datum, quia fateri pigebat in potestate sua Latinos iam non esse, timebantque, 13 ne arguendo abalienarent: Campanorum aliam condicionem esse, qui non foedere sed per deditionem in fidem venissent; itaque Campanos, seu velint seu nolint, quieturos; in foedere Latinos nihil esse quod bellare cum quibus ipsi velint prohibeant.

A.U.C. 414 III. Quod responsum sicut dubios Samnites quidnam facturum Romanum censerent dimisit, ita Campanos metu abalienavit, Latinos velut nihil iam non 2 concedentibus Romanis ferociores fecit. Itaque per speciem adversus Samnites belli parandi crebra concilia indicentes omnibus consultationibus inter se principes occulte Romanum coquebant bellum. Huic quoque adversus servatores suos bello Campanus 3 aderat. Sed quamquam omnia de industria celabantur—priusquam moverentur Romani, tolli ab tergo Samnitem hostem volebant—tamen per quosdam privatis hospitiis necessitudinibusque coniunctos in-that they would be satisfied to have snatched from the grasp of the Samnites a victory over their Campanian and Sidicinian foes, and not suffer them actually to be conquered by the most cowardly of nations. If the Latins and Campanians were subject to the Roman People, let the Romans use their authority and keep them from invading Samnium: but if they rejected that authority, let them hold them in check by force of arms. To this plea the Romans returned an ambiguous reply, since they were loath to confess that the Latins were no longer under their control, and feared to estrange them if they censured them. The Campanians, they said, were upon a different footing, having come under their protection not by treaty but by surrender; accordingly the Campanians, whether willing or not, should keep the peace; but there was nothing in their treaty with the Latins which entitled them to prevent their going to war with whom they chose. B.C. 341

III. This answer, as it left the Samnites quite at a loss to forecast the Roman policy, so it alienated the Campanians with fear, while it persuaded the Latins that there was no longer any concession the Romans would not make them, and rendered them yet more audacious. Accordingly their leaders, under colour of forwarding the war against the Samnites, appointed numerous councils, and in all their deliberations secretly concocted war with Rome. In this war, too, the Campanians took part, against their preservers. But though all their measures were sedulously concealed—for they wished to shake off the Samnite foe behind them before the Romans should take the alarm—yet through certain persons connected by private ties of hospitality and kinship, B.C. 340

A.U.C. 414

4 dicia coniurationis eius Romam emanarunt; iussisque ante tempus consulibus abdicare se magistratu, quo maturius novi consules adversus tantam molem belli crearentur, religio incessit, ab eis quorum imminutum imperium esset comitia haberi. Itaque interregnum 5 initum. Duo interreges fuere, M. Valerius ac M. Fabius; is creavit[1] consules T. Manlium Torquatum tertium, P. Decium Murem.

6 Eo anno Alexandrum Epiri regem in Italiam classem appulisse constat; quod bellum, si prima satis prospera fuissent, haud dubie ad Romanos 7 pervenisset. Eadem aetas rerum magni Alexandri est, quem sorore huius ortum in alio tractu orbis, invictum bellis, iuvenem fortuna morbo exstinxit.

8 Ceterum Romani, etsi defectio sociorum nominisque Latini haud dubia erat, tamen tamquam de Samnitibus non de se curam agerent, decem principes Latinorum Romam evocaverunt, quibus imperarent 9 quae vellent. Praetores tum duos Latium habebat, L. Annium Setinum et L. Numisium Circeiensem, ambo ex coloniis Romanis, per quos praeter Signiam[2] Velitrasque et ipsas colonias Romanas Volsci etiam exciti ad arma erant; eos nominatim evocari placuit. 10 Haud cuiquam dubium erat super qua re accirentur;

[1] is creavit cod. Sigon. (v. xxxi. 9): Fabius creavit Hertz: creauit Ω: creant U: creati A: creauerī F[3]: creauere $D^3A^3\gamma$.

[2] Signiam UA^1?: signia MOHTDL: signa PT^2A: signium

---

[1] Alexander the Epirot's expedition is here placed too early by some ten years. The story of his death is told in chap. xxiv.

[2] Olympias, daughter of Neoptolemus.

information of the conspiracy leaked out and was brought to Rome. The consuls were commanded, before their time was up, to resign their office, in order that new consuls might the sooner be chosen to confront so momentous an invasion; but a scruple arose at allowing the election to be held by those whose authority had been abridged, and so they had an interregnum. There were two interreges, Marcus Valerius and Marcus Fabius: the latter announced the election to the consulship of Titus Manlius Torquatus (for the third time) and Publius Decius Mus. B.C. 340

It is believed to have been in this year that Alexander, king of Epirus, sailed with a fleet to Italy—a war which, had it prospered in its beginning, would doubtless have extended to the Romans.[1] This was also the era of the exploits of Alexander the Great, who was the son of this man's sister,[2] and was doomed to be cut off by sickness while a young man, in another quarter of the world, after proving himself to be invincible in war.

But the Romans, though quite certain that the allies and all the Latins were going to revolt, nevertheless, as if concerned not for themselves but for the Samnites, summoned to Rome the ten chief men of the Latins, that they might give them such commands as they might wish. Latium at that time had two praetors, Lucius Annius Setinus and Lucius Numisius Circeiensis, both from Roman colonies, through whose contrivance, besides Signia and Velitrae—likewise Roman colonies—even the Volsci had been induced to draw the sword. It was determined to summon these men by name. Nobody could be in doubt why they were sent for; accorditaque concilio prius habito praetores quam Romam proficiscerentur evocatos se ab senatu docent Romano et quae actum iri secum credant, quidnam ad ea responderi placeat referunt.

A.U.C. 414

IV. Cum aliud alii censerent, tum Annius: "Quamquam ipse ego rettuli quid responderi placeret, tamen magis ad summam rerum nostrarum pertinere arbitror quid agendum nobis quam quid loquendum sit. Facile erit explicatis consiliis accommodare rebus 2 verba. Nam si etiam nunc sub umbra foederis aequi servitutem pati possumus, quid abest quin proditis Sidicinis non Romanorum solum sed Samnitium quoque dicto pareamus respondeamusque 3 Romanis nos, ubi innuerint, posituros arma? Sin autem tandem libertatis desiderium remordet animos, si foedus,[1] si societas aequatio iuris est, si consanguineos nos Romanorum esse, quod olim pudebat, nunc gloriari licet, si socialis illis exercitus is est quo adiuncto duplicent vires suas, quem secernere ab se consilia[2] bellis propriis ponendis sumendisque 4 nolint, cur non omnia aequantur? Cur non alter ab Latinis consul datur? Ubi pars virium, ibi et 5 imperii pars esto.[3] Est quidem nobis hoc per se haud nimis amplum, quippe concedentibus Romam caput Latio esse; sed ut amplum videri posset,

[1] si foedus Madvig: si foedus est Ω.

[2] consilia Madvig: consules Ω: consul TDLA.

[3] esto Mehler: est Ω: ēē (= esse) M: est? F^3H (Drakenborch): omitted by O.

ingly, before setting out for Rome the praetors held a council, and explaining how they had been summoned by the Roman senate, asked instructions touching the answers they should give to the questions which they supposed would be put to them. B.C. 340

IV. While one was suggesting this thing and another that, Annius arose. "Notwithstanding I have myself referred to you," said he, "the question as to what our reply should be, nevertheless I consider that what we are to do is of more importance to the welfare of our nation than what we are to say. It will be easy, when we have straightened out our plans, to frame words suitable to our conduct. For if we are able even now to endure slavery under a shadowy pretence of equal treaty-rights, what is left for us but to give up the Sidicini, and obeying the behest not of the Romans only but also of the Samnites, make answer to the Romans that we are ready to lay down our arms at their beck and call? But if our hearts are pricked at last with a longing for liberty; if treaties, if alliances, mean equality of rights; if we may now glory in the kinship of the Romans, of which we were formerly ashamed; if they mean by "allied army" one which added to their own doubles its numbers, one which they would not wish to make its own war and peace, apart from them;—if these things are so, I say, why are not all things equalized? Why is not one consul furnished by the Latins? Where a portion of the strength is, there, too, should be a portion of the authority. For us, indeed, this is not in itself any too great an honour, since we suffer Rome to be the capital of Latium; but we have made it seem an

A.U.C. 414

6 diuturna patientia fecimus. Atqui si quando unquam consociandi imperii, usurpandae libertatis tempus optastis, en hoc tempus adest, et virtute vestra et 7 deum benignitate vobis datum. Temptastis patientiam negando militem; quis dubitat exarsisse eos, cum plus ducentorum annorum morem solve- 8 remus? Pertulerunt tamen hunc dolorem. Bellum nostro nomine cum Paelignis gessimus; qui ne nostrorum quidem finium nobis per nos tuendorum 9 ius antea dabant nihil intercesserunt. Sidicinos in fidem receptos, Campanos ab se ad nos descisse, exercitus nos parare adversus Samnites, foederatos 10 suos, audierunt nec moverunt se ab urbe. Unde haec illis tanta modestia, nisi a conscientia virium et nostrarum et suarum? Idoneos auctores habeo querentibus de nobis Samnitibus ita responsum ab senatu Romano esse ut facile appareret ne ipsos quidem iam postulare ut Latium sub Romano imperio sit. Usurpate modo postulando[1] quod illi 11 vobis taciti concedunt. Si quem hoc metus dicere prohibet, en ego[2] ipse audiente non populo Romano modo senatuque sed Iove ipso, qui Capitolium incolit, profiteor me dicturum, ut si nos in foedere ac societate esse velint, consulem alterum ab nobis 12 senatusque partem accipiant." Haec ferociter non suadenti solum sed pollicenti clamore et adsensu

[1] postulando M^2 or $M^1\varsigma$: postulando. Eo TD: postulando eo Ω: postulando id ς.

[2] en ego A^3 Gelenius: eñgo M: en PFUO: ego HTDLA: hem ego ς.

honour by our prolonged submissiveness. And yet, B.C. 340
if ever at any time you have desired to share in the government and to use your freedom, behold, now is your opportunity, bestowed on you by your valour and by Heaven's favour! You have tried their patience by denying them troops; who can doubt that they were enraged when we broke the tradition of two hundred years? Yet they swallowed their resentment. We waged war on our own account with the Paeligni; those who aforetime withheld from us even the right to defend our own borders by ourselves, never interposed. They have heard how we received the Sidicini into our protection, how the Campanians have left them and joined us, how we are raising armies against the Samnites, their confederates,—and have not stirred from the City. Whence comes this great restraint on their part, if it come not from the consciousness of our strength—and their own? I have good authority for saying that when the Samnites were complaining of us, the Roman senate answered in such wise that it might readily appear that even the Romans themselves no longer demanded that Latium should be under their authority. Do but take up in your demands what they tacitly concede to you. If there is any man whom fear prevents from saying this, lo, I declare that I myself will say it, in the hearing not of the Roman People only and their senate, but of Jupiter himself, who dwells in the Capitol; that if they wish us to observe the treaty of alliance, they must receive from us one consul and a moiety of the senate." These bold encouragements, and even promises, were received with a general shout of approval, and Annius was empowered to act and speak as might seem con-

A.U.C. 414 omnes permiserunt ut ageret diceretque quae e re publica nominis Latini fideque sua viderentur.

V. Ubi est Romam ventum, in Capitolio eis senatus datus est. Ibi cum T. Manlius consul egisset cum eis ex auctoritate patrum, ne Samnitibus 2 foederatis bellum inferrent, Annius, tamquam victor armis Capitolium cepisset, non legatus iure gentium 3 tutus loqueretur, "Tempus erat," inquit, "T. Manli vosque, patres conscripti, tandem iam vos nobiscum nihil pro imperio agere, cum florentissimum deum benignitate Latium[1] armis virisque, Samnitibus bello victis, Sidicinis Campanisque sociis, nunc etiam Volscis adiunctis, videretis; colonias quoque vestras Latinum 4 Romano praetulisse imperium. Sed quoniam vos regno impotenti finem ut imponatis non inducitis in animum, nos, quamquam armis possumus adserere Latium in libertatem, consanguinitati tamen hoc dabimus ut condiciones pacis feramus aequas utrisque, quoniam vires quoque aequari dis immortalibus 5 placuit. Consulem alterum Roma, alterum ex Latio creari oportet, senatus partem aequam ex utraque gente esse, unum populum, unam rem publicam 6 fieri; et ut imperii eadem sedes sit idemque omnibus nomen, quoniam ab altera utra parte concedi necesse est, quod utrisque bene vertat, sit haec sane patria potior, et Romani omnes vocemur."

[1] Latium Madvig: nunc (tunc M) Latium Ω.

ducive to the welfare of the Latin state and befitting his own honour. B.C. 340

V. On the arrival of the Latins in Rome, they were given audience of the senate in the Capitol. There, after Titus Manlius the consul had pleaded with them, as directed by the senate, to make no war upon the Samnites, united as they were by treaty with the Romans, Annius held forth like some conqueror who had taken the Capitol by storm, not like an envoy protected by the law of nations. "It was high time, Titus Manlius," he said, "and you, Conscript Fathers, that you should cease at length to deal with us as in any sort our rulers, perceiving, as you have, that Latium, by Heaven's blessing, is flourishing exceedingly in arms and men, after vanquishing the Samnites in war and receiving as allies the Sidicini and Campanians, and now even the Volsci besides, and that your own colonies as well have preferred the Latin to the Roman sway. But, since you cannot make up your minds to bring your impotent sovereignty to a close, we—though able by force of arms to give Latium her freedom—will nevertheless concede so much to kinship as to offer terms of peace fair and equal to both sides, since the immortal gods have willed that we should be of equal strength. One consul should be chosen from Rome, the other from Latium, the senate should be drawn in equal proportions from both nations, there should be one people and one state; and that we may have the same seat of empire and the same name for all, by all means let this rather be our city, since one side must make concessions,—and may good come of it to both peoples!—and let us all be known as Romans."

A.U.C. 414

7 Forte ita accidit ut parem ferociae huius et Romani consulem T. Manlium haberent, qui adeo non tenuit iram ut, si tanta dementia patres conscriptos cepisset ut ab Setino homine leges acciperent, gladio cinctum in senatum venturum se esse palam diceret, et quemcumque in curia Latinum vidisset, sua manu 8 interempturum. Et conversus ad simulacrum Iovis, "Audi, Iuppiter, haec scelera" inquit; "audite, Ius Fasque. Peregrinos consules et peregrinum senatum in tuo, Iuppiter, augurato templo captus atque ipse [1] 9 oppressus visurus es! Haecine foedera Tullus, Romanus rex, cum Albanis, patribus vestris, Latini, 10 haec L. Tarquinius vobiscum postea fecit? Non venit in mentem pugna [2] apud Regillum lacum? Adeo et cladium veterum vestrarum et beneficiorum nostrorum erga vos obliti estis?"

VI. Cum consulis vocem subsecuta patrum indignatio esset, proditur memoriae adversus crebram implorationem deum, quos testes foederum saepius invocabant consules, vocem Anni spernentis numina 2 Iovis Romani auditam. Certe, cum commotus ira se a vestibulo templi citato gradu proriperet, lapsus per gradus capite graviter offenso impactus imo ita 3 est saxo ut sopiretur. Exanimatum auctores quoniam non omnes sunt, mihi quoque in incerto relictum sit, sicut inter foederum ruptorum testationem ingenti fragore caeli procellam effusam; nam et vera esse et apte ad repraesentandam iram deum ficta possunt.

[1] atque ipse Ω: ipse atque Alschefski.
[2] pugna Ω: pugnam M: pugnae Gronovius.

---

[1] See Book I., chap. xxiv and chap. lii.

It so happened that the Romans had, in their consul Titus Manlius, a man who was a match for Annius in boldness. So far was he from controlling his indignation, that he openly declared that if the Fathers were so demented as to receive terms from a Setine, he would gird on his sword, and entering the senate would slay with his own hand any Latin he might see within the Curia. And turning to the statue of the god, "Hear, Jupiter," he cried, "these wicked words! Hear ye, Law and Right! Shalt thou behold, O Jupiter, alien consuls and an alien senate in thy consecrated temple, thyself overpowered and taken captive? Are these the covenants, Latins, that Tullus, the Roman king, made with your Alban forefathers, that Lucius Tarquinius afterwards made with you?[1] Remember you not the battle at Lake Regillus? Have you so forgot your old disasters and our goodness to you?" B.C. 340

VI. The consul's speech having been warmly seconded by the indignant senators, it is recorded that in answer to the numerous supplications of the gods, whom the consuls repeatedly invoked as the witnesses of treaties, the voice of Annius was heard spurning the power of the Roman Jupiter. At all events, as he hurried, beside himself with rage, from the entrance of the temple, he slipped on the stairs, and struck his head so hard on the lowest stone that he lost consciousness. That he was killed is not asserted by all writers, wherefore I, too, may leave the question undecided, as also the tradition that while men were calling on the gods to witness the breaking of the treaty, there was a loud crash in the heavens, and a hurricane burst forth; for these things may be true, or they may be apt inventions to express in a

U.C. 411

4 Torquatus missus ab senatu ad dimittendos legatos
5 cum iacentem Annium vidisset, exclamat, ita ut populo patribusque audita vox pariter sit: "Bene habet: di pium movere bellum. Est caeleste numen;
es, magne Iuppiter; haud frustra te patrem deum
6 hominumque hac sede sacravimus. Quid cessatis, Quirites, vosque patres conscripti, arma capere deis ducibus? Sic stratas legiones Latinorum dabo, 7 quemadmodum legatum iacentem videtis." Adsensu populi excepta vox consulis tantum ardoris animis fecit, ut legatos proficiscentes cura magistratuum magis, qui iussu consulis prosequebantur, quam ius gentium ab ira impetuque hominum tegeret.

8 Consensit et senatus bellum; consulesque duobus scriptis exercitibus per Marsos Paelignosque profecti adiuncto Samnitium exercitu ad Capuam, quo iam 9 Latini sociique convenerant, castra locant. Ibi in quiete utrique consuli eadem dicitur visa species viri maioris quam pro humano habitu augustiorisque, 10 dicentis ex una acie imperatorem, ex altera exercitum Deis Manibus Matrique Terrae deberi; utrius exer-citus imperator legiones hostium superque eas se 11 devovisset, eius populi partisque victoriam fore. Hos ubi nocturnos visus inter se consules contulerunt, placuit averruncandae deum irae victimas caedi;

lively manner the wrath of Heaven. Torquatus, who B.C. 340 had been sent by the senate to dismiss the envoys, saw Annius lying there, and exclaimed in a voice that was heard alike by the people and the senators: "It is well; the gods have begun a righteous war. There is a heavenly power; thou dost exist, great Jupiter; not in vain have we established thee in this holy seat, the Father of gods and men. Why do you hesitate to arm, Quirites, and you Conscript Fathers, with the gods to lead you? As you behold their ambassador brought low, even so will I cast down the Latin legions." The consul's words were received with approval by the people, and so enraged them, that the envoys, at their setting out, owed their protection from men's wrath and fury more to the care of the magistrates—who attended them at the consul's bidding—than to the law of nations.

The senate also agreed on war; and the consuls, enrolling two armies, marched out through the country of the Marsi and Paeligni, and having added to their forces the army of the Samnites, went into camp near Capua, where the Latins and their allies had already assembled. There in the stillness of the night both consuls are said to have been visited by the same apparition, a man of greater than human stature and more majestic, who declared that the commander of one side, and the army of the other, must be offered up to the Manes and to Mother Earth; and that in whichever host the general should devote to death the enemy's legions, and himself with them, that nation and that side would have the victory. When the consuls had compared these visions of the night, they resolved that victims should be slain to turn away the wrath of Heaven;

u.c. 414 simul ut, si extis eadem quae in somnio[1] visa fuerant portenderentur, alter uter consulum fata impleret. 12 Ubi responsa haruspicum insidenti iam animo tacitae religioni congruerunt, tum adhibitis legatis tribunisque et imperiis deum propalam expositis, ne mors voluntaria consulis exercitum in acie terreret, 13 comparant inter se ut ab utra parte cedere Romanus exercitus coepisset, inde se consul devoveret pro 14 populo Romano Quiritibusque. Agitatum etiam in consilio est ut, si quando unquam severo ullum imperio bellum administratum esset, tunc utique[2] disciplina militaris ad priscos redigeretur mores. 15 Curam acuebat quod adversus Latinos bellandum erat, lingua, moribus, armorum genere, institutis ante omnia militaribus, congruentes; milites militibus, centurionibus centuriones, tribuni tribunis compares collegaeque iisdem in[3] praesidiis, saepe iisdem manipulis permixti fuerant. 16 Per haec ne quo errore milites caperentur, edicunt consules, ne quis extra ordinem in hostem pugnaret.

VII. Forte inter ceteros turmarum praefectos, qui exploratum in omnes partes dimissi erant, T. Manlius consulis filius super castra hostium cum suis turmalibus evasit, ita ut vix teli iactu ab statione 2 proxima abesset. Ibi Tusculani erant equites; praeerat Geminus Maecius, vir cum genere inter

[1] in somnio Wesenberg: somnio Ω: somnia (with visu) F.
[2] utique Sigonius: uti Ω.
[3] iisdem in Conway: in iisdem Wesenberg: iisdem (or isdem or hisdem) Ω.

and, at the same time, that if the warning of the entrails should coincide with what thay had seen in their dream, one or other of the consuls should fulfil the decrees of fate. The report of the soothsayers agreed with the secret conviction which had already found lodgment in their breasts; whereupon they sent for their lieutenants and the tribunes, and having openly declared the pleasure of the gods, that so the consul's voluntary death might not terrify the soldiers in the fray, they agreed with one another that on whichever flank the Roman army should begin to yield, there the consul should devote himself in behalf of the Roman People and Quirites. It was also urged in the council that if ever any war had been conducted with stern authority, now was the occasion of all others for recalling military descipline to its ancient courses. Their anxiety was sharpened by the fact that they must fight against the Latins, who were like themselves in language, customs, fashion of arms, and above all in military institutions; soldiers had mingled with soldiers, centurions with centurions, tribunes with tribunes, as equals and colleagues in the same garrisons and often in the same maniples. Lest this might betray the soldiers into some blunder, the consuls proclaimed that no man should quit his place to attack the foe. B.C. 340

VII. It chanced that amongst the other squadron-leaders who had been sent off in all directions to reconnoitre, Titus Manlius the consul's son had ridden out with his troopers beyond the enemy's camp, till he was hardly the cast of a spear from their nearest outpost. There the Tusculan horse were stationed, under the command of Geminus Maecius, who enjoyed a reputation amongst his

a.u.c. 414

3 suos tum factis clarus. Is ubi Romanos equites insignemque inter eos praecedentem consulis filium —nam omnes inter se, utique illustres viri, noti
4 erant—cognovit, "Unane," ait, "turma, Romani, cum Latinis sociisque bellum gesturi estis? Quid interea consules, quid duo exercitus consulares
5 agent?" "Aderunt in tempore," Manlius inquit, "et cum illis aderit Iuppiter ipse, foederum a vobis
6 violatorum testis, qui plus potest polletque. Si ad Regillum lacum ad satietatem vestram pugnavimus, hic quoque efficiemus profecto ne nimis acies vobis
7 et conlata signa nobiscum cordi sint." Ad ea Geminus paulum ab suis equo provectus: "Visne igitur, dum dies ista venit, qua magno conatu exercitus moveatis, interea tu ipse congredi mecum, ut nostro duorum iam hinc eventu cernatur, quantum
8 eques Latinus Romano praestet?" Movet ferocem animum iuvenis seu ira seu detractandi certaminis pudor seu inexsuperabilis vis fati. Oblitus itaque imperii patrii consulumque edicti, praeceps ad id certamen agitur, quo vinceret an vinceretur haud
9 multum interesset. Equitibus ceteris velut ad spectaculum submotis, spatio quod vacui interiacebat campi adversos concitant equos; et cum infestis cuspidibus concurrissent, Manli cuspis super galeam fellows for his achievements no less than for his noble birth. This man recognized the Roman cavalry, and, conspicuous in their van, the consul's son—for they were all known to one another, particularly the men of mark. "Come now," he cried, "will you Romans wage war on the Latins and their allies with a single squadron? What will the consuls, what will two consular armies be doing in the meantime?" "They will be here soon enough," said Manlius, "and with them will be Jupiter himself, the witness of those covenants which you have violated, who is mightier and more powerful than they. If at Lake Regillus we gave you your fill of fighting, here likewise we shall certainly see to it that you have no great joy of meeting us in the serried ranks of battle." At this, Geminus rode out a little in front of his men, and asked, "Would you like then, while waiting for that great day to come, when with a mighty effort you are to set your hosts in motion—would you like meanwhile, I say, to do battle with me, yourself, that from the outcome of our duel men may see at once how far the Latin horse surpass the Roman?" The youth's bold heart was stirred, whether by anger, or by shame at the thought of refusing the combat, or by the irresistible force of destiny. And so, forgetting the commands of his father and the edict of the consuls, he allowed himself to be swept headlong into an encounter where it would make little difference to him whether he won or lost. They caused the rest of the horsemen to stand back, as though it had been a spectacle, and spurred their steeds against one another across the vacant space between. With lances levelled they rushed together; but the lance of Manlius glanced off B.C. 340

A.U.C. 414

10 hostis, Maeci trans cervicem equi elapsa est. Circumactis deinde equis cum prior ad iterandum ictum Manlius consurrexisset, spiculum inter aures equi fixit. Ad cuius volneris sensum cum equus prioribus pedibus erectis magna vi caput quateret, excussit
11 equitem, quem cuspide parmaque innixum attollentem se ab gravi casu Manlius ab iugulo, ita ut per costas
12 ferrum emineret, terrae adfixit; spoliisque lectis ad suos revectus, cum ovante gaudio turma in castra atque inde ad praetorium ad patrem tendit, ignaru fati[1] futurique, laus an poena merita esset.
13 "Ut me omnes," inquit, "pater, tuo sanguine ortum vere ferrent, provocatus equestria haec spolia
14 capta ex hoste caeso porto." Quod ubi audivit consul, extemplo filium aversatus contionem classico
15 advocari iussit. Quae ubi frequens convenit, "Quandoque," inquit, "tu, T. Manli, neque imperium consulare neque maiestatem patriam veritus adversus edictum nostrum extra ordinem in hostem pugnasti,
16 et quantum in te fuit, disciplinam militarem, qua stetit ad hanc diem Romana res, solvisti, meque in eam necessitatem adduxisti, ut aut rei publicae mihi
17 aut mei[2] oblivisceendum sit, nos potius nostro delicto plectemur quam res publica tanto suo damno nostra peccata luat. Triste exemplum sed in posterum

[1] fati T^2 Frag. Havork. γ: facti Ω.
[2] mei Conway: mei meorum Ω: mei meorumue H: mei meorumque $F^1UD^3A^2\gamma$.

the helmet of his enemy, and that of Maecius passed B.C. 340 over the neck of the other's horse. Then, as they pulled their horses round, Manlius, who was the first to gather himself up for a second thrust, pricked his enemy's charger between the ears. The smart of this wound made the horse rear and toss his head so violently that he threw off his rider, who, raising himself with spear and shield, was struggling to his feet after the heavy fall, when Manlius plunged his lance into his throat so that it came out between the ribs and pinned him to the ground. He then gathered up the spoils and rode back to his troopers, who attended him with shouts of triumph to the camp, where he sought at once the headquarters of his father, knowing not what doom the future held for him, or whether praise or punishment were his appointed guerdon.

"Father," he said, "that all men might truly report me to be your son, I bring these equestrian spoils, stripped from the body of an enemy who challenged me." On hearing this, the consul straightway turned from his son and commanded a trumpet to sound the assembly. When the men had gathered in full numbers, the consul said, "Inasmuch, Titus Manlius, as you have held in reverence neither consular authority nor a father's dignity, and despite our edict have quitted your place to fight the enemy, and so far as in you lay, have broken military discipline, whereby the Roman state has stood until this day unshaken, thus compelling me to forget either the republic or myself, we will sooner endure the punishment of our wrong-doing than suffer the republic to expiate our sins at a cost so heavy to herself; we will set a stern example, but a salutary

A.U.C. 414

18 salubre iuventuti erimus. Me quidem cum ingenita caritas liberum tum specimen istud virtutis deceptum
19 vana imagine decoris in te movet; sed cum aut morte tua sancienda sint consulum imperia aut impunitate in perpetuum abroganda, nec[1] te quidem, si quid in te nostri sanguinis est, recusare censeam quin disciplinam militarem culpa tua prolapsam poena restituas—i, lictor, deliga ad palum."

20 Exanimati omnes tam atroci imperio nec aliter quam in se quisque destrictam cernentes securem,
21 metu magis quam modestia quievere. Itaque velut demerso[2] ab admiratione animo cum silentio defixi stetissent, repente, postquam cervice caesa fusus est cruor, tam[3] libero conquestu coortae voces sunt ut neque lamentis neque exsecrationibus parceretur,
22 spoliisque contectum iuvenis corpus, quantum militaribus studiis funus ullum concelebrari potest, structo extra vallum rogo cremaretur, Manlianaque imperia non in praesentia modo horrenda sed exempli etiam tristis in posterum essent.

VIII. Fecit tamen atrocitas poenae oboedientiorem duci militem, et praeterquam quod custodiae vigiliaeque et ordo stationum intentioris ubique curae erant, in ultimo etiam certamine, cum descensum
2 in aciem est, ea severitas profuit. Fuit autem civili maxime bello pugna similis; adeo nihil apud

[1] nec Ω Walters (who punctuates as in the text restituas—): ne Luc. Gronovius (with full stop after restituas).

[2] demerso M. Mueller (D has uelud for uelut): emerso Ω merso Madvig: veluti merso Zingerle.

[3] tam Crévier: tum Ω.

one, for the young men of the future. For my own part, I am moved, not only by a man's instinctive love of his children, but by this instance you have given of your bravery, perverted though it was by an idle show of honour. But since the authority of the consuls must either be established by your death, or by your impunity be forever abrogated, and since I think that you yourself, if you have a drop of my blood in you, would not refuse to raise up by your punishment the military discipline which through your misdemeanour has slipped and fallen,—go, lictor, bind him to the stake." B.C. 340

All were astounded at so shocking a command; every man looked upon the axe as lifted against himself, and they were hushed with fear more than with reverence. And so, after standing, as if lost in wonder, rooted to the spot, suddenly, when the blood gushed forth from the severed neck, their voices burst out in such unrestrained upbraiding that they spared neither laments nor curses; and covering the young man's body with his spoils, they built a pyre outside the rampart, where they burned it with all the honours that can possibly attend a soldier's funeral; and the "orders of Manlius" not only caused men to shudder at the time, but became a type of severity with succeeding ages.

VIII. Nevertheless the brutality of the punishment made the soldiers more obedient to their general; and not only were guard-duties, watches, and the ordering of outposts, everywhere more carefully observed, but in the final struggle, as well, when the troops had gone down into battle, that stern act did much good. Now the battle was exceedingly like the battles in a civil war, so little

A.U.C. 414

Latinos dissonum ab Romana re praeter animos erat.

3 Clipeis antea Romani[1] usi sunt; dein, postquam stipendiarii facti sunt, scuta pro clipeis fecere; et quod antea phalanx similis[2] Macedonicis, hoc postea 4 manipulatim structa acies coepit esse: postremi[3] in 5 plures ordines instruebantur. Prima acies hastati erant, manipuli quindecim, distantes inter se modicum spatium; manipulus leves[4] vicenos milites, aliam turbam scutatorum habebat; leves autem qui hastam tantum gaesaque gererent vocabantur. 6 Haec prima frons in acie[5] florem iuvenum pubescentium ad militiam habebat. Robustior inde aetas totidem manipulorum, quibus principibus est nomen, hos sequebantur, scutati omnes, insignibus maxime 7 armis. Hoc triginta manipulorum agmen antepilanos appellabant, quia sub signis iam alii quindecim ordines locabantur, ex quibus ordo unusquisque tres partes habebat — earum unam quamque primam[6] 8 pilum vocabant; tribus ex vexillis constabat ordo; sexagenos milites, duos centuriones, vexillarium unum habebat[7] vexillum; centum octoginta sex homines erant; primum vexillum triarios ducebat, veteranum militem spectatae virtutis, secundum rorarios, minus roboris aetate factisque, tertium

[1] Romani M^2(or M^2) H^1(or H^2) Frag. Haverk. ζ: romanis Ω.

[2] phalanx similis Luterbacher: phalanges similes Ω: phalange similes A^4.

[3] postremi Ortmann (and M?): postremo M or M^1 Ω.

[4] leves Gruter: leuis Ω.

[5] frons in acie $F^3I^3A^1$: frons in aciem U: foris in aciem (acē H) Ω: in aciem foris L: sors in acie Conway.

[6] primam Lipsius: primum Ω.

[7] The words ordo . . . habebat are placed here by Conway (Class Quart. 12 (1918) pp. 9–14), who punctuates as in the

did the Latins differ from the Romans in anything but courage. B.C. 340

The Romans had formerly used small round shields; then, after they began to serve for pay, they made oblong shields instead of round ones; and what had before been a phalanx, like the Macedonian phalanxes, came afterwards to be a line of battle formed by maniples, with the rearmost troops drawn up in a number of companies. The first line, or hastati, comprised fifteen maniples, stationed a short distance apart; the maniple had twenty light-armed soldiers, the rest of their number carried oblong shields; moreover those were called "light-armed" who carried only a spear and javelins. This front line in the battle contained the flower of the young men who were growing ripe for service. Behind these came a line of the same number of maniples, made up of men of a more stalwart age; these were called the principes; they carried oblong shields and were the most showily armed of all. This body of thirty maniples they called antepilani, because behind the standards there were again stationed other fifteen companies, each of which had three sections, the first section in every company being known as pilus. The company consisted of three vexilla or "banners"; a single vexillum had sixty soldiers, two centurions, one vexillarius, or colour-bearer; the company numbered a hundred and eighty-six men. The first banner led the triarii, veteran soldiers of proven valour; the second banner the rorarii, younger and less distinguished men; the text, making vexillum subj. of habebat: the MSS. give them after instruebantur (§ 4).

---

A.U.C. 414

accensos, minimae fiduciae manum; eo et in postremam aciem reiciebantur.

9 Ubi his ordinibus exercitus instructus esset, hastati omnium primi pugnam inibant. Si hastati profligare hostem non possent, pede presso eos retro cedentes in intervalla ordinum principes recipiebant. Tum 10 principum pugna erat; hastati sequebantur. Triarii sub vexillis considebant sinistro crure porrecto, scuta innixa umeris, hastas suberecta cuspide in terra fixas, haud secus quam vallo saepta inhorreret acies, 11 tenentes. Si apud principes quoque haud satis prospere esset pugnatum, a prima acie ad triarios se sensim referebant.[1] (Inde rem ad triarios redisse, cum 12 laboratur, proverbio increbruit.) Triarii consurgentes, ubi in intervalla ordinum suorum principes et hastatos recepissent, extemplo compressis ordinibus velut claudebant vias, unoque continenti agmine 13 iam nulla spe post relicta in hostem incidebant; id erat formidolosissimum hosti, cum velut victos insecuti novam repente aciem exsurgentem, auctam 14 numero, cernebant. Scribebantur autem quattuor fere legiones quinis milibus peditum, equitibus in singulas legiones trecenis.

Alterum tantum ex Latino dilectu adiciebatur,

[1] se sensim referebant Madvig: sensim referebantur Ω: redisse referebantur DA: redisse referebant L: retro se referebant D^2 or D^1 (margin).

[1] Of this account of the reorganization of the army see the discussion by Professor Conway (Class. Quart. 12 (1918) 9–14). The writer concludes that "in the army which Livy was describing there were only 10 maniples of Hastati, 10 of Principes, and 10 ordines of the third division (Triarii + Rorarii + Accensi). Then the numeration becomes clear; the third division has 3 times 600, i.e. 1800; each of the third banner the accensi, who were the least dependable, and were, for that reason, assigned to the rearmost line. B.C. 340

When an army had been marshalled in this fashion, the hastati were the first of all to engage. If the hastati were unable to defeat the enemy, they retreated slowly and were received into the intervals between the companies of the principes. The principes then took up the fighting and the hastati followed them. The triarii knelt beneath their banners, with the left leg advanced, having their shields leaning against their shoulders and their spears thrust into the ground and pointing obliquely upwards, as if their battle-line were fortified with a bristling palisade. If the principes, too, were unsuccessful in their fight, they fell back slowly from the battle-line on the triarii. (From this arose the adage, "to have come to the triarii," when things are going badly.) The triarii, rising up after they had received the principes and hastati into the intervals between their companies, would at once draw their companies together and close the lanes, as it were; then, with no more reserves behind to count on, they would charge the enemy in one compact array. This was a thing exceedingly disheartening to the enemy, who, pursuing those whom they supposed they had conquered, all at once beheld a new line rising up, with augmented numbers. There were customarily four legions raised of five thousand foot each, with three hundred horse to every legion.[1]

An equivalent contingent used to be added from first two has 1600, each maniple running to 160. This gives 1800+2(1600)=5000, Livy's total."

A.U.C. 414

qui ea tempestate hostes erant Romanis eodemque
15 ordine instruxerant aciem; nec vexilla cum vexillis tantum, universi hastati cum hastatis, principes cum principibus, sed centurio quoque cum centurione, si ordines turbati non essent, concurrendum sibi esse 16 sciebat. Duo primi pili ex utraque acie inter triarios erant, Romanus corpore haudquaquam satis validus,
17 ceterum strenuus vir peritusque militiae, Latinus viribus ingens bellatorque primus, notissimi inter
18 se, quia pares semper ordines duxerant.[1] Romano haud satis fidenti viribus iam Romae permissum erat ab consulibus, ut subcenturionem sibi quem vellet legeret qui tutaretur eum ab uno destinato hoste; isque iuvenis in acie oblatus ex centurione Latino victoriam tulit.

19 Pugnatum est haud procul radicibus Vesuvii montis, qua via ad Veserim ferebat. IX. Romani consules, priusquam educerent in aciem, immolaverunt. Decio caput iocineris a familiari parte caesum haruspex dicitur ostendisse: alioqui acceptam dis hostiam esse; Manlium egregie litasse. "Atqui bene habet" inquit Decius, "si ab collega litatum
2 est." Instructis, sicut ante dictum est, ordinibus processere in aciem. Manlius dextro, Decius laevo
3 cornu praeerat. Primo utrimque aequis viribus, eodem ardore animorum gerebatur res; deinde ab

[1] duxerant $: duxerunt Ω.

---

[1] A river (Aurelius Victor, 26.4), or possibly a town.

[2] The "head of the liver" was a protuberance on the upper part of the right (i.e. Roman) lobe. In the present instance this protuberance had the appearance of being mutilated, and so constituted a presage of evil to Decius.

the levy of the Latins, who were now the enemies of the Romans and had drawn up their battle-line in the same formation; and they knew that not only must section meet in battle with section, hastati with hastati, principes with principes, but even—if the companies were not disordered—centurion with centurion. In either army the primus pilus, or chief centurion, was with the triarii. The Roman was far from strong in body, but was an energetic man and an experienced soldier; the Latin was a man of might and a first-rate warrior; they were well acquainted with each other, because they had always commanded companies of equal rank. The Roman, putting no confidence in his strength, had obtained permission from the consuls before leaving Rome to choose whom he liked for his deputy-centurion, to defend him from the one man marked out for his opponent. This youth, encountering the Latin centurion in the battle, won the victory over him. B.C. 340

The engagement came off not far from the foot of Mount Vesuvius, where the road led to Veseris.[1]

IX. The Roman consuls before leading their troops into battle offered sacrifices. It is said that the soothsayer pointed out to Decius that the head of the liver was wounded on the friendly side; but that the victim was in all other respects acceptable to the gods,[2] and that the sacrifice of Manlius had been greatly successful. "It is well enough," said Decius, "if my colleague has received favourable tokens." In the formation already described they advanced into the field. Manlius commanded the right wing, Decius the left. In the beginning the strength of the combatants and their ardour were equal on both sides; but after a time the Roman laevo cornu hastati Romani, non ferentes impres-4 sionem Latinorum, se ad principes recepere. In hac trepidatione Decius consul M. Valerium magna voce inclamat: "Deorum" inquit "ope, M.[1] Valeri, opus est; agedum, pontifex publicus populi Romani, praei verba quibus me pro legionibus devoveam."

A.U.C. 414

5 Pontifex eum togam praetextam sumere iussit et velato capite, manu subter togam ad mentum exserta, super telum subiectum pedibus stantem sic
6 dicere: "Iane Iuppiter Mars pater Quirine Bellona Lares Divi Novensiles Di Indigetes Divi quorum est potestas nostrorum hostiumque Dique Manes,
7 vos precor veneror veniam peto oroque[2] uti populo Romano Quiritium vim victoriam prosperetis, hostesque populi Romani Quiritium terrore formidine
8 morteque adficiatis. Sicut verbis nuncupavi, ita pro re publica populi Romani[3] Quiritium, exercitu legionibus auxiliis populi Romani Quiritium, legiones auxiliaque hostium mecum Deis Manibus Tellurique devoveo."
9 Haec ita precatus lictores ire ad T. Manlium iubet matureque collegae se devotum pro exercitu nuntiare. Ipse incinctus cinctu Gabino, armatus

[1] ope, M. Alschefski: opem M.: ope Ω: omitted by L.
[2] oroque Forchhammer: feroque Ω.
[3] pro re publica populi Romani Quiritium Gronovius: pro r̄ p̄ quiritium Ω: pro p̄ r̄ quiritium U.

[1] See chap. iii. § 5. Apparently it was the custom for a member of the pontifical college to accompany the army in order to preside over important rites.
[2] Indiges probably means "belonging to a certain place," and di Indigites would be native, as contrasted with the di Novensiles (or Novensides), who were immigrants or new settlers in the Roman Pantheon.

hastati on the left, unable to withstand the pressure of the Latins, fell back upon the principes. In the confusion of this movement Decius the consul called out to Marcus Valerius in a loud voice: "We have need of Heaven's help, Marcus Valerius.[1] Come therefore, state pontiff of the Roman People, dictate the words, that I may devote myself to save the legions." The pontiff bade him don the purple-bordered toga, and with veiled head and one hand thrust out from the toga and touching his chin, stand upon a spear that was laid under his feet, and say as follows: "Janus, Jupiter, Father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, Lares, divine Novensiles, divine Indigites,[2] ye gods in whose power are both we and our enemies, and you, divine Manes,—I invoke and worship you, I beseech and crave your favour, that you prosper the might and the victory of the Roman People of the Quirites, and visit the foes of the Roman People of the Quirites with fear, shuddering, and death. As I have pronounced the words, even so in behalf of the republic of the Roman People of the Quirites, and of the army, the legions, the auxiliaries of the Roman People of the Quirites, do I devote the legions and auxiliaries of the enemy, together with myself, to the divine Manes and to Earth." B.C. 340

Having uttered this prayer he bade the lictors go to Titus Manlius and lose no time in announcing to his colleague that he had devoted himself for the good of the army. He then girded himself with the Gabinian cincture,[3] and vaulting, armed, upon

[3] A peculiar mode of wearing the toga usual in certain rites and possessing the advantage of rendering the robe less cumbersome.

U.C. 414 in equum insiluit ac se in medios hostes immisit,
10 conspectus ab utraque acie, aliquanto augustior humano visu, sicut caelo missus piaculum omnis deorum irae, qui pestem ab suis aversam in hostes
11 ferret. Ita omnis terror pavorque cum illo latus signa prima Latinorum turbavit, deinde in totam
12 penitus aciem pervasit. Evidentissimum id fuit, quod quacumque equo invectus est, ibi haud secus quam pestifero sidere icti pavebant; ubi vero corruit obrutus telis, inde iam haud dubie consternatae cohortes Latinorum fugam ac vastitatem late fece-
13 runt. Simul et Romani exsolutis religione animis velut tum primum signo dato coorti pugnam integram
14 ediderunt; nam et rorarii procurrebant inter antepilanos addebantque[1] vires hastatis ac principibus, et triarii genu dextro innixi nutum consulis ad consurgendum exspectabant.

X. Procedente deinde certamine cum aliis partibus multitudo superaret Latinorum, Manlius consul audito eventu collegae cum, ut ius fasque erat, lacrimis non minus quam laudibus debitis prosecutus
2 tam memorabilem mortem esset, paulisper addubitavit an consurgendi iam triariis tempus esset; deinde melius ratus integros eos ad ultimum discrimen servari, accensos ab novissima acie ante signa
3 procedere iubet. Qui ubi subiere, extemplo Latini,

[1] addebantque Alschefski: adderantque M: addid adid-F)erantque Ω.

his horse, plunged into the thick of the enemy, a B.C. 340 conspicuous object from either army and of an aspect more august than a man's, as though sent from heaven to expiate all anger of the gods, and to turn aside destruction from his people and bring it on their adversaries. Thus every terror and dread attended him, and throwing the Latin front into disarray, spread afterwards throughout their entire host. This was most clearly seen in that, wherever he rode, men cowered as though blasted by some baleful star; but when he fell beneath a rain of missiles, from that instant there was no more doubt of the consternation of the Latin cohorts, which everywhere abandoned the field in flight. At the same time the Romans—their spirits relieved of religious fears—pressed on as though the signal had just then for the first time been given, and delivered a fresh attack; for the rorarii were running out between the antepilani and were joining their strength to that of the hastati and the principes, and the triarii, kneeling on the right knee, were waiting till the consul signed to them to rise.

X. While the struggle continued, and in some parts of the field the Latins were prevailing by reason of their numbers, the consul Manlius learned of his colleague's end, and having paid to so memorable a death—as justice and piety demanded—its well-merited meed of tears as well as praise, he was for a little while in doubt whether the moment were yet come for the triarii to rise; but afterwards deeming it better to keep them fresh for the final push, he commanded the accensi to advance from the rear before the standards. No sooner had they gone up, than the Latins, supposing their enemies had done tamquam idem adversarii fecissent, triarios suos excitaverunt; qui aliquamdiu pugna atroci cum et semet ipsi fatigassent et hastas aut praefregissent aut hebetassent, pellerent tamen[1] hostem, debellatum iam rati perventumque ad extremam aciem, 4 tum consul triariis "Consurgite nunc" inquit, "integri adversus fessos, memores patriae parentumque et coniugum ac liberorum, memores consulis pro 5 vestra victoria morte occubantis." Ubi triarii consurrexerunt integri refulgentibus armis, nova ex improviso exorta acies, receptis in intervalla ordinum 6 antepilanis, clamore sublato principia Latinorum perturbant hastisque ora fodientes primo robore virorum caeso per alios manipulos velut inermes prope intacti evasere tantaque caede perrupere cuneos ut vix quartam partem relinquerent hostium. 7 Samnites quoque sub radicibus montis procul instructi praebuere terrorem Latinis.

A.U.C. 414

Ceterum inter omnes cives sociosque praecipua laus eius belli penes consules fuit, quorum alter omnes minas periculaque ab deis superis inferisque 8 in se unum vertit, alter ea virtute eoque consilio in proelio fuit ut facile convenerit inter Romanos Latinosque qui eius pugnae memoriam posteris tradiderunt, utrius partis T. Manlius dux fuisset, 9 eius futuram haud dubie fuisse victoriam. Latini ex fuga se Minturnas contulerunt. Castra secundum proelium capta, multique mortales ibi vivi oppressi,

[1] tamen Walters: ui tamen ui between points in H and following a point in F^2T) Ω: ue tamen $U\text{-}A^1$: ut tamen M: -que tandem Madvig.

[1] Whether Livy made use of Latin as well as Roman annalists is unknown; they no doubt existed, as he here gives us to understand.

the same, sent in their own triarii. These having B.C. 340 fought fiercely for some time, and worn themselves out and broken or blunted their spears, yet were driving back the foe, and supposed that they had already won the field and penetrated the last line, when the consul cried out to the Roman triarii: "Rise up now, and with fresh strength confront the weary enemy, remembering your country and your parents, your wives and your children, remembering the consul who lies dead that you may conquer." When the triarii had got to their feet, fresh and sound in their glittering armour, a new and unforeseen array, they received the antepilani into the gaps between their files, and, raising a shout, threw the enemy's front ranks into disorder, and thrusting their spears into their faces, disposed of the fine flower of their manhood and went through the other maniples almost scatheless, as though their opponents had been unarmed, penetrating their masses with such slaughter as scarce to leave a fourth part of their enemies alive. The Samnites, too, drawn up a little way off at the base of the mountain, were a source of terror to the Latins.

For the rest, of all the citizens and allies, the chief glory of that war went to the consuls; of whom the one had drawn all the threats and menaces of the supernal and infernal gods upon himself alone, and the other had shown such valour and ability in the battle that it is readily agreed by both Romans and Latins who have handed down an account of this engagement that whichever side had been led by Titus Manlius would undoubtedly have been victorious.[1] The Latins fled to Minturnae. Their camp was captured after the battle and many men—

A.U.C. 414

10 maxime Campani. Deci corpus ne eo die inveniretur, nox quaerentes oppressit; postero die inventum inter maximam hostium stragem coopertum telis; funusque ei par morti celebrante collega factum est.

11 Illud adiciendum videtur, licere consuli dictatorique et praetori, cum legiones hostium devoveat, non utique se, sed quem velit ex legione Romana scripta
12 civem devovere; si is homo qui devotus est moritur, probe factum videri; ni moritur, tum signum septem pedes altum aut maius in terram defodi et piaculum[1] caedi; ubi illud signum defossum erit, eo
13 magistratum Romanum escendere fas non esse. Sin autem sese devovere volet, sicuti Decius devovit, ni moritur, neque suum neque publicum divinum pure faciet, sive hostia sive quo alio volet.[2] Qui sese devoverit, Volcano arma sive cui alii divo vovere
14 volet ius est; telo super quod stans consul precatus est hostem potiri fas non est; si potiatur, Marti suovetaurilibus piaculum fieri. XI. Haec, etsi omnis divini humanique moris memoria abolevit nova peregrinaque omnia priscis ac patriis praeferendo, haud ab re duxi verbis quoque ipsis, ut tradita nuncupataque sunt, referre.

2 Romanis post proelium demum factum Samnites

[1] piaculum Walters and Conway (in their note): piaculum hostia -am U) Ω.

[2] sive . . . volet placed here by Madvig: after diuo uouere uolet Ω: omitted by HTDLA.

chiefly Campanians—were caught and slain there. B.C. 340
The body of Decius could not be found that day, for night overtook the searchers; on the following day it was found, covered with missiles, in a great heap of enemies, and was given burial by his colleague in a manner befitting his death.

It seems proper to add here that the consul, dictator, or praetor who devotes the legions of the enemy need not devote himself, but may designate any citizen he likes from a regularly enlisted Roman legion; if the man who has been devoted dies, it is deemed that all is well; if he does not die, then an image of him is buried seven feet or more under ground and a sin-offering is slain; where the image has been buried, thither a Roman magistrate may not go up. But if he shall choose to devote himself, as Decius did, if he does not die, he cannot sacrifice either for himself or for the people without sin, whether with a victim or with any other offering he shall choose. He who devotes himself has the right to dedicate his arms to Vulcan, or to any other god he likes. The spear on which the consul has stood and prayed must not fall into the hands of an enemy; should this happen, expiation must be made to Mars with the sacrifice of a swine, a sheep, and an ox. XI. These particulars, even though the memory of every religious and secular usage has been wiped out by men's preference of the new and outlandish to the ancient and homebred, I have thought it not foreign to my purpose to repeat, and in the very words in which they were formulated and handed down.

I find in certain writers that it was not until the battle was over that the Samnites, who had been

u.c. 414

venisse subsidio, exspectato eventu pugnae, apud
3 quosdam auctores invenio. Latinis quoque ab Lavinio auxilium, dum deliberando terunt tempus,
4 victis demum ferri coeptum; et, cum iam portis prima signa et pars agminis esset egressa, nuntio allato de clade Latinorum cum conversis signis retro in urbem rediretur, praetorem eorum nomine Milionium dixisse ferunt pro paulula via magnam mercedem esse Romanis solvendam.

5 Qui Latinorum pugnae superfuerant multis itineribus dissipati cum se in unum conglobassent, Vescia urbs eis receptaculum fuit. Ibi in conciliis
6 Numisius imperator eorum adfirmabat[1] communem vere Martem belli utramque aciem pari caede prostravisse victoriaeque nomen tantum penes Romanos esse, ceteram pro victis fortunam et illos gerere;
7 funesta duo consulum praetoria, alterum parricidio filii, alterum consulis devoti caede; trucidatum exercitum omnem, caesos hastatos principesque, stragem et ante signa et post signa factam, triarios
8 postremo rem restituisse; Latinorum etsi pariter accisae copiae sint, tamen supplemento vel Latium
9 propius esse vel Volscos quam Romam; itaque, si videatur eis, se ex Latinis et ex Volscis populis iuventute propere excita, rediturum infesto exercitu Capuam esse Romanosque nihil tum minus quam

[1] adfirmabat Luterbacher: adfirmando Ω.

[1] Communis Mars belli, like c'est la guerre, was a phrase that was often on the lips of the unsuccessful, cf. v. xii. 1.

waiting for the outcome of the engagement, came B.C. 340 up to support the Romans. The Latins, too, were already defeated when the Lavinians, who were consuming time in deliberation, began to march to their assistance ; and receiving word of the disaster to the Latins just as their foremost ensigns and a portion of their column had passed out through the gates, they faced about and returned into the city, their praetor, Milionius, remarking, so it is said, that they would have to pay a large price to the Romans for that little march.

Such of the Latins as survived the battle, after being dispersed over many roads, were reunited, and took refuge in the town of Vescia. In the councils which they held there, Numisius, their commander-in-chief, asserted that the fortune of war had in truth been common,[1] overwhelming both armies with equal carnage. The Romans, he said, were victorious only in name, in all else they too were as though they had been defeated ; both consular headquarters were polluted, the one by the blood of a son, the other by the death of the devoted consul ; their whole army had been cut to pieces, their first and second lines had been massacred, and the slaughter had extended from the troops before the standards to those behind them ; finally the veterans had restored the day ; but though the Latin forces had been equally cut up, yet, for recruiting, either Latium or the Volscian country was nearer than Rome ; if therefore it seemed good to them, he would speedily summon the fighting men from the Latin and Volscian tribes, and would return with an embattled host to Capua, where the unexpectedness of his arrival would strike dismay into the Romans, proelium exspectantes necopinato adventu perculsurum. Fallacibus litteris circa Latium nomenque Volscum missis, quia qui non interfuerant pugnae ad credendum temere faciliores erant, tumultuarius undique exercitus raptim conscriptus convenit.

A.U.C. 414

11 Huic agmini Torquatus consul ad Trifanum—inter Sinuessam Minturnasque is locus est—occurrit. Priusquam castris locus caperetur, sarcinis utrimque in acervum coniectis pugnatum debellatumque est; 12 adeo enim accisae res sunt ut consuli victorem exercitum ad depopulandos agros eorum ducenti dederent se omnes Latini deditionemque eam Cam- 13 pani sequerentur. Latium Capuaque agro multati. Latinus ager Privernati addito agro et Falernus, qui populi Campani fuerat, usque ad Volturnum 14 flumen plebi Romanae dividitur. Bina in Latino iugera, ita ut dodrante[1] ex Privernati complerent, data, terna in Falerno quadrantibus etiam pro lon- 15 ginquitate adiectis. Extra poenam fuere Latinorum Laurentes Campanorumque equites, quia non desciverant. Cum Laurentibus renovari foedus iussum, renovaturque ex eo quotannis post diem decimum 16 Latinarum. Equitibus Campanis civitas Romana data,[2] monumentoque ut esset, aeneam tabulam in who just then were looking for anything rather than a battle. Misleading letters were sent out to all parts of Latium and the country of the Volsci, and since those who received them had not been present at the battle, gained ready credence; and an army of militia was levied in hot haste and brought together from every quarter. B.C. 340

[1] dodrante Linsmayer: dodrantem (drod- DLA^3) Ω: quadrantem D^4A.

[2] Romana data Drakenborch: rō data H: rodata TDLR: redata M: reddata A: reddita D^3A^2: data PFUOT^{2}.

[1] The iugerum contained 28,800 square feet; the English acre contains 43,500.

This force Torquatus the consul met near Trifanum, a place situated between Sinuessa and Minturnae. Both armies, without waiting to choose sites for their camps, piled their baggage and fell to fighting, and the war was ended then and there: for the enemy's strength was brought so low that, when the consul led his victorious army to pillage their fields, the Latins all surrendered, and the Campanians followed their example. Latium and Capua were deprived of territory. The Latin territory, with the addition of that belonging to Privernum, together with the Falernian—which had belonged to the Campanian people—as far as the river Volturnus, was parcelled out amongst the Roman plebs. The assignment was two iugera in Latium supplemented with three-fourths of a iugerum from the land of Privernum, or three iugera in the Falernian district,—a fourth of a iugerum being added to compensate for its remoteness.[1] The Laurentes and the Campanian knights were exempted from the punishment inflicted on the Latins, because they had not revolted; it was ordered that the treaty with the Laurentes should be renewed, and it has been renewed every year from that time, on the tenth day after the Latin Festival. The Campanian knights received Roman citizenship, and to commemorate the occasion a bronze tablet was fastened up in

A.U.C. 414 aede Castoris Romae fixerunt. Vectigal quoque eis Campanus populus iussus pendere in singulos quotannis—fuere autem mille et sexcenti—denarios A.U.C. 415 nummos quadringenos quinquagenos. XII. Ita bello gesto, praemiis poenaque pro cuiusque merito persolutis, T. Manlius Romam rediit. Cui venienti seniores tantum obviam exisse constat, iuventutem et tunc et omni vita deinde aversatam eum exsecratamque.

2 Antiates in agrum Ostiensem Ardeatem Solonium incursiones fecerunt. Manlius consul, quia ipse per valetudinem id bellum exsequi nequierat, dictatorem L. Papirium Crassum, qui tum forte erat praetor, dixit; ab eo magister equitum L. Papirius Cursor 3 dictus. Nihil memorabile adversus Antiates ab dictatore gestum est, cum aliquot menses stativa in agro Antiati habuisset.

4 Anno insigni victoria de tot ac tam potentibus populis, ad hoc consulum alterius nobili morte, alterius sicut truci ita claro ad memoriam imperio, successere consules Ti.[1] Aemilius Mamercinus Q.[2] 5 Publilius Philo, neque in similem materiam rerum, et ipsi aut suarum rerum aut partium in re publica magis quam patriae memores. Latinos ob iram agri amissi rebellantes in campis Fenectanis fuderunt 6 castrisque exuerunt. Ibi Publilio, cuius ductu

[1] Ti. ς Sigonius (Diod. XVI. xci. 1); titius (or ticius) Ω: t U. Cassiod. (C.I.L. i², p. 44, A.U.C. 423).
[2] Q. ς (Diod., l.c.) omitted by Ω.

[1] Castor and Pollux were protectors of the Roman knights and hence appropriately chosen as patrons of the friendly relations established with the aristocracy of Capua.

[2] The denarius was a silver coin weighing 70 grains Troy and reckoned as equivalent to 16 asses. But silver was not coined in Rome until 268 B.C.

the temple of Castor at Rome.[1] Moreover, the Campanian people were commanded to pay them each a yearly stipend—there were sixteen hundred of them—amounting to four hundred and fifty denarii.[2] XII. The war being thus dispatched, and rewards and penalities distributed in accordance with everyone's deserts, Titus Manlius returned to Rome; it is said that on his approach only the seniors went out to meet him, and that the young men, then and for all the remainder of his days, abhorred and execrated him. B.C. 340 B.C. 339

The Antiates committed depredations upon the lands of Ostia, Ardea, and Solonium. Manlius, the consul, having been unable himself to conduct this war because of ill-health, appointed as dictator Lucius Papirius Crassus, who at that time happened to be praetor, and he in turn named Lucius Papirius Cursor master of the horse. The dictator accomplished nothing noteworthy against the Antiates, though he lay some months encamped in their territory.

To a year that was famous for its victory over so many and so powerful nations, and also for the glorious death of one of the consuls and the other's severity of discipline, which though cruel was nevertheless renowned through the ages, succeeded the consulship of Tiberius Aemilius Mamercinus and Quintus Publilius Philo. These men had no such opportunities, and were, besides, more concerned for their own or their party's interests than for the country. The Latins took up arms again, being incensed at the confiscation of their land, and suffered a defeat and the loss of their camp, in the Fenectane Plains.[3] While Publilius, under whose command and [3] Named presumably from some unknown town in Latium.

A.U.C. 415

auspicioque res gestae erant, in deditionem accipiente Latinos populos, quorum ibi iuventus caesa 7 erat, Aemilius ad Pedum exercitus duxit. Pedanos tuebatur Tiburs Praenestinus Veliternusque populus;
8 venerant et ab Lanuvio Antioque auxilia. Ubi cum proeliis quidem superior Romanus esset, ad urbem ipsam Pedum castraque sociorum populorum, quae urbi adiuncta erant, integer labor restaret, bello
9 infecto repente omisso consul, quia collegae decretum triumphum audivit, ipse quoque triumphi ante
10 victoriam flagitator Romam rediit. Qua cupiditate offensis patribus negantibusque nisi Pedo capto aut dedito triumphum, hinc alienatus ab senatu Aemilius seditiosis tribunatibus similem deinde consulatum
11 gessit. Nam neque, quoad fuit consul, criminari apud populum patres destitit collega haudquaquam
12 adversante, quia et ipse de plebe erat—materiam autem praebebat criminibus ager in Latino Falernoque [1] maligne plebei divisus—et postquam senatus finire imperium consulibus cupiens dictatorem ad-
13 versus rebellantes Latinos dici iussit, Aemilius, cuius tum [2] fasces erant, collegam dictatorem dixit; ab eo
14 magister equitum Iunius Brutus dictus. Dictatura popularis et orationibus in patres criminosis fuit, et quod tres leges secundissimas plebei, adversas
15 nobilitati tulit: unam, ut plebiscita omnes Quirites

[1] Falernoque Tan. Faber: Falernoque agro Ω.
[2] cuius tum $A^2\Sigma$: tum cuius Ω: tunc cuius F: cuius Walters and Conway.

[1] In the city the consuls took turns in exercising supreme administrative authority, and the twelve lictors, with the rods ('fasces'), attended the consul who, for the time being, enjoyed this authority.

auspices the campaign had been conducted, was receiving the surrender of the Latin peoples whose soldiers had fallen there, Aemilius led his army against Pedum. The Pedani were supported by the people of Tibur, Praeneste, and Velitrae, and auxiliaries had also come from Lanuvium and Antium. Though the Romans proved superior in certain engagements, yet the town of Pedum and the camp of the allied nations, which adjoined it, still remained intact to be dealt with, when suddenly the consul, hearing that his colleague had been decreed a triumph, left the war unfinished and returned to Rome to demand a triumph for himself as well, without staying to obtain a victory. This self-seeking disgusted the Fathers, who denied him a triumph, unless he should capture Pedum or receive its surrender. Estranged from the senate by this rebuff, Aemilius thereafter administered his consulship in the spirit of a seditious tribune. For, all the time that he was consul, he ceased not to accuse the senators to the people, while his colleague, since he too was of the plebs, offered not the smallest opposition. The ground of his accusations was the niggardly apportionment of land to the plebeians in the Latin and Falernian districts. And when the senate, desiring to put an end to the authority of the consuls, ordered that a dictator should be appointed to oppose the rebellious Latins, Aemilius, who then had the rods,[1] named his colleague dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was designated master of the horse. Publilius was a popular dictator, both because of his denunciation of the senate and because he carried through three laws very advantageous to the plebs and prejudicial to the nobles: one, that the decisions of the plebs B.C. 339

A.U.C. 415

tenerent; alteram, ut legum, quae comitiis centuriatis ferrentur, ante initum suffragium patres
16 auctores fierent; tertiam, ut alter utique ex plebe —cum eo ventum sit ut utrumque plebeium fieri
17 liceret—censor crearetur. Plus eo anno domi acceptum cladis ab consulibus ac dictatore quam ex victoria eorum bellicisque rebus foris auctum imperium patres credebant.

A.U.C. 416

XIII. Anno insequenti, L. Furio Camillo C. Maenio consulibus, quo insignitius omissa res Aemilio, superioris anni consuli, exprobraretur, Pedum armis virisque et omni vi expugnandum ac delendum senatus fremit; coactique novi consules
2 omnibus eam rem praeverti proficiscuntur. Iam Latio [1] is status erat rerum ut neque bellum neque pacem pati possent. Ad bellum opes deerant; pacem
3 ob agri adempti dolorem aspernabantur. Mediis consiliis standum videbatur—ut oppidis se tenerent, ne lacessitus Romanus causam belli haberet—et si cuius oppidi obsidio nuntiata esset, undique ex
4 omnibus populis auxilium obsessis ferretur. Neque tamen nisi admodum a paucis populis Pedani adiuti sunt. Tiburtes Praenestinique, quorum ager pro-
5 pior erat, Pedum pervenere; Aricinos Lanuvinosque et Veliternos Antiatibus Volscis se coniungentes ad Asturae [2] flumen Maenius improviso adortus fudit.

[1] Latio Ω: in Latio Madvig (but cf. Walters and Conway ad loc.).

[2] Asturae Sabellicus (Plin. N.H. III. v. 9, § 57) ς: Saturae (or -e) Ω: saturem DLA.

---

[1] See chap. xi. § 13.

[2] A little river emptying into the Mediterranean south of Antium.

should be binding on all the Quirites; another, that B.C. 339
the Fathers should ratify the measures proposed at the centuriate comitia before they were voted on; and a third, that at least one censor should be chosen from the plebs—since they had gone so far as to make it lawful for both to be plebeians. The harm that was wrought at home in that year by the consuls and the dictator outweighed—in the belief of the patricians—the increase in empire that resulted from their victory and their management of the war.

XIII. In the following year, when Lucius Furius B.C. 338
Camillus and Gaius Maenius were consuls, the senators, in order to render more conspicuous the negligence of Aemilius in the year before, insisted angrily that men and arms and every kind of force must be employed to capture Pedum and destroy it; and the new consuls were forced to put aside all other matters and set out for that place. The Latins were now come to such a pass that they could endure neither war nor peace; for war they lacked the means, and they scorned peace, for they still smarted under the confiscation of their land.[1] It seemed necessary to adopt a compromise, and keep to their towns—lest they might provoke the Romans and afford them a pretext for hostilities—and if tidings were brought that any town was beleaguered, to send in help to the besieged from all the surrounding peoples. For all that, the cities that aided Pedum were very few. The Tiburtes and Praenestini, whose territories lay near by, reached Pedum; the Aricini, Lanuvini, and Veliterni, as they were effecting a juncture with the Antiate Volsci at the river Astura,[2] were suddenly attacked by Maenius and routed. Camillus dealt

U.C. 416

6 Camillus ad Pedum cum Tiburtibus, maxime valido exercitu, maiore mole quamquam aeque prospero
7 eventu pugnat. Tumultum maxime repentina inter proelium eruptio oppidanorum fecit; in quos parte exercitus conversa Camillus non compulit solum eos intra moenia, sed eodem etiam die, cum ipsos auxilia-
8 que eorum perculisset, oppidum scalis cepit. Placuit inde iam maiore conatu animoque ab unius expugnatione urbis ad perdomandum Latium victorem circumducere exercitum. Nec quievere antequam expugnando aut in deditionem accipiendo singulas
9 urbes Latium omne subegere. Praesidiis inde dispositis per recepta oppida Romam ad destinatum omnium consensu triumphum decessere. Additus triumpho honos, ut statuae equestres eis—rara illa aetate res—in foro ponerentur.

10 Priusquam comitiis in insequentem annum consules rogarent, Camillus de Latinis populis ad sena-
11 tum rettulit atque ita disseruit: "Patres conscripti, quod bello armisque in Latio agendum fuit, id iam deum benignitate ac virtute militum ad finem venit.
12 Caesi ad Pedum Asturamque sunt exercitus hostium; oppida Latina omnia et Antium ex Volscis aut vi capta aut recepta in deditionem praesidiis tenentur
13 vestris. Reliqua consultatio est, quoniam rebellando saepius nos sollicitant, quonam modo perpetua pace

---

[1] Livy means to include with them the Praenestini.

with the very powerful army of the Tiburtes[1] in the vincinity of Pedum: the struggle was harder, but the issue was equally successful. The greatest confusion was occasioned by a sudden sally of the townsfolk during the battle; but Camillus, sending a part of his army against them, not only drove them back into their city, but having discomfited both them and their allies, even took the place by escalade that very day. The consuls then resolved, with the added energy and courage that came with the capture of one city, to proceed with their victorious army to the thorough conquest of the Latins; nor did they rest until, by storming every city or receiving its surrender, they had brought all Latium under their dominion. Then, distributing garrisons amongst the recovered towns, they departed for Rome, to enjoy the triumph by general consent awarded them. In addition to the triumph, they were granted the honour—a rare one in those days—of equestrian statues put up in the Forum. B.C. 338

Before the consular elections for the following year were held, Camillus referred to the senate the disposition of the Latin peoples, and spoke as follows: "Conscript Fathers, what was needful to be done in Latium in the way of war and arms has now by Heaven's favour and the valour of our troops been brought to a conclusion. The armies of our enemies have been cut to pieces at Pedum and on the Astura: all the Latin towns, and Antium in the land of the Volsci, have either been carried by storm or have made submission, and are in the keeping of your garrisons. It remains to consider, since they so often occasion us anxiety by a renewal of hostilities, how we may hold them

a.u.c. 416

14 quietos obtineamus. Di immortales ita vos potentes huius consilii fecerunt ut, sit Latium deinde an non sit, in vestra manu posuerint; itaque pacem vobis, quod ad Latinos attinet, parare in perpetuum vel 15 saeviendo vel ignoscendo potestis. Voltis crudeliter consulere in deditos victosque? Licet delere omne Latium, vastas inde solitudines facere, unde sociali egregio exercitu per multa bella magnaque saepe usi 16 estis. Voltis exemplo maiorum augere rem Romanam victos in civitatem accipiendo? Materia crescendi per summam gloriam suppeditat. Certe id firmissimum longe imperium est quo oboedientes gaudent. 17 Sed maturato opus est quidquid statuere placet; tot populos inter spem metumque suspensos animi habetis; et vestram itaque de eis curam quam primum absolvi, et illorum animos, dum exspectatione stupent, seu poena seu beneficio praeoccupari 18 oportet. Nostrum fuit efficere ut omnium rerum vobis ad consulendum potestas esset; vestrum est decernere quod optimum vobis reique publicae sit."

XIV. Principes senatus relationem consulis de summa rerum laudare, sed, cum aliorum causa alia esset, ita expediri posse consilium dicere, si,[1] ut pro merito cuiusque statueretur, de singulis nominatim quietly to a lasting peace. The immortal gods have B.C. 338 given you such absolute control of the situation as to leave the decision in your hands whether Latium is henceforward to exist or not. You are therefore able to assure yourselves of a permanent peace, in so far as the Latins are concerned, by the exercise of either cruelty or forgiveness, at your discretion. Would you adopt stern measures against those who have surrendered or been vanquished? You may blot out all Latium, and make vast solitudes of those places where you have often raised a splendid army of allies and used it through many a momentous war. Would you follow the example of your fathers, and augment the Roman state by receiving your conquered enemies as citizens? You have at hand the means of waxing great and supremely glorious. That government is certainly by far the strongest to which its subjects yield obedience gladly. But whatever it pleases you to do, you must determine promptly; you are holding so many peoples in suspense betwixt hope and fear, that it behoves you both to resolve your own anxiety regarding them as soon as may be, and to be beforehand with them, whether in the way of punishment or kindness, while they are waiting in a dull amazement. Our task has been to give you the power to decide regarding everything; it is yours to determine what is best for yourselves and for the state."

[1] si placed here by Walters and Conway: in Ω it stands before de singulis, but is omitted by PFUT^{2} (or T^{3}).

XIV. The leading senators praised the motion of Camillus on the national policy, but said that, since the Latins were not all in like case, his advice could best be carried out if the consuls would introduce proposals concerning the several peoples by name,

A.U.C. 416

2 referrent populis. Relatum igitur de singulis decretumque. Lanuvinis civitas data sacraque sua reddita, cum eo ut aedes lucusque Sospitae Iunonis communis Lanuvinis municipibus cum populo
3 Romano esset. Aricini Nomentanique et Pedani eodem iure quo Lanuvini in civitatem accepti.
4 Tusculanis servata civitas quam habebant, crimenque rebellionis a publica fraude in paucos auctores ver-
5 sum. In Veliternos, veteres cives Romanos, quod totiens rebellassent, graviter saevitum: et muri deiecti et senatus inde abductus iussique trans Tiberim habitare, ut eius qui cis Tiberim deprehensus
6 esset usque ad mille pondo assium [1] clarigatio esset nec priusquam aere persoluto is qui cepisset extra
7 vincula captum haberet. In agrum senatorum coloni missi, quibus adscriptis speciem antiquae
8 frequentiae Velitrae receperunt. Et Antium nova colonia missa, cum eo ut Antiatibus permitteretur, si et ipsi adscribi coloni vellent; naves inde longae abactae interdictumque mari Antiati populo est et 9 civitas data. Tiburtes Praenestinique agro multati, neque ob recens tantum rebellionis commune cum aliis Latinis crimen, sed quod taedio imperii Romani cum Gallis, gente efferata, arma quondam con-

[1] pondo assium Lachmann (who wrote assum): pondo ς: passum Ω: passuum $UO\varsigma$: passus F^1(or F^3)HA^3: assium Madvig (with hesitation).

---

[1] Presumably cum suffragio—with full political rights.
[2] Where they would be interned amongst an alien population.

as each should seem to merit. They were therefore B.C. 338 taken up and disposed of separately. The Lanuvini were given citizenship,[1] and their worship was restored to them, with the stipulation that the temple and grove of Juno Sospita should be held in common by the burghers of Lanuvium and the Roman People. The Aricini, Nomentani, and Pedani were received into citizenship on the same terms as the Lanuvini. The Tusculans were allowed to retain the civic rights which they enjoyed, and the charge of renewing the war was laid to a few ringleaders, without endamaging the community. The Veliterni, Roman citizens of old, were severely punished, because they had so often revolted: not only were their walls thrown down, but their senate was carried off and commanded to dwell across the Tiber,[2] with this understanding: that if any should be caught on the hither side, his redemption should be set at a thousand pounds of bronze, and that he who had captured him might not release his prisoner from bondage until the fine was paid. Colonists were settled on the senators' lands, and on their enrolment Velitrae regained its former appearance of populousness. To Antium likewise a colony was dispatched, with an understanding that the Antiates might be permitted, if they liked, themselves to enroll as colonists; their war-ships were taken from them and their people were forbidden the sea; they were granted citizenship. The Tiburtes and Praenestini were deprived of territory, not only because of the fresh charge of rebellion brought against them in common with the other Latins, but because they had once, in disgust at the power of Rome, united in arms with the 10 sociassent. Ceteris Latinis populis conubia commerciaque et concilia inter se ademerunt. Campanis equitum honoris causa, quia cum Latinis rebellare noluissent, Fundanisque et Formianis, quod per fines eorum tuta pacataque semper fuisset via, civitas

A.U.C. 416
11 sine suffragio data. Cumanos Suessulanosque eiusdem iuris condicionisque cuius Capuam esse placuit.
12 Naves Antiatium partim in navalia Romae subductae, partim incensae, rostrisque earum suggestum in foro exstructum adornari placuit, Rostraque id templum appellatum.

A.U.C. 417
XV. C. Sulpicio Longo P. Aelio Paeto consulibus cum omnia non opes magis Romanae quam beneficiis parta gratia bona pace obtineret, inter Sidicinos
2 Auruncosque bellum ortum. Aurunci, T. Manlio consule in deditionem accepti, nihil deinde moverant; eo petendi auxilii ab Romanis causa iustior
3 fuit. Sed priusquam consules ab urbe—iusserat enim senatus defendi Auruncos—exercitum educe-
4 rent, fama adfertur Auruncos metu oppidum deseruisse profugosque cum coniugibus ac liberis Suessam communisse,[1] quae nunc Aurunca appellatur,[2] moenia antiqua eorum urbemque ab Sidicinis

[1] communisse Ω: commeasse U_{ζ}.
[2] appellatur ζ (Madvig): appellata Ω.

[1] The Tiburtes had fought on the Gallic side in 361 and 360 B.C. (VII. xi. 1), the Praenestini possibly in 358 (VII. xii. 8).

[2] The speaker's platform on the line between the Comitium and the Forum is referred to earlier (IV. xvii. 6), but possibly only the place is there meant. Certainly Livy seems to imply here that the platform was now erected for the first time.

[3] 340 B.C.

[4] Suessa Aurunca was so called in order to distinguish it from the Volscian town Suessa Pometia.

Gauls, a race of savages.[1] The rest of the Latin peoples were deprived of the rights of mutual trade and intermarriage and of holding common councils. The Campanians, out of compliment to their knights, because they had not consented to revolt along with the Latins, were granted citizenship without the suffrage; so too were the Fundani and Formiani, because they had always afforded a safe and peaceful passage through their territories. It was voted to give the people of Cumae and Suessula the same rights and the same terms as the Capuans. The ships of the Antiates were some of them laid up in the Roman dockyards, and some were burnt and a motion passed to employ their beaks for the adornment of a platform erected in the Forum. This place was dedicated with augural ceremonies and given the name of Rostra or The Beaks.[2] B.C. 338

XV. In the consulship of Gaius Sulpicius Longus and Publius Aelius Paetus the good-will which their generous conduct had procured for the Romans had been no less efficacious than their power in maintaining a general peace, when a war broke out between the Sidicini and the Aurunci. The Aurunci had surrendered in the consulship of Titus Manlius[3] and had given no trouble since that time, for which reason they had the better right to expect assistance from the Romans. But before the consuls marched from Rome—for the Senate had directed them to defend the Aurunci—tidings were brought that the Aurunci had abandoned their town, in their alarm, and had taken refuge, with their wives and children, in Suessa—now called Aurunca[4]—which they had fortified: and that their ancient walls and their city had been destroyed by the Sidicini. This news B.C. 337

A.U.C. 417

5 deletam. Ob ea infensus consulibus senatus, quorum cunctatione proditi socii essent, dictatorem dici iussit. Dictus C. Claudius Inregillensis magistrum
6 equitum C. Claudium Hortatorem dixit. Religio inde iniecta de dictatore, et cum augures vitio creatum videri dixissent, dictator magisterque equitum se magistratu abdicarunt.

7 Eo anno Minucia Vestalis suspecta primo propter mundiorem iusto cultum, insimulata deinde apud
8 pontifices ab indice servo, cum decreto eorum iussa esset sacris abstinere familiamque in potestate habere, facto iudicio viva sub terram ad portam Collinam dextra viam [1] stratam defossa Scelerato campo; credo ab incesto id ei loco nomen factum.

9 Eodem anno Q. Publilius [2] Philo praetor primum de plebe adversante Sulpicio consule, qui negabat rationem eius se habiturum, est factus, senatu, cum in summis imperiis id non obtinuisset, minus in praetura tendente.

A.U.C. 418-420

XVI. Insequens annus, L. Papirio Crasso K. Duillio consulibus, Ausonum magis novo quam
2 magno bello fuit insignis. Ea gens Cales urbem incolebat; Sidicinis finitimis arma coniunxerat, unoque proelio haud sane memorabili duorum populorum

[1] dextra viam Ω: dextra uiae M^4: dextra uia A^{ix} (over erasure): extra uiam L^1 (Madvig): iuxta viam Weissenborn.
[2] Publilius Glareanus (and Sigonius at chap. xii. § 5): publius Ω.

---

[1] Had she manumitted them it would have been illegal to examine them under torture.
[2] The consul did not act upon his threat, so Livy implies, upon finding the senators lukewarm in their support.

made the senate angry with the consuls, by whose tardiness the allies had been betrayed, and they ordered a dictator to be appointed. The nomination fell to Gaius Claudius Inregillensis, who named as his master of horse Gaius Claudius Hortator. A religious difficulty was then raised about the dictator, and on the augurs' reporting that there seemed to have been a flaw in his appointment, the dictator and his master of the horse resigned. B.C. 337

In that year the Vestal Minucia, suspected in the first instance because of her dress, which was more ornate than became her station, was subsequently accused before the pontiffs on the testimony of a slave, and having been by their decree commanded to keep aloof from the sacred rites and to retain her slaves in her own power,[1] was convicted and buried alive near the Colline Gate, to the right of the paved road in the Polluted Field—so called, I believe, on account of her unchastity.

In the same year Quintus Publilius Philo was made praetor,—the first to be chosen from the plebs. Sulpicius the Consul opposed his election and declared that he would receive no votes for him; but the senate, having failed in its opposition to plebeian candidates for the highest magistracies, was less obstinate in the matter of the praetorship.[2]

XVI. The following year, being the consulship of Lucius Papirius Crassus and Caeso Duillius, was remarkable for a war more novel than important, to wit with the Ausonians, who inhabited the city of Cales. They had joined forces with their neighbours, the Sidicini, and the army of the two peoples having suffered a defeat in one—by no means memorable— B.C. 336–334

A.U.C. 418-420

exercitus fusus propinquitate urbium et ad fugam
3 pronior et in fuga ipsa tutior fuit. Nec tamen omissa eius belli cura patribus, quia totiens iam Sidicini aut ipsi moverant bellum aut moventibus
4 auxilium tulerant aut causa armorum fuerant. Itaque omni ope adnisi sunt, ut maximum ea tempestate imperatorem M. Valerium Corvum[1] consulem
5 quartum facerent; collega additus Corvo M. Atilius Regulus; et ne forte casu erraretur, petitum ab consulibus ut extra sortem Corvi ea provincia esset.
6 Exercitu victore a superioribus consulibus accepto, ad Cales, unde bellum ortum erat, profectus, cum hostes ab superioris etiam certaminis memoria pavidos clamore atque impetu primo fudisset, moenia
7 ipsa oppugnare est adgressus. Et militum quidem is erat ardor ut iam inde cum scalis succedere ad
8 muros vellent evasurosque contenderent; Corvus, quia id arduum factu erat, labore militum potius quam periculo peragere inceptum voluit. Itaque aggerem et vineas egit turresque muro admovit, quarum usum forte oblata opportunitas praevertit.
9 Namque M. Fabius, captivus Romanus, cum per neglegentiam custodum festo die vinculis ruptis per murum inter opera Romanorum, religata ad pinnam 10 muri reste suspensus, manibus se demisisset, perpulit imperatorem ut vino epulisque sopitos hostes adgre-

[1] Corvum Ω: coruinum (and coruino in § 5, where, however, O has corino) UO.

battle, was by the nearness of their cities not only the more disposed to flight, but found in that same flight the readier safety. The senators, however, did not cease to be concerned over this war, so many times before had the Sidicini either drawn the sword themselves, or lent aid to those who were drawing it, or been the occasion of hostilities. They accordingly bent every effort to elect to his fourth consulship the greatest soldier of that age, Marcus Valerius Corvus. To be his colleague, they gave him Marcus Atilius Regulus; and lest there should by chance be some miscarriage, they requested of the consuls that Corvus be given the command, without the drawing of lots. Taking over the victorious army from the previous consuls, he marched on Cales, where the war had originated, and routing the enemy—who had as yet not even recovered from the panic of the earlier encounter—at the first cheer and onset, he attacked the town itself. The soldiers, for their part, were so eager that they wished to attempt the walls at once with scaling-ladders, and insisted that they could carry the place; but Corvus, since this would have been an arduous achievement, preferred to accomplish his purpose at the cost of labour rather than of danger to his men. He therefore constructed a terrace and brought up mantlets, and moved his towers close to the walls, but a fortunate circumstance made it unnecessary to employ them. For Marcus Fabius, a Roman prisoner, being neglected by his guards on a day of merry-making, broke his bonds, let himself down by the wall, hand over hand, into the Roman works, by a rope which he had made fast to a battlement, and induced the general to attack the enemy while they deretur; nec maiore certamine capti cum urbe Ausones sunt quam acie fusi erant. Praeda capta ingens est, praesidioque imposito Calibus reductae 11 Romam legiones. Consul ex senatus consulto triumphavit, et, ne Atilius expers gloriae esset, iussi ambo consules adversus Sidicinos ducere exer-

B.C. 336–334

A.U.C. 418-420

12 citum. Dictatorem ante ex senatus consulto comitiorum habendorum causa dixerunt L. Aemilium Mamercinum; is magistrum equitum Q. Publilium Philonem dixit. Dictatore comitia habente consules
13 creati sunt T. Veturius Sp. Postumius. Ei, etsi [1] belli pars cum Sidicinis restabat, tamen, ut beneficio praevenirent desiderium plebis, de colonia dedu-
14 cenda Cales rettulerunt; factoque senatus consulto ut duo milia quingenti homines eo scriberentur, tres viros coloniae deducendae agroque dividundo creaverunt K. Duillium T. Quinctium M. Fabium.

A.U.C. 421

XVII. Novi deinde consules a veteribus exercitu accepto ingressi hostium fines populando usque ad
2 moenia atque urbem pervenerunt. Ibi quia ingenti exercitu comparato Sidicini et ipsi pro extrema spe dimicaturi enixe videbantur et Samnium fama erat
3 conciri ad bellum, dictator ab consulibus ex auctoritate senatus dictus P. Cornelius Rufinus, magister

[1] Ei, etsi Madvig: etsi Ω.

[1] This was the third triumph of Corvus. See VII. xxvii. 8, and xxxviii. 3.

were overcome with feasting and drinking. The result was that the Ausonians and their city were captured with no greater effort than they had been defeated in the field. Huge spoils were taken, a garrison was established in the town, and the legions were led back to Rome. The consul triumphed,[1] in pursuance of a senatorial decree, and lest Atilius should go without his meed of glory, both consuls were directed to march against the Sidicini. But first—being so instructed by the senate—they named a dictator to preside at the elections, their choice falling on Lucius Aemilius Mamercinus, who selected Quintus Publilius Philo to be master of the horse. Under the presidency of the dictator, Titus Veturius and Spurius Postumius were chosen consuls. These men, although a half of the war—with the Sidicini—yet remained, nevertheless, in order to anticipate the desires of the plebs by doing them a service, brought in a proposal for sending out a colony to Cales. The senate resolved that twenty-five hundred men should be enrolled for it, and appointed Caeso Duillius, Titus Quinctius, and Marcus Fabius a commission of three to conduct the settlers to the land and apportion it amongst them. B.C. 336–334

XVII. The new consuls then took over the army from their predecessors, and entering the enemy's territory laid it waste as far as their city walls. At this juncture, since the Sidicini had themselves raised an enormous army and seemed likely to make a desperate struggle in behalf of their last hope, and since the rumour went that Samnium was arming, the senate authorized the consuls to nominate a dictator. They appointed Publius Cornelius Rufinus, and Marcus Antonius was made master of the horse. B.C. 332

a.u.c. 422

4 equitum M. Antonius. Religio deinde incessit vitio eos creatos, magistratuque se abdicaverunt; et quia pestilentia insecuta est, velut omnibus eo vitio contactis auspiciis, res ad interregnum rediit.

5 Ab interregno inito per quintum demum interregem, M. Valerium Corvum,[1] creati consules A.
6 Cornelius iterum et Cn. Domitius. Tranquillis rebus fama Gallici belli pro tumultu valuit ut dictatorem dici placeret. Dictus M. Papirius Crassus et magis-
7 ter equitum P. Valerius Publicola. A quibus cum dilectus intentius quam adversus finitima bella haberetur, exploratores missi attulerunt quieta
8 omnia apud Gallos esse. Samnium quoque iam alterum annum turbari novis consiliis suspectum erat; eo ex agro Sidicino exercitus Romanus non 9 deductus. Ceterum Samnites bellum Alexandri Epirensis in Lucanos traxit; qui duo populi adversus regem escensionem[2] a Paesto facientem signis con-
10 latis pugnaverunt. Eo certamine superior Alexander, incertum qua fide culturus, si perinde cetera processissent, pacem cum Romanis fecit.

11 Eodem anno census actus novique cives censi. Tribus propter eos additae Maecia et Scaptia; censores
12 addiderunt Q. Publilius Philo Sp. Postumius. Romani

[1] Corvum Ω: coruinum UO.

[2] escensionem$_{\gamma}$: escensione Ω: excensionem A_{γ}: excursionem $I^{B}A^{3}$: ascensionem U.

---

[1] The Maecian tribe was presumably named from Castrum Maecium (near Lanuvium) mentioned at VI. ii. 8, and the Scaptian from the town of Scaptia which lay between Tibur and Tusculum. The number of tribes was thus raised to twenty-nine.

A scruple was subsequently raised about the regularity of their appointment, and they resigned their office; and when a pestilence ensued, it was supposed that all the auspices were affected by that irregularity, and the state reverted to an interregnum. B.C. 332

Finally Marcus Valerius Corvus, the fifth interrex from the beginning of the interregnum, achieved the election to the consulship of Aulus Cornelius (for the second time) and Gnaeus Domitius. Coming, as it did, when all was tranquil, the rumour of a Gallic war worked like an actual rising, and caused the senate to have recourse to a dictator. Marcus Papirius Crassus was the man, and he named Publius Valerius Publicola master of the horse. While they were conducting their levy, more strenuously than they would have done for a war against a neighbouring state, scouts were sent out, and returned with the report that all was quiet amongst the Gauls. Samnium likewise had now for two years been suspected of hatching revolutionary schemes, for which reason the Roman army was not withdrawn from the Sidicine country. But an invasion by Alexander of Epirus drew the Samnites off into Lucania, and these two peoples engaged in a pitched battle with the King, as he was marching up from Paestum. The victory remained with Alexander, who then made a treaty of peace with the Romans; with what faith he intended to keep it, had the rest of his campaign been equally successful, is a question.

In this same year the census was taken and new citizens were assessed. On their account the Maecian and Scaptian tribes were added.[1] The censors who added them were Quintus Publilius Philo and U.C. 422 facti Acerrani lege ab L. Papirio praetore lata, qua civitas sine suffragio data. Haec eo anno domi militiaeque gesta.

U.C. 423 XVIII. Foedus insequens annus seu intemperie caeli seu humana fraude fuit, M. Claudio Marcello
2 C.[1] Valerio consulibus. Flaccum Potitumque varie in annalibus cognomen consulis invenio; ceterum in eo parvi refert quid veri sit; illud pervelim—nec omnes auctores sunt—proditum falso esse, venenis absumptos quorum mors infamem annum pestilentia
3 fecerit; sicut proditur tamen res, ne cui auctorum
4 fidem abrogaverim, exponenda est. Cum primores civitatis similibus morbis eodemque ferme omnes eventu morerentur, ancilla quaedam ad Q. Fabium Maximum aedilem curulem indicaturam se causam publicae pestis professa est, si ab eo fides sibi data
5 esset haud futurum noxae indicium. Fabius confestim rem ad consules, consules ad senatum referunt,
6 consensuque ordinis fides indici data. Tum patefactum muliebri fraude civitatem premi matronasque ea venena coquere, et si sequi extemplo velint,
7 manifesto deprehendi posse. Secuti indicem et coquentes quasdam medicamenta et recondita alia

[1] C. Sigonius (Diod. XVII. lxxiv. 1): t Ω.

Spurius Postumius. The people of Acerra became Romans under a statute, proposed by the praetor Lucius Papirius, which granted them citizenship without the suffrage. Such were the events of this year at home and in the field. B.C. 332

XVIII. A terrible year succeeded, whether owing to the unseasonable weather or to man's depravity. The consuls were Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Gaius Valerius. I find Flaccus and Potitus severally given in the annals, as the surname of Valerius; but it does not greatly signify where the truth lies in regard to this. One thing, however, I should be glad to believe had been falsely handed down—and indeed not all the authorities avouch it—namely, that those whose deaths made the year notorious for pestilence were in reality destroyed by poison: still, I must set forth the story as it comes to us, that I may not deprive any writer of his credit. When the leading citizens were falling ill with the same kind of malady, which had, in almost every case the same fatal termination, a certain serving-woman came to Quintus Fabius Maximus, the curule aedile, and declared that she would reveal the cause of the general calamity, if he would give her a pledge that she should not suffer for her testimony. Fabius at once referred the matter to the consuls, and the consuls to the senate, and a pledge was given to the witness with the unanimous approval of that body. She then disclosed the fact that the City was afflicted by the criminal practices of the women; that they who prepared these poisons were matrons, whom, if they would instantly attend her, they might take in the very act. They followed the informer and found certain women brewing poisons, B.C. 331

U.C. 423

8 invenerunt. Quibus in forum delatis et ad viginti matronis, apud quas deprehensa erant, per viatorem accitis, duae ex eis, Cornelia ac Sergia, patriciae utraque gentis, cum ea medicamenta salubria esse contenderent, ab confutante indice bibere iussae, ut se falsum commentam in conspectu omnium [1] argue-
9 rent, spatio ad conloquendum sumpto, cum submoto populo rem ad ceteras rettulissent, haud abnuentibus et illis bibere, epoto medicamento suamet ipsae
10 fraude omnes interierunt. Comprehensae extemplo earum comites magnum numerum matronarum indicaverunt; ex quibus ad centum septuaginta
11 damnatae. Neque de veneficiis ante eam diem Romae quaesitum est. Prodigii ea res loco habita captisque magis mentibus quam conscleratis similis
12 visa; itaque memoria ex annalibus repetita in secessionibus quondam plebis clavum ab dictatore fixum alienatasque discordia mentes hominum eo piaculo compotes sui fuisse,[2] dictatorem clavi figendi causa
13 creari placuit. Creatus Cn. Quinctilius magistrum equitum L. Valerium dixit, qui fixo clavo magistratu se abdicaverunt.

U.C. 424

XIX. Creati consules L. Papirius Crassus iterum L. Plautius Venox; cuius principio anni legati ex Volscis Fabraterni et Lucani Romam venerunt, orantes ut in

[1] The words in conspectu omnium are found in the MSS. after populo. Walters and Conway suggest placing them here, or preferably, after epoto; but in the latter position they would be inconsistent with submoto populo, for the women would not recall the crowd to witness their own discomfiture.

[2] fuisse Crévier: factas esse Alschefski: fecisse Ω.

[1] Livy says nothing of the nail in his accounts of the several secessions at II. xxxii, III. l, and VII. xlii, but in VII. iii describes the practice as having originated in an attempt to relieve a pestilence.

and other poisons stored away. These concoctions were brought into the Forum, and some twenty matrons, in whose houses they had been discovered, were summoned thither by an apparitor. Two of their number, Cornelia and Sergia, of patrician houses both, asserted that these drugs were salutary. On the informer giving them the lie, and bidding them drink and prove her charges false in the sight of all, they took time to confer, and after the crowd had been dismissed they referred the question to the rest, and finding that they, like themselves, would not refuse the draught, they all drank off the poison and perished by their own wicked practices. Their attendants being instantly arrested informed against a large number of matrons, of whom one hundred and seventy were found guilty; yet until that day there had never been a trial for poisoning in Rome. Their act was regarded as a prodigy, and suggested madness rather than felonious intent. Accordingly when a tradition was revived from the annals how formerly in secessions of the plebs[1] a nail had been driven by the dictator, and how men's minds, which had been distracted by dissension, had by virtue of that expiation regained their self-control, they resolved on the appointment of a dictator to drive the nail. The appointment went to Gnaeus Quinctilius, who named Lucius Valerius master of the horse. The nail was driven and they resigned their posts. B.C. 331

XIX. The consular election resulted in the choice of Lucius Papirius Crassus (for the second time) and Lucius Plautius Venox. At the outset of this year Volscian ambassadors from Fabrateria and Luca came to Rome asking protection, and promising that, if B.C. 330

A.U.C. 424

2 fidem reciperentur: si a Samnitium armis defensi essent, se sub imperio populi Romani fideliter atque
3 oboedienter futuros. Missi tum ab senatu legati denuntiatumque Samnitibus ut eorum populorum finibus vim abstinerent; valuitque ea legatio, non tam quia pacem volebant Samnites quam quia nondum parati erant ad bellum.

4 Eodem anno Privernas bellum initum, cuius socii Fundani, dux etiam fuit Fundanus, Vitruvius[1] Vaccus,[2] vir non domi solum sed etiam Romae clarus; aedes fuere in Palatio eius, quae Vacci prata diruto
5 aedificio publicatoque solo appellata. Adversus hunc vastantem effuse Setinum Norbanumque et Coranum agrum L. Papirius profectus haud procul castris eius
6 consedit. Vitruvio nec ut vallo se teneret adversus validiorem hostem sana constare mens, nec ut longius
7 a castris dimicaret animus suppetere; vix tota extra portam castrorum explicata acie, fugam magis retro quam proelium aut hostem spectante milite, sine
8 consilio, sine audacia depugnat. Ut et levi momento nec ambigue est victus, ita brevitate ipsa loci facilique receptu in tam propinqua castra haud aegre
9 militem a multa caede est tutatus; nec fere quisquam in ipso certamine, pauci in turba fugae extremae, cum in castra ruerent, caesi; primisque tenebris Priver-

[1] Vitruvius F^2 (or F^3) Sigonius: uitrubius Ω: uitrubrius LA (in §§ 6 and 10 the MSS. give uitrub-).
[2] Vaccus ζ: baccus Ω (but uacci below).

defended from Samnite aggressions, they would be loyal and obedient subjects of the Roman People. The senate thereupon sent envoys to the Samnites and warned them to do no violence to the territories of those cities. The embassy was effective, not so much because the Samnites desired peace, as because they were unprepared, as yet, for war. B.C. 330

The same year saw the beginning of the war with Privernum. The enemy had the Fundanians for allies, and even a Fundanian general, by the name of Vitruvius Vaccus. He was a man of distinction, not only in his own city, but in Rome as well, where he had a house on the Palatine, at the place which, after the building had been demolished and the area confiscated, was known as the Meadows of Vaccus. He was spoiling, far and wide, the territories of Setia, Norba, and Cora, when Lucius Papirius marched out to confront him, and took up a position not far from the other's camp. Vitruvius had neither the strength of mind to remain behind his rampart in the face of a more powerful opponent, nor the courage to fight at a distance from his works. The last of his troops were scarcely clear of the camp gates and his line deployed, and the soldiers were thinking more of flight than of battle or the enemy, when he began, without showing either prudence or audacity, a critical engagement. He was easily and decisively defeated; yet, because his camp was so near and so readily accessible, he was able without great difficulty to save his men from heavy losses; indeed, there were hardly any slain in the battle itself, and in the flight only a few amongst the stragglers, as they rushed into the camp. Under cover of the earliest dusk they sought Privernum in a panic-stricken a.u.c. 424 num inde petitum agmine trepido, ut muris potius quam vallo sese tutarentur.

A Priverno Plautius alter consul pervastatis passim agris praedaque abacta in agrum Fundanum exercitum inducit. Ingredienti fines senatus Fundanorum occurrit; negant se pro Vitruvio sectamque eius secutis precatum venisse, sed pro Fundano populo, quem extra culpam belli esse ipsum Vitruvium iudicasse, cum receptaculum fugae Privernum habuerit, non patriam.[1] Priverni igitur hostes populi Romani quaerendos persequendosque esse, qui simul a Fundanis ac Romanis utriusque patriae immemores defecerint: Fundanis pacem esse et animos Romanos et gratam memoriam acceptae civitatis. Orare se consulem ut bellum ab innoxio populo abstineat; agros urbem corpora ipsorum coniugumque ac liberorum suorum in potestate populi Romani esse futuraque. Conlaudatis Fundanis consul litterisque Romam missis in officio Fundanos esse ad Privernum flexit iter. Prius animadversum in eos qui capita coniurationis fuerant a consule scribit Claudius; ad trecentos quinquaginta ex coniuratis vinctos Romam missos, eamque deditionem ab senatu non acceptam, quod egentium atque humilium poena defungi velle a.u.c. 425 Fundanum populum censuerint. XX. Privernum duobus consularibus exercitibus cum obsideretur, throng, to obtain for themselves the protection of walls in place of a rampart. B.C. 330

[1] patriam A^1 (or A^2) ζ: patriam fundanos Ω: patriam fundos ζ.

From Privernum the other consul Plautius, after everywhere pillaging the fields and driving off the cattle, led his army into the domain of Fundi. As he crossed the border he was met by the Fundanian senate, who said that they had come to plead, not for Vitruvius and his followers, but for the people of Fundi, whom even Vitruvius himself had cleared of responsibility for the war, when he sought refuge in Privernum and not in his native city. It was therefore in Privernum that the Roman People should seek out and punish its enemies, who had fallen away at the same time from Fundi and from Rome, unmindful of either allegiance: the Fundani were peaceful, their sympathies were Roman, and they held in grateful recollection the gift of citizenship. They begged the consul to make no war upon an innocent people, and declared that their lands, their city, their persons, and those of their wives and children were subject to the dominion of the Roman People and would so remain. The consul heartily commended them, and announcing in a dispatch to Rome that the Fundanians were loyal, turned aside and marched against Privernum. Claudius[1] writes that before he set out, the consul executed the leaders of the plot, and sent some three hundred and fifty of the conspirators in chains to Rome; but that the senate would not accept of their surrender, being persuaded that the people of Fundi sought to escape with the punishment of their poor and lowly.

XX. While the two consular armies were laying siege to Privernum, the other consul was recalled to B.C. 329 alter consul comitiorum causa Romam revocatus.

[1] Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, the annalist. See Introd. p. xxx.

A.U.C. 425

2 Carceres eo anno in circo primum statuti.

Nondum perfunctos cura Privernatis belli tumultus Gallici fama atrox invasit, haud ferme unquam
3 neglecta patribus. Extemplo igitur consules novi L. Aemilius Mamercinus et C. Plautius,[1] eo ipso die, Kalendis Quinctilibus, quo magistratum inierunt, comparare inter se provincias iussi, et Mamercinus, cui Gallicum bellum evenerat, scribere exercitum
4 sine ulla vacationis venia; quin opificum quoque volgus et sellularii, minime militiae idoneum genus, exciti dicuntur; Veiosque ingens exercitus contrac-
5 tus, ut inde obviam Gallis iretur; longius discedi, ne alio itinere hostis falleret ad urbem incedens, non placuit. Paucos deinde post dies satis explorata temporis eius quiete a Gallis Privernum omnis conversa vis.

6 Duplex inde fama est: alii vi captam urbem Vitruviumque vivum in potestatem venisse, alii priusquam ultima adhiberetur vis, ipsos[2] se in deditionem consuli[3] caduceum praeferentes[4] permisisse
7 auctores sunt Vitruviumque ab suis traditum. Senatus de Vitruvio Privernatibusque consultus consulem

[1] C. Plautius T[2] Sigon. (C.I.L. i.[2] p. 45): G. Plautius (or -ci-) PFUO: plautius MDLA: placius H: plutius T.

[2] ipsos $\bar{\varsigma}$: ipsum Ω.

[3] consuli Doujat (Walters): cōs (or cos or coīs or coss) Ω: consulis $\bar{\varsigma}$.

[4] praeferentes $\bar{\varsigma}$: praeferentis Ω.

[1] The cells were stalls, having a bar across the front which was thrown down to release the chariots at the start of the race.

[2] July 1st was the normal day for beginning the official year from 391 B.C. to 153 B.C., when it was changed to January 1st.

Rome to hold the elections. Chariot cells were built this year for the first time in the Circus.[1] B.C. 329

The war with Privernum was not yet out of the way, when there came an alarming report of a Gallic rising, a warning which the senate almost never disregarded. Accordingly, without a moment's hesitation, the new consuls, Lucius Aemilius Mamercinus and Gaius Plautius, were directed, on the very day on which they entered office—the Kalends of July[2]—to divide the commands between them, and Mamercinus, to whom the Gallic war had fallen, was bidden to enlist an army without granting a single exemption; indeed it is said that a rabble of craftsmen even, and sedentary mechanics, was called out—a type the least qualified of all for military service. An enormous army was brought together at Veii, which was to be the base for the campaign against the Gauls; further afield they would not go, lest the enemy, advancing upon the City, might slip by them on another road. After a few days it became quite evident that no disturbance on the part of the Gauls was to be apprehended at that time, whereupon the whole array was directed against Privernum.

From this point there is a twofold tradition: some say that the city was carried by storm, and that Vitruvius was taken alive; others, that before the final assault was made, the people came out with a flag of truce[3] to the consul and surrendered, and that Vitruvius was betrayed by his own followers. The senate, being consulted regarding Vitruvius and the Privernates, commanded the [3] The caduceus (κηρύκειον) was actually a herald's staff.

A.U.C. 425

Plautium dirutis Priverni muris praesidioque valido imposito ad triumphum accersit: Vitruvium in carcere[1] adservari iussit, quoad consul redisset, tum 8 verberatum necari. Aedes eius, quae essent in Palatio, diruendas, bona Semoni Sango censuerunt consecranda; quodque aeris ex eis redactum est, ex eo aenei orbes facti positi in sacello Sangus adversus 9 aedem Quirini. De senatu Privernate ita decretum, ut qui senator Priverni post defectionem ab Romanis mansisset trans Tiberim lege eadem qua Veliterni 10 habitaret. His ita decretis usque ad triumphum Plauti silentium de Privernatibus fuit; post triumphum consul necato Vitruvio sociisque eius noxae apud satiatos iam suppliciis nocentium tutam 11 mentionem de Privernatibus ratus, "Quoniam auctores defectionis" inquit, "meritas poenas et ab dis immortalibus et a vobis habent, patres conscripti, 12 quid placet de innoxia multitudine fieri?" Equidem, etsi meae partes exquirendae magis sententiae quam dandae sunt, tamen, cum videam Privernates vicinos Samnitibus esse, unde nunc nobis incertissima pax est, quam minimum irarum inter nos illosque relinqui velim."

XXI. Cum ipsa per se res anceps esset, prout cuiusque ingenium erat atrocius mitiusve suadentibus,

[1] in carcere F^x over erasure) Madvig: in carcerem Ω.

[1] Semo Sangus—or Sancus—was another name for Dius Fidius, the god of oaths, and was identified with Hercules, who was himself closely associated with Jupiter. See Warde Fowler, Roman Festivals of the Republic, pp. 135–145.

[2] See chap. xiv. § 6.

consul Plautius to raze the walls of Privernum, and placing a strong garrison in the town, to come to Rome and triumph. Vitruvius was to be held a prisoner till the consul should return, and then scourged and put to death; his house on the Palatine was to be pulled down, and his goods dedicated to Semo Sangus.[1] Out of the bronze which his chattels realized were fashioned bronze disks, which were placed in the shrine of Sangus, over against the temple of Quirinus. Concerning the senate of Privernum, it was decreed that any senator who had remained in Privernum after its defection from the Romans should dwell across the Tiber on the same terms as the Veliterni.[2] These decrees having been promulgated, no more was said about the Privernates, until Plautius had triumphed. After his triumph the consul caused Vitruvius and his associates in wrongdoing to be executed, and deeming it now safe to take up the question of the Privernates with men who were already sated with the punishment of the guilty, spoke as follows: "Since the authors of rebellion have now received the reward they merited, at the hands of the immortal gods, and at your own hands, Conscript Fathers, what is your pleasure regarding the innocent multitude? For my own part, though it becomes me rather to ask opinions than to offer one, yet when I see that the Privernates are neighbours to the Samnites, whose peaceful relations with ourselves are at this time most precarious, I could wish that as little bad feeling as possible might be left between them and us." B.C. 329

XXI. The question was of itself a hard one to decide, and every senator argued, as his own nature

A.U.C. 425

tum incertiora omnia unus ex Privernatibus legatis fecit, magis condicionis in qua natus esset quam
2 praesentis necessitatis memor; qui interrogatus a quodam tristioris sententiae auctore quam poenam meritos Privernates censeret, "Eam" inquit "quam
3 merentur qui se libertate dignos censent." Cuius cum feroci responso infestiores factos videret consul eos qui ante Privernatium causam impugnabant, ut ipse benigna interrogatione mitius responsum eliceret, 4 "Quid si poenam" inquit "remittimus vobis? Qualem nos pacem vobiscum habituros speremus?" "Si bonam dederitis" inquit, "et fidam et per-
5 petuam; si malam, haud diuturnam." Tum vero minari, nec id ambigue, Privernatem quidam, et illis vocibus ad rebellandum incitari pacatos populos;
6 pars mitior [1] senatus ad meliora [2] responsum trahere et dicere viri et liberi vocem auditam: an credi posse ullum populum aut hominem denique in ea condicione cuius eum paeniteat diutius quam
7 necesse sit mansurum? Ibi pacem esse fidam ubi voluntarii pacati sint, neque eo loco ubi servitutem esse velint, fidem sperandam esse.

[1] mitior Duker: melior Ω.
[2] meliora Ω: molliora (with melior instead of mitior) Gronovius, Walters and Conway.

prompted him, for severity or mercy; but the whole situation was rendered even more uncertain by one of the deputation from Privernum, who possessed a livelier sense of the condition in which he had been born than of the exigencies of the actual crisis. This man, on being asked by a certain advocate of harsher measures what punishment he thought the Privernates merited, replied, "That punishment which is merited by those who deem themselves worthy to be free." The consul perceived that this proud answer had increased the hostility of those who were before assailing the cause of the Privernates. In the hope that he might himself, by putting a more kindly question, elicit a friendlier response, "What," said he, "if we remit your punishment? What sort of peace may we hope to have with you?" "If you grant us a good one," was the answer, "you may look to find it faithfully and permanently kept; if a bad one, you must not expect that it will long endure." Whereat some cried out that the Privernate was threatening them, and in no ambiguous terms, and asserted that by such words as those pacified peoples were roused up to rebellion. But the more merciful party in the senate put a better construction on his answer, and pronounced it the utterance of a man, and a man free-born. Was it credible, they asked, that any nation, or for that matter any man, should abide longer than he must in a condition that was painful? That peace, they asserted, was faithfully observed where the terms were willingly accepted; they must not hope for loyalty in a quarter where they sought to impose servitude. B.C. 329

A.U.C. 425

8 In hanc sententiam maxime consul ipse inclinavit animos, identidem ad principes sententiarum consulares, uti exaudiri posset a pluribus, dicendo eos
9 demum qui nihil praeterquam de libertate cogitent
10 dignos esse qui Romani fiant. Itaque et in senatu causam obtinuere, et ex auctoritate patrum latum ad populum est ut Privernatibus civitas daretur.
11 Eodem anno Anxur trecenti in coloniam missi sunt ; bina iugera agri acceperunt.

A.U.C. 426–427

XXII. Secutus est annus nulla re belli domive insignis, P. Plautio Proculo P. Cornelio Scapula consuli-
2 bus, praeterquam quod Fregellas—Signinorum is ager, deinde Volscorum fuerat—colonia deducta et populo visceratio data a M. Flavio in funere matris.
3 Erant qui per speciem honorandae parentis meritam mercedem populo solutam interpretarentur, quod eum die dicta ab aedilibus crimine stupratae matris
4 familiae absolvisset. Data visceratio in praeteritam iudicii gratiam honoris etiam ei causa fuit. Tribunusque[1] plebei proximis comitiis absens petentibus praefertur.
5 Palaepolis fuit haud procul inde ubi nunc Neapolis sita est ; duabus urbibus populus idem habitabat.[2]
6 Cumis erant oriundi ; Cumani Chalcide Euboica

[1] tribunusque Zingerle : tribunatuque (wanting in O) Ω : tribunatumque ς Gronovius.

[2] habitabat F^3 ς : habita at MPF? : habitat OHTDLA : habitat ut UT^2.

The consul himself did the most to bring about the adoption of these views, by remarking repeatedly to the consulars, who led in the expression of opinion, in a voice loud enough for many to overhear, that only those who took no thought for anything save liberty were worthy of becoming Romans. Accordingly they gained their cause in the senate, and on the authorization of the Fathers a measure was brought before the people conferring citizenship on the Privernates. B.C. 329

In that same year three hundred colonists were sent to Anxur, where they received each two iugera of land.

XXII. The following year, when Publius Plautius Proculus and Publius Cornelius Scapula were consuls, was not signalised by any military or domestic event, except that a colony was sent out to Fregellae—the territory had belonged to the people of Signia, and afterwards to the Volsci—and a dole of meat was given to the people by Marcus Flavius, at the funeral of his mother. Some thought that under colour of honouring his mother he had paid a price that he owed the people, because they had acquitted him, when brought to trial by the aediles, of the charge of corrupting a married woman. Though the dole was made for the past favour shown him in the trial, it was also the cause of his receiving an office; and at the next election he was chosen tribune of the plebs in his absence, in preference to some who canvassed. B.C. 328–327

There was a city called Palaepolis, not far from the spot where Neapolis is now, and the two cities were inhabited by one people. Cumae was their mother city, and the Cumani derive their origin originem trahunt. Classe, qua advecti ab domo fuerant, multum in ora maris eius quod accolunt potuere, primo in insulas[1] Aenariam et Pithecusas[2] egressi, deinde in continentem ausi sedes transferre. 7 Haec civitas cum suis viribus tum Samnitium infidae adversus Romanos societati freta, sive pestilentiae quae Romanam urbem adorta nuntiabatur fidens, multa hostilia adversus Romanos agrum Campanum 8 Falernumque incolentes fecit. Igitur L. Cornelio Lentulo Q. Publilio Philone iterum consulibus, fetialibus Palaepolim ad res repetendas missis, cum relatum esset a Graecis, gente lingua magis strenua quam factis, ferox responsum, ex auctoritate patrum 9 populus Palaepolitanis bellum fieri iussit. Inter consules provinciis comparatis bello Graeci persequendi Publilio evenerunt; Cornelius altero exercitu Sam- 10 nitibus, si qua se moverent, oppositus—fama autem erat defectioni Campanorum imminentes admoturos castra—ibi optimum visum Cornelio stativa habere.

U.C. 426-427

U.C. 427-428

XXIII. Ab utroque consule exiguam spem pacis cum Samnitibus esse certior fit senatus: Publilius[3] duo milia Nolanorum militum et quattuor Samnitium magis Nolanis cogentibus quam voluntate Graecorum 2 recepta Palaepoli;[4] Cornelius dilectum indictum a [1] in insulas γ: insulas Ω: insulam A.

[2] Pithecusas γ: phitecusas MPFO: fitecusas U: pitecusas HTDLA.

[3] Publilius edd.: publius Ω (omitted by U).

[4] Palaepoli Walters and Conway: Palaepoli miserat Sigonius: palaepoli romam miserat (or -nt) Ω.

[1] Islands in the northern part of the Bay of Naples. By Pithecusae Livy seems to mean the islands of this group other than Aenaria, i.e. Pithecusa itself, Leucothea, and Sidonia; or perhaps he calls the whole group Pithecusae and means "Aenaria and the rest of the Pithecusae."

from Chalcis in Euboea. Thanks to the fleet in which they had sailed from their home, they enjoyed much power on the coast of that sea by which they dwell; having landed first on the island of Aenaria and the Pithecusae,[1] they afterwards ventured to transfer their seat to the mainland. This nation, relying in part on its own strength, in part on the faithlessness shown by the Samnites in their alliance with the Romans, or perhaps on the plague which was reported as having assailed the City of Rome, committed many hostile acts against the Romans dwelling in the districts of Campania and Falerii. When therefore Lucius Cornelius Lentulus and Quintus Publilius Philo (for the second time) were consuls, fetials were dispatched to Palaepolis to demand redress; and on their bringing back a spirited answer from the Greeks—a race more valiant in words than in deeds—the people acted upon a resolution of the senate and commanded that war be made upon Palaepolis. By the division of the commands between the consuls, the war with the Greeks fell to Publilius; Cornelius, with another army, was ordered to be ready for the Samnites, in case they should take the field; and since it was rumoured that they were only waiting to bring up their army the moment the Campanians began a revolt, that seemed to be the best place for the permanent encampment of Cornelius. B.C. 328–327

XXIII. Both consuls informed the senate that there was very little hope of peace with the Samnites: Publilius reported that two thousand soldiers from Nola and four thousand Samnites had been received into Palaepolis,—rather under compulsion from the Nolani than by the good-will of B.C. 327–326

c. 428

magistratibus universumque Samnium erectum ac vicinos populos, Privernatem Fundanumque et For-3 mianum, haud ambigue sollicitari. Ob haec cum legatos mitti placuisset prius ad Samnites quam bellum fieret, responsum redditur ab Samnitibus
4 ferox. Ultro incusabant iniurias Romanorum, neque eo neglegentius ea quae ipsis obicerentur purgabant:
5 haud ullo publico consilio auxiliove iuvari Graecos nec Fundanum Formianumve a se sollicitatos; quippe minime paenitere se virium suarum, si bellum placeat.
6 Ceterum non posse dissimulare aegre pati civitatem Samnitium quod Fregellas ex Volscis captas dirutasque ab se restituerit Romanus populus, coloniamque in Samnitium agro imposuerint, quam coloni eorum
7 Fregellas appellent; eam se contumeliam iniuriamque, ni sibi ab iis qui fecerint dematur, ipsos
8 omni vi depulsuros esse. Cum Romanus legatus ad disceptandum eos ad communes socios atque amicos vocaret, "Quid perplexe agimus?" inquit; "Nostra certamina, Romani, non verba legatorum nec hominum quisquam disceptator, sed campus Campanus, in quo concurrendum est, et arma et 9 communis Mars belli decernet. Proinde inter Capuam Suessulamque castra castris conferamus, et Samnis Romanusne imperio Italiam regat decer-the Greeks; Cornelius, that the Samnite magistrates had proclaimed a levy, and that all Samnium was up, while the neighbouring cities of Privernum, Fundi, and Formiae were being openly solicited to join. The senate having, in view of these facts, voted to send ambassadors to the Samnites before declaring war, received a defiant answer from them. Indeed they actually accused the Romans of improper conduct, yet without neglecting to clear their own skirts—if they could—of the charges brought against them: the Greeks, they said, were receiving no public counsel or support from them, nor had they asked the Fundani or Formiani to revolt; indeed they were quite strong enough to look out for themselves, if they chose to fight; on the other hand, they could not dissemble the chagrin of the Samnite nation that Fregellae, which they had captured from the Volsci and destroyed, should have been restored by the Roman People, and a colony planted in the territory of the Samnites which the Roman settlers called by that name; this was an insult and an injury, which, if its authors did not themselves recall it, they proposed to resist with might and main. When the Roman legate invited them to discuss the question with the common allies and friends of both, the Samnite spokesman said, "Why do we beat about the bush? Our differences, Romans, will be decided, not by the words of envoys nor by any man's arbitration, but by the Campanian plain—where we must meet in battle,—by the sword, and by the common chance of war. Let us encamp then face to face betwixt Suessula and Capua, and settle the question whether Samnite or Roman is to govern Italy." The Roman namus." Legati Romanorum cum se non quo hostis vocasset[1] sed quo imperatores sui duxissent ituros esse respondissent . . .[2]

B.C. 327–326

A.U.C. 427–428

Iam Publilius inter Palaepolim Neapolimque loco opportune capto diremerat hostibus societatem auxilii mutui qua, ut quisque locus premeretur, inter se usi fuerant. Itaque cum et comitiorum dies instaret et Publilium imminentem hostium muris avocari ab spe capiendae in dies urbis haud e re publica esset, actum cum tribunis est, ad populum ferrent ut, cum Q. Publilius Philo consulatu abisset, pro consule rem gereret quoad debellatum cum Graecis esset.

L. Cornelio, quia ne eum quidem in Samnium iam ingressum revocari ab impetu belli placebat, litterae missae ut dictatorem comitiorum causa diceret. Dixit M. Claudium Marcellum; ab eo magister equitum dictus Sp. Postumius. Nec tamen ab dictatore comitia sunt habita, quia vitione creatus esset in disquisitionem venit. Consulti augures vitiosum videri dictatorem pronuntiaverunt. Eam rem tribuni suspectam infamemque criminando fecerunt: nam neque facile fuisse id vitium nosci, cum consul oriens de nocte[3] silentio diceret dictatorem, neque ab consule cuiquam publice

[1] vocasset $T^2\gamma$: uocaset O^1: uocaret O: uocassent $\Omega\gamma$.

[2] Madvig thinks that a passage of some length, narrating the outcome of the embassy, the declaration of war, and the beginning of the siege of Naples, has been lost.

[3] oriens de nocte Drakenborch (oriens nocte Rubenius): oriende nocte F: oriente nocte Ω: oriente noctis D^3A: oriente sub nocte O.

[1] This is the first recorded instance of the continuation of a consul's powers beyond his year of office, although in 464 a former consul, T. Quinctius, had been invested with consular authority for a campaign (III. iv. 10).

legates having replied that they should go, not where the enemy summoned them, but where their generals led them . . . B.C. 327–326

By taking up a favourable position between Palaepolis and Neapolis, Publilius had already deprived the enemy of that mutual exchange of assistance which they had made use of, as one place after another was hard pressed. Accordingly, since the time drew near for the elections, and it was not for the advantage of the state that Publilius, who was threatening the enemy's walls, should be called away from the prospective capture of their city, which might happen any day, the senate got the tribunes to propose a popular enactment, providing that Quintus Publilius Philo should, on the expiration of his consulship, conduct the campaign as proconsul until the Greeks should have been conquered.[1]

To Lucius Cornelius, who had already entered Samnium, and whom they were equally unwilling to withdraw from the vigorous prosecution of the war, they sent a letter directing him to name a dictator for conducting the elections. He named Marcus Claudius Marcellus, who named Spurius Postumius master of the horse. But the comitia were not held by the dictator, inasmuch as the regularity of his appointment was called in question. The augurs were consulted, and announced that the procedure appeared faulty. This sentence the tribunes by their accusations made suspect and infamous; for the flaw, as they pointed out, could not easily have been discovered, since the consul rose in the night and appointed the dictator in silence, neither had the consul written to anyone

B.C. 428

privatimve de ea re scriptum esse nec quemquam
16 mortalium exstare qui se vidisse aut audisse quid dicat quod auspicium dirimeret, neque augures divinare Romae sedentes potuisse quid in castris consuli vitii obvenisset; cui non apparere, quod plebeius dictator sit, id vitium auguribus visum?
17 Haec aliaque ab tribunis nequiquam iactata; tandem[1] ad interregnum res redit, dilatisque alia atque alia de causa comitiis quartus decimus demum interrex L. Aemilius consules creat C. Poetelium[2] L. Papirium Mugillanum; Cursorem in aliis annalibus invenio.

B.C. 5

XXIV. Eodem anno Alexandream in Aegypto proditum conditam, Alexandrumque Epiri regem ab exsule Lucano interfectum sortes Dodonaei Iovis
2 eventu adfirmasse. Accito ab Tarentinis in Italiam data dictio erat, caveret Acherusiam aquam Pando-
3 siamque urbem: ibi fatis eius terminum dari. Eoque ocius transmisit in Italiam ut quam maxime procul abesset urbe Pandosia in Epiro et Acheronte amni, quem ex Molosside fluentem in Stagna Inferna[3]
4 accipit Thesprotius sinus. Ceterum ut[4] ferme fugiendo in media fata ruitur, cum saepe Bruttias

[1] tandem ς Madvig: tamen Ω (wanting in O).
[2] Poetelium Madvig (III. XXXV. 11): petilium (or petillium) Ω.
[3] Stagna Inferna Walters and Conway (Plin., N.H. IV. i. 4, Strabo VII. vii. 5): stagna inferna Ω edd.
[4] ceterum ut ς: ut ceterum Ω.

[1] The founding of Alexandria and the death of Alexander of Epirus are placed five years too late. They occurred in 332 or 331 B.C.
[2] The name was doubtless due to the association of the Acheron in Epirus with the Acheron of the lower world.

regarding the transaction, whether officially or privately, nor was there a single mortal living who could say that he had seen or heard a thing that would bring to naught the auspices; nor yet could the augurs have divined, as they sat in Rome, what obstacle the consul had met with in the camp. Was there anyone, they would like to know, who could not see that the plebeian standing of the dictator was the thing which had seemed irregular to the augurs? These and other objections were made by the tribunes to no purpose; the state at length reverted to an interregnum, and after the comitia had been again and again postponed, on one pretext or another, at last the fourteenth interrex, Lucius Aemilius, procured the election of consuls, viz. Gaius Poetelius and Lucius Papirius Mugillanus—in other annals I find the name of Cursor. B.C. 327–326

XXIV. It is recorded that in that same year Alexandria in Egypt was founded, and that Alexander, king of Epirus, being murdered by a Lucanian exile, fulfilled by his death the oracle of Jupiter at Dodona.[1] On his being summoned to Italy by the Tarentines, the oracle had warned him to beware of the Acherusian water and the city Pandosia, for there he was destined to end his days. On this account he had passed over with the more speed into Italy, that he might be as far removed as possible from the city of Pandosia in Epirus and from the river Acheron, which, debouching from Molossis into the Infernal Marshes,[2] discharges its waters into the Thesprotian Gulf. But, as generally happens, in seeking to escape his doom he ran full upon it. Having repeatedly defeated the Bruttian B.C. 326

U.C. 428

Lucanasque legiones fudisset, Heracleam Tarentinorum coloniam ex Lucanis, Sipontum Apulorum, Consentiamque [1] Bruttiorum ac Terinam,[2] alias inde Messapiorum [3] ac Lucanorum cepisset urbes et trecentas familias illustres in Epirum, quas obsidum
5 numero haberet, misisset, haud procul Pandosia urbe, imminente Lucanis ac Bruttiis finibus, tres tumulos aliquantum inter se distantes insedit, ex quibus incursiones in omnem partem agri hostilis faceret;
6 et ducentos ferme Lucanorum exsules circa se pro fidis habebat, ut pleraque eius generis ingenia sunt, cum fortuna mutabilem gerentes fidem.
7 Imbres continui campis omnibus inundatis [4] cum interclusissent trifariam exercitum a mutuo inter se auxilio, duo praesidia, quae sine rege erant, improviso hostium adventu opprimuntur; deletisque eis ad ipsius obsidionem omnes con-
8 versi. Inde ab Lucanis exsulibus ad suos nuntii missi sunt, pactoque reditu promissum est regem aut vivum aut mortuum in potestatem daturos.
9 Ceterum cum delectis ipse egregium facinus ausus per medios erumpit hostes, et ducem Lucanorum comminus congressum obtruncat;
10 contrahensque suos ex fuga palatos pervenit ad amnem, ruinis recentibus pontis, quem vis aquae
11 abstulerat, indicantem iter. Quem cum incerto

[1] coloniam ex Lucanis, Sipontum Apulorum, Consentiamque Bruttiorum Weissenborn: coloniam Consentiam (M omits Consentiam) ex Lucanis Sipontumque Bruttiorum (Bruttiorum coloniam O) Ω.

[2] ac Terinam Sigonius: acerinam (or -um) Ω: acrentinam M.

[3] Messapiorum A^3,-: massepiorum(-porum = priorum L) Ω

[4] inundatis Madvig: inundates MPT: inundantes Ω.

and Lucanian levies; having taken Heraclea, a Tarentine colony, from the Lucanians, and Sipontum belonging to the Apulians, and the Bruttian towns Consentia and Terina, and after that other towns of the Messapians and Lucanians; and having sent to Epirus three hundred illustrious families, to be held as hostages, he took up his station not far from the city Pandosia, which looks down upon the borders of Lucania and Bruttium, on three hills that stand some little distance apart from one another, that he might thence make incursions into every quarter of the enemy's country. He had about him some two hundred Lucanian exiles, whom he trusted; but their loyalty, like that of most men of that nation, was prone to change with the change of fortune. B.C. 326

Continuous rains, which flooded all the fields, having isolated the three divisions of the army and cut them off from mutual assistance, the two bodies other than the king's were surprised and overpowered by the enemy, who, after putting them all to the sword, proceeded with their entire strength to blockade Alexander himself. Whereupon the Lucanian exiles sent messengers to their countrymen, and promised that, if assured of restoration, they would give up the king, alive or dead, into their hands. But Alexander, with a chosen band, made a daring attempt, and broke out through the midst of his foes, cutting down the Lucanian general in a hand-to-hand encounter. Then, rallying his followers, who had become scattered in the flight, he came to a river, where the fresh ruins of a bridge, which the violence of the current had swept away, pointed out the road. As his company were making u.c. 428 vado transiret agmen, fessus metu ac labore miles, increpans nomen abominandum fluminis, "Iure Acheros vocaris" inquit. Quod ubi ad aures accidit regis, adiecit extemplo animum fatis suis sub-12 stititque, dubius an transiret. Tum Sotimus, minister ex regiis pueris, quid in tanto discrimine periculi cunctaretur interrogans, indicat

13 Lucanos insidiis quaerere locum. Quos[1] ubi respexit rex procul grege facto venientes, stringit gladium, et per medium amnem transmittit equum; iamque in vadum egressum eminus
14 veruto Lucanus exsul transfigit. Lapsum inde cum inhaerente telo corpus exanime detulit amnis in hostium praesidia. Ibi foeda laceratio corporis facta. Namque praeciso medio partem Consentiam misere, pars ipsis retenta ad ludibrium.
15 Quae cum iaculis saxisque procul incesseretur, mulier una ultra humanarum irarum fidem saevienti turbae immixta, ut parumper sustinerent precata, flens ait virum sibi liberosque captos apud hostes esse; sperare corpore regio utcumque mulcato se
16 suos redempturam. Is finis lacerationi fuit, sepultumque Consentiae quod membrorum reliquum fuit cura mulieris unius, ossaque Metapontum [ad hostes
17 remissa, inde Epirum devecta ad Cleopatram uxorem

[1] quos A^2 vor A^3)$_{\overline{\Gamma}}$: quod Ω.

[1] Acheros is apparently a by-form of Acheron. The soldier associated the word with ἄχος, "pain." The stream is thought to have been a small tributary of the Neaethus.

[2] Apparently Alexander had a garrison there.

their way across the stream by a treacherous ford, a B.C. 326 discouraged and exhausted soldier cried out, cursing the river's ill-omened name, "You are rightly called the Acheros!"[1] When the king heard this, he at once bethought him of the oracle, and stopped, undecided whether he should cross or not. Whereat Sotimus, one of the young nobles who attended him, asked why he hesitated in so dangerous a crisis, and pointed out the Lucanians, who were looking for a chance to waylay him. With a backward glance the king perceived them at a little distance coming towards him in a body, and drawing his sword, urged his horse through the middle of the stream. He had already gained the shallow water, when a Lucanian exile cast a javelin that transfixed him. He fell with the javelin in his lifeless body, and the current carried him down to the enemy's guard. By them his corpse was barbarously mangled, for they cut it in two through the middle, and sending a half to Consentia, kept the other half to make sport for themselves. They were standing off and pelting it with javelins and stones, when a solitary woman, exposing herself to the inhuman savagery of the raging crowd, besought them to forbear a little, and with many tears declared that her husband and children were prisoners in the hands of the enemy, and that she hoped that with the body of the king, however much disfigured, she might redeem them. This ended the mutilation. What was left of the corpse was cremated at Consentia by the care of none other than the woman, and the bones sent back to Metapontum,[2] to the enemy; whence they were conveyed by ship to Epirus, to his wife Cleopatra and his sister

B.C. 328 sororemque Olympiadem, quarum mater magni
18 Alexandri altera, soror altera fuit. Haec de Alexandri Epirensis tristi eventu, quamquam Romano bello fortuna eum abstinuit, tamen, quia in Italia bella gessit, paucis dixisse satis sit.

XXV. Eodem anno lectisternium Romae, quintum post conditam urbem, iisdem quibus ante placandis
2 habitum est deis. Novi deinde consules iussu populi cum misissent qui indicerent Samnitibus bellum, ipsi maiore conatu quam adversus Graecos cuncta parabant; et alia nova nihil tum animo tale agitanti-
3 bus accesserunt auxilia. Lucani atque Apuli, quibus gentibus nihil ad eam diem cum Romano populo fuerat, in fidem venerunt, arma virosque ad bellum pollicentes; foedere ergo in amicitiam accepti. Eodem tempore etiam in Samnio res prospere
4 gesta. Tria oppida in potestatem venerunt, Allifae Callifae Rufrium, aliusque ager primo adventu consulum longe lateque est pervastatus.

5 Hoc bello tam prospere[1] commisso, alteri quoque bello, quo Graeci obsidebantur, iam finis aderat. Nam praeterquam quod intersaeptis munimentis hostium pars parti abscisa erat, foediora aliquanto
6 intra muros iis[2] quibus hostis territabat fiebant,[3] et velut capti a suismet ipsi[4] praesidiis indigna in[5] liberis

[1] prospere Ω : propere H T : prope (for prope = propere) M.
[2] iis Crev. : his Ω.
[3] fiebant Luterbacher : patiebant Ω.
[4] ipsi Perizonius Gronovius : ipsis Ω.
[5] in Gronovius : iam Ω.

[1] The first of these banquets for the gods took place in 399 B.C., the others in 392, 364, and 348.

Olympias, of whom the latter was mother, the former sister, to Alexander the Great. This brief account of the sad end of Alexander may be excused on the score of his having warred in Italy, albeit Fortune held him back from attacking the Romans. B.C. 326

XXV. A lectisternium, the fifth since the founding of the City, was held this year, to propitiate the same deities as before.[1] Then the new consuls, having sent fetials, as commanded by the people, to declare war on the Samnites, not only began themselves to make ready for it, on a much greater scale in every respect than they had done against the Greeks, but received new and at that time quite unlooked-for help. For the Lucanians and Apulians, nations which until then had had no dealings with the Roman People, put themselves under their protection and promised arms and men for the war, and were accordingly received into a treaty of friendship. At the same time, the Romans conducted a successful campaign in Samnium. Three towns—Allifae, Callifae, and Rufrium—fell into their hands, and the rest of the country was devastated far and wide at the first coming of the consuls.

While this war was beginning in so prosperous a fashion, the other, against the Greeks, was in a fair way to be concluded. For not only were a part of the besieged cut off from the rest by the intervening entrenchments of the Romans, but things were going on within their walls much more dreadful than the perils with which the enemy threatened them; and as though the inhabitants had been made prisoners by their own defenders, they were subjected to outrage even in the persons of their

U.C. 428 quoque ac coniugibus et quae captarum urbium
7 extrema sunt patiebantur. Itaque cum et a Tarento et a Samnitibus fama esset nova auxilia ventura, Samnitium plus quam vellent intra moenia esse
8 rebantur, Tarentinorum iuventutem, Graeci Graecos, haud minus per quos Samniti Nolanoque quam ut Romanis hostibus resisterent, exspectabant; posttremo levissimum malorum deditio ad Romanos visa:
9 Charilaus et Nymphius, principes civitatis, communicato inter se consilio partes ad rem agendam divisere, ut alter ad imperatorem Romanorum transfugeret, alter subsisteret ad praebendam
10 opportunam consilio urbem. Charilaus fuit qui ad Publilium Philonem venit, et quod bonum faustum felix Palaepolitanis populoque Romano esset, tradere 11 se ait moenia statuisse; eo facto, utrum ab se prodita an servata patria videatur, in fide Romana positum esse; sibi privatim nec pacisci quicquam nec petere; 12 publice petere quam pacisci magis ut, si successisset inceptum, cogitaret populus Romanus potius cum quanto studio periculoque reditum in amicitiam suam esset, quam qua[1] stultitia et temeritate de 13 officio decessum. Conlaudatus ab imperatore tria milia militum ad occupandam eam partem urbis

[1] quam qua U^2 (or U^1) T^2A^3: quamquam (quemquam M?) Ω (including M^1).

children and their wives, and suffered all the horrors of captured cities. And so, on a report that reinforcements were on their way, both from Tarentum and from the Samnites, they felt that they had within their city more Samnites than they wanted, but being Greeks, looked forward to the coming of their fellow Greeks, the young men of Tarentum, to enable them to resist the Samnites and the Nolani, no less than their enemies, the Romans. In the end it appeared to them that surrender to the Romans was the least intolerable evil. Charilaus and Nymphius, their principal citizens, took counsel together, and arranged the part that each should play in order to bring this about. One was to go over to the Roman general, the other to remain behind and make the city ready for the accomplishment of their design. It was Charilaus who went to Publilius Philo, and praying that it might turn out a good and favourable and fortunate thing for Palaepolis and for the Roman People, announced that he had resolved to deliver up the walls. It depended, he said, upon the honour of the Romans whether, having accomplished his intention, he should appear to have betrayed his country or to have saved it. For himself in particular he neither stipulated nor requested anything; for his people he requested—though he did not stipulate—that if the enterprise succeeded, the Roman People should consider with what eagerness they had resumed the friendship, and the hazard which they ran, rather than the folly and temerity which had led them to forget their duty. The general commended him, and gave him three thousand soldiers to seize that part of the city where the Samnites were established, appointing B.C. 326

U.C. 428 quam Samnites insidebant accepit; praesidio ei L. Quinctius tribunus militum praepositus.

XXVI. Eodem tempore et Nymphius praetorem Samnitium arte adgressus perpulerat, ut, quoniam omnis Romanus exercitus aut circa Palaepolim aut in Samnio esset, sineret se classe circumvehi ad Romanum agrum, non oram modo maris sed ipsi 2 urbi propinqua loca depopulaturum. Sed ut falleret, nocte proficiscendum esse extemploque naves deducendas. Quod quo maturius fieret, omnis iuventus Samnitium praeter necessarium urbis praesidium 3 ad litus missa. Ubi dum Nymphius in tenebris et multitudine semet ipsa impediente, sedulo aliis alia imperia turbans, terit tempus, Charilaus ex composito ab sociis in urbem receptus, cum summa urbis Romano milite implesset, tolli clamorem iussit: ad quem Graeci signo accepto a principibus quievere, 4 Nolani per aversam partem urbis via Nolam ferente[1] effugiunt. Samnitibus exclusis ab urbe, ut expeditior in praesentia fuga, ita foedior, postquam periculo 5 evaserunt, visa, quippe qui inermes nulla rerum suarum non relicta inter hostes, ludibrium non externis modo sed etiam popularibus, spoliati atque

[1] via Nolam ferente T^2A^x: uiam nolam ferentem (-tes O) Ω.

[1] This shows that the Samnite general was in control in the city.

Lucius Quinctius, a military tribune, to command the force. B.C. 326

XXVI. At the same time Nymphius for his part had gone craftily to work with the Samnite commander, and pointing out that all the forces of the Romans were either about Palaepolis or in Samnium, got him to consent [1] that he should take a fleet and sail round them to the Roman seaboard, where he proposed, so he said, to ravage not only the coastal region, but the vicinity of Rome itself; it would however be necessary, in order to slip past the enemy unobserved, to put out at night, and the ships must be drawn down at once. That this might be accomplished the more expeditiously, all the Samnite soldiers, except the few who were needed to mount guard in the city, were sent down to the shore. While Nymphius was killing time there in the darkness, purposely issuing contradictory orders to confuse the throng, which was so large as to get in its own way, Charilaus, having been received into the city, as agreed upon by the conspirators, had occupied the highest part of it with Roman soldiers, whom he now commanded to give a cheer. On hearing this, the Greeks, who had received a signal from their leaders, remained still, but the Nolani fled through the opposite quarter of the city by the road that leads to Nola. The Samnites, being shut out from the town, enjoyed a momentary advantage in the ease with which they fled, but appeared in a more disgraceful light, when the danger had been left behind. Unarmed—for they had abandoned everything to the enemy—they returned to their homes despoiled and destitute, a laughing-stock not only to strangers but to their own

U.C. 428

6 egentes domos rediere. Haud ignarus opinionis alterius, qua haec proditio ab Samnitibus facta traditur, cum auctoribus hoc dedi quibus dignius credi est, tum foedus Neapolitanum—eo enim deinde summa rei Graecorum venit—similius vero
7 facit ipsos in amicitiam redisse. Publilio triumphus decretus, quod satis credebatur obsidione domitos hostes in fidem venisse. Duo singularia haec ei viro primum contigere, prorogatio imperii non ante in ullo facta et acto honore triumphus.

XXVII. Aliud subinde bellum cum alterius orae
2 Graecis exortum. Namque Tarentini, cum rem Palaepolitanam vana spe auxilii aliquamdiu sustinuissent, postquam Romanos urbe potitos accepere, velut destituti ac non qui ipsi destituissent, increpare Palaepolitanos, ira atque invidia in Romanos furere, eo etiam magis, quod Lucanos et Apulos—nam utraque eo anno societas coepta est—in fidem
3 populi Romani venisse allatum est: quippe propemodum perventum ad se esse, iamque in eo rem fore, ut Romani aut hostes aut domini habendi sint.
4 Discrimen profecto rerum suarum in bello Samnitium eventuque eius verti; eam solam gentem restare, nec eam ipsam satis validam, quando Lucanus defecerit;

[1] The treaty secured advantages to the inhabitants of Palaepolis-Neapolis—of which combination Neapolis now became the head—which would hardly have been granted them if they had been subdued, and had not voluntarily surrendered.

countrymen. I am not unaware of the other tradition which ascribes the capture to betrayal by the Samnites, but have followed the authorities who are more deserving of credence; moreover, the treaty with Neapolis—to which place the Greeks now transferred the seat of government—makes it more likely that they renewed the friendship voluntarily.[1] Publilius was decreed a triumph, in consequence of a belief that the enemy had surrendered because they were forced to do so by the siege. He was the first to enjoy these two distinctions: an extension of his command, never before granted to any, and a triumph after the expiration of his term. B.C. 326

XXVII. This war was immediately followed by the outbreak of another, with the Greeks of the eastern coast. For the Tarentines, after sustaining the people of Palaepolis for some time with delusive hopes of succour, when they learned that the Romans had got possession of the city, inveighed against the Palaepolitans, as though, instead of deserting them, they themselves had been deserted, and were raging with hatred and envy against the Romans: the more so, because they learnt that the Lucanians and Apulians had made their submission to the Roman People—for an alliance was formed that year with both these nations. The Romans, they said, were almost at the gates of Tarentum, and matters would soon be come to such a pass, that they must needs have them for enemies or masters; it was clear that their own future hinged on the outcome of the war then being waged by the Samnites; this was the only nation that continued to hold out, and indeed that nation was none too strong since the defection

u.c. 428

quem revocari adhuc impellique ad abolendam societatem Romanam posse, si qua ars serendis discordiis adhibeatur.

Haec consilia cum apud cupidos rerum novandarum valuissent, ex iuventute quidam Lucanorum pretio adsciti, clari magis inter populares quam honesti, inter se mulcati ipsi virgis, cum corpora nuda intulissent in civium coetum, vociferati sunt se, quod castra Romana ingredi ausi essent, a consulibus virgis caesos ac prope securi percussos esse. Deformis suapte natura res cum speciem iniuriae magis quam doli prae se ferret, concitati homines cogunt clamore suo magistratus senatum vocare; et alii circumstantes concilium bellum in Romanos poscunt, alii ad concitandam in arma multitudinem agrestium discurrunt, tumultuque etiam sanos consternante animos decernitur ut societas cum Samnitibus renovaretur, legatique ad eam rem mittuntur.[1] Repentina res quia quam causam nullam tam ne fidem quidem habebat, coacti a Samnitibus et obsides dare et praesidia in loca munita accipere, caeci fraude et ira nihil recusarunt. Dilucere deinde brevi fraus coepit, postquam criminum falsorum auctores Tarentum commigravere; sed amissa omni[2] de se potestate, nihil ultra quam ut paeniteret frustra restabat.

XXVIII. Eo anno plebei Romanae velut aliud

[1] mittuntur HT²LA¹R: remittuntur DA: mittantur PFUOT²: mitteantur M: mitterentur Frigell.

[2] omni UOHT²A¹: omnia MPFTDLA: omni iam Alschefski.

of the Lucanians; but the latter might even yet be brought back and induced to repudiate the Roman alliance, if a little art were employed in sowing discord. B.C. 326

These counsels having prevailed—for they were eager to fall in with novel schemes—they bribed certain young Lucanians, of greater prominence among their countrymen than respectability, who lacerated one another with rods and then exhibited their naked bodies before a concourse of their fellow citizens, crying out that for having dared to enter the Roman camp they had been ordered by the consuls to be scourged, and had narrowly escaped losing their heads. This spectacle, so hideous in itself, pointed clearly to injury and not to guile. In an uproar of excitement, the people obliged their magistrates to convoke the senate. At the meeting some crowded round and clamoured for war against the Romans, while others hurriedly departed this way and that, to rouse the inhabitants of the countryside to arms, till even the prudent lost their heads in the tumult, and it was voted to renew the alliance with the Samnites; and ambassadors were sent off to arrange it. This impulsive action, as it had no cause, so it carried no conviction; they were forced by the Samnites both to give hostages and also to admit garrisons within their strongholds; but, blinded by the cheat and by resentment, they stuck at nothing. A little later, when the false witnesses had retired to Tarentum, they began to see through the imposition: but having lost all power of independent action, they could only indulge in vain regrets.

XXVIII. In that year the liberty of the Roman

A.U.C. 425

initium libertatis factum est, quod necti desierunt; mutatum autem ius ob unius feneratoris simul libi-
2 dinem simul crudelitatem insignem. L. Papirius is fuit, cui cum se C. Publilius ob aes alienum paternum nexum dedisset, quae aetas formaque misericordiam elicere poterant, ad libidinem et con-
3 tumeliam animum accenderunt. Florem[1] aetatis eius fructum adventicium crediti ratus, primo perlicere adulescentem sermone incesto est conatus; dein, postquam aspernabantur flagitium aures, minis
4 territare atque identidem admonere fortunae; postremo, cum ingenuitatis magis quam praesentis condicionis memorem videret, nudari iubet ver-
5 beraque adferri. Quibus laceratus iuvenis cum se in publicum proripuisset, libidinem crudelitatemque
6 conquerens feneratoris, ingens vis hominum cum aetatis miseratione atque indignitate iniuriae accensa, tum suae condicionis liberumque suorum respectu, in forum atque inde agmine facto ad
7 curiam concurrit; et cum consules tumultu repentino coacti senatum vocarent, introeuntibus in curiam patribus laceratum iuvenis tergum, procumbentes ad singulorum pedes, ostentabant.
8 Victum eo die ob impotentem iniuriam unius ingens vinculum fidei; iussique consules ferre ad populum ne quis, nisi qui noxam meruisset, donec poenam lueret, in compedibus aut in nervo tene-

[1] Florem Madvig: ut florem Ω: et florem ς.

[1] The plebs had gained political liberty on the expulsion of the kings and the adoption of the republican government. Now they were assured of personal liberty as well. The reform is put by Valerius Maximus (VI. i. 9) and Dionysius of Halicarnassus (xvi. 9) after the disaster at the Caudine Forks in 321 B.C.

plebs had as it were a new beginning; for men ceased to be imprisoned for debt.[1] The change in the law was occasioned by the notable lust and cruelty of a single usurer, Lucius Papirius, to whom Gaius Publilius had given himself up for a debt owed by his father. The debtor's youth and beauty, which might well have stirred the creditor's compassion, did but inflame his heart to lust and contumely. Regarding the lad's youthful prime as additional compensation for the loan, he sought at first to seduce him with lewd conversation: later, finding he turned a deaf ear to the base proposal, he began to threaten him and now and again to remind him of his condition; at last, when he saw that the youth had more regard to his honourable birth than to his present plight, he had him stripped and scourged. The boy, all mangled with the stripes, broke forth into the street, crying out upon the money-lender's lust and cruelty; and a great throng of people, burning with pity for his tender years, and with rage for the shameful wrong he had undergone, and considering, too, their own condition and their children's, rushed down into the Forum, and from there in a solid throng to the Curia. The consuls were forced by the sudden tumult to convene the senate; and as the Fathers entered the Curia, the people threw themselves at the feet of each, and pointed to the young lad's mutilated back. On that day, owing to one man's outrageous injury, was broken a strong bond of credit, and the consuls were ordered to carry a proposal to the people that none should be confined in shackles or in the stocks, save those who, having been guilty of some crime, were waiting to pay the penalty; B.C. 326

A.U.C. 428

9 retur; pecuniae creditae bona debitoris, non corpus obnoxium esset. Ita nexi soluti, cautumque in posterum ne necterentur.

A.U.C. 429

XXIX. Eodem anno, cum satis per se ipsum Samnitium bellum et defectio repens Lucanorum auctoresque defectionis, Tarentini, sollicitos haberent patres, accessit ut et Vestinus populus Samnitibus
2 sese coniungeret. Quae res sicut eo anno sermonibus magis passim hominum iactata quam in publico ullo concilio est, ita insequentis anni consulibus, L. Furio Camillo iterum Iunio Bruto Scaevae, nulla prior potiorque visa est, de qua ad senatum
3 referrent. Et quamquam non nova[1] res erat, tamen tanta cura patres incessit, ut pariter eam susceptam neglectamque timerent, ne aut impunitas eorum lascivia superbiaque aut bello poenae expetitae metu propinquo atque ira concirent finitimos populos;
4 et erat genus omne abunde bello Samnitibus par, Marsi Paelignique et Marrucini, quos, si Vestinus
5 attingeretur, omnes habendos hostes. Vicit tamen pars quae in praesentia videri potuit maioris animi quam consilii; sed eventus docuit fortes fortunam
6 iuvare. Bellum ex auctoritate patrum populus adversus Vestinos iussit. Provincia ea Bruto, Samnium

[1] non nova (or nota) Duker: noua Ω.

and that for money lent, the debtor's goods, but not his person, should be distrainable. So those in confinement were released, and it was forbidden that any should be confined thereafter. B.C. 326

XXIX. In that same year, though the Samnite war and the sudden revolt of the Lucanians, together with the Tarentines their abettors, were enough of themselves to fill the senators with concern, yet the Vestini added to their cares by uniting with the Samnites. This action was widely discussed in private conversations, without being made the subject, in that year, of any public deliberations; but the consuls of the following year, Lucius Furius Camillus (for the second time) and Junius Brutus Scaeva, deemed it a matter that should take precedence over all other business to come before the senate. There, notwithstanding it was no news to them, the situation occasioned the Fathers so great anxiety as to make them equally afraid to deal with it or to let it alone, lest the impunity of the Vestini might inspire the neighbouring tribes with licence and insolence, or a punitive war inflame them with apprehensions of imminent danger and with resentment; moreover the race as a whole was fully equal to the Samnites in military power, comprising, as it did, the Marsi, and the Paeligni and Marrucini,—all of whom must be had for enemies, should the Vestini be molested. The day, however, was carried by that party which might have seemed at the moment to have on its side a greater share of courage than of wisdom; but the sequel showed that Fortune favours the brave. Being authorized by the senate, the people voted a war against the Vestini. This command was assigned by lot to B.C. 325

A.U.C. 429

7 Camillo sorte evenit. Exercitus utroque ducti, et cura tuendorum finium hostes prohibiti coniungere
8 arma. Ceterum alterum consulem L. Furium, cui maior moles rerum imposita erat, morbo gravi im-
9 plicitum fortuna bello subtraxit: iussusque dictatorem dicere rei gerendae causa, longe clarissimum bello ea tempestate dixit, L. Papirium Cursorem, a quo Q.[1] Fabius Maximus Rullianus[2] magister
10 equitum est dictus, par nobile rebus in eo magistratu gestis, discordia tamen, qua prope ad ultimum dimicationis ventum est, nobilius.

11 Ab altero consule in Vestinis multiplex bellum nec usquam vario eventu gestum est. Nam et pervastavit agros et populando atque urendo tecta
12 hostium sataque in aciem invitos extraxit, et ita proelio uno accidit Vestinorum res, haudquaquam tamen incruento milite suo, ut non in castra solum refugerent hostes, sed iam ne vallo quidem ac fossis freti dilaberentur in oppida, situ urbium moeni-
13 busque se defensuri. Postremo oppida quoque vi expugnare adortus, primo Cutinam ingenti ardore militum a volnerum ira,[3] quod haud fere quisquam integer proelio excesserat, scalis cepit, deinde
14 Cingiliam. Utriusque urbis praedam militibus, quod

[1] a quo Q. $I^2F^3T^2$: a quo que (or a quoq.) Ω: amquoq. M: a quo D^x: abeoquo A^2.

[2] Rullianus Sigon. (C.I.L. i², p. 45, a.u.c. 432, 445; Plin. N.H. vii. xli. 42: rutilanus O: rutilianus MPFUHT: rutulianus DLA.

[3] a vol (vul- nerum ira Madvig (cf. xxiv. xxx. 1): aut vol (uul- nerum ira Ω: ac uulnerum ira ζ: aut uulneratum ira M.

[1] Since the Vestini were not supported by their neighbours, as men had feared they would be.

[2] Also called Rullus (xxiv. ix. 8). He was the grandfather of Fabius Cunctator, who opposed Hannibal.

Brutus, that against the Samnites to Camillus. B.C. 325
Armies were dispatched in both directions, and the enemy, concerned to protect their borders, were kept from joining forces. But one of the consuls, Lucius Furius, on whom the heavier burden had been laid,[1] had the misfortune to fall dangerously ill and was compelled to relinquish his command; being ordered to nominate a dictator for the purpose of carrying on the war, he named by far the most distinguished soldier of that time, Lucius Papirius Cursor, by whom Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus[2] was appointed master of the horse. They were a pair famous for the victories won while they were magistrates; but their quarrelling, which almost went the length of a mortal feud, made them more famous still.

The other consul, in the country of the Vestini, carried on a war of many phases, but of unvarying success at every point. For he ravaged their farms, and by pillaging and burning their houses and their crops, compelled them against their will to take the field; and then in a single battle wrought such havoc with the Vestinian power—though his own troops came off by no means scatheless—that the enemy not only retreated to their camp, but, no longer trusting to their parapet and trenches, slipped away to their several towns, seeking protection in the situation of the places and their walls. Finally, the consul addressed himself to the capture of these towns. The soldiers fought with great fury to revenge their wounds, for hardly a man had come unhurt out of the battle; and first Cutina was carried by escalade, and then Cingilia. The consul gave the booty of both these cities to his men, eos neque portae nec muri hostium arcuerant, concessit.

A.U.C. 429

XXX. In Samnium incertis itum auspiciis est; cuius rei vitium non in belli eventum, quod prospere gestum est, sed in rabiem atque iras imperatorum 2 vertit. Namque Papirius dictator a pullario monitus, cum ad auspicium repetendum Romam proficisceretur, magistro equitum denuntiavit ut sese loco teneret, neu absente se cum hoste manum conse- 3 reret. Q.[1] Fabius cum post profectionem dictatoris per exploratores comperisset perinde omnia soluta apud hostes esse ac si nemo Romanus in Samnio 4 esset, seu ferox adulescens indignitate accensus, quod omnia in dictatore viderentur reposita esse, seu occasione bene gerendae rei inductus, exercitu instructo paratoque profectus ad Imbrinium—ita 5 vocant locum—acie cum Samnitibus conflixit. Ea fortuna pugnae fuit ut nihil relictum sit quo, si adfuisset dictator, res melius geri potuerit; non dux 6 militi, non miles duci defuit; eques etiam auctore L. Cominio tribuno militum, qui aliquotiens impetu capto perrumpere non poterat[2] hostium agmen,[3] detraxit frenos equis, atque ita concitatos calcaribus permisit ut sustinere eos nulla vis posset; per 7 arma, per viros late stragem dedere; secutus pedes impetum equitum turbatis hostibus intulit signa.

[1] Q. A[2] or A[1]j: que M: omitted by Ω.
[2] poterat Ω: potuerat Weissenborn.
[3] agmen Ω: aciem Weissenborn (but cf., with Walters and Conway, Hor. Carm. IV. xiv. 29 and III. ii. 9).

because neither the gates nor the walls of the enemy had held them back. B.C. 325

XXX. The expedition into Samnium was attended with ambiguous auspices; but the flaw in them took effect, not in the outcome of the war, which was waged successfully, but in the animosities and madness of the generals. For Papirius, the dictator, as he was setting out for Rome, on the advice of the keeper of the sacred chickens, to take the auspices afresh, warned the master of the horse to remain in his position, and not to engage in battle with the enemy while he himself was absent. When Quintus Fabius had ascertained from his scouts—after the departure of the dictator—that the enemy were in all respects as careless and unguarded as if there had been not a single Roman in Samnium, whether it was that the spirited young man felt aggrieved that all power should seem to be vested in the dictator, or that he was tempted by the opportunity of striking a successful blow, he put the army in fighting trim, and advancing upon a place they call Imbrinium, engaged in a pitched battle with the Samnites. This engagement was so fortunate that no greater success could have been gained, had the dictator been present; the general failed not his men, nor the men their general. The cavalry, too—at the suggestion of Lucius Cominius, a tribune of the soldiers—after charging a number of times without being able to break the enemy's lines, pulled the bridles off their horses and spurred them on so hotly that nothing could resist the shock, and arms and men went down before them over a wide front. The foot soldiers, following up the cavalry charge, advanced on the disordered enemy,

A.U.C. 429 Viginti milia hostium caesa eo die traduntur. Auctores habeo bis cum hoste signa conlata dictatore absente, bis rem egregie gestam; apud antiquissimos scriptores una haec pugna invenitur; in quibusdam annalibus tota res praetermissa est.

8 Magister equitum, ut ex tanta caede multis potitus spoliis, congesta in ingentem acervum hostilia arma subdito igne concremavit, seu votum id deorum 9 cuipiam fuit, seu credere libet Fabio auctori eo factum, ne suae gloriae fructum dictator caperet nomenque ibi scriberet aut spolia in triumpho ferret. 10 Litterae quoque de re prospere gesta ad senatum, non ad dictatorem, missae argumentum fuere minime cum eo communicantis laudes. Ita certe dictator id factum accepit, ut laetis aliis victoria parta prae 11 se ferret iram tristitiamque. Misso itaque repente senatu se ex curia proripuit, tum vero non Samnitium magis legiones quam maiestatem dictatoriam et disciplinam militarem a magistro equitum victam et eversam dictitans, si illi impune spretum imperium 12 fuisset. Itaque plenus minarum iraeque profectus in castra, cum maximis itineribus isset, non tamen 13 praevenire famam adventus sui potuit; praecucurrerant enim ab urbe qui nuntiarent dictatorem of whom it is said that twenty thousand were slain that day. I find it stated by certain writers that Quintus Fabius twice fought the enemy while the dictator was absent, and twice gained a brilliant victory. The oldest historians give but this one battle, and in certain annals the story is omitted altogether. B.C. 325

The master of the horse found himself, after so great a slaughter, in possession of extensive spoils. He piled the enemy's arms in a great heap, applied a torch to them, and burnt them. This may have been done in fulfilment of a vow to one of the gods, or—if one chooses to accept the account of Fabius—to prevent the dictator reaping the harvest of his glory and inscribing his name on the arms, or having them carried in his triumph. A dispatch, too, reporting the victory, which Fabius sent to the senate and not to the dictator, argues that he had no mind to share the credit with him. At all events, the dictator so received the news, that while everyone else was rejoicing at the victory, he showed no uncertain signs of anger and discontent. And so, having hastily dismissed the senate, he rushed out of the Curia, repeatedly asserting that in that battle the master of the horse had defeated and overthrown the prestige of the dictatorship and military discipline not less decisively than the Samnite legions, should it end in his having flouted orders with impunity. And so he set out for the camp, breathing wrath and menaces; but though he travelled by exceedingly long stages, he was unable to arrive before the report of his being on the way. For couriers had hastened from the City, bringing word that the dictator was coming, athirst a.u.c. 429 avidum poenae venire, alternis paene verbis T. Manli factum laudantem.

XXXI. Fabius contione extemplo advocata obtestatus milites est ut, qua virtute rem publicam ab infestissimis hostibus defendissent, eadem se, cuius ductu auspicioque vicissent, ab impotenti 2 crudelitate dictatoris tutarentur: venire amentem invidia, iratum virtuti alienae felicitatique; furere quod se absente res publica egregie gesta esset; malle, si mutare fortunam posset, apud Samnites 3 quam Romanos victoriam esse; imperium dictitare spretum, tamquam non eadem mente pugnari vetuerit qua pugnatum doleat. Et tunc invidia impedire virtutem alienam voluisse cupidissimisque arma ablaturum fuisse militibus, ne se absente 4 moveri possent: et nunc[1] id furere, id aegre pati, quod sine L. Papirio non inermes, non manci milites fuerint, quod se Q. Fabius magistrum equitum 5 duxerit ac non accensum dictatoris. Quid illum facturum fuisse, si, quod belli casus ferunt Marsque communis, adversa pugna evenisset, qui sibi devictis hostibus, re publica bene gesta, ita ut non ab illo unico duce melius geri potuerit, supplicium magistro 6 equitum tunc victori minetur? Neque illum magi-

[1] nunc Ω: tunc M.

[1] See chapter vii.

for vengeance and praising with almost every other word the deed of Titus Manlius.[1] B.C. 323

XXXI. Fabius at once convened an assembly of the soldiers, and reminding them how their bravery had saved the state from the most determined of enemies, conjured them to be no less brave in defending him—under whose command and auspices they had gained the victory—from the ungovernable wrath of the dictator. He was coming, said Fabius, crazed with jealousy, and exasperated that another should have been both brave and fortunate; it enraged him that the state should have won a glorious victory in his absence; he would prefer—could he effect a change of fortune—that the Samnites and not the Romans had been the victors; he repeatedly declared that his authority had been despised, as though his orders against fighting had not been inspired by the same motive as was his grief over the battle! On the former occasion envy had made him wish to thwart the bravery of others; he would have stripped the most willing of soldiers of their arms, that they might be unable to use them in his absence. At present his rage and resentment were due to this, that his troops, though lacking the help of Lucius Papirius, had lacked neither swords nor hands to wield them, and that Quintus Fabius had regarded himself as master of the horse, and not as the dictator's orderly. What would he have done, had the chances of war and the common lot of armies resulted in defeat? Despite the conquest of the enemy and a campaign so well directed that not even his own peerless leadership could have bettered it, he was now threatening the master of the horse with punishment, victorious though he was. For that stro equitum infestiorem[1] quam tribunis militum, quam centurionibus, quam militibus esse. Si posset, 7 in omnes saeviturum fuisse: quia id nequeat, in unum saevire; etenim[2] invidiam tamquam ignem summa petere; in caput consilii, in ducem incurrere; si se simul cum gloria rei gestae exstinxisset, tunc victorem velut in capto exercitu dominantem, quidquid licuerit in magistro equitum, in militibus 8 ausurum. Proinde adessent in sua causa omnium libertati. Si consensum exercitus eundem qui in proelio fuerit in tuenda victoria videat et salutem unius omnibus curae esse, inclinaturum ad clemen- 9 tiorem sententiam animum. Postremo se vitam fortunasque suas illorum fidei virtutique permittere.

U.C. 429

XXXII. Clamor e tota contione ortus, uti bonum animum haberet: neminem illi vim allaturum salvis legionibus Romanis.

Haud multo post dictator advenit classicoque 2 extemplo ad contionem advocavit. Tum silentio facto praeco Q. Fabium magistrum equitum citavit. Qui simul ex inferiore loco ad tribunal accessit, tum 3 dictator "Quaero" inquit, "de te, Q. Fabi, cum summum imperium dictatoris sit pareantque ei consules, regia potestas, praetores, iisdem[3] auspiciis

[1] tunc victori minetur? Neque illum magistro equitum infestiorem O (but with a stop after victori): et tunc victori minetur? neque illum magistro equitum infestiorem edd. before Gronov.: tunc uictorem uelut in capto exercitu infestiorem MPFU: minetur minuetur H, neque illum magistro equitum infestiorem HTDLA.

[2] etenim Eoot: etiam (et iam A) Ω.

[3] iisdem A^x: isdem HT^2: hisdem MPFT is de D?L: wanting in O: illegible in A.

[1] cf. II. i. 8. All the rights of the kings and all their insignia were possessed by the earliest consuls.

matter, he was no angrier with the master of the horse than with the tribunes of the soldiers, the centurions, and the men. Had he been able, he would have vented his rage upon them all: this being imposible, he was pouring it out on one. The truth is that envy, like lightning, seeks out the highest places; he was hurling himself upon the head of their counsels, upon their general; should he succeed in destroying Fabius, and with him the glory of their achievement, he would then follow up his victory—as though lording it over a captured army—and would visit upon the soldiers all the cruelty he had been permitted to inflict upon the master of the horse. Let them defend, he cried, the liberty of all by defending him. If that same singleness of purpose which the army had displayed in battle should appear in the way they stood up for their victory and made one man's safety the safety of them all, the dictator would incline his heart to a more merciful determination. He ended by committing himself, his life, and his fortunes to their loyalty and valour. B.C. 325

XXXII. A shout arose from the whole concourse, bidding him be of good courage; no one, they cried, should do him violence, while the Roman legions were safe.

Not long after came the dictator, and forthwith by sound of trumpet summoned an assembly. Then a herald, having obtained silence, cited Quintus Fabius the master of the horse, who was no sooner come up from below to the tribunal, than the dictator cried out: "I ask you, Quintus Fabius, seeing that the dictator's authority is paramount, and the consuls obey him, though they possess the might of kings,[1] and the praetors, too, who have been elected under quibus consules creati, aequum censeas necne, ei[1] magistrum equitum dicto audientem esse; itemque illud interrogo, cum me incertis auspiciis profectum ab domo scirem, utrum mihi turbatis religionibus res publica in discrimen committenda fuerit an auspicia repetenda, ne quid dubiis dis agerem? Simul illud, quae dictatori religio impedimento ad rem gerendam fuerit, num ea magister equitum solutus ac liber potuerit esse? Sed quid ego haec interrogo, cum, si ego tacitus abissem, tamen tibi ad voluntatis interpretationem meae dirigenda tua sententia fuerit? Quin tu respondes, vetuerimne te quicquam rei me absente agere, vetuerimne signa cum hostibus conferre? Quo tu imperio meo spreto, incertis auspiciis, turbatis religionibus adversus morem militarem disciplinamque maiorum et numen deorum ausus es cum hoste confligere. Ad haec quae interrogatus es responde; at[2] extra ea cave vocem mittas.[3] Accede, lictor."

A.U.C. 429

Adversus singula cum respondere haud facile esset, et nunc quereretur eundem accusatorem capitis sui ac iudicem esse, modo vitam sibi eripi citius quam gloriam rerum gestarum posse vociferaretur purgaretque se in vicem atque ultro accusaret, tunc[4] Papirius redintegrata ira spoliari magistrum equitum ac virgas et secures expediri iussit. Fabius fidem

[1] necne ei Madvig: necne Ω.
[2] responde; at F^x: respondeat Ω: responde A^3.
[3] vocem mittas A^2 (or A^1) ζ: uocem emittas F^3 (-itas) A^3 (or A^2): uocem mittat Ω: uoce mittat M: uox nece mittat^2 (i.e. mittatur) H: uocem mittatur T (or T^1) D^3A (or A^1): uoce mittatur DL (and $TA^{?2}$).
[4] tunc Ω: tum L Madvig.

the same auspices with the consuls, whether or no B.C. 325
you deem it to be reasonable that the master of the horse should hearken to his word; and I put this further question to you—whether, when I knew that I had set out from home with uncertain auspices, it was my duty, in view of our troubled relations with the gods, to jeopardize the public safety, or to seek auspices again, that I might take no steps while the will of Heaven was in doubt; and I likewise ask whether that which a religious scruple has prevented the dictator from doing can be freely and unrestrainedly undertaken by the master of the horse. But why do I put these questions, since, had I gone off without a word, nevertheless your thoughts should have been directed to the interpretation of my will? Come, answer me: Did I forbid you to take any measures in my absence? Did I forbid you to engage the enemy? But you spurned this order: and notwithstanding the uncertainty of the auspices and our uneasy scruples, you had the hardihood, against all military precedent, and the discipline of our fathers, and the divine will of the gods, to encounter with the enemy. Answer these questions I have put to you; but have a care that you utter no word besides! Stand ready, lictor."

To answer the separate indictments was far from easy. Now complaining that the same man was his accuser and his judge in a matter of life and death, and again crying out that he could more easily be robbed of his life than of the glory of his deeds, he defended himself and accused the general by turns, until Papirius in a fresh burst of anger bade them strip the master of the horse and make ready rods and axes. Then Fabius, imploring the protection of

A.U.C. militum implorans lacerantibus vestem lictoribus ad 429 triarios tumultum ultima[1] in contione miscentes sese recepit.

12 Inde clamor in totam contionem est perlatus; alibi preces, alibi minae audiebantur. Qui proximi forte tribunali steterant, quia subiecti oculis im-peratoris noscitari poterant, orabant ut parceret magistro equitum, neu cum eo exercitum damnaret; 13 extrema contio et circa Fabium globus increpabant inclementem dictatorem nec procul seditione aberant. Ne tribunal quidem satis quietum erat; 14 legati circumstantes sellam orabant ut rem in posterum diem differret et irae suae spatium et con-15 silio tempus daret: satis castigatam adulescentiam Fabi esse, satis deformatam victoriam; ne ad extremum finem supplicii tenderet, neu unico iuveni
neu patri eius, clarissimo viro, neu Fabiae genti eam 16 iniungeret ignominiam. Cum parum precibus, parum causa proficerent, intueri saevientem contionem iubebant: ita inritatis militum animis subdere ignem ac materiam seditioni non esse aetatis, non prudentiae 17 eius; neminem id Q. Fabio poenam deprecanti suam vitio versurum, sed dictatori, si occaecatus ira infestam multitudinem in se pravo certamine mo-18 visset. Postremo, ne id se gratiae dare Q. Fabi

[1] ultima Wesenberg: iam Ω.

[1] For an assembly the soldiers stood in maniples, drawn up in the same order as for a battle. See chapter viii.

the soldiers, escaped from the clutches of the lictors with his clothes in tatters, and sought refuge in the midst of the triarii, who were stirring up riot in the rear of the assembly.[1] B.C. 325

Thence the outcry spread to the entire host. In one place were heard entreaties, in another threats. Those who chanced to be standing next to the tribunal, and being under the general's eyes were able to be marked by him, implored him to spare the master of the horse, and not condemn the army with him. Those in the outskirts of the meeting, and the crowd that surrounded Fabius, railed at the dictator's cruelty, and were near to mutiny. Not even the tribunal itself was quiet; the lieutenants, standing about the dictator's chair, besought him to put the matter off until the morrow and allow time for consideration and for his anger to cool; he had sufficiently chastened the youth of Fabius, they said, and discredited his victory; it would not be well to carry out his punishment to the end, nor to fasten such humiliation upon a young man of extraordinary merit, nor on that most distinguished man, his father, and the Fabian family. Finding that neither prayers nor arguments did any good, they bade him look at the turmoil in the assembly; when the passions of the soldiers were so overwrought, it was not, they said, for one of his years and discretion to furnish fuel to the flames of mutiny; no one would ascribe the fault to Quintus Fabius—who was but deprecating his own punishment—but all would blame the dictator, if, blinded with resentment, he should bring down the angry multitude upon himself by an ill-judged contention. Finally, that he might not suppose that they argued thus out of any

A.U.C. 429 crederet, se ius iurandum dare paratos esse non videri e re publica in Q. Fabium eo tempore animadverti.

XXXIII. His vocibus cum in se magis incitarent dictatorem quam magistro equitum placarent, iussi 2 de tribunali descendere legati; et silentio nequiquam per praeconem temptato, cum prae[1] strepitu ac tumultu nec ipsius dictatoris nec apparitorum eius vox audiretur, nox velut in proelio certamini finem fecit.

3 Magister equitum, iussus postero die adesse, cum omnes adfirmarent infestius Papirium exarsurum, agitatum contentione[2] ipsa exacerbatumque, clam 4 ex castris Romam profugit; et patre auctore M. Fabio, qui ter iam consul dictatorque fuerat, vocato extemplo senatu, cum maxime conquereretur apud patres vim atque iniuriam dictatoris, repente strepitus 5 ante curiam lictorum summoventium auditur, et ipse infensus aderat, postquam comperit profectum ex castris, cum expedito equitatu secutus. Iterata deinde contentio, et prendi Fabium Papirius iussit. 6 Ubi cum deprecantibus primoribus patrum atque universo senatu perstaret in incepto immitis animus,

[1] cum prae T^2A^3 (or A^2) ζ: prae Ω.
[2] contentione ζ: contione F^3 (or F^2) over erasure: conuentione Ω.

[1] It was not until 216 B.C. that the senate was a second time convened by a master of the horse (XXIII. XXV. 3).

personal regard for Fabius, they were ready, they said, to take an oath that it appeared to be inconsistent with the interests of the state that Quintus Fabius should then be punished. B.C. 325

XXXIII. But the lieutenants by these words rather stirred up the wrath of the dictator against themselves than lessened his rancour against the master of the horse, and he ordered them to go down from the tribunal. He then sought by the mouth of a herald to procure silence, but without success, for the din and uproar were so great that it was impossible for the dictator himself or his attendants to be heard; and it was left for darkness, as though descending on a battle-field, to end the struggle.

The master of the horse was commanded to appear next day; but since everyone assured him that Papirius would be more violent than ever, aroused as he was and exasperated by the opposition he had met with, he slipped out of the camp and fled to Rome. There, with the approval of his father, who had thrice been consul, and dictator to boot, he at once assembled the senate,[1] and had reached, in his speech to the senators, the very point where he was complaining of the violence and injury offered him by the dictator, when a sudden noise was heard outside the Curia, as the lictors cleared the way, and Papirius himself, in high dudgeon, appeared before them: for he had learned of the other's departure from the camp, and taking a troop of light horse had pursued him. The dispute was now renewed, and the dictator ordered Fabius to be seized. Both the leading members and the senate as a body sought to pacify his wrath; but he would not relent, and persisted in his pur-

A.U.C. 429

7 tum pater M. Fabius "Quando quidem" inquit, "apud te nec auctoritas senatus nec aetas mea, cui orbitatem paras, nec virtus nobilitasque magistri equitum a te ipso nominati valet nec preces, quae saepe hostem mitigavere, quae deorum iras placant, tribunos plebis appello et provoco ad populum eum-
8 que tibi, fugienti exercitus tui, fugienti senatus iudicium, iudicem fero, qui certe unus plus quam tua dictatura potest polletque. Videro, cessurusne provocationi sis, cui rex Romanus Tullus Hostilius cessit."

9 Ex curia in contionem itur. Quo cum paucis dictator, cum omni agmine principum magister equitum cum escendisset,[1] deduci eum de rostris
10 Papirius in partem inferiorem iussit. Secutus pater "Bene agis" inquit, "cum eo nos deduci iussisti, unde et privati vocem mittere possemus." Ibi primo non tam perpetuae orationes quam altercatio exaudie-
11 batur[2]; vicit deinde strepitum vox et indignatio Fabi senis increpantis superbiam crudelitatemque 12 Papiri: se quoque dictatorem Romae fuisse, nec a se quemquam, ne plebis quidem hominem, non 13 centurionem, non militem violatum; Papirium tamquam ex hostium ducibus, sic ex Romano imperatore

[1] cum escendisset ϝ: escendisset MPOHT: ascendisset M^4P^2FUDLA.
[2] exaudiebatur Gronov.: exaudiebantur Ω.

[1] See Book I., chap. xxvi.

pose. Then the father of the young man said: B.C. 325
"Inasmuch as neither the senate's authority nor my old age—which you are going about to bereave —nor the merits and noble lineage of a master of the horse whom you yourself appointed, are of any weight with you, nor yet entreaties, which have often moved an enemy to mercy, which can persuade the gods to put away their anger,—I invoke the tribunes of the plebs, and appeal to the people: and since you would shun the judgment of your own army and shun the judgment of the senate, I propose to you a judge that singly has more might and power—be well assured—than has your dictatorship. We shall see whether you will submit to an appeal to which a Roman king, Tullus Hostilius, submitted!"[1]

Leaving the senate-house, they repaired to the speaker's platform, which the dictator mounted with only a few attendants, while the master of the horse was accompanied thither by the whole body of the leading men. Then Papirius bade Fabius be removed from the Rostra to the ground below; and his father followed him, exclaiming, "You do well to bid us be removed to a place where even as private citizens we can say our say!" At first there were not so much set speeches to be heard above the tumult as an interchange of angry words. But presently the strong voice and the indignation of the elder Fabius prevailed over the din, as he inveighed against the pride and cruelty of Papirius. He reminded him that he too had been dictator at Rome, and that no man—not even a plebeian, a centurion, or a common soldier—had been misused by him; but Papirius was seeking a victory and triumph over a Roman general, as if over com-

A.U.C. victoriam et triumphum petere. Quantum interesse[1] inter moderationem antiquorum et novam superbiam 14 crudelitatemque! Dictatorem Quinctium Cincinnatum in L. Minucium consulem ex obsidione a se ereptum non ultra saevisse quam ut legatum eum
15 ad exercitum pro consule relinqueret. M. Furium Camillum in L. Furio, qui contempta sua senectute et auctoritate foedissimo cum eventu pugnasset, non solum in praesentia moderatum irae esse, ne quid
16 de collega secus populo aut senatui scriberet, sed cum revertisset, potissimum ex tribunis consularibus habuisse quem ex collegis optione ab senatu data
17 socium sibi imperii deligeret. Nam populi quidem, penes quem potestas omnium rerum esset, ne iram quidem unquam atrociorem fuisse in eos qui temeritate atque inscitia exercitus amisissent quam ut pecunia eos multaret: capite anquisitum ob rem bello male gestam de imperatore nullo[2] ad eam
18 diem esse. Nunc ducibus populi Romani, quae ne victis quidem bello fas fuerit, virgas et secures victoribus et iustissimos meritis triumphos intentari.
19 Quid enim tandem passurum fuisse filium suum, si exercitum amisisset, si fusus, fugatus, castris exutus fuisset? Quo ultra iram violentiamque eius excessuram fuisse, quam ut verberaret necaretque? Quam 20 conveniens esse, propter Q. Fabium civitatem in

[1] interesse Gronov.: interesset /-ent? F: interest Ω: interest L
[2] nullo $A^2\gamma$: nullum nulum T Ω: nullam M.

---

[1] The story is related at length, III. xxvi.–xxix.
[2] See VI. xxii.–xxv.

manders of the enemy. How great was the B.C. 325 difference betwixt the moderation of the ancients and this new-fangled arrogance and ruthlessness! When Quinctius Cincinnatus had been dictator, and had rescued the consul Lucius Minucius from the toils of the enemy, his anger had gone no further than to leave Minucius in command of the army as his lieutenant, in place of being consul.[1] Marcus Furius Camillus, when Lucius Furius, in contempt of his great age and his authority, had fought a battle, with the direst results, not only controlled his indignation at the moment and made no animadversions upon his colleague in writing to the senate or the people, but, on being permitted by the senate, after his return, to choose a partner in command, selected Lucius Furius in preference to all the other consular tribunes, his associates.[2] As to the people, who had all power in their hands, their indignation against those who by recklessness or lack of skill had lost their armies had never burned so fiercely that they punished them with anything worse than a fine; a capital charge on account of a defeat had never until that day been lodged against a general. But now the generals of the Roman People, who even if beaten might not be so dealt with without sin, were, despite their victories and their well-earned title to a triumph, being threatened with scourging and decapitation. What, pray, would his son have suffered, if he had lost his army, if he had been discomfited, routed, and driven from his camp? To what higher pitch could the passionate violence of Papirius have mounted than to scourge him and put him to death? How proper it was that because of Quintus Fabius the citizens

A.U.C. 429 laetitia victoria supplicationibus ac gratulationibus
21 esse, eum propter quem deum delubra pateant, arae sacrificiis fument, honore donis cumulentur, nudatum virgis lacerari in conspectu populi Romani, intuentem Capitolium atque arcem deosque ab se duobus proeliis
22 haud frustra advocatos! Quo id animo exercitum, qui eius ductu auspiciisque vicisset, laturum? Quem luctum in castris Romanis, quam laetitiam inter hostes fore!
23 Haec simul iurgans, querens, deum hominumque fidem obtestans et complexus filium, plurimis cum lacrimis agebat.

XXXIV. Stabat cum eo senatus maiestas, favor populi, tribunicium auxilium, memoria absentis exer-
2 citus; ex parte altera imperium invictum populi Romani et disciplina rei militaris et dictatoris edictum pro numine semper observatum et Manliana imperia et posthabita filii caritas publicae utilitati iactabantur:
3 hoc etiam L. Brutum, conditorem Romanae libertatis, antea in duobus liberis fecisse: nunc patres comes et senes faciles de alieno imperio spreto, tamquam rei parvae, disciplinae militaris eversae iuventuti
4 gratiam facere. Se tamen perstaturum in incepto, nec ei qui adversus dictum suum turbatis religionibus ac dubiis auspiciis pugnasset quicquam ex iusta poena

---

[1] Chap. VII. § 22. [2] II. v. 5.

should exult in victory with thanksgivings and rejoicings; while he on whose account the shrines of the gods were open, and the altars smoked with sacrifices and were heaped high with incense and with offerings, should be stripped and mangled with rods in full sight of the Roman People, as he looked up to the Capitol and the Citadel and the gods whose help in battle he had twice invoked, and not in vain! In what spirit would this be taken by the army, which under his conduct and his auspices had gained the victory? What grief would there be in the Roman camp, what rejoicings amongst their enemies! B.C. 325

So he made his plea, now chiding and now complaining, now calling on gods and men to help him, now bursting into tears, as he embraced his son.

XXXIV. On his side were ranged the countenance of the senate, the favour of the populace, the assistance of the tribunes, the remembrance of the absent army. His opponent urged the invincible authority of the Roman People, and military discipline, and the edict of a dictator—which had ever been revered as the will of Heaven—and the severity of Manlius,[1] who had preferred the general good to the love he bore his son, even as Lucius Brutus,[2] the founder of Roman liberty, had done before, in the case of his two children. But nowadays—the dictator proceeded—fathers were indulgent; and the older generation, little caring if another man's authority were flouted, excused the young for overturning military discipline, as a thing of no importance. He should nevertheless persist in his undertaking, nor remit an iota of his due punishment to one who had fought against his orders, while the rites of religion were confused and the remissurum. Maiestas imperii perpetuane esset non esse in sua potestate: L. Papirium nihil de eius iure[1] deminuturum[2]; optare ne potestas tribunicia, inviolata ipsa, violet intercessione sua Romanum imperium, neu populus in se potissimum dictatore vim et ius[3] dictaturae exstinguat. Quod si fecisset, non L. Papirium sed tribunos, sed pravum populi iudicium nequiquam posteros accusaturos, cum polluta semel militari disciplina non miles centurionis, non centurio tribuni, non tribunus legati, non legatus consulis, non magister equitum dictatoris pareat imperio, nemo hominum, nemo deorum verecundiam habeat, non edicta imperatorum, non auspicia obser-ventur, sine commeatu vagi milites in pacato, in hostico errent,[4] immemores sacramenti licentia sua se[5] ubi velint exauctorent, infrequentia deserantur signa neque conveniatur ad edictum nec discernatur interdiu nocte, aequo iniquo loco, iussu iniussu[6] imperatoris pugnent, et non signa, non ordines servent, latrocinii modo caeca et fortuita pro sollemni et sacrata militia sit;—"Horum criminum vos reos in omnia saecula offerte, tribuni plebi, vestra obnoxia capita pro licentia Q. Fabi obicite."

A.U.C. 429

[1] nihil de eius iure ζ: nihil eius iure Ω: nihil eius *MHTDLA*ζ.

[2] deminuturum ζ: diminuturum Ω: diminutum A^3M.

[3] dictatore vim et ius Kreyssig: dictatorem ius ζ: dictatorem et ius Ω: dictatore ius Duker: dictatore et ius H. J. Mueller (and P?).

[4] errent F^3A^2: errarent Ω.

[5] sua se Walters and Conway: sola uase HTDLA: sola se MA^2 Gelenius: sola PFUT^{2}: lacuna between sacramenti and uelint O: sola sua se Alschefski: soluta se Madvig: sola qua se D^3.

[6] iussu iniussu Gelenius ζ: iniussu Ω.

auspices uncertain. Whether the majesty of the B.C. 325 supreme authority were to endure or not was beyond his power to determine; but Lucius Papirius would do nothing to diminish it. He prayed that the tribunes might not employ their power—itself inviolate—to violate by their interference the authority of Rome; that the people might not single out the very time of his holding that office to extinguish the lawful might of the dictatorship. Should they do so, it would not be Lucius Papirius, but the tribunes and the crooked judgment of the people, that posterity would censure, and censure without avail. For let military discipline be once broken, and soldier would not obey centurion, nor centurion tribune, nor tribune lieutenant, nor lieutenant consul, nor master of the horse dictator—none would have respect for men, none reverence for the gods; neither edicts of generals nor auspices would be regarded; the soldiers, without leave, would roam in hostile as in peaceful territory; with no thought of their oath they would quit the service by their own permission, when they pleased; the standards would be deserted, the men would not come together at command; they would fight without reference to night or day, to the advantage or disadvantage of the ground, to the orders or prohibition of the general; they would neither wait for the word nor keep to their ranks; blind and haphazard brigandage would supplant the time-honoured and hallowed ways of war.—"On such charges, tribunes of the plebs, expose yourselves to be arraigned through all the ages! Let your own heads bear the guilt of the licence of Quintus Fabius!"

U.C. 429

XXXV. Stupentes tribunos et suam iam vicem magis anxios quam eius cui auxilium ab se petebatur, liberavit onere consensus populi Romani, ad preces et obtestationem versus, ut sibi poenam magistri
2 equitum dictator remitteret. Tribuni quoque inclinatam rem in preces subsecuti orare dictatorem insistunt ut veniam errori humano, veniam adulescentiae Q. Fabi daret; satis eum poenarum dedisse.
3 Iam ipse adulescens, iam pater M. Fabius, contentionis obliti procumbere ad genua et iram deprecari dicta-
4 toris. Tum dictator silentio facto "Bene habet" inquit, "Quirites. Vicit disciplina militaris, vicit imperii maiestas, quae in discrimine fuerunt an ulla
5 post hanc diem essent. Non noxae eximitur Q. Fabius, qui contra edictum imperatoris pugnavit, sed noxae damnatus donatur populo Romano, donatur tribuniciae potestati precarium non iustum auxilium
6 ferenti. Vive, Q. Fabi, felicior hoc consensu civitatis ad tuendum te quam qua paulo ante exsultabas victoria; vive, id facinus ausus cuius tibi ne parens quidem, si eodem loco fuisset quo fuit L. Papirius,
7 veniam dedisset. Mecum, ut voles, reverteris in gratiam; populo Romano, cui vitam debes, nihil maius praestiteris quam si hic tibi dies satis documenti dederit ut bello ac pace pati legitima imperia

XXXV. The tribunes were dumbfounded, more troubled now on their own account than on his, for whom their help was being solicited; but the Roman People relieved them of their burden of responsibility, when they turned as one man to the dictator, and entreated and adjured him to remit for their sake the punishment of the master of the horse. The tribunes, too, fell in with the prevailing mood, and earnestly besought Papirius to allow for human frailty, to allow for the youth of Quintus Fabius, who had suffered punishment enough. Now the young man himself, now his father Marcus Fabius, forgetting all contention, threw themselves down at the dictator's knees and attempted to avert his anger. Then said the dictator, when silence was obtained, "It is well, Quirites. The discipline of war, the majesty of government, have got the victory, despite the danger that this day would see the end of them. Quintus Fabius is not found guiltless, seeing that he fought against the orders of his general; but, convicted of that guilt, is granted as a boon to the Roman People, is granted to the authority of the tribunes, who plead for him but can bring him no legal relief. Live, Quintus Fabius, more blest in this consent of your fellow citizens to save you, than in the victory over which, a little while ago, you were exulting! Live, though you dared a deed which not even your sire would have pardoned, had he been in the place of Lucius Papirius! With me you shall again be on good terms when you will: for the Roman People, to whom you owe your life, you can do nothing greater than to show that you have learned what this day clearly teaches—to submit in war and in peace B.C. 325

A.U.C. 429

8 possis." Cum se nihil morari magistrum equitum pronuntiasset, degressum[1] eum templo laetus senatus, laetior populus, circumfusi ac gratulantes hinc
9 magistro equitum, hinc dictatori, prosecuti sunt, firmatumque imperium militare haud minus periculo Q. Fabi quam supplicio miserabili adulescentis Manli videbatur.

10 Forte ita eo anno evenit ut quotienscumque dictator ab exercitu recessisset,[2] hostes in Samnio moverentur. Ceterum in oculis exemplum erat Q. Fabius M. Valerio legato, qui castris praeerat, ne quam vim hostium magis quam trucem dictatoris
11 iram timeret. Itaque frumentatores cum circumventi ex insidiis caesi loco iniquo essent, creditum volgo est subveniri eis ab legato potuisse, ni tristia edicta
12 exhorruisset. Ea quoque ira alienavit a dictatore militum animos, iam ante infensos, quod implacabilis Q. Fabio fuisset et, quod suis precibus negasset, eius populo Romano veniam dedisset.

XXXVI. Postquam dictator praeposito in urbe L. Papirio Crasso, magistro equitum Q. Fabio vetito quicquam pro magistratu agere, in castra rediit,
2 neque civibus satis laetus adventus eius fuit nec hostibus quicquam attulit terroris. Namque postero die, seu ignari venisse dictatorem seu adesset an

[1] degressum Gronovius: digressum Ω.
[2] recessisset D^3A^3 (or A^2) Muretus: recessit Ω.

to lawful authority." Then, declaring that the master of the horse was free to depart, he descended from the platform, and the joyful senators and yet more joyful people thronged about them and attended them, congratulating now the master of the horse and now the dictator. It seemed that the peril of Fabius had been not less efficacious than the pitiful punishment of young Manlius in the establishment of military authority. B.C. 325

It so fell out that year, that as often as the dictator left the army, there was a rising of the enemy in Samnium. But with the example of Quintus Fabius before his eyes, Marcus Valerius, the lieutenant who commanded in the camp, could not fear any violence of the enemy more than the dread displeasure of the dictator. And so when a party of foragers had fallen into an ambush and fighting at a disadvantage had been slain, it was commonly believed that the lieutenant might have rescued them, had he not quailed at the thought of those harsh orders. Their resentment of this still further estranged the soldiers from the dictator, angry as they already were at his unwillingness to pardon Quintus Fabius, and his having granted to the Roman People a boon he had denied to their own entreaties.

XXXVI. When the dictator had set Lucius Papirius Crassus over the City and had forbidden Quintus Fabius, the master of the horse, to exercise his magistracy in any way, he returned to the camp, where his arrival occasioned no great satisfaction to the Romans nor the slightest apprehension to their enemies. For on the following day, whether unaware that the dictator was come or caring little

U.C. 429 abesset parvi facientes, instructa acie ad castra
3 accesserunt. Ceterum tantum momenti in uno viro
L. Papirio fuit ut, si ducis consilia favor subsecutus militum foret, debellari eo die cum Samnitibus 4 potuisse pro haud dubio habitum sit; ita instruxit aciem, ita loco[1] ac subsidiis, ita omni arte bellica firmavit; cessatum a milite ac de industria, ut obtrectaretur laudibus ducis, impedita victoria est. Plures Samnitium cecidere, plures Romani volnerati sunt.
5 Sensit peritus dux quae res victoriae obstaret:
temperandum ingenium suum esse et severitatem
6 miscendam comitati. Itaque adhibitis legatis ipse circuit[2] saucios milites, inserens in tentoria caput, singulosque ut sese haberent rogitans curam eorum nominatim legatis tribunisque et praefectis de-7 mandabat. Rem per se popularem ita dextere[3] egit ut medendis corporibus animi multo prius militum imperatori reconciliarentur, nec quicquam ad salubritatem efficacius fuerit quam quod grato 8 animo ea cura accepta est. Refecto exercitu cum hoste congressus, haud dubia spe sua militumque, ita fudit fugavitque Samnites, ut ille ultimus eis dies 9 conferendi signa cum dictatore fuerit. Incessit deinde qua duxit praedae spes victor exercitus per-

[1] ita loco Madvig: loco Ω.
[2] circuit Walters (cf. chap. xxxvii § 9): circū POHD: circum MFTLA: circumiens U.
[3] dextere Frag. Harerk. ς: dexter (or dexī) Ω: sedulo F^3 (over erasure).

whether he were there or not, the Samnites formed B.C. 325 in order of battle and approached the camp. So great however was the importance of one man, Lucius Papirius, that if the goodwill of the soldiers had seconded the measures taken by their general, it was held as certain that the war with Samnium might that day have been brought to a successful termination—so skilfully did he dispose his army, so well secure it with every advantage of position and reserves, and with every military art. But the men were listless, and, on purpose to discredit their commander, threw away the victory. There were more Samnites killed, more Romans wounded. The experienced general perceived what stood in the way of his success: he must qualify his native disposition, and mingle geniality with his sternness. So, calling together his lieutenants, he made the round of his wounded soldiers in person, and putting his head into their tents and asking each how he was doing, he commended them by name to the care of the lieutenants, the tribunes, and the prefects. This of itself was a popular thing to do, and Papirius managed it with such tact, that in healing their bodies he gained their affections much more rapidly; and indeed there was nothing that more promoted their recovery than the pleasurable feelings with which they accepted these attentions. When the army was restored, he met the enemy, with no doubt as to the result, either on his own part or on that of his soldiers, and so routed and dispersed the Samnites that this was the last time they joined battle with the dictator. The victorious army then marched on where the prospect of booty beckoned them, and traversed the territories of the

A.U.C. 429 lustravitque hostium agros, nulla arma, nullam vim
10 nec apertam nec ex insidiis expertus. Addebat alacritatem quod dictator praedam omnem edixerat militibus; nec ira magis publica quam privatum
11 compendium in hostem acuebat. His cladibus subacti Samnites pacem a dictatore petiere; cum quo pacti, ut singula vestimenta militibus et annuum stipen-
12 dium darent, cum ire ad senatum iussi essent, securos se dictatorem responderunt, unius eius fidei virtutique causam suam commendantes. Ita deductus ex Samnitibus exercitus.

A.U.C. 429-431 XXXVII. Dictator triumphans urbem est ingressus: et cum se dictatura abdicare vellet, iussu patrum, priusquam abdicaret, consules creavit C. Sulpicium Longum iterum Q. Aemilium Cerretanum.
2 Samnites infecta pace, quia de condicionibus ambigebatur,[1] indutias annuas ab urbe rettulerunt. Nec earum ipsarum sancta fides fuit; adeo, postquam Papirium abisse magistratu nuntiatum est, arrecti ad bellandum animi sunt.
3 C. Sulpicio Q. Aemilio—Aulium[2] quidam annales habent—consulibus ad defectionem Samnitium Apulum novum bellum accessit. Utroque exercitus missi. Sulpicio Samnites, Apuli Aemilio sorte
4 evenerunt. Sunt qui non ipsis Apulis bellum inlatum, sed socios eius gentis populos ab Samnitium
5 vi atque iniuriis defensos scribant: ceterum fortuna Samnitium, vix a se ipsis eo tempore propulsantium

[1] ambigebatur Drakenborch: agebatur Ω.
[2] Aulium Gelenius and Sigonius: aulum Ω.

enemy without encountering any armed resistance whatsoever, either face to face or from an ambush. The dictator had increased the alacrity of his troops by proclaiming that the booty should all be theirs, and private gain did as much as the public resentment to whet their zeal against the enemy. Discouraged by these reverses, the Samnites sought peace of Papirius, and agreed with him to give every soldier a garment and a year's pay. He directed them to go before the senate, but they replied that they would attend him thither, committing their cause wholly to his honour and integrity. So the army was withdrawn from Samnium. B.C. 325

XXXVII. The dictator, having entered the City in triumph, would have laid down his office, but was commanded by the senate first to hold a consular election; he announced that Gaius Sulpicius Longus had been chosen for the second time, together with Quintus Aemilius Cerretanus. The treaty was not completed, owing to a disagreement over terms, and the Samnites left the City with a truce for a year; nor did they scrupulously hold even to that; so encouraged were they to make war, on learning that Papirius had resigned. B.C. 324-323

In the consulship of Gaius Sulpicius and Quintus Aemilius—some annals have Aulius—the defection of the Samnites was followed by a new war with Apulia. Armies were sent out in both directions. The lots assigned the Samnites to Sulpicius, the Apulians to Aemilius. Some say that the war was not waged against the Apulians, but in defence of some of the allies of that people whom the Samnites had wantonly invaded; but the circumstances of the Samnites, who at that time could hardly ward off

U.C. 430–431

bellum, propius ut sit vero facit non Apulis ab Samnitibus arma inlata, sed cum utraque simul 6 gente bellum Romanis fuisse. Nec tamen res ulla memorabilis acta; ager Apulus Samniumque evastatum; hostes nec hic nec illic inventi.

Romae nocturnus terror ita ex somno trepidam repente civitatem excivit ut Capitolium atque arx 7 moeniaque et portae plena armatorum fuerint; et cum concursatum clamatumque ad arma omnibus locis esset, prima luce nec auctor nec causa terroris comparuit.

8 Eodem anno de Tusculanis Flavia rogatione populi fuit iudicium. M. Flavius[1] tribunus plebis tulit ad populum ut in Tusculanos animadverteretur, quod eorum[2] ope ac consilio Veliterni Privernatesque
9 populo Romano bellum fecissent. Populus Tusculanus cum coniugibus ac liberis Romam venit. Ea multitudo veste mutata et specie reorum tribus
10 circuit, genibus se omnium advolvens; plus itaque misericordia ad poenae veniam impetrandam quam
11 causa ad crimen purgandum valuit. Tribus omnes praeter Polliam antiquarunt legem. Polliae sententia fuit puberes verberatos necari, coniuges liberosque 12 sub corona lege belli venire. Memoriam eius irae Tusculanis in poenae tam atrocis auctores mansisse ad patrum aetatem constat, nec quemquam ferme ex Pollia tribu candidatum Papiriam ferre solitum.

[1] Flavius ζ: fabius Ω.
[2] quod eorum ζ: quō eorum O: quorum A: quorum eorum Ω: quoniam eorum $A^2\zeta$.

---

[1] The Tusculans, upon gaining Roman citizenship, were enrolled in the Papirian tribe, and were so numerous as to control its vote.

invasion from themselves, render it more probable that they did not attack the Apulians but that they and the Apulians were at war with Rome simultaneously. There was, however, no memorable engagement. The Romans laid waste Apulia and Samnium, without encountering the enemy in either country. B.C. 321-323

At Rome a nocturnal alarm awoke the sleeping citizens with such a fright that Capitol and Citadel, walls and gates, were crowded with armed men; and after all the hurrying to posts and crying "to arms!" in every quarter, day broke and discovered neither author nor occasion of the panic.

In the same year, the Tusculans were tried before the people in accordance with the Flavian rogation. Marcus Flavius, a plebeian tribune, had proposed to the people that the Tusculans be punished for having lent their countenance and aid to the Veliterni and Privernates in their war with the Roman People. The citizens of Tusculum, with their wives and children, came to Rome; and the great throng, putting on the sordid raiment of defendants, went about amongst the tribes and clasped the knees of the citizens in supplication. And so it happened that pity was more effective in gaining them remission of their punishment than were their arguments in clearing away the charges. All the tribes rejected the proposal, save only the Pollian, which voted that the grown men should be scourged and put to death, and their wives and children sold at auction under the laws of war. It seems that the resentment engendered in the Tusculans by so cruel a proposal lasted down to our fathers' time, and that a candidate of the Pollian tribe almost never got the vote of the Papirian.[1]

A.U.C. 432

XXXVIII. Insequenti anno, Q. Fabio L. Fulvio consulibus, A. Cornelius Arvina dictator et M. Fabius Ambustus magister equitum metu gravioris in Samnio belli—conducta enim pretio a finitimis iuventus dicebatur—intentiore dilectu habito egregium exer-
2 citum adversus Samnites duxerunt. Castra in hostico incuriose ita posita tamquam procul abesset hostis, cum subito advenere Samnitium legiones tanta ferocia ut vallum usque ad stationem Romanam inferrent.
3 Nox iam appetebat; id prohibuit munimenta adoriri; nec dissimulabant orta luce postero die facturos.
4 Dictator ubi propiorem spe dimicationem vidit, ne militum virtuti damno locus esset, ignibus crebris relictis, qui conspectum hostium frustrarentur, silentio legiones educit; nec tamen fallere propter propin-
5 quitatem castrorum potuit. Eques extemplo insecutus ita institit agmini ut, donec lucesceret, proelio abstineret; ne[1] pedestres quidem copiae
6 ante lucem castris egressae. Eques luce demum ausus incursare in hostem, carpendo novissimos premendoque iniquis ad transitum locis, agmen detinuit. Interim pedes equitem adsecutus, et totis iam copiis
7 Samnis urgebat. Tum dictator, postquam sine

[1] ne Ω: nec U_5.

XXXVIII. In the following year, when Quintus Fabius and Lucius Fulvius were consuls, the dread of a serious war with the Samnites—who were said to have gathered an army of mercenaries from neighbouring tribes—occasioned the appointment of Aulus Cornelius Arvina as dictator and Marcus Fabius Ambustus as master of the horse. By a vigorous levy these men raised an excellent army, and marching against the Samnites, went into camp on hostile soil with as little regard to their position as if the enemy had been far away. Suddenly the Samnite legions appeared, and advancing with great hardihood entrenched themselves close to the Roman outposts. Night was now drawing on, which prevented them from assaulting the Roman works; but they made no secret of their intention to do so with the morrow's earliest light. The dictator saw that the battle was coming sooner than he had anticipated, and feared that the courage of his men would be affected by their cramped position. So, leaving behind him numerous fires to deceive the enemy, he silently led the legions out. But the camps were so near each other that he could not elude their observation. Their cavalry at once pursued him, but though they hung upon the fringe of his column, they refrained from attacking until the day began to break; as for the infantry, they did not even leave their stockade before the dawn. Finally, when it was light, the cavalry ventured to charge the Romans, and by harassing their rear and pressing them when they came to places that were difficult to cross, delayed their march. Meanwhile the foot had caught up with the horse, and the Samnites were throwing all their forces into the assault. Then the B.C. 322

A.U.C. 432

magno incommodo progredi non poterat, cum ipsum in quo constiterat locum castris dimetari iussit. Id[1] vero circumfuso undique equitatu—ut vallum peteretur opusque inciperet—fieri non poterat.

8 Itaque ubi neque eundi neque manendi copiam esse videt, instruit aciem, impedimentis ex agmine remotis. Instruunt contra et hostes, et animis et 9 viribus pares. Auxerat id maxime animos quod ignari loco iniquo, non hosti cessum, velut fugientes 10 ac territos terribiles ipsi secuti fuerant. Id aliquamdiu aequavit pugnam, iam pridem desueto Samnite clamorem Romani exercitus pati; et hercule[2] illo die ab hora diei tertia ad octavam ita anceps dicitur certamen stetisse, ut neque clamor, ut primo semel concursu est sublatus, iteratus sit, neque signa promota loco retrove recepta, neque 11 recursum ab ulla sit parte. In suo quisque gradu obnixi,[3] urgentes scutis, sine respiratione ac respectu pugnabant; fremitus aequalis tenorque idem pugnae in defatigationem ultimam aut noctem spectabat. 12 Iam viris vires, iam ferro sua vis, iam consilia ducibus deerant, cum subito Samnitium equites, cum turma una longius provecta accepissent impedimenta dictator, finding that he could make no headway without great distress, gave orders to lay out a camp on the very spot where he had halted. But enveloped, as they were, by the enemy's horse, it was impossible to gather stakes and begin the work. B.C. 322

[1] id Ω: ibi Weissenborn.

[2] Et hercule (-lae T) Ω Aldus: at hercule O Gelenius.

[3] obnixi A^2: obnixis U: obnoxi T^2(or T^1); obnoxio O: obnoxii MPHDLA: ab obnoxii F: obnoxiis F^3T.

And so, when he saw that he could neither advance nor encamp, he removed the baggage from his column and formed a line of battle. The enemy then formed up against him, being inferior neither in spirit nor in strength. Their encouragement was due chiefly to ignorance that their enemies had retreated from an awkward position, and not from them; for they assumed that their own doughty appearance had driven the Romans before them in a panic. This held the fighting in balance for a while, though the Samnites had now for some time been unused to abide the battle-cry of a Roman army. Indeed it is said that on that day from the third hour to the eighth the outcome was so much in doubt, that there was never a second cheer after that which was once given when the armies rushed together; nor were standards either moved forward or withdrawn; nor did the combatants anywhere give ground. Facing each other with every man squarely in his place, they pressed forward with their shields and fought without stopping to breathe or to look behind. The monotonous din and changeless tenor of the battle made it seem probable that sheer exhaustion or the night would put an end to it. And now men's strength was ebbing, and the sword was forgetting its keenness and the generals their strategy:—when the Samnite horsemen, learning from one of their squadrons that had pushed on ahead how the Romanorum procul ab armatis sine praesidio, sine munimento stare, aviditate praedae impetum faciunt.

13 Quod ubi dictatori trepidus nuntius attulit, "Sine modo" inquit, "sese praeda praepediant." Alii deinde super alios diripi passim ferrique fortunas
14 militum vociferabantur. Tum magistro equitum accito "Vides tu" inquit, "M. Fabi, ab hostium equite omissam pugnam? Haerent impediti impedi-
15 mentis nostris. Adgredere, quod inter praedandum omni multitudini evenit, dissipatos; raros equis insidentes, raros, quibus ferrum in manu sit, invenies; sese equosque[1] dum praeda onerant, caede inermes
16 cruentamque illis praedam redde. Mihi legiones peditumque pugna curae erunt; penes te equestre sit decus."

XXXIX. Equitum acies, qualis quae esse instructissima potest, invecta in dissipatos impeditosque
2 hostes caede omnia replet. Inter sarcinas omissas repente, obiacentes pedibus fugientium consternatorumque equorum, neque pugnae neque fugae satis
3 potentes caeduntur. Tum deleto prope equitatu hostium M. Fabius circumductis paulum alis[2] ab
4 tergo pedestrem aciem adoritur. Clamor inde novus accidens et Samnitium terruit animos, et dictator, ubi respectantes hostium antesignanos turbataque

[1] sese equosque Luterbacher (se equosque Madvig): equosque (or aequosq.) PFUHT²D: et quosque *MTLA*ς.
[2] alis T^3: aliis (omitted by T^1) Ω.

baggage of the Romans lay remote from their fighting men, without defenders or a rampart to protect it, were seized with the lust of pillaging, and made a sudden dash for it. But when a frightened messenger brought word of this to the dictator, he said, "Only let them cumber themselves with spoil!" After that came others and still others, crying aloud that the soldiers' possessions were being plundered and carried clean away. Then Cornelius called the master of the horse and said, "Do you not see, Marcus Fabius, how the enemy's cavalry have ceased to fight? They are caught fast and entangled in our baggage. Have at them while they are dispersed, as any body of men will be in pillaging! You shall find few in the saddle, few sword in hand; while they are loading themselves and their horses with spoils, cut them down unarmed and make it a bloody booty for them. I will see to the legions and the battle of the infantry; be yours the glory of the cavalry fight." B.C. 322

XXXIX. The cavalry, drawn up in the most perfect order, charged their scattered and embarrassed enemies and cut them down on every hand. They had hastily flung aside their packs—which lay all about and impeded the terrified horses as they tried to run away—and, powerless either to resist or to escape, were massacred where they stood. Then Marcus Fabius, having almost annihilated the enemy's cavalry, fetched a short compass with his squadrons and attacked from behind their line of infantry. The shouts that were now heard in that quarter struck terror into the hearts of the Samnites; and the dictator, seeing the men in their fighting line glance nervously behind them, and their standards

A.U.C. 432

signa et fluctuantem aciem vidit, tum appellare, tum adhortari milites, tribunos principesque ordinum nominatim ad iterandam secum pugnam vocare. 5 Novato clamore signa inferuntur: et quidquid progrediebantur, magis magisque turbatos, hostes cernebant. Eques ipse iam primis erat in conspectu, et 6 Cornelius respiciens ad manipulos militum, quod manu, quod voce poterat, monstrabat vexilla se 7 suorum parmasque cernere equitum. Quod ubi auditum simul visumque est, adeo repente laboris per diem paene totum tolerati volnerumque obliti sunt, ut haud secus quam si tum integri e castris signum pugnae accepissent concitaverint se in hostem. 8 Nec ultra Samnis tolerare terrorem equitum peditumque vim potuit: partim in medio caesi, partim 9 in fugam dissipati sunt. Pedes[1] restantes ac circumventos cecidit: ab equite fugientium strages est facta, inter quos et ipse imperator cecidit.

10 Hoc demum proelium Samnitium res ita infregit, ut omnibus conciliis fremerent minime id quidem mirum esse, si impio bello et contra foedus suscepto, infestioribus merito deis quam hominibus nihil prospere agerent; expiandum id bellum magna 11 mercede luendumque esse; id referre tantum, utrum supplicia noxio paucorum an omnium innoxio prae-

[1] pedes Gelenius ("scriptura vetus") ζ: pedes res M: pedestres (pedestris U) Ω.

[1] That of 341 B.C. See chap. ii § 4, and (for the violation) chap. xxii. § 7 and chap. xxiii. § 1.

become disordered, and their line begin to waver, B.C. 322 then cried out to his men, then urged them on, and called by name on tribunes and company-commanders to join him in a new attack. With a fresh cheer the ranks pressed forward, and at each advance perceived the Samnites to be more and more confused. The horse themselves could now be seen by those in the van; and Cornelius, looking back on the maniples of soldiers, made them understand as best he could with hand and voice that he saw the banners and round shields of their comrades. On hearing and at the same time seeing them, they straightway forgot the toil they had endured for well-nigh the entire day, and forgot their wounds, and, like troops who were but that moment fresh from camp and had received the battle-signal, they flung themselves upon the enemy. The Samnites could support no longer the fury of the cavalry and the violent onset of the foot; some were slaughtered in the midst, others were scattered abroad in flight. The foot-soldiers surrounded those who resisted and put them to the sword; the cavalry made havoc of the fugitives, amongst whom perished their general himself.

This defeat, after all that had gone before, so broke the spirit of the Samnites, that in all their councils they began to murmur that it was no wonder if they met with no success in an impious war, undertaken in violation of a treaty,[1] for the gods had even more right than men to be incensed with them. They would have to pay a heavy price to expiate this war and atone for it; the only question was, should they offer atonement with the blood of the guilty few or with that of the innocent

A.U.C. 432 beant sanguine; audebantque iam quidam nominare 12 auctores armorum. Unum maxime nomen per consensum clamantium Brutuli Papi exaudiebatur. Vir nobilis potensque erat, haud dubie proximarum in-13 dutiarum ruptor. De eo coacti referre, praetores decretum fecerunt, ut Brutulus Papius Romanis dederetur et cum eo praeda omnis Romana captivique ut Romam mitterentur, quaeque res per fetiales ex foedere repetitae essent secundum ius fasque
14 restituerentur. Fetiales Romam, ut censuerunt, missi, et corpus Brutuli exanime; ipse morte volun-
15 taria ignominiae se ac supplicio subtraxit. Placuit cum corpore bona quoque eius dedi. Nihil tamen earum rerum praeter captivos ac si qua cognita ex praeda sunt acceptum est; ceterarum rerum inrita fuit deditio. Dictator ex senatus consulto triumphavit.

XL. Hoc bellum a consulibus bellatum quidam auctores sunt, eosque de Samnitibus triumphasse; Fabium etiam in Apuliam processisse atque inde
2 magnas praedas egisse. Nec discrepat quin dictator eo anno A. Cornelius fuerit; id ambigitur, belline gerendi causa creatus sit, an ut esset qui ludis Romanis, quia L. Plautius praetor gravi morbo forte
3 implicitus erat, signum mittendis quadrigis daret

---

[1] i.e. the Romans would not accept the tardy compliance of the Samnites with the old terms, being resolved to impose harder ones.

[2] Instituted by Tarquinius Priscus (I. xxxv. 9).

multitude? Some ventured at this juncture to name B.C. 322
those who had been responsible for the war. One name in particular could be distinguished; for all agreed in denouncing Papius Brutulus, a powerful noble who had without question been the breaker of the latest truce. The praetors were compelled to refer his case to the council, which decreed that Papius Brutulus should be surrendered to the Romans, and that all the Roman booty and all the prisoners should be sent with him to Rome; and further, that all the property which the fetials had sought to recover under the provisions of the treaty should be restored in compliance with law and with religion. The fetials proceeded to Rome, in accordance with this resolution, taking with them the lifeless body of Brutulus, who had escaped the humiliation and punishment by a voluntary death. It was voted to surrender his goods also with his body. But of all these things the Romans would accept none but the prisoners and such articles of booty as they recognized as theirs; the surrender of all the rest was of no effect.[1] The dictator triumphed by resolution of the senate.

XL. Some writers hold that this war was waged by the consuls, and that it was they who triumphed over the Samnites; they say that Fabius even advanced into Apulia and thence drove off much booty. But that Aulus Cornelius was dictator in that year is not disputed, and the doubt is only whether he was appointed to administer the war, or in order that there might be somebody to give the signal to the chariots at the Roman Games[2]—since the praetor, Lucius Plautius, happened to be very sick—and whether, having discharged this office,

A.U.C. 432 functusque eo haud sane memorandi imperii ministerio se dictatura abdicaret. Nec facile est aut
4 rem rei aut auctorem auctori praeferre. Vitiatam memoriam funebribus laudibus reor falsisque imaginum titulis, dum familiae[1] ad se quaeque famam rerum gestarum honorumque fallenti mendacio tra-
5 hunt; inde certe et singulorum gesta et publica monumenta rerum confusa. Nec quisquam aequalis temporibus illis scriptor exstat, quo satis certo auctore stetur.

[1] familiae ~ Madvig: familia Ω.

which is, to be sure, no very noteworthy exercise of power, he resigned the dictatorship. It is not easy to choose between the accounts or the authorities. The records have been vitiated, I think, by funeral eulogies and by lying inscriptions under portraits, every family endeavouring mendaciously to appropriate victories and magistracies to itself—a practice which has certainly wrought confusion in the achievements of individuals and in the public memorials of events. Nor is there extant any writer contemporary with that period, on whose authority we may safely take our stand. B.C. 322

LIBRI VIII PERIOCHA

Latini cum Campanis defecere et missis legatis ad senatum condicionem tulerunt ut si pacem habere vellent alterum ex Latinis consulem facerent. Qua legatione perlata praetor eorum Annius de Capitolio ita lapsus est ut exanimaretur. T. Manlius consul filium, quod contra edictum eius adversus Latinos pugnaverat, quamvis prospere pugnasset, securi percussit. Laborantibus in acie Romanis P. Decius, tunc consul cum Manlio, devovit se pro exercitu, et concitato equo cum in medios hostes se intulisset, interfectus morte sua Romanis victoriam restituit. Latini in deditionem venerunt. T. Manlio in urbem reverso nemo ex iuventute obviam processit. Minucia virgo Vestalis incesti damnata est. Ausonibus victis et oppido ex is capto Cales[1] item[2] Fregellae coloniae deductae sunt. Veneficium complurium matronarum deprehensum est, ex quibus plurimae statim epotis medicaminibus perierunt. Lex de veneficio tunc primum constituta est. Privernatibus, cum bellassent, victis civitas data est. Neapolitani bello et obsidione victi in deditionem venerunt. Q. Publilio, qui eos obsederat, primo et imperium prolatum est et pro cos. triumphus decretus. Plebs nexu liberata est propter L. Papiri creditoris libidinem, qui C. Publilio debitori suo stuprum inferre voluerat. Cum L. Papirius Cursor dictator reversus in urbem ab exercitu esset propter auspicia repetenda, Q. Fabius magister equitum, occasione bene gerendae rei invitatus, contra edictum eius prospere adversus Samnites pugnavit. Ob eam causam cum dictator de magistro equitum supplicium sumpturus videretur, Fabius Romam profugit, et cum parum causa proficeret, populi precibus donatus est. Res praeterea contra Samnites prospere gestas continet.

[1] et oppido ex is capto Cales Rossbach: in oppido exis cales capto cales (or in oppido ex his capto cales MSS.

[2] item Gronovius: item colonia deducta est MSS.

SUMMARY OF BOOK VIII.

The Latins and Campanians revolted, and sending envoys to the senate proposed as a condition of peace that one of the two consuls should be chosen from the Latins. After delivering these terms, their praetor Annius fell from the Capitol, and so lost consciousness. Titus Manlius the consul had his son beheaded, because he had fought—albeit successfully—against the Latins in defiance of his edict. In a battle which was going against the Romans, Publius Decius, who was then consul, along with Manlius, devoted himself in behalf of the army, and having spurred his horse among the enemy, was slain, and by his death restored the victory to the Romans. The Latins surrendered. Titus Manlius, returning to the City, was met by none of the young men. Minucia, a Vestal virgin, was convicted of unchastity. The Ausonians were defeated; and their town being taken from them, the colonies of Cales and Fregellae were established. A number of matrons were discovered to be guilty of poisoning, of whom very many drank off at once the drugs they had prepared, and died. A law about poisoning was then for the first time enacted. The Privernates, having gone to war, were defeated and given citizenship. The Neapolitans were beaten in war and in a siege, and made submission. Quintus Publilius, who had besieged them, was the first to have his authority extended and to be granted a triumph as proconsul. The plebs were relieved of imprisonment for debt on account of the lust of Lucius Papirius, a creditor, who had sought to violate the chastity of his debtor, Gaius Publilius. When Lucius Papirius Cursor the dictator had returned from the army to the City in order to renew the auspices, Quintus Fabius, the master of the horse, tempted by the opportunity for a successful action, fought the Samnites, against orders, and gained a victory. For this reason it appeared that the dictator would punish the master of the horse; but Fabius fled to Rome, and though his cause was weak, was begged off by the people. The book also contains victories over the Samnites.

BOOK IX

LIBER IX

A.U.C. 433

I. Sequitur hunc annum nobilis clade Romana Caudina pax T. Veturio Calvino Sp. Postumio consulibus. Samnites eo anno imperatorem C. Pontium Herenni filium habuerunt, patre longe prudentissimo natum, primum ipsum bellatorem ducemque. Is, ubi legati qui ad dedendas res missi erant pace infecta redierunt, "Ne nihil actum" inquit "hac legatione censeatis, expiatum est quidquid ex foedere rupto irarum in nos caelestium fuit. Satis scio quibuscumque dis cordi fuit subigi nos ad necessitatem dedendi res quae ab nobis ex foedere repetitae fuerant, iis non fuisse cordi tam superbe ab Romanis foederis expiationem spretam. Quid enim ultra fieri ad placandos deos mitigandosque homines potuit quam quod nos fecimus? Res hostium in praeda captas, quae belli iure nostrae videbantur, remisimus; auctores belli, quia vivos non potuimus, perfunctos iam fato dedidimus; bona eorum, ne quid ex contagione noxae remaneret penes nos, Romam portavimus. Quid ultra tibi, Romane, quid foederi, quid dis arbitris foederis debeo? Quem tibi tuarum

---

[1] For the second time, having held the office together thirteen years before.

[2] The reference is to events described at VIII. xxxvii. 3.

BOOK IX

I. In the following year came the Caudine Peace, B.C. 321 the notorious sequel of a disaster to the Roman arms. Titus Veturius Calvinus and Spurius Postumius were consuls.[1] The Samnites had that year for their general Gaius Pontius, whose father Herennius far excelled them all in wisdom, while the son was their foremost warrior and captain. When the envoys who had been dispatched to make restitution returned without having achieved a peace, Pontius said: "You must not think that this embassy has been of no avail: whatever divine resentment we incurred by breaking the treaty [2] has been appeased. Well do I know that whatever gods desired that we might be compelled to restore the spoils which had been demanded again of us in accordance with the treaty did not desire that our expiation of the treaty should be so scornfully rejected by the Romans. For what more could have been done to mollify the gods and to placate men than we have done? The goods of the enemy which we had taken as booty, and regarded as our own by the laws of war, we restored to them; the authors of the war, whom we could not surrender living, we surrendered dead; their possessions—that no guilt might remain with us from touching them—we carried to Rome. What more do I owe to you, Romans, or to the treaty, or to the gods, its witnesses? Whom can I proffer as umpire betwixt irarum, quem meorum suppliciorum iudicem feram? Neminem neque populum neque privatum fugio. 8 Quod si nihil cum potentiore iuris humani relinquitur inopi, at ego ad deos vindices intolerandae superbiae 9 confugiam et precabor ut iras suas vertant in eos quibus non suae redditae res, non alienae accumulatae satis sint; quorum saevitiam non mors noxiorum, non deditio exanimatorum corporum, non bona sequentia domini deditionem exsatient,[1] nisi hauriendum sanguinem laniandaque viscera nostra prae- 10 buerimus. Iustum est bellum, Samnites, quibus necessarium, et pia arma quibus nulla nisi in armis 11 relinquitur spes. Proinde, cum rerum humanarum maximum momentum sit, quam propitiis rem, quam adversis agant dis, pro certo habete priora bella adversus deos magis quam homines gessisse, hoc quod instat ducibus ipsis dis gesturos."

A.U.C. 433

II. Haec non laeta magis quam vera vaticinatus exercitu educto circa Caudium castra quam potest 2 occultissime locat. Inde ad Calatiam, ubi iam consules Romanos castraque esse audiebat, milites decem pastorum habitu mittit pecoraque diversos, alium alibi, haud procul Romanis pascere iubet praesidiis; 3 ubi inciderint in praedatores, ut idem omnibus sermo constet, legiones Samnitium in Apulia esse, Luceriam omnibus copiis circumsedere nec procul abesse quin

[1] exsatient Walters: exsatient placari nequeant (-unt F^3) Ω: exsatient placari qui nequeant Drakenborch: exsatient; qui placari nequeant Gronovius.

your anger and my punishment? I refuse no nation, B.C. 321 no private citizen. But if, in dealing with the mighty, the weak are left no human rights, yet will I seek protection of the gods, who visit retribution on intolerable pride, and will beseech them that they turn their anger against those who are not content with the restitution of their own possessions, nor the heaping up in addition of other men's; whose rage is not sated with the death of the guilty, nor with the surrender of their lifeless bodies, nor with the master's goods going with that surrender—unless we yield them our blood to drink and our flesh to rend. Samnites, that war is just which is necessary, and righteous are their arms to whom, save only in arms, no hope is left. Since, therefore, it is of the utmost moment in the affairs of men whether what they undertake be pleasing in the sight of Heaven or whether it be offensive, be well assured that you waged your former war rather against gods than men, but that you will wage this war now threatening with the gods themselves for your leaders."

II. Having pronounced these words, as prophetic as they were encouraging, he led his army out and encamped with all possible secrecy in the vicinity of Caudium. Thence he dispatched in the direction of Calatia, where he heard that the Roman consuls were already in camp, ten soldiers in the guise of shepherds, with orders to graze their flocks—dispersed one here another there—at no great distance from the Romans. On encountering pillagers, they were all to tell one story; namely, that the Samnite levies were in Apulia, where they were laying siege with all their forces to Luceria, and were on the

A.U.C. 433

4 vi capiant. Iam is rumor et ante[1] de industria volgatus venerat ad Romanos, sed fidem auxere captivi eo maxime quod sermo inter omnes con-
5 gruebat. Haud erat dubium quin Lucerinis opem Romanus ferret, bonis ac fidelibus sociis, simul ne Apulia omnis ad praesentem terrorem deficeret: ea modo qua irent consultatio fuit.

6 Duae ad Luceriam ferebant viae, altera praeter oram superi maris, patens apertaque sed quanto tutior tanto fere longior, altera per furculas Caudinas,
7 brevior; sed ita natus locus est: saltus duo alti angusti silvosique sunt montibus circa perpetuis inter se iuncti; iacet inter eos satis patens clausus in medio campus herbidus aquosusque, per quem
8 medium iter est; sed antequam venias ad eum, intrandae primae angustiae sunt, et aut eadem qua te insinuaveris retro via repetenda aut, si ire porro pergas, per alium saltum artiorem impeditioremque, evadendum.

9 In eum campum via alia per cavam rupem Romani demisso[2] agmine cum ad[3] alias angustias protinus pergerent, saeptas deiectu arborum saxorumque ingentium obiacente mole[4] invenere. Cum fraus hostilis apparuisset, praesidium etiam in summo
10 saltu conspicitur. Citati inde retro, qua venerant pergunt repetere viam; eam quoque clausam sua

[1] iam is rumor et ante H. J. Mueller: iam is n (or 7 i.e. et) rumor ante P: iam et is rumor ante P^1F^1U: iam is ∝ rumor ante M.

[2] demisso ζ: remisso Ω.

[3] cum ad $T^1\zeta$: quō ad U: qm̄ ad PFT^2 (marg.): quad M: ad TDLA: quo ad A^x.

[4] obiacente mole ζ Sigonius: obiacente molem D: obiacentem molem Ω.

point of taking it by assault. This rumour, which B.C. 321 had designedly been given out before, had already come to the ears of the Romans, but the prisoners strengthened their belief in it, especially since they all gave the same account. The Romans did not hesitate about helping the Lucerini, their good and faithful allies, and preventing Apulia at the same time from a general defection in the face of instant peril: the only subject of deliberation was by what route they should march.

There were two roads to Luceria. One skirted the Adriatic, and though open and unobstructed, was long almost in proportion to its safety. The other led through the Caudine Forks,[1] and was shorter, but this is the nature of the place: two deep defiles, narrow and wooded, are connected by an unbroken range of mountains on either hand; shut in between them lies a rather extensive plain, grassy and well-watered, with the road running through the middle of it; but before you come to it, you must enter the first defile, and afterwards either retrace the steps by which you made your way into the place, or else —should you go forward—pass out by another ravine, which is even narrower and more difficult.

Into this plain the Romans debouched from the rocky gorge of one of the two passes; and advancing forthwith to the other pass, found it blocked with a barrier of felled trees and huge boulders. The enemy's stratagem now stood revealed, and indeed a body of troops was descried at the head of the defile. The Romans thereupon hastened back to regain the road by which they had come, but found that this was likewise closed with its own

[1] See map at the end of the volume.

A.U.C. 433

obice armisque inveniunt. Sistunt inde gradum sine ullius imperio, stuporque omnium animos ac
11 velut torpor quidam insolitus membra tenet, intuentesque alii alios, cum alterum quisque compotem magis mentis ac consilii ducerent, diu immobiles
12 silent; deinde, ubi praetoria consulum erigi videre et expedire quosdam utilia operi, quamquam ludibrio
13 fore munientes perditis rebus ac spe omni adempta cernebant, tamen, ne culpam malis adderent, pro se quisque nec hortante ullo nec imperante ad muniendum versi castra propter aquam vallo circum-
14 dant, sua ipsi opera laboremque inritum, praeterquam quod hostes superbe increpabant, cum miserabili
15 confessione eludentes. Ad consules maestos, ne advocantes quidem in consilium, quando nec consilio nec auxilio locus esset, sua sponte legati ac tribuni conveniunt, militesque ad praetorium versi opem, quam vix di immortales ferre poterant, ab ducibus exposcunt.

III. Querentes magis quam consultantes nox oppressit, cum pro ingenio quisque fremerent: "Per obices viarum," alius,[1] "per adversa montium, per
2 silvas, qua ferri arma poterunt, eamus, modo ad hostem pervenire liceat, quem per annos iam prope triginta vincimus; omnia aequa et plana erunt

[1] "per obices viarum." alius Walters: alius (alium M) per obices uiarum alius Ω: alius "per obices viarum — Sigon. Muretus.

[1] The speaker disregards the interval of peace (341–328).

barricade and armed men. At this they came to a halt, without any command, and a stupor came over the minds of all, and a strange kind of numbness over their bodies; and looking at one another—for every man supposed his neighbour more capable of thinking and planning than himself—they stood for a long time motionless and silent. Afterwards, when they saw the tents of the consuls going up and some of the men getting out entrenching tools, although they perceived that in their desperate plight, deprived of every hope, it would be ridiculous for them to entrench themselves, nevertheless, that they might not add a fault to their misfortunes, they fell to digging—each for himself with no encouragement or command from anyone—and fortified a camp close to the water; meanwhile not only did their enemies insolently scoff at them, but they jested themselves, with pathetic candour, at the futility of their works and the pains they took. The dejected consuls did not even call a council, for the situation admitted neither of discussion nor of help, but the lieutenants and tribunes assembled of their own accord, and the soldiers, turning to the headquarters tent, called on their generals for help, which the immortal gods could scarce have given them. B.C. 321

III. Night came, and found them not so much consulting as lamenting, while each murmured as his nature prompted him. "Let us force the barriers of the road," said one, "let us scale the mountains, penetrate the forests, go wherever we can carry arms, if only we may come at the enemy, whom we have now been conquering for close upon thirty years[1]; any field will be smooth and level to a

A.U.C. 433

Romano in perfidum Samnitem pugnanti"; alius:
3 "Quo aut qua eamus? Num montes moliri sede sua paramus? Dum haec imminebunt iuga, qua tu ad hostem venias?[1] Armati inermes, fortes ignavi, pariter omnes capti atque victi sumus; ne ferrum quidem ad bene moriendum oblaturus est hostis;
4 sedens bellum conficiet." His in vicem sermonibus qua cibi qua quietis immemor nox traducta est.

Ne Samnitibus quidem consilium in tam laetis suppetebat rebus; itaque universi Herennium Pontium, patrem imperatoris, per litteras consu-5 lendum censent. Iam is gravis annis non militaribus solum sed civilibus quoque abscesserat muneribus;
in corpore tamen adfecto vigebat vis animi con-6 siliique. Is ubi accepit ad furculas Caudinas inter duos saltus clausos esse exercitus Romanos, consultus ab nuntio filii censuit omnes inde quam primum 7 inviolatos dimittendos. Quae ubi spreta sententia est iterumque eodem remeante nuntio consulebatur, 8 censuit ad unum omnes interficiendos. Quae ubi tam discordia inter se velut ex ancipiti oracculo responsa data sunt, quamquam filius ipse in primis iam animum quoque patris consenuisse in adfecto corpore rebatur, tamen consensu omnium victus est
9 ut ipsum in consilium acciret. Nec gravatus senex

[1] venias A (Madvig) : uenies Ω.

Roman who fights against a treacherous Samnite!" B.C. 321
Another would ask: "Where or by what way can we go? Do we think to remove the mountains from their seat? So long as these ridges tower over you, how shall you come at the enemy? Armed and unarmed, the brave and the cowardly, we are all alike captured and beaten men. The foe will not even draw his sword on us, that we may die with honour; he will end the war by sitting still." With such-like exchange of talk the night wore on, neither was there any thought of food or sleep.

Even the Samnites were at a loss what course to follow in such happy circumstances; and accordingly they agreed unanimously to dispatch a letter to Herennius Pontius, the father of their general, asking his advice. This man, bowed down with years, had already withdrawn not only from military but even from civic duties; yet, despite his bodily infirmity, his mind and judgment retained their vigour. When he learned that the Roman armies had been hemmed in between two defiles at the Caudine Forks, and was asked by his son's messenger for his opinion, he advised that they should all be dismissed unscathed, at the earliest possible moment. This policy having been rejected, and the messenger returning a second time to seek his counsel, he recommended that all, to the last man, be slain. Having received these answers, as inconsistent as the riddling responses of an oracle, the younger Pontius was among the first to conclude that his father's mind had now given way along with his failing body, but yielded to the general desire and sent for him to advise with them in person. The old man made no objection: he was plaustro in castra dicitur advectus vocatusque in consilium ita ferme locutus esse ut nihil sententiae

A.U.C. 433

10 suae mutaret, causas tantum adiceret: priore se consilio, quod optimum duceret, cum potentissimo populo per ingens beneficium perpetuam firmare pacem amicitiamque; altero consilio in multas aetates, quibus amissis duobus exercitibus haud facile recepturа vires Romana res esset, bellum differre; tertium
11 nullum consilium esse. Cum filius aliique principes percontando[1] exsequerentur, quid si media via consilii caperetur, ut et dimitterentur incolumes et 12 leges iis iure belli victis imponerentur, "Ista quidem sententia" inquit "ea est, quae neque amicos parat nec inimicos tollit. Servate modo quos ignominia inritaveritis: ea est Romana gens quae victa quiescere 13 nesciat. Vivet semper in pectoribus illorum quidquid istuc praesens necessitas inusserit, nec eos ante multiplices poenas expetitas a vobis quiescere sinet." Neutra sententia accepta Herennius domum e castris est avectus.

IV. Et in castris Romanis cum frustra multi conatus ad erumpendum capti essent et iam omnium
2 rerum inopia esset, victi necessitate legatos mittunt qui primum pacem aequam peterent; si pacem non 3 impetrarent, uti provocarent ad pugnam. Tum Pontius debellatum esse respondit; et, quoniam ne

[1] percontando A: percunctando Ω.

brought to the camp in a waggon—so the story B.C. 321 runs—and being invited to join the council of war, spoke to such purpose as merely, without changing his opinion, to add thereto his reasons: If, he said, they adopted his first proposal—which he held to be the best—they would establish lasting peace and friendship with a very powerful people by conferring an enormous benefit upon them; by adopting the other plan they would postpone the war for many generations, in which time the Roman State, having lost two armies, would not easily regain its strength; there was no third plan. When his son and the other leading men pressed him to say what would happen if they took a middle course, and while letting them go unhurt imposed terms upon them by the rights of war, as upon the vanquished, "That," he answered, "is in sooth a policy that neither wins men friends nor rids them of their enemies. Spare, if you will, those whom you have stung to anger with humiliation; the Roman race is one that knows not how to be still under defeat. Whatever shame you brand them with in their present necessity, the wound will ever rankle in their bosoms, nor will it suffer them to rest until they have exacted many times as heavy a penalty of you." Neither proposal was accepted, and Herennius was carried home from the camp.

IV. In the other camp the Romans, finding themselves now, after many fruitless efforts to break out, in want of everything, were reduced to the necessity of sending envoys; who were first to treat for an equal peace, and, if peace could not be had, to provoke the enemy to fight. To them Pontius made answer, that the war was victi quidem ac capti fortunam fateri scirent, inermes cum singulis vestimentis sub iugum missurum; alias 4 condiciones pacis aequas victis ac victoribus fore: si agro Samnitium decederetur, coloniae abducerentur, suis inde legibus Romanum ac Samnitem aequo 5 foedere victurum; his condicionibus paratum se esse foedus cum consulibus ferire; si quid eorum dis- 6 pliceat, legatos redire ad se vetuit. Haec cum legatio renuntiaretur, tantus gemitus omnium subito exortus est tantaque maestitia incessit ut non gravius accepturi viderentur si nuntiaretur omnibus eo loco mortem oppetendam [1] esse.

A.U.C. 433

7 Cum diu silentium fuisset nec consules aut pro foedere tam turpi aut contra foedus tam necessarium hiscere possent, tum L. Lentulus, qui princeps [2] 8 legatorum virtute atque honoribus erat: "Patrem meum" inquit, "consules, saepe audivi memorantem se in Capitolio unum non fuisse auctorem senatui redimendae auro a Gallis civitatis, quando nec fossa valloque ab ignavissimo ad opera ac muniendum hoste clausi essent et erumpere, si non sine magno 9 periculo tamen sine certa pernicie, possent. Quod si, ut illis [3] decurrere ex Capitolio armatis in hostem licuit, quo saepe modo obsessi in obsidentes eru-

[1] oppetendam F?A[1]: appetendam UA: adpetendam MPOTDL.
[2] princeps Drakenborch: tum princeps Ω.
[3] ut illis Aldus: illis ut Ω.

[1] He had been consul 328 B.C. (VIII. xxii. 8). His descendants assumed the surname of Caudini and a P. Cornelius Caudinus is mentioned at XXVI. xlviii. 9 and a L. Cornelius Caudinus at XXVII. xxi. 9.

already fought and won; and since they knew B.C. 321 not how to admit their plight, even when beaten and made prisoners, he intended to send them unarmed and with a single garment each under the yoke; in all else the peace should be one of equal terms to the vanquished and the victors; for if the Romans would evacuate the Samnite territory and withdraw their colonies, Romans and Samnites should thenceforward live by their own laws in an equal alliance. On these terms he was ready to conclude a treaty with the consuls; if they were any of them unacceptable, he forbade the envoys to return to him. When the upshot of this embassy was made known to the Romans, they all straightway fell to groaning, and so overcome were they with sorrow that it seemed as though they could not possibly take it more to heart if they should be told that they must all die in that place.

Finally, after a long silence—for the consuls were incapable of uttering a word, either for a treaty so disgraceful or against a treaty so necessary—Lucius Lentulus, at that time first of the lieutenants both for his valour and his dignities,[1] spoke as follows: "Consuls, I have often heard my father say that on the Capitol he was the only man who would not have the senate ransom the City from the Gauls with gold, since their enemies, who were most indolent besiegers, had not shut them in with trench and rampart, and they were able to make a sortie, if not without great danger, yet without certain destruction. But if, in like manner as they had it in their power to run down from the Capitol, sword in hand, against their enemy, even as the besieged have often sallied out against the besiegers, perunt, ita nobis aequo aut iniquo loco dimicandi tantummodo cum hoste copia esset, non mihi paterni animis indoles in consilio dando deesset. Equidem mortem pro patria praeclaram esse fateor et me vel devovere pro populo Romano legionibusque vel in medios immittere hostes[1] paratus sum; sed hic patriam video, hic quidquid Romanarum legionum est, quae nisi pro se ipsis ad mortem ruere volunt, quid habent quod morte sua servent? 'Tecta urbis' dicat aliquis 'et moenia et eam turbam a qua urbs incolitur.' Immo hercule produntur ea omnia deleto hoc exercitu, non servantur. Quis enim ea tuebitur? Imbellis videlicet atque inermis multitudo. Tam hercule quam a Gallorum impetu defendit. An a Veiis exercitum Camillumque ducem implorabunt? Hic omnes spes opesque sunt, quas servando patriam servamus, dedendo ad necem patriam deserimus ac prodimus. 'At foeda atque ignominiosa deditio est.' Sed ea caritas patriae est ut tam ignominia eam quam morte nostra, si opus sit, servemus. Subeatur ergo ista, quantacumque est, indignitas et pareatur necessitati, quam ne di quidem superant. Ite, consules, redimite armis civitatem quam auro maiores vestri redemerunt."

A.U.C. 433

V. Consules profecti ad Pontium in conloquium, cum de foedere victor agitaret, negarunt iniussu populi foedus fieri posse nec sine fetialibus caerimoniaque alia sollemni. Itaque non, ut volgo

[1] in medios immittere hostes Gronovius: in medios hostes me inmittere O: in medios me immittere hostes Ω.

so we were able, whether on favourable ground or no, only to come to grips with our antagonist, I should not lack my father's spirit in advising you. I do indeed confess that it is glorious to die for one's country, and I am ready to devote myself for the Roman People and the legions, or to throw myself into the midst of the enemy; but it is here I see my country, here all the legions Rome possesses, and unless they would rush on death to please themselves, what have they to save by dying? 'The roof-trees of the City,' someone may say, 'and its walls, and the multitude by whom it is inhabited.' Nay, not so! For all these are betrayed, not saved, if this army is wiped out! For who shall preserve them? The unwarlike, unarmed rabble? Ay, even as it preserved them from the onset of the Gauls! Or will they pray perhaps that an army may be sent from Veii, and a Camillus to command it? Here are all our hopes and our resources, which if we save we save our country; whereas if we give these up to die, we abandon our country and betray it. 'But surrender is shameful and humiliating.' True, but our country is so dear that we would save it by enduring shame, as we would, if need were, by our death. Let us submit then to that indignity, however great, and obey necessity, to which even gods are not superior. Go, consuls, at the cost of arms redeem the City which your sires paid gold to redeem." B.C. 321

V. The consuls then went to confer with Pontius. The victor proposed a treaty, but they declared that a treaty could not be made without the authorization of the people, nor without fetials and the rest of the customary ceremonial. Consequently the Caudine

A.U.C. 423

credunt Claudiusque etiam scribit, foedere pax Cau-
3 dina, sed per sponsionem facta est. Quid enim aut sponsoribus in foedere opus esset aut obsidibus, ubi precatione res transigitur, per quem populum fiat quo minus legibus dictis stetur, ut eum ita Iuppiter feriat quemadmodum a fetialibus porcus feriatur?
4 Spoponderunt consules, legati, quaestores, tribuni militum, nominaque omnium qui spoponderunt exstant, ubi, si ex foedere acta res esset, praeterquam
5 duorum fetialium non exstarent; et propter necessariam foederis dilationem obsides etiam sescenti equites imperati, qui capite luerent, si pacto non 6 staretur. Tempus inde statutum tradendis obsidibus exercituque inermi mittendo.

Redintegravit luctum in castris consulum adventus, ut vix ab iis abstinerent manus quorum temeritate in eum locum deducti essent, quorum ignavia foedius
7 inde quam venissent abituri: illis non ducem locorum, non exploratorem fuisse; beluarum modo caecos
8 in foveam missos. Alii alios intueri, contemplari arma mox tradenda et inermes futuras dextras obnoxiaque corpora hosti; proponere sibimet ipsi ante oculos iugum hostile et ludibria victoris et

---

[1] Q. Claudius Quadrigarius Introduction, Vol. I. p. xxx).

[2] "The sponsio was a verbal engagement or pledge made by those in authority (the generals and, if required, their officers) in answer to a formal question from the other party."—Anderson.

[3] See I. xxiv. 8.

Peace was not entered into by means of a treaty, as B.C. 321 people in general believe and as Claudius[1] actually states, but by a guarantee.[2] For what need would there have been for guarantors or for hostages in a treaty, where the agreement is concluded with a prayer that the nation responsible for any departure from the recited terms may be smitten by Jupiter even as the swine is smitten by the fetials?[3] The guarantors were the consuls, the lieutenants, the quaestors, and the tribunes of the soldiers, and the names of all who gave the guarantee are extant, whereas, if the agreement had been entered into as in making a treaty, none would be preserved except those of the two fetials; and because of the inevitable postponement of the treaty, hostages were also required to the number of six hundred knights, whose lives were to be forfeit if the Romans should fail to keep the terms. A time was then set for the delivery of the hostages and the dismissal of the army without their arms.

Fresh lamentations broke out in the camp when the consuls returned; and the men could hardly keep from laying violent hands on those through whose rashness they had been led into that place, and through whose cowardice they were now to depart more shamefully than they had come. They bethought them how they had been unprovided either with guides or with patrols, but had been driven blindly, like wild beasts, into a trap. They looked at one another; they gazed on the arms that they must presently surrender, on the right hands that would be helpless and the bodies that would be at the mercy of the foe. They pictured to their mind's eye the hostile yoke, the victor's taunts,

A.U.C. 433

9 voltus superbos et per armatos inermium iter, inde foedi agminis miserabilem viam per sociorum urbes, reditum in patriam ad parentes, quo saepe ipsi 10 maioresque eorum triumphantes venissent: se solos sine volnere, sine ferro, sine acie victos; sibi non stringere licuisse gladios, non manum cum hoste conferre; sibi nequiquam arma, nequiquam vires, nequiquam [1] animos datos.

11 Haec frementibus hora fatalis ignominiae advenit, omnia tristiora experiundo factura quam quae prae- 12 ceperant animis. Iam primum cum singulis vestimentis inermes extra vallum exire iussi, et primi 13 traditi obsides atque in custodiam abducti. Tum a consulibus abire lictores iussi paludamentaque detracta: id tantam [2] inter ipsos, qui paulo ante eos exsecrantes dedendos lacerandosque censuerant, 14 miserationem fecit, ut suae quisque condicionis oblitus ab illa deformatione tantae maiestatis velut ab nefando spectaculo averteret oculos.

VI. Primi consules prope seminudi sub iugum missi; tum ut quisque gradu proximus erat ita 2 ignominiae obiectus; tum deinceps singulae legiones. Circumstabant armati hostes, exprobrantes eludentesque; gladii etiam plerisque intentati, et volnerati

[1] sibi nequiquam arma, nequiquam vires, nequiquam Gelenius: sibe (and in marg. uires nequiquam) nequiquam M: sibi nequiquam Ω.

[2] tantam id Drakenborch: tantam Ω.

and fleering countenance; and how they must pass B.C. 321
unarmed between the ranks of their armed enemies, and then wend their wretched way, a pitiful band, through the cities of their allies; and finally the return to their own city and their parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors had often returned in triumph. They alone had been defeated without a wound, without a weapon, without a battle; to them it had not been granted to draw the sword, nor to join in combat with the enemy; on them in vain had arms, in vain had strength, in vain had bravery been bestowed.

As they uttered these complaints, the fateful hour of their humiliation came, an hour destined to transcend all anticipations in the bitterness of its reality. To begin with, they were ordered to pass outside the rampart, clad in their tunics and unarmed, and the hostages were at once handed over and led off into custody. Next, the lictors were commanded to forsake the consuls, who then were stripped of their generals' cloaks,—a thing which inspired such compassion in those very men who a little while before had cursed them and had declared that they deserved to be given up and put to torture, that every man, forgetting his own evil case, averted his eyes from that degradation of so majestic an office, as from a spectacle of horror.

VI. First the consuls, little better than half-naked, were sent under the yoke, then their subordinates were humbled, each in the order of his rank; and then, one after another, the several legions. The enemy under arms stood on either side, reviling them and mocking them; many they actually threatened with the sword, and some, whose

A.U.C. 433 quidam necatique, si voltus eorum indignitate rerum acrior victorem offendisset.

3 Ita traducti sub iugum, et quod paene gravius erat, per hostium oculos, cum e saltu evasissent, etsi velut ab inferis extracti tum primum lucem aspicere visi sunt, tamen ipsa lux ita deforme
4 intuentibus agmen omni morte tristior fuit. Itaque cum ante noctem Capuam pervenire possent, incerti de fide sociorum et quod pudor praepediebat, circa viam haud procul Capua omnium egena corpora
5 humi prostraverunt. Quod ubi est Capuam nuntiatum, evicit miseratio iusta sociorum superbiam in-
6 genitam Campanis. Confestim insignia sua consulibus,[1] arma equos vestimenta commeatus militibus, 7 benigne mittunt; et venientibus Capuam cunctus senatus populusque obviam egressus iustis omnibus hospitalibus privatisque et publicis fungitur officiis.
8 Neque illis sociorum comitas voltusque benigni et adloquia non modo sermonem elicere sed ne ut oculos quidem attollerent aut consolantes amicos
9 contra intuerentur efficere poterant: adeo super maerorem pudor quidam fugere conloquia et coetus hominum cogebat.

10 Postero die cum iuvenes nobiles missi a Capua ut proficiscentes ad finem Campanum prosequerentur

[1] consulibus Hertz: consulibus fasces lictores Ω.

resentment of the outrage showing too plainly in their faces gave their conquerors offence, they wounded or slew outright. B.C. 321

Thus they were sent under the yoke, and, what was almost harder to bear, while their enemies looked on. On emerging from the pass, although they seemed like men raised from the dead, who beheld for the first time the light of day, yet the very light itself, which allowed them to see that dismal throng, was gloomier than any death. And so, although it was in their power to have made Capua before nightfall, yet, questioning the loyalty of their allies, and withheld also by shame, they threw themselves upon the ground along the roadside, not far from the city, with nothing to supply their wants. When tidings of this were brought to Capua, a feeling of pity, natural to allies, overcame the ingrained arrogance of the Campanians. Ungrudgingly, without an instant's hesitation, they dispatched the insignia of their office to the consuls, together with arms, horses, clothing, and provisions, for the men; and as they drew near Capua, the whole senate and people going forth to meet them used towards them all the rites of hospitality and every public and private courtesy. Yet the kindness of their allies and their friendly looks and words were so far from drawing the Romans into talk that they could not even be got to raise their eyes or look their friends and comforters in the face; so constrained were they by a kind of humiliation—over and above their grief—to avoid the speech and assemblages of men.

On the following day, when the young nobles sent from Capua to attend them to the borders of Campania had returned, and were called into the senate-

A.U.C. 433 11 revertissent vocatique in curiam percontantibus maioribus natu multo sibi maestiores et abiectiores animi visos referrent: adeo silens ac prope mutum 12 agmen incessisse; iacere[1] indolem illam Romanam, ablatosque cum armis animos; non reddere salutem salutantibus, non dare responsum,[2] non hiscere quemquam prae metu potuisse, tamquam ferentibus adhuc cervicibus iugum sub quod missi[3] essent; 13 habere Samnites victoriam non praeclaram solum sed etiam perpetuam, cepisse enim eos non Romam, sicut ante Gallos, sed, quod multo bellicosius fuerit, Romanam virtutem ferociamque.—VII. cum haec

A.U.C. 434 dicerentur audirenturque et deploratum paene Romanum nomen in concilio sociorum fidelium esset, 2 dicitur A. Calavius,[4] Ovi filius, clarus genere factisque, tum etiam aetate verendus, longe aliter 3 se habere rem dixisse: silentium illud obstinatum fixosque in terram oculos et surdas ad omnia solacia aures et pudorem intuendae lucis ingentem molem 4 irarum ex alto animi[5] cientis indicia esse. Aut Romana se ignorare ingenia, aut silentium illud Samnitibus flebiles brevi clamores gemitusque excitaturum, Caudinaeque pacis aliquanto Samnitibus 5 quam Romanis tristiorem memoriam fore; quippe suos quemque eorum animos habiturum, ubicumque congressuri sint; saltus Caudinos non ubique Samnitibus fore.

6 Iam Romae etiam[6] sua infamis clades erat. Ob-

[1] iacere ζ: tacere Ω.

[2] salutantibus, non dare responsum Madvig: non salutantibus dare responsum Ω: bracketed by Conway.

[3] quod missi $F^2A^2\zeta$: quod emissi (or quo demissi) Ω.

[4] A. Calavius Conway: Ofillius (or Ofilius) A. Calauius (or acalauius or accilauius or other corruptions) Ω.

[5] animi $U\zeta$: animo Ω.

house and questioned by the elders, they reported B.C. 321 that they had seemed to be much more sorrowful and dejected than before: their column had marched on in silence and almost as though dumb; the old Roman spirit was quite dashed; they had lost their courage with their arms; being saluted, they returned not the salutation; they responded to no questions; not a man of them had been able to open his mouth for shame, as if they still bore on their necks the yoke under which they had been sent; the Samnites had won not only a famous but a lasting victory, for they had conquered, not Rome—as the Gauls had done before—but a thing which demanded far greater prowess—the Roman valour and independence. VII. Such were the opinions that were spoken B.C. 320 and listened to, and the Roman name had well-nigh been given up for lost in the council of Rome's faithful allies, when Aulus Calavius, son of Ovius, a man of famous birth and achievements and at that time venerable also for his age, asserted that the case was very different: that obstinate silence, those eyes fixed on the ground and ears deaf to every consolation, that shame at looking on the light, were signs, he argued, of bosoms bursting with passionate resentment; either he knew nothing of the Roman character, or that silence was destined ere long to draw from the Samnites cries and groans of anguish, and the Caudine Peace to become a far more bitter memory to Samnites than to Romans; for each people would have its own native spirit wherever they might encounter, but the Samnites would not everywhere have a Caudine Pass.

By this time Rome, too, had heard of her shameful

[6] Romae etiam Drakenborch: Romae et Ω. Romae ℟ M.

A.U.C. 434

sessos primum audierunt; tristior deinde ignominiosae
7 pacis magis quam periculi nuntius fuit. Ad famam obsidionis dilectus haberi coeptus erat; dimissus deinde auxiliorum apparatus, postquam deditionem tam foede factam acceperunt, extemploque sine ulla publica auctoritate consensum in omnem formam
8 luctus est. Tabernae circa forum clausae, iustitiumque in foro sua sponte coeptum prius quam indictum;
9 lati clavi, anuli aurei positi; paene maestior exercitu ipso civitas esse; nec ducibus solum atque auctoribus sponsoribusque pacis irasci sed innoxios etiam milites
10 odisse et negare urbe tectisve accipiendos. Quam concitationem animorum fregit adventus exercitus etiam iratis miserabilis. Non enim tamquam in patriam revertentes ex insperato incolumes sed capto-
11 rum habitu voltuque ingressi sero in urbem ita se in suis quisque tectis abdiderunt ut postero atque insequentibus diebus nemo eorum forum aut publi-
12 cum aspicere vellet. Consules in privato abditi nihil pro magistratu agere, nisi quod expressum senatus consulto est ut dictatorem dicerent comitiorum
13 causa. Q. Fabium Ambustum dixerunt et P. Aelium
14 Paetum[1] magistrum equitum; quibus vitio creatis

[1] Aelium Paetum ς: ae (e- milium paetum Ω.

[1] The latus clavus, a broad (purple) stripe in the tunic, marked the senator. Both senators and knights wore golden rings, though these later became the distinguishing badge of the knights.

calamity. The first news was that the army was B.C. 320 entrapped; then came a gloomier report, more by reason of the disgraceful peace than because of the peril. On the rumour of a blockade they had begun to hold a levy; but they afterwards gave over their measures for relief, when they learned that there had been so infamous a capitulation, and immediately, without official sanction of any sort, betook themselves with one mind to every form of mourning. The booths round about the Forum were shut up, and ere proclamation could be made, all business was suspended; tunics with the broad stripe of purple were discarded, as were golden rings.[1] The citizens were almost more dejected than the army; and not only were they enraged against their generals and those who had favoured and guaranteed the peace, but they even visited their hate upon the innocent soldiers and proposed to exclude them from the City and from their homes. But this flurry of resentment was dispelled by the arrival of the army, which even angry men could not but pity. For they came not like men returning in safety to their homes, after all hope of them had been abandoned; but entering the City late in the day, with the bearing and looks of prisoners, they slipped away every man to his own house, and on the next and the succeeding days not one of them would look into the Forum or the streets. The consuls shut themselves up in their houses and would transact no public business, except that they were forced by a senatorial decree to name a dictator to preside at the election. They designated Quintus Fabius Ambustus, with Publius Aelius Paetus to be master of the horse. A flaw in their appointment occasioned the substitution in their

A.U.C. 434 suffecti M. Aemilius Papus dictator. L. Valerius Flaccus magister equitum. Nec per eos comitia habita; et quia taedebat populum omnium magis-15 tratuum eius anni, res ad interregnum rediit. Interreges Q. Fabius Maximus M. Valerius Corvus. Is consules creavit Q. Publilium Philonem tertium [1] et L. Papirium Cursorem iterum haud dubio consensu civitatis, quod nulli ea tempestate duces clariores essent.

VIII. Quo creati sunt die, eo—sic enim placuerat patribus—magistratum inierunt sollemnibusque senatus consultis perfectis de pace Caudina rettulerunt;
2 et Publilius, penes quem fasces erant, "Die, Sp. Postumi," inquit. Qui ubi surrexit, eodem illo vultu
3 quo sub iugum missus erat, "Haud sum ignarus" inquit, "consules, ignominiae non honoris causa me primum excitatum iussumque dicere, non tamquam senatorem, sed tamquam reum qua infelicis belli, qua
4 ignominiosae pacis. Ego tamen, quando neque de noxa nostra neque de poena rettulistis, omissa defensione, quae non difficillima esset apud haud ignaros fortunarum humanarum necessitatiumque, sententiam de eo de quo rettulistis paucis peragam; quae sententia testis erit mihine an legionibus vestris pepercerim, cum me seu turpi seu necessaria spon-

[1] Q. Publilium Philonem tertium Glareanus: Q. Publilium Philonem Ω.

[1] The fasces (bundles of rods, symbolic of supreme authority) were borne by the lictors in alternate attendance on the two consuls. The elder had them first.

room of Marcus Aemilius Papus, as dictator, and B.C. 320
Lucius Valerius Flaccus, as master of the horse. However, even they did not hold an election; and because the people were dissatisfied with all the magistrates of that year, the state reverted to an interregnum. The interreges were Quintus Fabius Maximus and Marcus Valerius Corvus. The latter announced the election to the consulship of Quintus Publilius Philo (for the third time) and Lucius Papirius Cursor (for the second) with the unmistakable approval of the citizens, for there were at that time no leaders more distinguished.

VIII. On the day of their election—for so the Fathers had ordained—they entered upon the duties of their magistracy, and having disposed of the routine resolutions, raised the question of the Caudine Peace. Publilius had the fasces,[1] and called on Spurius Postumius to speak. Having risen to his feet, he said, with the same expression on his countenance as when he had been sent under the yoke, "I am not ignorant, consuls, that I have been called on first and bidden to speak because of my disgrace, and not to honour me; not as a senator, but as one charged with the guilt not only of an unlucky war but of a shameful peace. However, you have not raised the question of our wrongdoing or our punishment; I will therefore attempt no defence—though it should be no difficult cause to plead before judges not unacquainted with the fortunes of men and their necessities—but will briefly formulate a motion concerning the subject you have asked us to consider. My motion will bear witness whether it was myself or your legions that I spared, when I bound myself by a base, or, perhaps,

A.U.C. 434

5 sione obstrinxi; qua tamen, quando iniussu populi facta est, non tenetur populus Romanus, nec quicquam ex ea praeterquam corpora nostra debentur
6 Samnitibus. Dedamur per fetiales nudi vinctique; exsolvamus religione populum, si qua obligavimus, ne quid divini humanive obstet quo minus iustum
7 piumque de integro ineatur bellum. Interea consules exercitum scribere, armare, educere placet, nec prius ingredi hostium fines, quam omnia iusta
8 in deditionem nostram[1] perfecta erunt. Vos, di immortales, precor quaesoque, si vobis non fuit cordi Sp. Postumium T. Veturium consules cum Samnitibus
9 prospere bellum gerere, at vos satis habeatis vidisse nos sub iugum missos, vidisse sponsione infami obligatos, videre nudos vinctosque hostibus deditos, omnem iram hostium nostris capitibus excipientes;
10 novos consules legionesque Romanas ita cum Samnite gerere bellum velitis ut omnia ante nos consules bella gesta sunt."

11 Quae ubi dixit, tanta simul admiratio miseratioque viri incessit homines ut modo vix crederent illum eundem esse Sp. Postumium qui auctor tam foedae
12 pacis fuisset; modo miserarentur quod vir talis etiam praecipuum apud hostes supplicium passurus esset
13 ob iram diremptae pacis. Cum omnes laudibus modo

[1] deditionem nostram Ω: deditionem nostra TDA: deditione nostra Lς.

a necessary pledge,—by which, however, the Roman B.C. 320
People is not held, since it was given without the people's authorization : nor by its terms is aught but our own persons due to the Samnites. Let us be given up, I propose, by the fetials, stripped and bound ; let us release the people from their religious obligation, if in any such we have involved them, that no obstacle, divine or human, may block the way to a just and righteous renewal of the war. Meantime I move that the consuls enroll an army and arm it and lead it forth, yet without crossing the borders of the enemy, until all the ceremonies incident to our surrender shall have been completed. Do you, immortal gods, I beseech and pray you, if you were not pleased that the consuls Spurius Postumius and Titus Veturius should wage a successful war with the Samnites, yet deem it enough to have seen us sent beneath the yoke, to have seen us bound by an infamous agreement, to behold us, naked and in bonds, delivered to the enemy, receiving on our own heads all the resentment of our foes ; and vouchsafe to the new consuls and the Roman legions so to wage war with the Samnites, as, until our consulship, all Rome's wars were waged."

When he had finished speaking, such a thrill of astonishment, and at the same time of pity for the man, ran through the senate, that at first men could hardly believe it was the same Spurius Postumius who had been the author of a peace so shameful ; and presently they were all compassion, to think that such a man should suffer what would be no ordinary punishment at the hands of enemies enraged by the rupture of the peace. As they prosequentes virum in sententiam eius pedibus irent, 14 temptata paulisper intercessio est ab L. Livio et Q. Maelio tribunis plebis, qui neque exsolvi religione populum aiebant deditione sua, nisi omnia Samnitibus, qualia apud Caudium fuissent, restituerentur;

A.U.C. 434

15 neque se pro eo quod spondendo pacem servassent exercitum populi Romani poenam ullam meritos esse; neque ad extremum, cum sacrosancti essent, dedi hostibus violarive posse.[1]

IX. Tum Postumius "Interea dedite" inquit "profanos nos, quos salva religione potestis; dedetis deinde et istos sacrosanctos, cum primum magistratu
2 abierint, sed, si me audiatis, priusquam dedantur, hic in comitio virgis caesos, hanc iam ut intercalatae
3 poenae usuram habeant. Nam quod deditione nostra negant exsolvi religione populum, id istos magis ne dedantur quam quia ita se res habeat dicere, quis
4 adeo iuris fetialium expers est qui ignoret? Neque ego infitias eo, patres conscripti, tam sponsiones[2] quam foedera sancta esse apud eos homines apud quos iuxta divinas religiones fides humana colitur; sed iniussu populi nego quicquam sanciri posse
5 quod populum teneat. An, si eadem superbia qua sponsionem istam expresserunt nobis Samnites coegis-

[1] posse ζ: posset MPT: possent Ω.
[2] sponsiones ζ: sponsores Ω.

[1] Livius and Maelius are apparently thought of as having been among the guarantors and as having afterwards been elected plebeian tribunes.

were all crossing over to support his motion, with B.C. 320 nothing but praises for his heroism, Lucius Livius and Quintus Maelius, tribunes of the plebs, endeavoured for a moment to interpose their veto. The people, they said, could not be freed from their obligation by surrendering them, unless every advantage which the Samnites had possessed at Caudium were restored to them; moreover, they had merited no punishment for having preserved by their pledge of peace the army of the Roman People; nor, finally, seeing that they were sacrosanct, could they be surrendered to the enemy or violated.[1]

IX. Then said Postumius: "Meanwhile, surrender us, who are unconsecrate, as you may do without offence to Heaven; afterwards you shall surrender also those sacrosanct ones, when once they have retired from their magistracy; but, if you should listen to me, before surrendering them you would have them scourged here in the Comitium, that they might receive in advance this extra punishment, by way of interest. For when they deny that the people can be freed of their obligation by surrendering us, who is so unacquainted with the fetial law as not to be aware that they say this, more that they may not be surrendered than because the case is so? And yet, Conscript Fathers, I do not dispute the fact that guarantees as well as treaties are sacred in the eyes of those who cherish honour among men on an equal footing with obligations due to the gods; but I deny that without the people's authorization any sanction can be given which shall be binding on the people. What! If the Samnites with that same arrogance with which they extorted this capitulation from us had com-

A.U.C. 434

sent nos verba legitima dedentium urbes nuncupare, deditum populum Romanum vos tribuni diceretis et hanc urbem templa delubra fines aquas Samnitium
6 esse? Omitto deditionem, quoniam de sponsione agitur; quid tandem si spopondissemus urbem hanc relicturum populum Romanum? si incensurum? si magistratus, si senatum, si leges non habiturum? si
7 sub regibus futurum? Di meliora, inquis. Atqui non indignitas rerum sponsionis vinculum levat: si quid est in quod [1] obligari populus possit, in omnia potest. Et ne illud quidem, quod quosdam forsitan moveat, refert, consul an dictator an praetor spopon-
8 derit. Et hoc ipsi etiam Samnites iudicaverunt, quibus non fuit satis consules spondere, sed legatos, quaestores, tribunos militum spondere coegerunt.

9 "Nec a me nunc quisquam quaesiverit quid ita spoponderim, cum id nec consulis ius esset nec illis spondere pacem quae mei non erat arbitrii, nec pro
10 vobis qui nihil mandaveratis possem. Nihil ad Caudium, patres conscripti, humanis consiliis gestum est: di immortales et vestris et hostium imperatoribus 11 mentem ademerunt. Nec nos in bello satis cavimus, et illi male partam victoriam male perdiderunt, dum vix locis quibus vicerant credunt, dum quacumque

[1] quod ϝ: quo Ω.

pelled us to pronounce the solemn form of words B.C. 320 of those who surrender cities, would you tribunes assert that the Roman People had been surrendered, and that this City, with its temples, its holy places, its bounds and waters, was become the property of the Samnites? But enough of surrender; we are talking of a guarantee. How, pray, if we had guaranteed that the Roman People should forsake this City? that they should burn it? that it should cease to have magistrates, a senate, laws? that it should be subject to the rule of kings? 'The gods forbid!' you say. And yet the unworthiness of the conditions cannot lessen the force of a guarantee; if there is anything for which the people can be bound, it can be bound for everything. Nor does it matter, either, as some are perhaps inclined to think, whether consul or dictator or praetor have given the guarantee. And this the very Samnites themselves deemed to be true, for not content with the guarantee of consuls, they obliged the lieutenants, the quaestors, and the tribunes of the soldiers to add theirs.

"And let no man now demand of me why I gave this guarantee, seeing that a consul has no right so to do and that I could not pledge them a peace which was not mine to grant, nor in your behalf, who had given me no mandate. There was nothing done at Caudium, Conscript Fathers, by man's wisdom: the immortal gods deprived of understanding both your commanders and the enemy's. We, on our part, took no sufficient precautions in the war: while, as for them, they threw away their ill-got victory by their ill-guided conduct, for they hardly trusted the very ground that had given them

A.U.C. 434 condicione arma viris in arma natis auferre festinant.
12 An, si sana mens fuisset, difficile illis fuit, dum senes ab domo ad consultandum accersunt, mittere Romam legatos? cum senatu, cum populo de pace ac foedere
13 agere? Tridui iter expeditis erat; interea in indutiis res fuisset, donec ab Roma legati aut victoriam illis certam aut pacem adferrent. Ea demum sponsio
14 esset quam populi iussu spopondissemus. Sed neque vos tulissetis nec nos spopondissemus; nec fas fuit alium rerum exitum esse quam ut illi velut somnio laetiore quam quod mentes eorum capere possent
15 nequiquam eluderentur et nostrum exercitum eadem quae impedierat fortuna expediret, vanam victoriam vanior inritam faceret pax, sponsio interponeretur
16 quae neminem praeter sponsorem obligaret. Quid enim vobiscum, patres conscripti, quid cum populo Romano actum est? Quis vos appellare potest, quis se a vobis dicere deceptum? Hostis an civis? Hosti nihil spopondistis, civem[1] neminem spondere pro
17 vobis iussistis. Nihil ergo vobis nec nobiscum est, quibus nihil mandastis, nec cum Samnitibus, cum 18 quibus nihil egistis. Samnitibus sponsores nos sumus rei satis locupletes in id quod nostrum est, in id quod praestare possumus, corpora nostra et animos;

[1] civem A^3: quem Ω: quin U: qui F^3.

[1] Victory, in case the Roman People declined to accept terms for the ransom of their army; peace, if they acceded to those terms.

their conquest, in their haste to deprive of arms, on B.C. 320 any terms, men born to the use of arms. Why, had they had their wits about them, would it have been hard, while summoning old men from home for consultation, to dispatch envoys to Rome? to treat with senate and with people for a peace and covenant? It was only three days' journey to those who travel light; meantime hostilities would have been suspended, until their envoys should return from Rome with either certain victory or a peace.[1] Then, and then only, would there have been a guarantee in which our pledge was backed by the mandate of the people. But neither would you have voted one, nor should we have given it; nor was it Heaven's will that the affair should have any other ending, but that they should be beguiled with a dream too joyful for their comprehension, and that our army should be extricated by the same fortune which had entrapped it; that their idle victory should evaporate in a yet idler peace, and a guarantee be proffered that should bind none but the guarantor. For what negotiation, Conscript Fathers, has there been with you or with the Roman People? Who can appeal to you, who can say that he has been deceived by you? Can the enemy, can a fellow-citizen? You have pledged nothing to the enemy, you have given no authority to make a pledge to any fellow-citizen. You have therefore naught to do with us, to whom you gave no mandate, or with the Samnites, with whom you have had no dealings. The Samnites have in us guarantors who are responsible and quite competent, so far as concerns what belongs to ourselves and what we are able to deliver, namely, our persons and our lives; against these let

A.U.C. 434 in haec saeviant, in haec ferrum, in haec iras acuant.
19 Quod ad tribunos attinet, consulite utrum praesens deditio eorum fieri possit an in diem differatur; nos interim, T. Veturi vosque ceteri, vilia haec capita luendae sponsionis[1] feramus et nostro supplicio liberemus Romana arma."

X. Movit patres conscriptos cum causa tum auctor nec ceteros solum sed tribunos etiam plebei, ut se
2 in senatus dicerent fore potestate. Magistratu inde se extemplo abdicaverunt traditique fetialibus cum ceteris Caudium ducendi. Hoc senatus consulto
3 facto lux quaedam adfulsisse civitati visa est. Postumius in ore erat; eum laudibus ad caelum ferebant, devotioni P. Deci consulis, aliis claris facinoribus
4 aequabant: emersisse civitatem ex obnoxia pace illius consilio et opera; ipsum se cruciatibus et hostium irae offerre piaculaque pro populo Romano
5 dare. Arma cuncti spectant et bellum: en unquam futurum ut congredi armatis cum Samnite liceat?
6 In civitate ira odioque ardente dilectus prope omnium voluntariorum fuit. Rescriptae ex eodem milite novae legiones ductusque ad Caudium exer-
7 citus. Praegressi fetiales ubi ad portam venere, vestem detrahi pacis sponsoribus iubent, manus post tergum vinciri. Cum apparitor verecundia maiestatis Postumi laxe vinciret, "Quin tu" inquit "adduces[2]

[1] sponsionis Ω: sponsioni ς edd.
[2] adduces Ω: adducis (or adduce) ς.

[1] VIII. ix. 4 f.

them storm, against these direct their swords, against these make sharp their anger. As for the tribunes, you must determine whether their surrender can take place at once or had better be deferred; meantime, Titus Veturius, let us, and you others, offer these caitiff heads of ours in satisfaction of our pledge, and by our suffering liberate the Roman arms." B.C. 320

X. Both the cause itself and the speaker greatly stirred the Conscript Fathers and the others present, including even the tribunes of the plebs, who declared that they would obey the senate, and having forthwith resigned their office were delivered over to the fetials to be led with the rest to Caudium. When the senate had acted on this motion, it somehow seemed as though day had dawned upon the State. Postumius was on all men's lips; they extolled him to the skies, and compared his conduct to the devotion of Publius Decius, the consul,[1] and to other glorious deeds. The state, they said, had emerged —thanks to his wisdom and his services—from a slavish peace; he was freely giving himself up to the tortures of a resentful foe, that he might make expiation for the Roman People. Men thought of nothing but war and arms. Would ever the hour come, they asked, when they might encounter the Samnites, sword in hand?

In a city ablaze with wrath and hate, the levy was almost wholly made up with volunteers. The same soldiers were enrolled into new legions, and the army marched on Caudium. Before them went the fetials, who, when they had come to the gate, bade the guarantors of peace be stripped and their hands be bound behind their backs. As the officer, awed by the dignity of Postumius, would have left him loosely

A.U.C. 434

8 lorum, ut iusta fiat deditio!" Tum ubi in coetum Samnitium et ad tribunal ventum Ponti est, A. Cor-
9 nelius Arvina fetialis ita verba fecit: "Quandoque hisce homines iniussu populi Romani Quiritium foedus ictum iri spoponderunt atque ob eam rem noxam nocuerunt, ob eam rem quo populus Romanus scelere impio sit solutus hosce homines vobis dedo."
10 Haec dicenti fetiali Postumius genu femur quanta maxime poterat vi perculit et clara voce ait se Samnitem civem esse, illum legatum[1] a se contra ius gentium violatum: eo iustius bellum gesturos.

XI. Tum Pontius "Nec ego istam deditionem accipiam" inquit, "nec Samnites ratam habebunt.
2 Quin tu, Spuri Postumi, si deos esse censes, aut omnia inrita facis aut pacto stas? Samniti populo omnes quos in potestate habuit aut pro iis pax
3 debetur. Sed quid ego te appello, qui te captum victori cum qua potes fide restituis? Populum Romanum appello; quem si sponsionis ad furculas Caudinas factae paenitet, restituat legiones intra
4 saltum quo saeptae fuerunt. Nemo quemquam deceperit; omnia pro infecto sint; recipiant arma, quae per pactionem tradiderunt; redeant in castra sua; quidquid pridie habuerunt quam in conloquium est ventum habeant: tum bellum et fortia consilia
5 placeant, tum sponsio et pax repudietur. Ea fortuna,

[1] legatum Walters and Conway: legatum fetialem Ω.

[1] i.e. the pater patratus, see I. xxiv. 6.

bound, "Nay, draw the thong tight," he exclaimed, B.C. 320
"that the surrender may be duly carried out." Then, on arriving at the assembly of the Samnites and the tribune of Pontius, Aulus Cornelius Arvina the fetial[1] spoke as follows: "Whereas these men, unbidden by the Roman People of the Quirites, have guaranteed that a treaty should be ratified, and by so doing have committed an injury; to the end that the Roman People may be absolved of heinous guilt, I deliver up these men to you." As the fetial spoke these words, Postumius thrust his knee into the other's thigh, with all the force he could summon up, and proclaimed in a loud voice that he was a Samnite citizen, who had maltreated the envoy in violation of the law of nations, whereby the Romans would make war with the better right.

XI. Then said Pontius, "I will not receive this surrender, nor will the Samnites hold it valid. And you, Spurius Postumius, if you believe in the existence of the gods, why not either reject the whole negotiation or abide by your agreement? The Samnite People is entitled to all whom it had in its power, or to peace in place of them. But why do I appeal to you, who yield yourself a prisoner as honourably as you can? I appeal to the Roman People; if they repent them of the pledge that was given at the Caudine Forks, let them replace their legions in the defile where they were surrounded. Let no one deceive anybody; let all be as though it had not happened; let them resume the arms they laid down in accordance with the compact; let them go back to their camp; whatever they had on the day before the conference, let them have again; then let them vote for war and warlike measures, then let iis[1] locis, quae ante pacis mentionem habuimus, geramus bellum, nec populus Romanus consulum sponsionem nec nos fidem populi Romani accusemus. 6 Nunquamne causa defiet cur victi pacto non stetis? Obsides Porsinnae dedistis: furto eos subduxistis; auro civitatem a Gallis redemistis: inter accipiendum 7 aurum caesi sunt; pacem nobiscum pepigistis, ut legiones vobis captas restitueremus: eam pacem inritam facitis. Et semper aliquam fraudi speciem 8 iuris imponitis. Non probat populus Romanus ignominiosa pace legiones servatas? Pacem sibi habeat, legiones captas victori restituat; hoc fide, hoc foederibus, hoc fetialibus caerimoniis dignum erat. 9 Ut quidem tu quod petisti per pactionem habeas, tot cives incolumes, ego pacem quam hos tibi remittendo pactus sum non habeam, hoc tu, A. Corneli, hoc vos, fetiales, iuris gentibus dicitis?

A.U.C. 434

10 "Ego vero istos quos dedi simulatis nec accipio nec dedi arbitror, nec moror quo minus in civitatem obligatam[2] sponsione commissa iratis omnibus dis, 11 quorum eluditur numen, redeant. Gerite bellum, quando Sp. Postumius modo legatum[3] genu perculit. Ita di credent Samnitem civem Postumium, non ci-

[1] iis σ: his (hiis A) Ω.

[2] obligatam F^3A^2: obluctam (or other corruptions) Ω: convictam Walters.

[3] legatum Walters and Conway: legatum fetialem (or fec-) Ω.

[1] An allusion to the Cloelia episode, II. xiii. 6–11.

[2] v. xlviii–xlix.

them reject the guarantee and the peace! Let us B.C. 320 fight it out in those circumstances, and in those positions, which were ours before peace was mentioned; let the Roman People not blame the pledge given by the consuls, nor let us blame the honour of the Roman People. Will you never, when you have been beaten, lack excuses for not holding to your covenants? You gave hostages to Porsinna —and withdrew them by a trick.[1] You ransomed your City from the Gauls with gold—and cut them down as they were receiving the gold.[2] You pledged us peace, on condition that we gave you back your captured legions—and you nullify the peace. And always you contrive to give the fraud some colour of legality. Does the Roman People not approve the preservation of its legions by a disgraceful peace? Let it keep its peace, and give back the captured legions to the victor; that would be conduct worthy of its promise, its covenants, its fetial ceremonies. That you, on your side, should have what you aimed at in your compact, the safety of these many citizens, but that I should not have the peace I stipulated for, when I released them,—is this the judgment which you, Aulus Cornelius, and you, fetials, render to the nations?

"As for me, I will none of these whom you pretend to be surrendering, nor do I deem them to be surrendered, neither do I stand in the way of their returning, despite the wrath of all the gods, whose divinity they have made a mock, to the City which is committed by their guarantee. Aye, go to war, since Spurius Postumius has just now jostled the envoy with his knee! So shall the gods believe that Postumius is a Samnite—not a Roman—citizen, vem Romanum esse, et a Samnite legatum Romanum violatum: eo vobis iustum in nos factum esse bellum.

A.U.C. 434

12 Haec ludibria religionum non pudere in lucem proferre et vix pueris dignas ambages senes ac consu-
13 lares fallendae fidei exquirere! I, lictor, deme vincla Romanis; moratus sit nemo, quo minus ubi visum fuerit abeant." Et illi quidem, forsitan et publica, sua certe liberata fide ab Caudio in castra Romana inviolati redierunt.

XII. Samnitibus pro superba pace infestissimum cernentibus renatum bellum, omnia[1] quae deinde evenerunt non in animis solum sed prope in oculis
2 esse; et sero ac nequiquam laudare senis Ponti utraque consilia, inter quae se media lapsos via[2] victoriae possessionem pace incerta mutasse; et beneficii et maleficii occasione amissa pugnaturos cum eis quos potuerint in perpetuum vel inimicos
3 tollere vel amicos facere. Adeoque nullodum certamine inclinatis viribus post Caudinam pacem animi mutaverant, ut clariorem inter Romanos deditio Postumium quam Pontium incruenta victoria inter
4 Samnites faceret, et geri posse bellum Romani pro victoria certa haberent, Samnites simul rebellasse et vicisse crederent Romanum.

[1] omnia ζ: omniaque Ω.
[2] media lapsos via Doujat (Madvig): media lapsos Ω: medio lapsos Perizonius.

and that a Roman envoy has been maltreated by a B.C. 320
Samnite, and that you, in consequence of this, have justly made war on us! Does it not shame you to bring forth into the light of day these mockeries of religion, and, old men and consulars as you are, to devise such quibbles to evade your promise as were scarce worthy of children? Go, lictor, strike their fetters from the Romans; let no man hinder them from departing when they list." And the guarantors, released it may be from the nation's pledge, but at all events from their own, returned from Caudium, inviolate, to the Roman camp.

XII. The Samnites now perceived that instead of their domineering peace they were confronted with the renewal of a most bitter war, and not only imagined but almost saw all the consequences which afterwards proceeded from it. Too late and all in vain did they praise the alternative policies suggested by the aged Pontius, between which they had fallen, and exchanged a victory already in their possession for an uncertain peace; they had let slip the opportunity both of doing good and of doing harm, and were going to fight with men whom they might permanently have removed from their path, as enemies, or have made their permanent friends. And though there had so far been no battle since the Caudine Peace to give an advantage to either side, yet such a change of feeling had come about that Postumius enjoyed more fame among the Romans for his surrender than did Pontius among the Samnites for his bloodless victory; and while the Romans regarded their being able to make war as certain victory, the Samnites felt that the Romans had at one and the same moment renewed the war and won it.

A.U.C. 434

5 Inter haec Satricani ad Samnites defecerunt, et Fregellae colonia necopinato adventu Samnitium—fuisse et Satricanos cum iis satis constat—nocte occupata est. Timor inde mutuus utrosque usque 6 ad lucem quietos tenuit; lux pugnae initium fuit, quam aliquamdiu aequam et quia pro aris ac focis dimicabatur et quia ex tectis adiuvabat imbellis 7 multitudo tamen[1] Fregellani sustinuerunt. Fraus deinde rem inclinavit, quod vocem audiri praeconis passi sunt, incolumem abiturum qui arma posuisset. Ea spes remisit a certamine animos, et passim arma 8 iactari coepta. Pertinacior pars armata per aversam portam erupit, tutiorque eis audacia fuit quam incautus ad credendum ceteris pavor, quos circumdatos igni nequiquam deos fidemque invocantes Samnites concremaverunt.

9 Consules inter se partiti provincias, Papirius in Apuliam ad Luceriam pergit, ubi equites Romani obsides ad Caudium dati custodiebantur, Publilius in Samnio substitit adversus Caudinas legiones. 10 Distendit ea res Samnitium animos, quod nec ad Luceriam ire, ne ab tergo instaret hostis, nec manere, ne Luceria interim amitteretur, satis audebant. 11 Optimum visum est committere rem fortunae

[1] multitudo tamen Ω: multitudo certamen (or multitudo) Madvig.

Meanwhile the Satricans revolted to the Samnites, B.C. 320 and the colony of Fregellae, in a surprise attack by the Samnites—accompanied, it would seem, by people from Satricum—was seized during the night. Mutual fear then caused both sides to remain quiet until the morning, when the light ushered in a battle which for a long time was equally sustained —for the townsfolk were fighting for their hearths and altars and a throng of those unfit for arms gave them assistance from the housetops,—still, the people of Fregellae held their own, until presently a ruse decided the victory; for they permitted a herald to be heard, who promised safety to any who laid down his arms. The hope of this relaxed the tension of their courage and on every side they began throwing their arms away. The more determined portion of them retained their weapons and burst out by the opposite gate, and their boldness stood them in better stead than did their too credulous timidity the others; for these the Samnites compassed about with fire, and, despite their appeals to Heaven and to the promise of their captors, burnt them alive.

The consuls having divided the provinces between them, Papirius took his way into Apulia towards Luceria, where the Roman knights given up at Caudium for hostages were being guarded, while Publilius stopped behind in Samnium to oppose the Caudine legions. This plan distracted the minds of the Samnites, since they neither dared move towards Luceria, lest they should bring the enemy down upon their rear, nor remain where they were, for fear that Luceria would meanwhile be lost. The best course seemed to be to entrust their cause to

A.U.C. 434 et transigere cum Publilio certamen; itaque in aciem copias educunt.

XIII. Adversus quos Publilius consul cum dimicaturus esset, prius adloquendos milites ratus contionem advocari iussit. Ceterum sicut ingenti alacritate ad praetorium concursum est, ita prae clamore poscentium pugnam nulla adhortatio im- 2 peratoris audita est: suus cuique animus memor ignominiae adhortator aderat. Vadunt igitur in proelium urgentes signiferos, et ne mora in concursu pilis emittendis stringendisque inde gladiis esset, pila velut dato ad id signo abiciunt strictisque gladiis 3 cursu in hostem feruntur. Nihil illic imperatoriae artis ordinibus aut subsidiis locandis fuit: omnia ira 4 militaris prope vesano impetu egit. Itaque non fusi modo hostes sunt, sed ne castris quidem suis fugam impedire[1] ausi Apuliam dissipati petiere; Luceriam tamen coacto rursus in unum agmine est perventum. 5 Romanos ira eadem quae per mediam aciem hostium tulerat et in castra pertulit. Ibi plus quam in acie sanguinis ac caedis factum praedaeque pars maior ira corrupta.

6 Exercitus alter cum Papirio consule locis maritimis pervenerat Arpos per omnia pacata Samnitium magis iniuriis et odio quam beneficio ullo populi Romani;

[1] impedire Ω: inhibere Madvig.

Fortune and fight it out with Publilius. They B.C. 320 accordingly formed up in line of battle.

XIII. Publilius the consul was ready to engage them, but thinking it best to encourage his soldiers first, he bade summon them to an assembly. But though they came running to the praetorium with vast alacrity, yet the outcry of those who demanded battle was so loud that the general's exhortation could not be heard; still, every man's own heart, remembering the late humiliation, was there to exhort him. So they went forward into battle, urging on their standard-bearers; and, that there might be no delay in coming to grips while they were discharging their javelins and drawing their swords, they threw away their javelins, as if a signal had been given them, and, sword in hand, pushed forward at the double against the enemy. No tactical skill was there employed in ranging centuries or reserves: the wrath of the soldiers swept everything along in its mad rush. And so not only were the Samnites routed, but not daring to interrupt their flight even at their camp, they dispersed and struck out for Apulia; yet they afterwards rallied again and came to Luceria in one body. The same fury that took the Romans through their enemy's battle-line, carried them also into his camp. There was more bloodshed and carnage there than in the battle, and the greater part of the booty was destroyed in anger.

The other army, under the consul Papirius, marching along the coast as far as Arpi, had found all peaceably disposed, more because of the wrongs done by the Samnites and the hatred they had engendered than owing to any favour shown by the 7 nam Samnites, ea tempestate in montibus vicatim habitantes, campestria et maritima loca contempto[1] cultorum molliore atque, ut evenit fere, locis simili genere ipsi montani atque agrestes depopulabantur. 8 Quae regio si fida Samnitibus fuisset, aut pervenire Arpos exercitus Romanus nequisset, aut interiecta penuria[2] rerum omnium exclusos a commeatibus 9 absumpsisset. Tum quoque profectos inde ad Luceriam, iuxta obsidentes obsessosque, inopia vexavit. Omnia ab Arpis Romanis suppeditabantur, ceterum adeo exigue ut militi occupato stationibus vigiliisque et opere eques folliculis in castra ab 10 Arpis frumentum veheret, interdum occursu hostium cogeretur abiecto ex equo frumento pugnare. Obsessis priusquam alter consul victore exercitu advenit, et commeatus ex montibus Samnitium invecti 11 erant et auxilia intromissa. Artiora omnia adventus Publili fecit, qui obsidione delegata in curam collegae vacuus[3] per agros cuncta infesta commeatibus hostium 12 fecerat. Itaque cum spes nulla esset diutius obsessos inopiam laturos, coacti Samnites, qui ad Luceriam castra habebant, undique contractis viribus signa cum Papirio conferre.

A.U.C. 434

XIV. Per id tempus parantibus utrisque se ad

[1] contempto $A^5\zeta$: contempta M: contemptu Ω

[2] interiecta penuria Tan. Faber (Walters and Conway): interiecta inter Romam et Arpos penuria Ω.

[3] vacuus Ω: uacuos A^1 (or A^2): uacuis U: uagus Duker (Madvig).

Roman People. For the Samnites, who in those B.C. 320 days dwelt in villages among the mountains, used to ravage the regions of the plain and coast, despising their cultivators, who were of a softer character, and one that—as often happens—resembled their country, while they themselves were rude highlanders. If this district had been faithful to the Samnites, it would either have been impossible for a Roman army to have got as far as Arpi, or the utterly barren nature of the intervening country would have destroyed them, cut off as they would have been from their supplies. Even as it was, when they had proceeded to the vicinity of Luceria, besiegers and besieged suffered alike from scarcity of food: everything was carried up from Arpi for the Romans, but so precarious were their supplies, that while the foot-soldiers were busy with outpost-duty, guard-mounting, and entrenching, the cavalry brought up corn for them from Arpi in leather pouches, and, now and then, encountering the enemy, were forced to throw off the corn from their horses and fight; the besieged, until the arrival of the other consul with his victorious army, had got in their provisions —and auxiliary forces too—from the mountains of the Samnites. The coming of Publilius tightened up the lines; for, turning the siege over to his colleague, he was free to range the country-side, where he made things difficult for the supply-trains of the enemy. The Samnites, therefore, who were encamped about Luceria, in despair of being able to endure the scarcity, if the siege continued, were obliged to gather up their forces from every quarter and give battle to Papirius.

XIV. At this juncture, while both sides were proelium legati Tarentini interveniunt denuntiantes Samnitibus Romanisque ut bellum omitterent: per utros stetisset quo minus discederetur ab armis, 2 adversus eos se pro alteris pugnaturos. Ea legatione Papirius audita perinde ac motus dictis eorum cum collega se communicaturum respondit; accitoque eo, cum tempus omne in apparatu pugnae consumpsisset, conlocutus de re haud dubia signum 3 pugnae proposuit. Agentibus divina humanaque quae adsolent cum acie dimicandum est consulibus Tarentini legati occursare responsum exspectantes; 4 quibus Papirius ait: "Auspicia secunda esse, Tarentini, pullarius nuntiat; litatum praeterea est egregie; auctoribus dis, ut videtis, ad rem gerendam pro- 5 ficiscimur." Signa inde ferre[1] iussit et copias eduxit, vanissimam increpans gentem quae, suarum impotens rerum prae domesticis seditionibus discordiisque, aliis modum pacis ac belli facere aequum censeret.

A.U.C. 434

6 Samnites ex parte altera, cum omnem curam belli remisissent, quia aut pacem vere cupiebant aut expediebat simulare, ut Tarentinos sibi conciliarent, cum instructos repente ad pugnam Romanos con- 7 spexissent, vociferari se in auctoritate Tarentinorum manere nec descendere in aciem nec extra vallum arma ferre; deceptos potius quodcumque casus ferat

[1] ferre Ω : ferri Gronovius.

[1] i.e. a red flag hung out in front of the general's tent.

[2] Two kinds of divination are alluded to: (1) by observing the feeding of the sacred chickens, (2) by inspecting the entrails of a victim.

making ready for the struggle, came ambassadors B.C. 320 from Tarentum, admonishing both Samnites and Romans to desist from war. Whichever party should oppose the cessation of hostilities, against that they proposed to fight in behalf of the other. After listening to these envoys, Papirius, as though moved by what they said, replied that he would consult his colleague. Having sent for Publilius, he employed every moment of the interval in making his preparations, and when he had conferred with him about a matter which admitted of no doubt, displayed the battle-signal.[1] The consuls were busy with matters pertaining to gods and to men, as they are wont to to be on the eve of an engagement, when the envoys from Tarentum approached them to receive their answer; to whom Papirius replied, "Tarentines, the keeper of the chickens reports that the signs are favourable; the sacrifice too has been exceedingly auspicious;[2] as you see, the gods are with us at our going into action." He then commanded to advance the standards, and marshalled his troops, with exclamations on the folly of a nation which, powerless to manage its own affairs, because of domestic strife and discord, presumed to lay down the limits of peace and war for others.

The Samnites, on their side, having dismissed from their minds every anxiety regarding the war, either because they sincerely wished for peace, or because it was expedient for them to pretend that they wished it, in order to gain the support of the Tarentines, when they beheld the Romans suddenly arrayed for battle, cried out that they would abide by the will of the Tarentines and would neither take the field nor advance beyond the rampart; they had

A.U.C. 434

passuros quam ut sprevisse pacis auctores Tarentinos
8 videantur. Accipere se omen consules aiunt et eam precari mentem hostibus ut ne vallum quidem
9 defendant. Ipsi inter se partitis copiis succedunt hostium munimentis et simul undique adorti, cum pars fossas explerent, pars vellerent vallum atque in fossas proruerent nec virtus modo insita sed ira etiam exulceratos ignominia stimularet animos, castra
10 invasere; et pro se quisque, non haec Furculas nec Caudium nec saltus invios esse, ubi errorem fraus superbe vicisset, sed Romanam virtutem, quam nec
11 vallum nec fossae arcerent memorantes, caedunt pariter resistentes fusosque, inermes atque armatos, servos liberos, puberes impubes, homines iumentaque;
12 nec ullum superfuisset animal, ni consules receptui signum dedissent avidosque caedis milites e castris
13 hostium imperio ac minis[1] expulissent. Itaque apud infensos ob interpellatam dulcedinem irae confestim oratio habita est, ut doceretur miles minime cuiquam militum consules odio in hostes cessisse
14 aut cessuros; quin duces sicut belli ita insatiabilis supplicii futuros fuisse, ni respectus equitum sescentorum qui Luceriae obsides tenerentur praepedisset[2] 15 animos, ne desperata venia hostes caecos in sup-

[1] ac minis $I^3\gamma$: agminis Ω.
[2] praepedisset (pre-) γ: praepedissent Ω.

[1] The omen lay in the Samnites' expressed purpose to offer no resistance.

been deceived, but they chose rather to endure B.C. 320
whatever Fortune might have in store for them than be thought to have spurned the peaceful advice of the Tarentines. The consuls declared that they embraced the omen,[1] praying that the enemy might be so minded as not even to defend his rampart. They themselves, dividing their troops between them, marched up to the earthworks of the Samnites, and attacked them at once from every side. Some began to fill the trenches, others to pull up the palings and fling them into the trenches; besides their native courage they were goaded on by anger at the disgrace that rankled in their hearts. Forcing their way into the camp, while every man repeated that here were no Forks, no Caudium, no trackless passes, where guile had arrogantly triumphed over error, but Roman manhood, which neither rampart nor trenches could keep out, they cut down without distinction those who resisted and those who fled, the armed and the unarmed, slaves and freemen, adults and children, men and beasts; nor would anything living have survived, had not the consuls bade sound the recall and expelled the bloodthirsty soldiers from the enemy's camp with commands and threats. The men were incensed at the interruption of their sweet revenge, and accordingly the consuls at once addressed them and explained that they had neither yielded nor meant to yield to any of the soldiers in hatred of the enemy: on the contrary, they would have led the way, as in war, so in the exaction of endless vengeance, had their indignation not been checked by thoughts of the six hundred knights who were being held as hostages in Luceria; but they feared that the enemy, if they despaired of

A.U.C. 434 plicia eorum ageret, perdere prius quam perire optantes. Laudare ea milites laetarique obviam itum irae suae esse ac fateri omnia patienda potius quam proderetur salus tot principum Romanae iuventutis.

A.U.C. 435 XV. Dimissa contione consilium habitum omnibusne copiis Luceriam premerent an altero exercitu et duce Apuli circa, gens dubiae ad id voluntatis, temptarentur. Publilius consul ad peragrandam profectus Apuliam aliquot expeditione una populos aut vi subegit aut condicionibus in societatem accepit. Papirio quoque, qui obsessor Luceriae restiterat, brevi ad spem eventus respondit. Nam insessis omnibus viis per quas commeatus ex Samnio subvehebantur, fame domiti Samnites qui Luceriae in praesidio erant legatos misere ad consulem Romanum, ut receptis equitibus qui causa belli essent absisteret obsidione. Iis Papirius ita respondit: debuisse eos Pontium Herenni filium, quo auctore Romanos sub iugum misissent, consulere quid victis patiendum censeret: ceterum quoniam ab hostibus in se aequa statui quam in se ipsi ferre maluerint, nuntiare Luceriam iussit, arma sarcinas iumenta multitudinem omnem imbellem intra moenia relinquerent; quarter, might be driven blindly to put their B.C. 320 prisoners to death, choosing to slay before they were slain themselves. These arguments the men applauded, and rejoiced that their wrath had been restrained; they confessed that it was better that they should suffer anything than betray the lives of so many distinguished young Romans.

XV. The assembly was dismissed, and a council of B.C. 319 war was held to determine whether they should press the siege with all their forces, or should employ one army and its general to test the dispositions of the Apulians around them—a people whose sympathies were still in doubt. The consul Publilius set out on a march through Apulia and in a single expedition either subjugated, or by granting terms, received into alliance, a goodly number of states. Papirius, too, who had remained behind at Luceria to conduct the siege, soon found the outcome answerable to his hopes; for all the roads by which supplies were wont to be brought in from Samnium were blocked, and the Samnite garrison were reduced by hunger to send a deputation to the Roman consul with an offer to release the horsemen who were the cause of the war, on condition that he would raise the siege. Papirius replied that they ought to have gone to Pontius, the son of Herennius, at whose instance they had sent the Romans under the yoke, to find out what the vanquished deserved to suffer; however, since they preferred that their enemies should decide on a just penalty for them, rather than propose one for themselves, he bade them take word to Luceria that they should leave their arms, packs, sumpter animals, and all the non-combatants, within the walls; the soldiers he in-militem se cum singulis vestimentis sub iugum missurum, ulciscentem inlatam, non novam inferentem ignominiam. Nihil recusatum. Septem milia militum sub iugum missa, praedaque ingens Luceriae capta receptis omnibus signis armisque quae ad Caudium amissa erant, et quod omnia superabat gaudia, equitibus reciperatis [1] quos pignora pacis custodiendos Luceriam Samnites dederant. Haud ferme alia mutatione subita rerum clarior victoria populi Romani est, si quidem etiam, quod quibusdam in annalibus invenio, Pontius Herenni filius, Samnitium imperator, ut expiaret consulum ignominiam, sub iugum cum ceteris est missus.

A.U.C. 435

Ceterum id minus miror obscurum esse de hostium duce dedito missoque; id magis mirabile est ambigi, Luciusne Cornelius dictator cum L. Papirio Cursore magistro equitum eas res ad Caudium atque inde Luceriam gesserit ultorque unicus Romanae ignominiae haud sciam an iustissimo triumpho ad eam aetatem secundum Furium Camillum triumphaverit, an consulum—Papirique praecipuum—id decus sit. Sequitur hunc errorem alius error, Cursorne Papirius proximis comitiis cum Q. Aulio Cerretano iterum ob rem bene gestam Luceriae continuato magistratu tended to send under the yoke, clad only in their tunics, inflicting on them no new disgrace, but requiting that which had first been put upon the Romans. They made no objection, and seven thousand men were sent under the yoke. Huge spoils were captured in Luceria, and all the standards and arms which had been lost at Caudium were retaken, and, to cap the climax of their joy, the horsemen were recovered whom the Samnites had assigned, as pledges of peace, to be guarded at Luceria. There is scarce any other Roman victory more glorious for its sudden reversal of fortune, especially if it is true, as I find in certain annals, that Pontius the son of Herennius, the Samnite general-in-chief, was sent with the rest under the yoke, to expiate the humiliation of the consuls. B.C. 319

[1] reciperatis Walters and Conway (passim): recuperatis Ω.

Be that as it may, I am not greatly surprised that there should be some doubt as to the general of the enemy who was surrendered and disgraced; the amazing thing is the uncertainty whether it was Lucius Cornelius, as dictator—with Lucius Papirius Cursor, as master of the horse—who won these victories at Caudium and subsequently at Luceria, and, because of the signal vengeance that he exacted for Rome's shame, enjoyed a triumph which I should be inclined to rate as the best-deserved of all down to that time, next after that of Furius Camillus; or whether that honour belongs to the consuls—and particularly to Papirius. This doubt is attended with another—whether at the ensuing election Papirius Cursor was retained in office in recognition of his victory at Luceria, being returned for a third time to the consulship, together with Quintus Aulius Cerretanus—then chosen for the second time—or consul tertium creatus sit an L. Papirius Mugillanus[1] et in cognomine erratum sit.

A.U.C. 435

XVI. Convenit iam inde per consules reliqua belli perfecta. Aulius cum Ferentanis[2] uno secundo proelio debellavit urbemque ipsam, quo se fusa contulerat acies, obsidibus imperatis in deditionem 2 accepit. Pari fortuna consul alter cum Satricanis, qui cives Romani post Caudinam cladem ad Samnites defecerant praesidiumque eorum in urbem acce- 3 perant, rem gessit. Nam cum ad moenia Satrici[3] admotus esset exercitus legatisque missis ad pacem cum precibus petendam triste responsum ab consule redditum esset, nisi praesidio Samnitium interfecto aut tradito ne ad se remearent, plus ea voce quam 4 armis inlatis terroris colonis iniectum. Itaque subinde exsequuntur quaerendo a consule legati quonam se pacto paucos et infirmos crederet praesidio tam valido et armato vim allaturos. Ab iisdem consilium petere iussi, quibus auctoribus praesidium in urbem accepissent, discedunt aegreque impetrato ut de ea 5 re consuli senatum responsaque ad se referri sineret 6 ad suos redeunt. Duae factiones senatum distinebant, una cuius principes erant defectionis a populo Romano auctores, altera fidelium civium; certatum ab utrisque tamen est ut ad reconciliandam pacem 7 consuli opera navaretur. Pars altera, cum praesidium

[1] Mugillanus PFUO: mugilanus MTDLA.
[2] Ferentanis $M^2I^2FUOT^2$: frentanis MTDLA: frentranis P: Forentanis Gronovius.
[3] Satrici γ: Satricae (or -ce) Ω.

[1] Their town has been conjecturally identified with Horace's "low-lying Forentum," Odes, III. iv. 16.

whether it was Lucius Papirius Mugillanus, and the B.C. 319 mistake was a matter of the surname.

XVI. It is agreed that from this point onwards the war was brought to a conclusion by the consuls. Aulius finished in one successful battle the campaign against the Ferentani,[1] and having exacted hostages, received the surrender of the city itself, in which their defeated army had taken refuge. With no less good fortune the other consul overcame the Satricans, who—though Roman citizens—had revolted, after the Caudine misfortune, to the Samnites, of whom they had admitted a garrison into their city. For when the Roman army had drawn near the walls of Satricum, the townspeople sent ambassadors to sue humbly for peace; but the consul returned them a harsh answer: that unless they put to death the Samnite garrison or delivered it up, they must come back to him no more—a saying which struck more terror into their hearts than the threatened assault. And so the envoys persisted in demanding of the consul how he supposed that they, being few and weak, could force so strong and well-armed a garrison. But he bade them seek advice from those same men at whose instigation they had received the garrison into their city; and after they had with no small difficulty persuaded him to suffer them to consult their senate in the matter and report to him its decision, they went back to their people. Two factions kept the senate divided: one of these had for leaders the men who had inspired the revolt from Rome, the other was composed of loyal citizens; both, however, were equally anxious to accommodate the consul, so that they might be granted peace. One party, seeing that the Samnite garrison was intend-

A.U.C. 435

Samnitium, quia nihil satis praeparati erat ad obsidionem tolerandam, excessurum proxima nocte esset,[1] enuntiare consuli satis habuit, qua noctis hora quaque porta et quam in viam egressurus hostis
8 foret; altera, quibus invitis descitum ad Samnites erat, eadem nocte portam etiam consuli[2] aperuerunt
9 armatosque clam hoste[3] in urbem acceperunt. Ita duplici proditione et praesidium Samnitium insessis circa viam silvestribus locis necopinato oppressum est, et ab urbe plena hostium clamor sublatus; momentoque unius horae caesus Samnis, Satricanus
10 captus, et omnia in potestate consulis erant. Qui quaestione habita quorum opera defectio esset facta, quos sontes comperit virgis caesos securi percussit praesidioque valido imposito arma Satricanis ademit.
11 Inde ad triumphum decessisse Romam Papirium Cursorem scribunt, qui eo duce Luceriam receptam
12 Samnitesque sub iugum missos auctores sunt. Et fuit vir haud dubie dignus omni bellica laude, non animi solum vigore sed etiam corporis viribus 13 excellens. Praecipua pedum pernicitas inerat, quae cognomen etiam dedit; victoremque[4] cursu omnium aetatis suae fuisse ferunt,[5] seu crurum[6] vi seu exer-

[1] esset D^3A^3: esse MTDLA: omitted by PFUO.
[2] consuli σ: consulibus Ω.
[3] clam hoste Gelenius: clam nocte Ω: clam Weissenborn.
[4] victoremque M^3F^1 (or F^3) A^x (over erasure) Frag. Hav.^{2}: uictorisque Ω.
[5] ferunt Madvig: ferunt et Ω.
[6] crurum Madvig: uirium Ω.

ing to escape on the following night—for they had B.C. 319 made no preparations for enduring a siege—deemed it sufficient to let the consul know at what hour and by what gate the enemy meant to leave, and what road he planned to take. The others, who had opposed going over to the Samnites, that same night also opened a gate to the consul, and without letting the Samnites know, admitted his soldiers into the city. In consequence of this double betrayal, the Samnite garrison was surprised and overpowered by an ambush laid in the woods about their road, while a shout went up in the city, which was filled with enemies. Thus, in one crowded hour, the Samnites were slain and the Satricans captured, and all things brought under the power of the consul; who conducted an investigation, and, having ascertained who were responsible for the defection, had the guilty parties scourged and beheaded; after which he imposed a strong garrison upon the Satricans and deprived them of their arms.

Papirius Cursor then departed for Rome to celebrate his triumph, as those writers state who name him as the commander who recovered Luceria and sent the Samnites under the yoke. No question, he was a man deserving of all praise as a soldier, excelling, as he did, not only in the vigour of his spirit, but in physical strength. He possessed remarkable fleetness of foot, which was even the source of his surname.[1] It is said that he vanquished all his mates at running, whether owing to the [1] Cursor means "runner," but the name seems really to have been an inheritance in the present case, for at chap. xxxiv. § 20 we read of it as belonging to the grandfather of our Papirius.

A.U.C. 435 citatione multa; cibi vinique eundem capacissimum;
14 nec cum ullo asperiorem, quia ipse invicti ad laborem corporis esset, fuisse militiam pediti pariter equi-15 tique; equites etiam aliquando ausos ab eo petere ut sibi pro re bene gesta laxaret aliquid laboris; 16 quibus ille "Ne nihil remissum dicatis, remitto," inquit, "ne utique dorsum demulceatis, cum ex equis descendetis." Et vis erat in eo viro imperii 17 ingens pariter in socios civesque. Praenestinus praetor per timorem segnius ex subsidiis suos duxerat in primam aciem; quem cum inambulans ante taber-18 naculum vocari iussisset, lictorem expedire securem iussit, ad quam vocem exanimi stante Praenestino:
"Agedum, lictor, excide radicem hanc" inquit "in-commodam ambulantibus," perfusumque ultimi sup-19 plicii metu multa dicta dimisit. Haud dubie illa aetate, qua nulla virtutum feracior fuit, nemo unus erat vir quo magis innixa res Romana staret. Quin eum parem destinant animis magno Alexandro ducem, si arma Asia perdomita in Europam vertisset.

XVII. Nihil minus quaesitum a principio huius operis videri potest quam ut plus iusto ab rerum ordine declinarem varietatibusque distinguendo opere et legentibus velut deverticula amoena et requiem strength of his legs or to much exercise; that he B.C. 319 had also the greatest capacity for food and wine; and that no general was harder on his men, whether horse or foot, for his own constitution could never be overcome by toil. It is related how his cavalrymen ventured once to ask him if in view of their good conduct he would not excuse them from some portion of their duties; to whom he answered, "That you may not say that I have excused you nothing, I freely excuse you from the duty of rubbing your backs when you dismount." And the man possessed a power of command which was equally effective with citizens and allies. A Praenestine praetor had, through timidity, been somewhat slow in bringing his men up from the supports to the fighting line. Papirius strolled over to the praetor's tent and having bidden them call him out, commanded a lictor to prepare his axe. Hearing this the praetor stood aghast, but Papirius said to the lictor, "Come, cut out this root; it is a nuisance to those who walk." He then fined the man and let him go, half-dead with the fear of capital punishment. There can be no doubt that in his generation, than which none was ever more fruitful of great qualities, there was no single man who did more to uphold the Roman State. Indeed people regard him as one who might have been a match in generalship for Alexander the Great, if the latter, after subjugating Asia, had turned his arms against Europe.

XVII. Nothing can be thought to have been more remote from my intention, since I first set about this task, than to depart unduly from the order of events, and to aim, by the introduction of ornamental digressions, at providing as it were agreeable by-

A.U.C. 435

2 animo meo quaererem; tamen tanti regis ac ducis mentio, quibus saepe tacitus[1] cogitationibus volutavi[2] animum, eas evocat in medium, ut quaerere libeat quinam eventus Romanis rebus, si cum Alexandro foret bellatum, futurus fuerit.

3 Plurimum in bello pollere videntur militum copia et virtus, ingenia imperatorum, fortuna per omnia
4 humana, maxime in res bellicas potens: ea et singula intuenti et universa, sicut ab aliis regibus gentibusque ita ab hoc quoque, facile praestant invictum
5 Romanum imperium. Iam primum, ut ordiar ab ducibus comparandis, haud equidem abnuo egregium ducem fuisse Alexandrum; sed clariorem tamen eum facit quod unus fuit, quod adulescens in incremento rerum, nondum alteram fortunam expertus, decessit.
6 Ut alios reges claros ducesque omittam, magna exempla casuum humanorum, Cyrum, quem maxime Graeci laudibus celebrant, quid nisi longa vita, sicut Magnum modo Pompeium, vertenti praebuit fortunae?
7 Recenseam duces Romanos, nec omnes omnium aetatium, sed ipsos eos cum quibus consulibus aut
8 dictatoribus Alexandro fuit bellandum, M. Valerium Corvum C. Marcium Rutulum[3] C. Sulpicium T. Manlium Torquatum Q. Publilium Philonem L. Papirium Cursorem Q. Fabium Maximum duos Decios

[1] tacitus PF: tacitis Ω.
[2] volutavi F: uolutauit Ω.
[3] Rutulum Conway (cf. his note on III. vii. 6): Rutilium Ω.

---

[1] Professor Anderson argues that the following digression (chap. xvii. § 3 through chap. xix) was a youthful exercise in rhetoric written when Livy was a boy and later inserted here without revision, but with the addition of an introductory section (§§ 1, 2). See his edition, App. III, and paths for the reader, and mental relaxation for myself. Nevertheless the mention of so great a prince and captain evokes certain thoughts which I have often silently pondered in my mind, and disposes me to enquire how the Roman State would have fared in a war with Alexander.[1] B.C. 319

It appears that in war the factors of chief importance are the numbers and valour of the soldiers, the abilities of the commanders, and Fortune, which, powerful in all the affairs of men, is especially so in war. These factors, whether viewed separately or conjointly, afford a ready assurance, that, even as against other princes and nations, so also against this one the might of Rome would have proved invincible. First of all—to begin by comparing commanders—I do not deny that Alexander was a remarkable general; still, his fame was enhanced by the fact that he was a sole commander, and the further fact that he died young, in the flood-tide of success, when as yet he had experienced no other lot. Not to speak of other distinguished kings and generals, illustrious proofs of human vicissitude, what else was it but length of days that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks exalt so high in their panegyrics, to the fickleness of Fortune? And the same thing was lately seen in the case of Pompey the Great. Need I repeat the names of the Roman generals, not all nor of every age, but those very ones with whom, as consuls or as dictators, Alexander would have had to fight—Marcus Valerius Corvus, Gaius Marcius Rutulus, Gaius Sulpicius, Titus Manlius Torquatus, Quintus Publilius Philo, Lucius Papirius Cursor, Quintus Fabius Maximus,

[1] Transactions of the American Philological Association, XXXIX. (1908), pp. 94–99.

A.U.C. 435

9 L. Volumnium M'. Curium?[1] Deinceps ingentes sequuntur viri, si Punicum Romano praevertisset
10 bellum seniorque in Italiam traiecisset. Horum in quolibet cum indoles eadem quae in Alexandro erat animi ingeniique; tum disciplina militaris, iam inde ab initiis urbis tradita per manus, in artis[2] perpetuis
11 praeceptis ordinatae modum venerat. Ita reges gesserant bella, ita deinde exactores regum Iunii Valeriique, ita deinceps Fabii Quinctii Cornelii, ita Furius Camillus, quem iuvenes ii quibus cum Alex-
12 andro dimicandum erat senem viderant. Militaria opera pugnando obeunti Alexandro—nam ea quoque haud minus clarum eum faciunt—cessisset videlicet in acie oblatus par Manlius Torquatus aut Valerius
13 Corvus, insignes ante milites quam duces, cessissent Decii, devotis corporibus in hostem ruentes, cessisset Papirius Cursor illo corporis robore, illo animi!
14 Victus esset consiliis iuvenis unius, ne singulos nominem, senatus ille, quem qui ex regibus constare dixit unus veram speciem Romani senatus cepit!
15 Id vero erat periculum, ne sollertius quam quilibet unus ex his quos nominavi castris locum caperet, commeatus expediret, ab insidiis praecaveret, tempus

[1] M'. Curium? Sigonius (C.I.L. i², p. 46): marcum (or m̄) Ω (C.I.L. i², pp. 135, 171): marcium O.
[2] artis A^6 ς: artes Ω.

[1] Cineas, the ambassador of King Pyrrhus. Cf. Plut. Pyrrhus, xix.

the two Decii, Lucius Volumnius, Manius Curius? B.C. 319
After these come some extraordinary men, if he had turned his attention to war with Carthage first and later with Rome, and had crossed into Italy when somewhat old. Any one of these was as highly endowed with courage and talents as was Alexander; and military training, handed down from the very beginning of the City, had taken on the character of a profession, built up on comprehensive principles. So the kings had warred; so after them the expellers of the kings, the Junii and the Valerii, and so in succession the Fabii, Quinctii, Cornelii, and Furius Camillus, whom in his old age those had seen, as youths, who would have had to fight with Alexander. But in the performance of a soldier's work in battle—for which Alexander was no less distinguished—Manlius Torquatus or Valerius Corvus would, forsooth, have yielded to him, had they met him in a hand-to-hand encounter, famous though they were as soldiers before ever they won renown as captains! The Decii, of course, would have yielded to him, who hurled their devoted bodies upon the foe! Papirius Cursor would have yielded, with that wondrous strength of body and of spirit! The counsels of a single youth would no doubt have got the better of that senate—not to speak of individual members—which was called an assembly of kings by him who before all others had a true conception of the Roman Senate![1] And I suppose there was the danger that Alexander would display more skill than any of these whom I have named, in selecting a place for a camp, in organizing his service of supply, in guarding against ambuscades, in choosing a time for battle, in

A.U.C. 435 pugnae deligeret, aciem instrueret, subsidiis firmaret!
16 Non cum Dareo[1] rem esse dixisset, quem mulierum ac spadonum agmen trahentem, inter purpuram atque aurum oneratum fortunae apparatibus suae, praedam verius quam hostem, nihil aliud quam bene ausus
17 vana contemnere incruentus devicit. Longe alius Italiae quam Indiae, per quam temulento agmine comisabundus incessit, visus illi habitus esset, saltus Apuliae ac montes Lucanos cernenti et vestigia recentia domesticae cladis ubi avunculus eius nuper, Epiri rex Alexander, absumptus erat.

XVIII. Et loquimur de Alexandro nondum merso secundis rebus, quarum nemo intolerantior fuit.
2 Qui si ex habitu novae fortunae novique, ut ita
3 dicam, ingenii quod sibi victor induerat spectetur, Dareo magis similis quam Alexandro in Italiam venisset et exercitum Macedoniae oblitum degene-4 rantemque iam in Persarum mores adduxisset.
Referre in tanto rege piget superbam mutationem vestis et desideratas humi iacentium adulationes, etiam victis Macedonibus graves, nedum victoribus, et foeda supplicia et inter vinum et epulas caedes
5 amicorum et vanitatem ementiendae stirpis. Quid

[1] Dareo MPTDL (and chap. xviii. § 3 MPOT) : dario (darici O) I^2FUA (and below P^2FUDLA).

---

[1] Darius III. defeated by Alexander in the battle of Arbela, 331 B.C.

[2] VIII. xxiv.

[3] Philotas was examined under torture and confessed participation in a plot against Alexander's life. He implicated also his father Parmenio, the general, and both were executed. Clitus, who had saved Alexander's life at the Granicus, was killed by him at a banquet in a fit of marshalling his troops, in providing strong reserves! B.C. 319

He would have said it was no Darius[1] whom he had to deal with, trailing women and eunuchs after him, and weighed down with the gold and purple trappings of his station. Him he found a booty rather than an enemy, and conquered without bloodshed, merely by daring to despise vain shows. Far different from India, through which he progressed at the head of a rout of drunken revellers, would Italy have appeared to him, as he gazed on the passes of Apulia and the Lucanian mountains, and the still fresh traces of that family disaster wherein his uncle, King Alexander of Epirus, had lost his life.[2]

XVIII. And we are speaking of an Alexander not yet overwhelmed with prosperity, which none has ever been less able to bear. For viewing him in the light of his new fortune and of the new character—if I may use the expression—which he had assumed as conqueror, he would evidently have come to Italy more like Darius than like Alexander, at the head of an army that had forgotten Macedonia and was already adopting the degenerate customs of the Persians. I am loath, in writing of so great a prince, to remind the reader of the ostentatious alteration in his dress, and of his desire that men should prostrate themselves in adulation, a thing which even conquered Macedonians would have found oppressive, much more then those who had been victorious; of his cruel punishments and the murder of his friends as they drank and feasted; of the boastful lie about his origin.[3] What if his love of wine had drunken rage. The last clause alludes to Alexander's claim that Zeus, not Philip, was his father.

A.U.C. 435

si vini amor in dies fieret acrior? Quid si trux ac praefervida ira?—Nec quicquam dubium inter scriptores refero—, nullane haec damna imperatoriis
6 virtutibus ducimus? Id vero periculum erat, quod levissimi ex Graecis, qui Parthorum quoque contra nomen Romanum gloriae favent, dictitare solent, ne maiestatem nominis Alexandri, quem ne fama
7 quidem illis notum arbitror fuisse, sustinere non potuerit populus Romanus; et adversus quem Athenis, in civitate fracta Macedonum armis, cernentes[1] tum maxime prope fumantes Thebarum ruinas, contionari libere ausi sunt homines—id quod ex monumentis orationum patet—adversus eum nemo ex tot proceribus Romanis vocem liberam missurus fuerit!
8 Quantalibet magnitudo hominis concipiatur animo; unius tamen ea magnitudo hominis erit collecta
9 paulo plus decem annorum felicitate; quam qui eo extollunt quod populus Romanus etsi nullo bello multis tamen proeliis victus sit, Alexandro nullius pugnae non secunda fortuna fuerit, non intellegunt se hominis res gestas, et eius iuvenis, cum populi iam quadringentesimum[2] bellantis annum rebus
10 conferre. Miremur si, cum ex hac parte saecula plura numerentur quam ex illa anni, plus in tam

[1] cernentes UD^x (Madvig): cernente Ω.
[2] quadringentesimum (i.e. CCCC) Tan. Faber: octingentesimum (i.e. DCCC) Ω.

[1] This is supposed to refer to Timagenes, an historian of a notoriously anti-Roman bias.

every day grown stronger? and his truculent and fiery anger? I mention only things which historians regard as certain. Can we deem such vices to be no detraction from a general's good qualities? But there was forsooth the danger—as the silliest of the Greeks,[1] who exalt the reputation even of the Parthians against the Romans, are fond of alleging—that the Roman People would have been unable to withstand the majesty of Alexander's name, though I think that they had not so much as heard of him; and that out of all the Roman nobles not one would have dared to lift up his voice against him, although in Athens, a city crushed by the arms of Macedonia, at the very moment when men had before their eyes the reeking ruins of the neighbouring Thebes, they dared inveigh against him freely, as witness the records of their speeches.[2] B.C. 3.519

However imposing the greatness of the man may appear to us, still this greatness will be that of one man only, and the fruits of little more than ten years of success. Those who magnify it for this reason, that the Roman People, albeit never in any war, have yet suffered defeat in a number of battles, whereas Alexander's fortune was never aught but prosperous in any battle, fail to perceive that they are comparing the achievements of a man—and a young man too—with those of a people that was now in its four hundredth year of warfare. Should it occasion us surprise if, seeing that upon the one side are counted more generations than are years

[2] An allusion, more rhetorical than exact, to the famous Philippics of Demosthenes, the latest of which was probably delivered some six years before the destruction of Thebes in 335 B.C.

A.U.C. 455 longo spatio quam in aetate tredecim annorum
11 fortuna variaverit? Quin tu hominis cum homine
12 et ducis cum duce fortunam confers?[1] Quot Romanos duces nominem quibus nunquam adversa fortuna pugnae fuit! Paginas in annalibus magistratuumque fastis[2] percurrere licet consulum dictatorumque quorum nec virtutis nec fortunae ullo
13 die populum Romanum paenituit. Et quo sint mirabiliores quam Alexander aut quisquam rex, denos vicenosque dies quidam dictaturam, nemo
14 plus quam annum consulatum gessit; ab tribunis plebis dilectus impediti sunt; post tempus ad bella ierunt, ante tempus comitiorum causa revocati sunt;
15 in ipso conatu rerum circumegit se annus; collegae nunc temeritas nunc pravitas impedimento aut damno fuit; male gestis rebus alterius successum est; tironem aut mala disciplina institutum exercitum acceperunt.
16 At hercule reges non liberi solum impedimentis omnibus sed domini rerum temporumque trahunt
17 consiliis cuncta, non sequuntur. Invictus ergo Alexander cum invictis ducibus bella gessisset et eadem fortunae pignora in discrimen detulisset;
18 immo etiam eo plus periculi subisset quod Macedones unum Alexandrum habuissent, multis casibus non

[1] hominis cum homine et ducis cum duce fortunam confers? Madvig: hominis cum homine et ducis (duces F) cum fortunam cum fortuna (cum fortuna fortunam T) confers Ω: homines cum homine, [et] duces cum duce, fortunam cum fortuna confers Walters and Conway.

[2] magistratuumque fastis Walters and Conway: magistratuum fastisque Ω.

---

[1] If we reckon the saeculum or "generation" at thirty-three years, the Rome of Alexander's time would have upon the other,[1] fortune should have varied more B.C. 319 in that long time than in a life of thirteen years? Why not compare a man's fortune with a man's, and a general's with a general's? How many Roman generals could I name who never suffered a reverse in battle! In our annals and lists of magistrates you may run through pages of consuls and dictators of whom it never on any day repented the Roman People, whether of their generalship or fortune. And what makes them more wonderful than Alexander or any king is this: some were dictators of ten or twenty days, and none held the consulship above a year; their levies were obstructed by the tribunes of the plebs; they were late in going to war, and were called back early to conduct elections; in the midst of their undertakings the year rolled round; now the rashness, now the frowardness of a colleague occasioned them losses or difficulties; they succeeded to affairs which others had mismanaged, they received an army of raw recruits, or one badly disciplined. Now consider kings: not only are they free from all impediments, but they are lords of time and circumstance, and in their counsels carry all things with them, instead of following in their train. So then, an undefeated Alexander would have warred against undefeated generals, and would have brought the same pledges of Fortune to the crisis. Nay, he would have run a greater risk than they, inasmuch as the Macedonians would have had but a single Alexander, not only exposed to many dangers, but endured a little over thirteen saecula. Livy says that people are really comparing these thirteen generations with the thirteen years of Alexander's (effective) life, i.e. his reign (336–323 B.C.).

A.U.C. 455

19 solum obnoxium sed etiam offerentem se, Romani multi fuissent Alexandro vel gloria vel rerum magnitudine pares, quorum suo quisque fato sine publico discrimine viveret morereturque.

XIX. Restat ut copiae copiis comparentur vel numero vel militum genere vel multitudine auxiliorum. Censebantur eius aetatis lustris ducena 2 quinquagena milia capitum. Itaque in omni defectione sociorum Latini nominis urbano prope dilectu 3 decem scribebantur legiones; quaterni quinique exercitus saepe per eos annos in Etruria, in Vmbria Gallis hostibus adiunctis, in Samnio, in Lucanis 4 gerebant bellum. Latium deinde omne cum Sabinis et Volscis et Aequis et omni Campania et parte Vmbriae Etruriaeque et Picentibus et Marsis Paelignisque ac Vestinis atque Apulis, adiuncta omni ora[1] Graecorum inferi maris a Thuriis[2] Neapolim et Cumas et inde Antio atque Ostiis tenus aut[3] socios validos Romanis aut fractos bello invenisset hostes. 5 Ipse traiecisset mare cum veteranis Macedonibus, non plus triginta milibus hominum et quattuor milibus equitum, maxime Thessalorum; hoc enim roboris erat. Persas Indos aliasque si adiunxisset gentes, impedimentum maius quam auxilium traheret.

[1] omni ora O^1A^x (or A^1) Aldus: omnis ora Ω.

[2] a Thuriis ζ: a Thuris (or athuris) Ω: authuris F: a brutiis Gronovius.

[3] aut Lobrae: Samnites aut Ω.

---

[1] In the last census which Livy had recorded (459 B.C.) were enrolled 117,321 persons (III. xxiv. 10). Livy seems to have consulted the records of the censors, at least occasionally.

[2] Or possibly: at every revolt of the Latin allies.

incurring them voluntarily, while there would have been many Romans a match for Alexander, whether for glory or for the greatness of their deeds, of whom each several one would have lived and died as his own fate commanded, without endangering the State. B.C. 319

XIX. It remains to compare the forces on both sides, whether for numbers, or types of soldiers, or size of their contingents of auxiliaries. The quinquennial enumerations of that period put the population at 250,000.[1] And so at the time when all the Latin allies were in revolt[2] it was the custom to enroll ten legions, by a levy which was virtually limited to the City. In those years frequently four and five armies at a time would take the field, in Etruria, in Umbria (where they also fought the Gauls), in Samnium, and in Lucania. Later on Alexander would have found all Latium, with the Sabines, the Volsci and the Aequi, all Campania, and a portion of Umbria and Etruria, the Picentes and the Marsi and Paeligni, the Vestini and the Apulians, together with the whole coast of the Lower Sea, held by the Greeks, from Thurii as far as Naples and Cumae, and thence all the way to Antium and Ostia—all these, I say, he would have found either powerful friends of the Romans or their defeated enemies. He himself would have crossed the sea with veteran Macedonians to the number of not more than thirty thousand foot and four thousand horse—mostly Thessalians—for this was his main strength. If to these he had added Persians and Indians and other nations, he would have found them a greater burden to have dragged about than a help.

A.U.C. 435

6 Adde, quod Romanis ad manum domi supplementum esset, Alexandro, quod postea Hannibali accidit, alieno in agro bellanti exercitus consenu-
7 isset. Arma clipei essent illis sarisaeque [1]: Romano scutum, maius corpori tegumentum, et pilum, haud paulo quam hasta vehementius ictu missuque [2] telum.
8 Statarius uterque miles, ordines servans; sed illa phalanx immobilis et unius generis, Romana acies distinctior, ex pluribus partibus constans, facilis partienti, quacumque opus esset, facilis iungenti.
9 Iam in opere quis par Romano miles, quis ad tolerandum laborem melior? Uno proelio victus Alexander bello victus esset: Romanum, quem Caudium, quem Cannae non fregerunt, quae fregisset acies?
10 Ne ille saepe, etiam si prima prospere evenissent, Persas et Indos et imbellem Asiam quaesisset et 11 cum feminis sibi bellum fuisse dixisset, quod Epiri regem Alexandrum mortifero volnere ictum dixisse ferunt, sortem bellorum in Asia gestorum ab hoc ipso iuvene cum sua conferentem.
12 Equidem cum per annos quattuor et viginti primo Punico bello classibus certatum cum Poenis recordor,

[1] Arma clipei essent illis sarisaeque Madvig: arma cluisset arma cluisset sarisaeque illis id est hastae M: arma cluisset sarisaeque etc. M^1 or M^2: arma clipeus (or clupeus) sarisaeque (or -eque) illis (or illis portare or illis, at or illis id est hastae) Ω.

[2] ictu missuque Ş: ictu missumque PTA^2: ictum missumque Ω.

---

[1] The sarisa was a pike 21 feet long.

[2] The hasta was ordinarily used as a pike or lance, but was sometimes thrown, by means of a thong.

[3] Aulus Gellius, XVII. xxi. 33, says that Alexander, as he

Add to this, that the Romans would have had recruits ready to call upon, but Alexander, as happened afterwards to Hannibal, would have found his army wear away, while he warred in a foreign land. His men would have been armed with targets and spears:[1] the Romans with an oblong shield, affording more protection to the body, and the Roman javelin, which strikes, on being thrown, with a much harder impact than the lance.[2] Both armies were formed of heavy troops, keeping to their ranks; but their phalanx was immobile and consisted of soldiers of a single type; the Roman line was opener and comprised more separate units; it was easy to divide, wherever necessary, and easy to unite. Moreover, what soldier can match the Roman in entrenching? Who is better at enduring toil? Alexander would, if beaten in a single battle, have been beaten in the war; but what battle could have overthrown the Romans, whom Caudium could not overthrow, nor Cannae? Nay, many a time—however prosperous the outset of his enterprise might have been—would he have wished for Indians and Persians and unwarlike Asiatics, and would have owned that he had before made war upon women, as Alexander, King of Epirus, is reported to have said, when mortally wounded, contrasting the type of war waged by this very youth in Asia, with that which had fallen to his own share.[3] B.C. 319

Indeed when I remember that we contended against the Carthaginians on the seas for four-and-was setting sail for Italy, remarked that he was going to the Romans, as it were to the men's quarters (andronitin); whereas the Macedonian had gone to the Persians, as to the quarters of the women (gynaeconitin).

A.U.C. 435
vix aetatem Alexandri suffecturam fuisse reor ad
13 unum bellum; et forsitan, cum et foederibus vetustis iuncta res Punica Romanae esset et timor par adversus communem hostem duas potentissimas armis virisque urbes armaret, simul[1] Punico Roma-
14 noque obrutus bello esset. Non quidem Alexandro duce nec integris Macedonum rebus sed experti tamen sunt Romani Macedonem hostem adversus Antiochum Philippum Persen non modo cum clade
15 ulla sed ne cum periculo quidem suo. Absit invidia verbo et civilia bella sileant: nunquam[2] a pedite, nunquam aperta acie, nunquam aequis, utique
16 nunquam nostris locis laboravimus; equitem sagittas, saltus impeditos, avia commeatibus loca gravis armis
17 miles timere potest. Mille acies graviores quam Macedonum atque Alexandri avertit avertetque, modo sit perpetuus huius qua vivimus pacis amor et civilis cura concordiae.—

A.U.C. 436–437
XX. M. Folius[3] Flaccina inde et L. Plautius
2 Venox consules facti. Eo anno ab frequentibus Samnitium populis de foedere renovando legati cum senatum humi strati movissent, reiecti ad populum
3 haudquaquam tam efficaces habebant preces. Itaque de foedere negatum; indutiae biennii, cum per aliquot dies fatigassent singulos precibus, impetratae.

[1] simul ζ: et simul Ω.
[2] nunquam Dobree and Madvig: nunquam ab equite hoste nunquam Ω.
[3] Folius ζ: follius (or ollius) Ω: Foslius Sigonius (C.I.L. i², p. 130).

[1] The earliest treaty was said to have been made in 509 B.C. (Livy does not mention it, but Polybius does, at III. xxii.); and another in 348. See VII. xxvii. 2, and note.

twenty years, I think that the whole life of Alexander would hardly have sufficed for this single war; and perchance, inasmuch as the Punic State had been by ancient treaties leagued with the Roman,[1] and the two cities most powerful in men and arms might well have made common cause against the foe whom both dreaded, he had been crushed beneath the simultaneous attacks of Rome and Carthage. The Romans have been at war with the Macedonians—not, to be sure, when Alexander led them or their prosperity was unimpaired, but against Antiochus, Philippus, and Perses—and not only without ever suffering defeat, but even without incurring any danger. Proud word I would not speak, but never—and may civil wars be silent!—never have we been beaten by infantry, never in open battle, never on even, or at all events on favourable ground: cavalry and arrows, impassable defiles, regions that afford no road to convoys, may well occasion fear in heavy-armed troops. A thousand battle-arrays more formidable than those of Alexander and the Macedonians have the Romans beaten off—and shall do—if only our present love of domestic peace endure and our concern to maintain concord. B.C. 319

XX. Marcus Polius Flaccina and Lucius Plautius Venox were the next consuls. In that year came ambassadors from many Samnite states to seek a renewal of the treaty. Prostrating themselves before the senate, they aroused the pity of that order, but on being referred to the people found their prayers by no means so efficacious. Accordingly they were refused the treaty, but after some days spent in importuning individual citizens, they suc- B.C. 318–317

A.U.C. 4 Et ex Apulia Teanenses Canusinique populationibus
326–427 fessi obsidibus L. Plautio consuli datis in deditionem
5 venerunt. Eodem anno primum praefecti Capuam creari coepti legibus ab L. Furio praetore datis, cum utrumque ipsi pro remedio aegris rebus discordia
6 intestina petissent; et duae Romae additae tribus, Ufentina ac Falerna.
7 Inclinatis semel in Apulia rebus Teates quoque Apuli ad novos consules, C. Iunium Bubulcum Q.
Aemilium Barbulam, foedus petitum venerunt, pacis per omnem Apuliam praestandae populo Romano 8 auctores. Id audacter spondendo impetravere, ut foedus daretur neque ut aequo tamen foedere sed ut 9 in dicione populi Romani essent. Apulia perdomita —nam Forento [1] quoque, valido oppido, Iunius potitus erat—in Lucanos perrectum: inde repentino adventu 10 Aemili consulis Nerulum vi captum. Et postquam res Capuae stabilitas Romana disciplina fama per socios volgavit. Antiatibus quoque, qui se sine legibus certis, sine magistratibus agere querebantur, dati ab senatu ad iura statuenda ipsius coloniae patroni; nec arma modo sed iura etiam Romana late pollebant.

A.U.C. 428 XXI. C. Iunius Bubulcus et Q. Aemilius Barbula

[1] nam Forento Gronovius Iam Iorento M: nam florento PFOT[2] (marg.): nam florente U: nam Torento TDLA: iam torento (al. laurento) A[2].

---

[1] Making the number now thirty-one.

[2] Teate was in reality only another name for Teanum. Livy has been drawing upon two authorities, and their use of different names for the same people has led him to make two episodes out of one.

[3] Prominent Romans were often invited to act in a semi-official relation of protectorship to Italian or even to foreign towns.

ceeded in obtaining a two years' truce. In Apulia, likewise, the Teanenses and Canusini, exhausted by the devastation of their lands, gave hostages to Lucius Plautius the consul and made submission. In the same year praefects began to be elected and sent out to Capua, after Lucius Furius, the praetor, had given them laws—both steps being taken at the instance of the Capuans themselves, as a remedy for the distress occasioned by internal discord. At Rome two tribes were added, the Ufentina and the Falerna.[1] B.C. 318–317

When affairs had once taken a turn in Apulia, the Apulian Teates[2] also came to the new consuls, Gaius Junius Bubulcus and Quintus Aemilius Barbula, to sue for a treaty, engaging to insure the Roman People peace throughout Apulia. By this bold pledge they prevailed so far as to obtain a treaty—not, however, on equal terms, but such as made them subject to the Romans. After Apulia had been thoroughly subdued—for Forentum, a strong town, had also fallen into the hands of Junius—the campaign was extended to the Lucanians, from whom, on the sudden arrival of Aemilius the consul, Nerulum was taken by assault. And once it had been noised abroad amongst the allies how the affairs of Capua were firmly established by Roman discipline, the Antiates, too, complained that they were living without fixed statutes and without magistrates, and the senate designated the colony's own patrons to draw up laws for it.[3] Not Roman arms alone but also Roman law began to exert a widespread influence.

XXI. The consuls Gaius Junius Bubulcus and Quintus Aemilius Barbula gave over their legions, at B.C. 316

A.U.C. 438 consules exitu anni non consulibus ab se creatis, Sp. Nautio et M. Popilio, ceterum dictatori L. Aemilio 2 legiones tradiderant. Is cum L. Fulvio magistro equitum Saticulam[1] oppugnare adortus rebellandi 3 causam Samnitibus dedit. Duplex inde terror inlatus Romanis: hinc Samnis magno exercitu coacto ad eximendos obsidione socios haud procul castris Romanorum castra posuit; hinc Saticulani magno cum tumultu patefactis repente portis in stationes hostium 4 incurrerunt. Inde pars utraque, spe alieni magis auxilii quam viribus freta suis, iusto mox proelio inito Romanos urgent, et quamquam anceps dimicatio erat, tamen utrimque tutam aciem dictator habuit, quia et locum haud facilem ad circumveniendum 5 cepit et diversa statuit signa. Infestior tamen in erumpentes incessit nec magno certamine intra moenia compulit, tum totam aciem in Samnites 6 obvertit. Ibi plus certaminis fuit; victoria sicut sera ita nec dubia nec varia fuit. Fusi in castra Samnites exstinctis nocte ignibus tacito agmine abeunt et spe abiecta Saticulae tuendae Plisticam[2] ipsi, socios Romanorum, ut parem dolorem hosti redderent, circumsidunt.

A.U.C. 439 XXII. Anno circumacto bellum deinceps ab dicta-

[1] Saticulam (and in § 3 Saticulani and in § 6 Saticulae) Sigonius (Diod. XIX. lxxii. 4): Satriculam (and Satriculani and Satriculae below) Ω.

[2] Plisticam Sigonius (Diod. XIX. lxxii. 3): plistiam $M^2D^1A^2$: plistiam postiam F: post iam philistiam O: postiam Ω.

---

[1] Saticula was probably on the border between Campania and Samnium, and possibly occupied the same site as the modern S. Agata dei Goti.

the conclusion of the year, not to Spurius Nautius B.C. 316 and Marcus Popilius, the consuls at whose election they had presided, but to a dictator—Lucius Aemilius. The latter, with Lucius Fulvius, his master of the horse, laid siege to Saticula,[1] and by so doing afforded the Samnites a pretext for renewing the war. The Romans were thus threatened in two quarters: on the one side the Samnites, with a large army which they had mustered to relieve their besieged allies, were encamped at no great distance from the Roman camp; on the other side the Saticulani suddenly threw their gates wide open and charged pell-mell against the outposts of the Romans. Both hostile armies—each relying rather on the other's help than on any strength of its own—then pressed home their attack, in what soon developed into a general engagement. But the dictator, despite the twofold struggle, was protected on both fronts, since he had chosen a position that was difficult to turn, and made his maniples face opposite ways. However, he attacked the sallying party with the greater fury, and, encountering no very sharp resistance, drove them back into the town. He then directed his entire line against the Samnites. There was more resistance here, but though the victory was slow in coming yet it was neither dubious nor partial. The Samnites fled in disorder to their camp, and in the night, putting out their fires, they silently stole away, and relinquishing all hope of saving Saticula, themselves laid siege to Plistica, an ally of Rome, that they might pay the enemy out in their own coin.

XXII. When the year had come round, the con- B.C. 315 duct of the war passed without a break into the tore Q. Fabio gestum est; consules novi, sicut superiores, Romae manserunt; Fabius ad accipiendum ab Aemilio exercitum ad Saticulam cum supplemento

A.U.C. 459

2 venit. Neque enim Samnites ad Plisticam[1] manserant sed accitis ab domo novis militibus multitudine freti castra eodem quo antea loco posuerunt lacessentesque proelio Romanos avertere ab obsidione co-
3 nabantur. Eo intentius dictator in moenia hostium versus id bellum tantum[2] ducere quod urbem oppugnabat, securior ab Samnitibus agere stationibus
4 modo oppositis ne qua in castra vis fieret. Eo ferocius adequitare Samnites vallo neque otium pati. Et cum iam prope in portis castrorum esset hostis, nihil consulto dictatore magister equitum Q. Aulius Cerretanus magno tumultu cum omnibus turmis
5 equitum evectus summovit hostem. Tum in[3] minime pertinaci genere pugnae sic fortuna exercuit opes ut insignes[4] utrimque clades et clara ipsorum
6 ducum ederet funera. Prior Samnitium imperator, aegre patiens quo[5] tam ferociter adequitasset inde se fundi fugarique, orando hortandoque equites
7 proelium iteravit; in quem insignem inter suos cientem pugnam magister equitum Romanus infesta cuspide ita permisit equum ut uno ictu exanimem

[1] plisticam edd. (with Ω in § 11): plistiam Ω.
[2] tantum (= tantummodo) Gronovius: tantum nitebatur ς: tanti Ω.
[3] tum in ς: cum in Ω: cumq. T.
[4] insignes ς: insignis Ω.
[5] quo ς: quod Ω.

[1] The men whose names are by so strange an oversight omitted here were L. Papirius Cursor and Q. Publilius Philo, each of whom had thrice held the office.

hands of the dictator Quintus Fabius. The new B.C. 315 consuls,[1] as their predecessors had done, remained in Rome; Fabius took new forces to replace the old, and proceeded to Saticula, to receive the army from Aemilius. For the Samnites had not continued before Plistica, but, summoning fresh troops from home and confiding in their numbers, had pitched their camp on the same spot as before, and were trying to provoke the Romans into giving battle, in the endeavour to divert them from the siege. This but intensified the dictator's concentration on the enemy's walls, for he deemed the war to consist solely in the attack upon the city, and treated the Samnites with much indifference, save only that he posted out-guards to prevent their making any inroad upon his camp. But this only made the Samnites the more audacious, and riding again and again up to the rampart, they gave no respite to the Romans. And now the enemy were almost in the gateway of the camp, when Quintus Aulius Cerretanus, the master of the horse, without consulting the dictator, sallied out with all his squadrons in a furious charge and drove them off. At this juncture—though in a type of battle by no means marked by obstinacy—Fortune so used her powers as to bring extraordinary losses on both sides, and on the commanders themselves distinguished deaths. The Samnite general first, indignant at being routed and put to flight from a position he had so boldly occupied, prevailed with his troopers by entreaties and encouragement to renew the conflict; against whom, conspicuous amongst his followers as he urged them into battle, the Roman master of the horse rode such a tilt with levelled lance as at one lunge unhorsed and killed

A.U.C. 439

equo praecipitaret. Nec, ut fit, ad ducis casum 8 perculsa magis quam inritata est multitudo; omnes qui circa erant in Aulium temere invectum per 9 hostium turmas tela coniecerunt; fratri praecipuum decus ulti Samnitium imperatoris dedederunt.[1] Is victorem detractum ex equo magistrum equitum plenus maeroris atque irae trucidavit, nec multum afuit quin corpore etiam, quia inter hostilis cecide-10 rat turmas, Samnites potirentur. Sed extemplo ad pedes descensum ab Romanis est coactique idem Samnites facere; et repentina acies circa corpora ducum pedestre proelium iniit, quo haud dubie superat Romanus, reciperatumque Auli corpus mixta 11 cum dolore laetitia victores in castra referunt. Sam-nites duce amisso et per equestre certamen temptatis viribus omissa Saticula, quam nequiquam defendi rebantur, ad Plisticae obsidionem redeunt, intraque paucos dies Saticula Romanus per deditionem, Plistica per vim Samnis potitur.

XXIII. Mutata inde belli sedes est; ad Soram
2 ex Samnio Apuliaque traductae legiones. Sora ad Samnites defecerat interfectis colonis Romanorum.
Quo cum prior Romanus exercitus ad ulciscendam civium necem reciperandamque coloniam magnis itineribus pervenisset[2] et sparsi[3] per vias speculatores

[1] di (dii) dederunt Walch (who also suggested deditum): dederunt Ω: dedere A^2.

[2] pervenisset ζ: praeuenisset Ω.

[3] et sparsi ζ: sparsi Ω: sparsiq. ζ.

him. Yet the rank and file were not more dismayed B.C. 315 by their leader's death—though it often happens so —than they were angered; and as Aulius rode recklessly on through the enemy's squadrons, all those about him darted their javelins at him. But the glory of avenging the Samnite general was given by Heaven in largest measure to his brother, who, wild with grief and rage, dragged down the victorious Roman from his seat and slew him. Indeed the Samnites almost got possession of the body, which had fallen in the midst of their troops. But the Romans at once dismounted, and the Samnites were forced to do the same; and hurriedly forming up their lines, they began a battle on foot around the bodies of their generals, in which the Romans had easily the better. So they rescued the body of Aulius, which they bore back victoriously to their camp, with mingled feelings of sorrow and satisfaction. The Samnites, having lost their commander, and having tried what they could do in a cavalry engagement, gave up Saticula, which they felt was holding out in vain, and returned to the siege of Plistica. Within a few days' time Saticula had surrendered to the Romans and the Samnites had carried Plistica by assault.

XXIII. The seat of war was now shifted, and the legions were transferred from Samnium and Apulia to Sora, which had gone over to the Samnites, after putting to death the Roman colonists. The Roman army, by a series of forced marches, undertaken to avenge their slaughtered fellow-citizens and regain the colony, came first upon the ground. But the scouts who had scattered out along the roads reported one after the other that the Samnite legions

A.U.C. 459

3 sequi legiones Samnitium nec iam procul abesse alii
4 super alios nuntiarent, obviam itum hosti atque ad Lautulas ancipiti proelio dimicatum est. Non caedes non fuga alterius partis sed nox incertos
5 victi victoresne essent diremit. Invenio apud quosdam adversam eam pugnam Romanis fuisse atque in ea cecidisse Q. Aulium magistrum equitum.
6 Suffectus in locum Auli C. Fabius magister equitum cum exercitu novo ab Roma advenit et per praemissos nuntios consulto dictatore ubi subsisteret quove tempore et qua ex parte hostem adgrederetur, substitit occultus ad omnia satis exploratis consiliis.
7 Dictator cum per aliquot dies post pugnam continuisset suos intra vallum obsessi magis quam
8 obsidentis modo, signum repente pugnae proposuit et efficacius ratus ad accendendos virorum fortium animos nullam alibi quam in semet ipso cuiquam relictam spem de magistro equitum novoque ex-
9 ercitu militem celavit, et tamquam nulla nisi in eruptione spes esset, "Locis" inquit "angustis, milites, deprehensi, nisi quam victoria patefecerimus
10 viam nullam habemus. Stativa nostra munimento satis tuta sunt, sed inopia eadem infesta; nam et circa omnia defecerunt unde subvehi commeatus poterant, et si homines[1] iuvare velint, iniqua loca 11 sunt. Itaque non frustrabor ego vos castra hic

[1] homines γ: omnes Ω.

[1] Whom Diodorus follows (XIX. lxxii.).

[2] The Fasti Capitolini give his name in full as C. Fabius M. f. N. n. Ambustus, which makes him a brother of the dictator.

[3] i. e. down the valley of the Liris, through the Samnite army, for the other way was blocked by the town of Sora.

were following and were already close at hand. B.C. 315
Whereupon the Romans marched to meet the enemy, and an indecisive battle was fought near Lautulae. It was not the losses nor the rout of either army that put a stop to the engagement, but darkness, which left them uncertain if they had lost or won. I find in some authorities[1] that the Romans were defeated in this battle, and that it was here that the master of the horse, Quintus Aulius, lost his life. To fill out the term of Aulius they appointed Gaius Fabius,[2] who marched from Rome with a fresh army. Sending messengers on ahead to the dictator, he consulted him as to where he should halt, and when, and from what quarter, attack the enemy. On being accurately informed regarding every detail of the dictator's plans, he halted where his army could lie concealed. For some days after the battle the dictator had kept his soldiers within their works, more like one besieged than a besieger. Then, suddenly, he displayed the battle-signal, and thinking it more efficacious for quickening the courage of brave men to leave none of them any hope but in himself, he concealed from his troops the arrival of the master of the horse and his new army, and, as though their only salvation lay in cutting their way through, "Soldiers," he said, "we are trapped and have no way of escape save such as victory shall open to us.[3] Our standing camp is sufficiently protected by its rampart, but for lack of provisions is untenable; for every place round about us from which supplies could be brought up has revolted, and even if men wished to help us, the character of the country is against it. I will therefore not beguile you by leaving the camp standing here for you to

A.U.C. 459 relinquendo, in quae infecta victoria sicut pristino die vos recipiatis. Armis munimenta, non muni-
12 mentis arma tuta esse debent. Castra habeant repetantque quibus operae est trahere bellum: nos omnium rerum respectum praeterquam victoriae
13 nobis abscidamus. Ferte signa in hostem; ubi extra vallum agmen excesserit, castra quibus imperatum est incendant. Damna vestra, milites, omnium circa 14 qui defecerunt populorum praeda sarcientur." Et oratione dictatoris, quae necessitatis ultimae index erat, milites accensi vadunt in hostem, et respectus ipse ardentium castrorum, quamquam proximis tantum—ita enim iusserat dictator—ignis est subditus, 15 haud parvum fuit inritamentum. Itaque velut vecordes inlati signa primo impetu hostium turbant; et in tempore, postquam ardentia procul vidit castra, magister equitum—id convenerat signum—hostium terga invadit. Ita circumventi Samnites, qua potest
16 quisque, fugam per diversa petunt; ingens multitudo in unum metu conglobata ac semet ipsam turba
17 impediens in medio caesa. Castra hostium capta direptaque, quorum praeda onustum militem in Romana castra dictator reducit, haudquaquam tam victoria laetum, quam quod praeter exiguam deformatam incendio partem cetera contra spem salva invenit.

A.U.C. 449 XXIV. Ad Soram inde reditum; novique consules M. Poetelius C. Sulpicius exercitum ab dictatore make a refuge, if you fail of victory, as on the former B.C. 315 occasion. Entrenchments should be secured by arms, not arms by entrenchments. Let those have a camp, and retire to it, who have time to prolong the war: as for us, let us shut out all regard for everything but victory. Forward against the enemy! When the column is outside the rampart, let those who have been ordered to do so fire the camp! Your losses, men, shall be made good with the spoils of all the revolted peoples round about!" Inflamed by the dictator's speech, which pointed to the direst necessity, the soldiers advanced upon the foe; and the mere sight of their blazing camp as they glanced back, though only the nearest tents were set afire—for so the dictator had commanded—was no small whet to their resentment. And so, charging like madmen, they threw the enemy's ranks into confusion at the first assault; and in the nick of time the master of the horse, who had seen far away the burning camp—which was the signal they had agreed upon—assaulted the enemy from behind. Being thus hemmed in, the Samnites fled, as each best might, in different directions; a vast throng huddled up together, in their terror, and blocking each other's way in the confusion, were cut down where they stood. The enemy's camp was seized and plundered, and the soldiers, laden with the spoils, were led back by the dictator to the Roman camp, rejoicing not so greatly in their victory as because, contrary to their expectation, they found all safe there, except for a trifling part that had been damaged by the flames.

XXIV. The Romans then returned to Sora: and B.C. 314 new consuls, Marcus Poetelius and Gaius Sulpicius,

A.C.U. 440

Fabio accipiunt magna parte veterum militum dimissa novisque cohortibus in supplementum ad-
2 ductis. Ceterum cum propter difficilem urbis situm nec oppugnandi satis certa ratio iniretur et aut tempore longinqua aut praeceps periculo victoria
3 esset, Soranus transfuga clam ex oppido profectus, cum ad vigiles Romanos penetrasset, duci se extemplo ad consules iubet deductusque traditurum
4 urbem promittit. Visus[1] inde, cum quonam modo id praestaturus esset percontantes doceret, haud vana adferre, perpulit prope adiuncta moenibus Romana castra ut sex milia ab oppido removerentur:
5 fore ut minus intentae in custodiam urbis diurnae stationes ac nocturnae vigiliae essent. Ipse insequenti nocte sub oppido silvestribus locis cohortibus insidere iussis decem milites delectos secum per ardua ac prope invia in arcem ducit, pluribus quam
6 pro numero virorum missilibus telis eo conlatis; ad hoc saxa erant et temere iacentia, ut fit in aspretis, et de industria etiam, quo locus tutior esset, ab oppidanis congesta.

7 Ubi cum constituisset Romanos semitamque angustam et arduam erectam ex oppido in arcem ostendisset, "Hoc quidem ascensu" inquit "vel tres
8 armati quamlibet multitudinem arcuerint: vos et

[1] visus γ: iussus (or uissus) Ω.

[1] The legions had been three years in the field, although some of the soldiers, who had been enlisted to replace those killed or disabled, had not served so long. These latter were retained with the colours and the others were discharged. The word "cohorts" is anachronistic: Livy had perhaps forgotten that the organization by cohorts dated only from the time of Marius.

[2] Apparently conceived of as merely an unfortified and for the time being, unoccupied height.

took over the army from Fabius the dictator, dismiss- B.C. 314
ing a great part of the veteran troops and bringing in new cohorts to replace them.[1] But the city lay in a troublesome position, where the Romans could devise no very certain way of getting at it, and it seemed that victory would either be long in coming, or fraught with fearful risks; when a Soran deserter stole out of the town, and picking his way to the Roman sentinels, bade them bring him immediately to the consuls. Arrived in their presence, he offered to betray the city. On being questioned how he could accomplish it, he satisfied his interrogators that his plan was not unfeasible, and induced them to withdraw the Roman camp—which was almost in contact with the city walls—to a distance of six miles from the town; for so, he said, the sentinels would be less vigilant in guarding the place, whether by night or day. He himself on the following night, having directed certain cohorts to seek cover in the woods below the town, took with him ten picked men, whom he conducted over steep and almost impassable ground up to the citadel.[2] Here he had brought together a quantity of missiles out of all proportion to the number of men, besides which there were stones—both those which happened to be lying there, as is usual in rough country, and those which the townsmen had piled up on purpose, for the better protection of the place.

On this height he posted the Romans, and, indicating to them a steep and narrow path which led up from the town to the citadel, he said, "From an ascent like this three men would be enough to keep back a multitude, however numerous: you are not decem numero, et quod plus est, Romani Romanorumque fortissimi viri estis. Et locus pro vobis et nox erit, quae omnia ex incerto maiora territis ostentat. Ego iam terrore omnia implebo: vos 9 arcem intenti tenete." Decurrit inde, quanto maxime poterat cum tumultu, "Ad arma!" et "Pro vestram fidem, cives!" clamitans; "arx ab hostibus 10 capta est: defendite!"[1] Haec incidens principum foribus, haec obviis, haec excurrentibus in publicum pavidis increpat. Acceptum ab uno pavorem plures 11 per urbem ferunt. Trepidi magistratus missis ad arcem exploratoribus cum tela et armatos tenere arcem multiplicato numero audirent, avertunt animos 12 a spe reciperandae arcis; fuga cuncta complentur portaeque ab semisomnis ac maxima parte inermibus refringuntur, quarum per unam praesidium Romanum clamore excitatum inrumpit et concursantes per vias 13 pavidos caedit. Iam Sora capta erat, cum consules prima luce advenere et quos reliquos fortuna ex nocturna caede ac fuga fecerat in deditionem 14 accipiunt. Ex his ducentos viginti quinque, qui omnium consensu destinabantur et infandae colonorum caedis et defectionis auctores, vinctos Romam deducunt; ceteram multitudinem incolumem praesidio imposito Sorae relinquunt. Omnes qui Romam 15 deducti erant virgis in foro caesi ac securi percussi, summo gaudio plebis, cuius maxime intererat tutam only ten, but Romans, and of Romans the very bravest. You will have the advantage of position and of night, which makes everything loom greater in the eyes of frightened men, because of the obscurity. As for me, I will presently strike terror into every heart: do you hold the citadel and watch." He then ran down, making all the noise he could, as he cried "To arms!" and "Help, help, my countrymen! The citadel has been taken by the enemy! Defend us!" These words he shouted as he knocked at the doors of the great, the same to all he met, the same to those who rushed out terrified into the streets. The panic begun by one man was spread by numbers through all the city. Quaking with fear, the magistrates dispatched scouts to investigate, and on hearing that armed men, in exaggerated numbers, held the citadel, relinquished all hope of regaining it. The city was thronged with fugitives, and men who were hardly yet awake and most of them unarmed, began battering down the gates. Through one of them rushed in the band of Romans, who had started up on hearing the outcry, and now running through the streets, cut down the frightened townsfolk. Sora was already taken, when the consuls arrived at early dawn, and received the surrender of such as Fortune had spared in the rout and slaughter of the night. Of these, two hundred and twenty-five, who were designated on all hands as the authors of the revolt and the hideous massacre of the colonists, they sent to Rome in chains; the rest they left unharmed in Sora, only setting a garrison over them. All those who were taken to Rome were scourged and beheaded in the Forum, to the great joy of the commons, whom it most B.C. 314

A.U.C. 440

[1] defendite A^{2} Madvig: defendite ite Ω: ite defendite ζ.

A.U.C. 440

ubique quae passim in colonias mitteretur multitudinem esse.

XXV. Consules ab Sora profecti in agros atque urbes Ausonum bellum intulerunt. Mota namque omnia adventu Samnitium cum apud Lautulas dimicatum est fuerant, coniurationesque circa Campaniam passim factae; nec Capua ipsa crimine caruit; quin Romam quoque et ad principum quosdam inquirendo ventum est. Ceterum Ausonum gens proditione urbium sicut Sora in potestatem venit. Ausona et Minturnae et Vescia [1] urbes erant ex quibus principes iuventutis duodecim numero in proditionem urbium suarum coniurati ad consules veniunt. Docent suos iam pridem exoptantes Samnitium adventum, simul ad Lautulas pugnatum audierint,[2] pro victis Romanos habuisse, iuventute armis Samnitem iuvisse: fugatis inde Samnitibus incerta pace agere nec claudentes portas Romanis, ne arcessant bellum, et obstinatos claudere, si exercitus admoveatur; in ea fluctuatione animorum opprimi incautos posse. His auctoribus mota propius castra missique eodem tempore circa tria oppida milites, partim armati, qui occulti propinqua moenibus insiderent loca, partim togati tectis veste gladiis qui sub lucem apertis portis urbes ingrederentur.

[1] Vescia Sigonius (VIII. xi. 5): uescina (uestina FA^x) Ω.
[2] audierint Ruperti: audierunt Ω.

[1] Ausones is the Greek name for the Aurunci.
[2] Site unknown.

nearly concerned that the people who were sent out B.C. 314 here and there to colonies should in every case be protected.

XXV. The consuls on leaving Sora conducted a campaign against the lands and cities of the Ausones.[1] For everything had been disturbed by the coming of the Samnites, when the battle was fought at Lautulae, and conspiracies had been formed all about Campania. Even Capua itself did not escape accusation; nay, the investigation actually led to Rome and to some of the prominent men there. But the Ausones were brought into subjection by the betrayal of their cities, as had happened in the case of Sora. From Ausona,[2] from Minturnae, and from Vescia, twelve young nobles, having conspired to betray their cities, came to the consuls, and explained to them that their countrymen, after long looking forward to the coming of the Samnites, had no sooner heard of the battle at Lautulae than they had concluded the Romans vanquished and had aided the Samnites with men and arms; that since the expulsion of the Samnites from that region, they had been living in an uncertain kind of peace, not closing their gates upon the Romans, lest to do so should invite attack, but determined none the less to close them in case an army should approach; and that in that wavering state of mind they could be surprised and overcome. By their advice the camp was moved up nearer and soldiers were simultaneously sent round to the three towns. Some of these, in armour, were to lie in ambush in places near the walls, while others, wearing the toga and concealing swords under their dress, were to enter the cities, a little before day, by the open gates.

A.U.C. 440

8 Ab his simul custodes trucidari coepti, simul datum signum armatis ut ex insidiis concurrerent. Ita portae occupatae triaque oppida eadem hora eodemque consilio capta; sed quia absentibus duci-
9 bus impetus est factus, nullus modus caedibus fuit, deletaque Ausonum gens vix certo defectionis crimine perinde ac si internecivo bello certasset.

XXVI. Eodem anno prodito hostibus Romano
2 praesidio Luceria Samnitium facta. Nec diu proditoribus impunita res fuit: haud procul inde exercitus Romanos erat, cuius primo impetu urbs sita in plano capitur. Lucerini ac Samnites ad inter-
3 necionem caesi; eoque ira processit ut Romae quoque, cum de colonis mittendis Luceriam consuleretur senatus, multi delendam urbem censerent.
4 Praeter odium, quod exsecrabile in his captos erat, longinquitas quoque abhorrere a relegandis tam procul ab domo civibus inter tam infestas gentes
5 cogebat. Vicit tamen sententia ut mitterentur coloni. Duo milia et quingenti missi.

Eodem anno, cum omnia infida Romanis essent, Capuae quoque occultae principum coniurationes 6 factae. De quibus cum ad senatum relatum esset, haudquaquam neglecta res: quaestiones decretae dictatoremque quaestionibus exercendis dici placuit.

---

[1] With this sentence Livy resumes the narrative begun in Chap. XXV. §§ 1 and 2.

These latter fell upon the watchmen, at the same time making a signal to their fellows in armour to rush in from their ambuscade. Thus the gates were captured, and three towns were taken in one hour and by one device. But because the leaders were not present when the attack was made, there was no limit to the slaughter, and the Ausonian nation was wiped out—though it was not quite clear that it was guilty of defection—exactly as if it had contended in an internecine war. B.C. 314

XXVI. In the same year Luceria, betraying its Roman garrison to the enemy, passed into the possession of the Samnites; but the traitors did not long go unpunished for their deed. Not far away there was a Roman army, which captured the city—situated as it was in a plain—at the first attack. The Lucerini and Samnites were shown no quarter, and resentment ran so high that even in Rome, when the senate was debating the dispatch of colonists to Luceria, there were many who voted to destroy the town. Besides men's hate, which was very bitter against those whom they had twice subdued, there was also the remoteness of the place, which made them shrink from condemning fellow-citizens to an exile so far from home and surrounded by such hostile tribes. However, the proposal to send colonists prevailed, and twenty-five hundred were sent.

In that year also of general disloyalty to the Romans, there were secret conspiracies of the nobles, even at Capua.[1] On their being reported to the senate, the danger was by no means minimized, but tribunals of enquiry were voted and it was determined to appoint a dictator to conduct the 7 C. Maenius dictus; is M. Folium magistrum equitum dixit. Ingens erat magistratus eius terror. Itaque, sive is timor seu conscientia fuit,[1] Calavios[2] Ovium[3] Noviumque—ea capita coniurationis fuerant—priusquam nominarentur apud dictatorem, mors haud dubie ab ipsis conscita iudicio subtraxit.

A.U.C. 440

8 Deinde ut quaestioni Campanae materia decessit, versa Romam interpretando res: non nominatim qui Capuae sed in universum qui usquam coissent coniurassentve adversus rem publicam quaeri sena-
9 tum iussisse; et coitiones honorum adipiscendorum causa factas adversus rem publicam esse. Latiorque et re et personis quaestio fieri haud abnuente dicta-
10 tore sine fine ulla quaestionis suae ius esse. Postulabantur ergo nobiles homines appellantibusque tribunos nemo erat auxilio quin nomina reciperentur.
11 Inde nobilitas, nec ii[4] modo in quos crimen intendebatur sed universi, simul negare nobilium id crimen esse, quibus, si nulla obstetur fraude, pateat
12 via ad honorem, sed hominum novorum; ipsos adeo dictatorem magistrumque equitum reos magis quam quaesitores idoneos eius criminis esse intellecturosque ita id esse, simul magistratu abissent.

13 Tum enimvero Maenius, iam famae magis quam imperii memor, progressus in contionem[5] ita verba
14 fecit: "Et omnes ante actae vitae vos conscios habeo,

[1] sive is timor seu conscientia fuit Madvig: siue timor seu conscientiae uis PF (or ius) OTD (or ius) LA[1] (and A[1] over erasure): siuet (or siuei) timor seu conscientia eius M (or M[1] or M[2] over erasure): siue is timor seu conscientiae uis U.

[2] Calavios ζ: calabios Ω.

[3] Ovium ζ: obium (or obuium) Ω.

[4] ii ζ: hi (or hii) Ω: in PF: omitted by O.

[5] contionem $D^{1}\zeta$: contione Ω.

investigations. Gaius Maenius was nominated, and B.C. 314 named Marcus Folius master of the horse. Great was the terror inspired by that magistracy; and so, whether from fear or a guilty conscience, the Calavii, Ovius and Novius, who had headed the conspiracy, before informations could be lodged against them with the dictator, avoided trial by a death which was undoubtedly self-inflicted.

After that, the field of enquiry at Capua having been exhausted, the proceedings were transferred to Rome, on the theory that the senate had ordered an investigation, not of specified individuals in Capua, but, in general, of all who had anywhere combined or conspired against the State; and that cabals for obtaining magistracies had been made against the common weal. The enquiry began to take a wider range, in respect both of charges and of persons, and the dictator was nothing loath that there should be no limit to the jurisdiction of his court. Certain nobles were accordingly impeached, and on appealing to the tribunes found none to help them by stopping the informations. The nobles then declared—not those alone at whom the charge was levelled, but all of them conjointly—that this accusation did not lie against the nobility, to whom, unless fraudulently obstructed, the road to office lay wide open, but rather against upstart politicians; that in fact the dictator and the master of the horse themselves were fitter to be tried on such a charge than to act as judges, and they would find this to be so the moment they resigned their places.

Then indeed Maenius, more mindful now of his reputation than of his authority, came forward and addressed the assembly. "You are all of you," he

A.U.C. 440

Quirites, et hic ipse honos delatus ad me testis est innocentiae meae; neque enim, quod saepe alias, quia ita tempora postulabant rei publicae, qui bello clarissimus esset, sed qui maxime procul ab his coitionibus vitam egisset, dictator deligendus exercendis quaestionibus fuit. Sed quoniam quidam nobiles homines—qua de causa vos existimare quam me pro magistratu quicquam incompertum dicere melius est—primum ipsas expugnare quaestiones omni ope adnisi sunt, dein postquam ad id parum potentes erant, ne causam dicerent, in praesidia adversariorum, appellationem et tribunicium auxilium, patricii confugerunt; postremo repulsi inde adeo omnia tutiora quam ut innocentiam suam purgarent visa—in nos inruerunt et privatis dictatorem poscere reum verecundiae non fuit;—ut omnes di hominesque sciant ab illis etiam quae non possint temptari ne rationem vitae reddant, me obviam ire crimini et offerre me inimicis reum, dictatura me abdico. Vos quaeso, consules, si vobis datum ab senatu negotium fuerit, in me primum et hunc M. Folium quaestiones exerceatis, ut appareat innocentia nostra nos non maiestate honoris tutos a criminationibus istis esse." Abdicat inde se dictatura et post eum confestim Folius magisterio equi-said, "Quirites, aware of my past life, and this very B.C. 314 office which has been conferred upon me is witness to my innocence; for it was necessary to select as dictator for the administration of judicial investigations, not the most distinguished soldier—as has often been done at other times, when some crisis in the state required it—but the man who had lived a life most aloof from these cabals. But since certain noblemen—for what cause it is better that you should form your own opinion than that I as magistrate should affirm anything not fully ascertained—have in the first place striven with might and main to defeat these very investigations; and then, finding themselves not strong enough to escape pleading their cause in court, have sought refuge, patricians though they are, in the safeguards of their adversaries—the appeal, I mean, and the help of the tribunes;—and since at last, repulsed in that quarter, they have fallen upon us—so much safer does any course appear to them than to try to vindicate their innocence—and have not blushed, though private citizens, to demand the impeachment of a dictator;—in order that all gods and men may know that they are attempting even impossibilities to avoid accounting for their lives, whereas I am ready to face their charge and to offer myself to my enemies to be tried, I hereby resign the dictator's authority. You, consuls, I beseech, if the task shall be devolved upon you by the senate, that you begin your investigations with me and with Marcus Folius here, that it may be seen that we are safe from these accusations by reason of our innocence, not by reason of the awe inspired by our office." He then resigned as dictator, and so at once did Folius as master of the horse. They were

A.U.C. 440 tum; primique apud consules—iis enim ab senatu mandata res est—rei facti adversus nobilium testi-
21 monia egregie absolvuntur. Publilius etiam Philo multiplicatis summis honoribus post res tot domi belloque gestas, ceterum invisus nobilitati, causam
22 dixit absolutusque est. Nec diutius, ut fit, quam dum recens erat quaestio per clara nomina reorum viguit; inde labi coepit ad viliora capita, donec coitionibus factionibusque adversus quas comparata erat oppressa est.

XXVII. Earum fama rerum, magis tamen spes Campanae defectionis, in quam coniuratum erat, Samnites in Apuliam versos rursus ad Caudium re-
2 vocavit, ut inde ex propinquo, si qui motus occasio-
3 nem aperiret, Capuam Romanis eriperent. Eo consules cum valido exercitu venerunt. Et primo circa saltus, cum utrimque ad hostem iniqua via 4 esset, cunctati sunt; deinde Samnites per aperta loca brevi circuitu in loca plana, Campanos campos, agmen demittunt,[1] ibique primum castra in con-
5 spectum[2] hostibus data, deinde levibus proeliis equitum saepius quam peditum utrimque periculum factum; nec aut eventus eorum Romanum aut
6 morae, qua trahebant bellum, paenitebat. Samni-

[1] demittunt ζ: dimittunt Ω: dimatant (?) F.
[2] in conspectum Gronovius: in conspectu Ω: conspectu F.

[1] In 339 B.C. Philo had proposed three democratic laws, which won him the enmity of the patricians. See VIII. xii. 14–16.

the first to go to trial before the consuls—for to these the senate had given the matter in charge—and, against the testimony of the nobles, were gloriously acquitted. Publilius Philo, too, after all his famous achievements at home and in war, and after having repeatedly held the highest offices, had incurred the hate of the nobility, and was brought to trial and acquitted.[1] But the inquisition, as often happens, had the vigour to deal with illustrious defendants no longer than while its novelty lasted; after that it began to descend to the baser sort, until it was finally put down by the cabals and factions which it had been instituted to oppose. B.C. 314

XXVII. The rumour of these events, and still more the hope of a Campanian insurrection, which had been the aim of the conspirators, recalled the Samnites from Apulia, on which their attention had been fixed, to Caudium; in the hope that, being there so near, they might, if any disturbance should afford the opportunity, seize Capua from the Romans; and to Caudium came the consuls, with a powerful force. Both armies at first held back, each on its own side of the pass, for either would have been at a disadvantage in advancing against the other. Then the Samnites made a short detour over open ground, and brought their army down to the plain, where the hostile forces were, for the first time, encamped in sight of one another. Some skirmishing followed, in which both sides made trial more often of their cavalry than their foot. The Romans were not dissatisfied either with the outcome of these brushes or with the delays by which the campaign was protracted. To the Samnite leaders, on the contrary, it appeared that tium contra ducibus et carpi parvis cottidie damnis et senescere dilatione belli vires suae videbantur.

A.U.C. 440

7 Itaque in aciem procedunt equitibus in cornua divisis, quibus praeceptum erat intentiores ad respectum castrorum, ne qua eo vis fieret, quam[1] ad
8 proelium starent: aciem pedite[2] tutam fore. Consulum Sulpicius in dextro, Poetelius[3] in laevo cornu consistunt. Dextra pars, qua et Samnites raris ordinibus aut ad circumeundos hostes aut ne ipsi
9 circumirentur constiterant, latius patefacta stetit: sinistris, praeterquam quod confertiores steterant, repentino consilio Poeteli consulis additae vires, qui subsidiarias cohortes, quae integrae ad longioris pugnae casus reservabantur, in primam aciem extemplo emisit universisque hostem primo impetu
10 viribus impulit. Commota pedestri acie Samnitium eques in pugnam succedit. In hunc transverso agmine inter duas acies se inferentem Romanus equitatus concitat equos signaque et ordines peditum atque equitum confundit, donec universam ab
11 ea parte avertit aciem. In eo cornu non Poetelius solus sed Sulpicius etiam hortator adfuerat, avectus ab suis nondum conserentibus manus ad clamorem

[1] quam Gelenius $_{5}$: cum Ω: et cum F.
[2] pedite U (anticipating Gronovius): pediti Ω: peditum Ax$_{5}$.
[3] Poetelius edd. (cf. chap. xxiv. § 1): potelius MPF: petilius O: poetellius TD: petellius LA (similar corruptions in §§ 9 and 11, and at chap. xxviii. §§ 2, 5, 6).

[1] i.e. the Samnite right.

their forces were daily diminishing with petty losses, and were wasting away with the prolongation of the war. B.C. 314

They accordingly made ready for a general engagement, dividing their cavalry between the wings, with orders to pay more attention to the camp, to prevent any attack upon it, than to the battle; for the infantry would sufficiently safeguard the line. Of the consuls, Sulpicius took up his post on the right wing, Poetelius on the left. The formation on the right was spread out over a considerable distance, and on that wing the Samnites, too, were drawn up in ranks of little depth, either meaning to turn the Romans' flank, or to keep their own from being turned. The troops on the left, besides being drawn up in closer order, had received an accession to their strength from a plan conceived on the spur of the moment by Poetelius. For those subsidiary cohorts which were wont to be kept fresh in reserve, to meet the chance needs of a long engagement, he sent immediately into the fighting line; and by using all his strength at once, he forced the enemy back at the first assault. As the Samnite infantry wavered, their cavalry moved up to support them. But while they came obliquely onward, in the interval between the armies, the Roman cavalry charged them at the gallop, confounding the ranks and the formations of horse and foot, until they had routed the entire army at that point.[1] On that wing Sulpicius was present, as well as Poetelius, to animate the soldiers, for when the shouting arose upon the left, he had ridden over there, leaving his own men, who were not yet come to grips with

A.U.C. 440 12 a sinistra parte prius exortum. Unde haud dubiam victoriam cernens cum ad suum cornu tenderet cum mille ducentis viris, dissimilem ibi fortunam invenit, Romanos loco pulsos, victorem hostem signa in 13 perculsos inferentem. Ceterum omnia mutavit repente consulis adventus; nam et conspectu ducis refectus militum est animus, et maius quam pro numero auxilium advenerant fortes viri, et partis alterius victoria audita mox visa etiam proelium 14 restituit. Tota deinde iam vincere acie Romanus et omisso certamine caedi capique Samnites, nisi qui Maleventum, cui nunc urbi Beneventum nomen est, perfugerunt. Ad triginta milia caesa aut capta Samnitium proditum memoriae est.

A.U.C. 441 XXVIII. Consules egregia victoria parta protinus 2 inde ad Bovianum oppugnandum legiones ducunt; ibique hiberna egerunt, donec ab novis consulibus, L. Papirio Cursore quintum C. Iunio Bubulco iterum nominatus dictator C. Poetelius cum M. Folio 3 magistro equitum exercitum accepit. Is cum audisset arcem Fregellanam ab Samnitibus captam, omisso Boviano ad Fregellas pergit. Unde nocturna Samnitium fuga sine certamine receptis Fregellis praesidioque valido imposito in Campaniam reditum 4 maxime ad Nolam armis repetendam. Eo se intra

[1] The city, which was a Greek colony, was called Μαλοφείς, which meant "Sheeptown" (or, perhaps, "Appletown"). The Romans corrupted the accusative case, Μαλοφέντα, to Maleventum, which they regarded as derived from male and venire, and then, to avoid the omen, changed it to Beneventum when they planted a colony there, 268 B.C.

the enemy. But perceiving his colleague's victory B.C. 314 to be safe, he left him and rode off with twelve hundred men to his own wing. There he found affairs in a different posture; the Romans had been driven out of their position, and the victorious enemy were charging their disordered ranks. But all was quickly changed by the arrival of the consul. For the sight of their general revived the spirits of the soldiers, and the brave men who followed him were a greater succour than their numbers indicated; and the tidings of their comrades' victory, which they soon saw for themselves, restored the battle. Presently the Romans had begun to conquer all along the line, while the Samnites, giving up the struggle, were massacred or made prisoners, except those who fled to Maleventum, the city which is now called Beneventum.[1] Tradition avers that some thirty thousand Samnites were slain or captured.

XXVIII. The consuls, who had won a brilliant B.C. 313 victory, at once marched away to lay siege to Bovianum, where they remained in winter quarters, until the new consuls, Lucius Papirius Cursor (for the fifth time) and Gaius Junius Bubulcus (for the second) appointed Gaius Poetelius dictator, who, with Marcus Folius as master of horse, took over the command. Poetelius, hearing that the citadel of Fregellae was captured by the Samnites, raised the siege of Bovianum and proceeded to Fregellae. Having got possession of the place without a struggle—for the Samnites fled from it in the night—he installed a strong garrison there, and leaving Fregellae, marched back into Campania, for the purpose, chiefly, of winning back Nola by force of moenia sub adventum dictatoris et Samnitium omnis multitudo et Nolana agrestis contulerat.[1] Dictator urbis situ circumspecto, quo apertior aditus ad moenia esset, omnia aedificia—et frequenter ibi habitabatur—circumiecta muris incendit; nec ita multo post, sive a Poetelio dictatore sive ab C. Iunio consule—nam utrumque traditur,—Nola est capta. Qui captae decus Nolae ad consulem trahunt, adiciunt Atinam et Calatiam ab eodem captas, Poetelium autem pestilentia orta clavi figendi causa dictatorem dictum.

A.U.C. 441

Suessa et Pontiae eodem anno coloniae deductae sunt. Suessa Auruncorum fuerat; Volsci Pontias, insulam sitam in conspectu litoris sui, incoluerant. Et Interamnam Sucasinam[2] ut deduceretur colonia, senati consultum[3] factum est; sed triumviros creavere ac misere colonorum quattuor milia insequentes consules M. Valerius P. Decius.

A.U.C. 442

XXIX. Profligato[4] fere Samnitium bello, priusquam ea cura decederet patribus Romanis, Etrusci belli fama exorta est. Nec erat ea tempestate gens alia cuius secundum Gallicos tumultus arma terri-

[1] et Nolana agrestis contulerat codd. Gelen.: et nolani agrestes (agrestis O agrestas PFD² LA) contulerat (-et F, -ant *AM*³ *or M*⁴*T*¹ *or T*²*D*³) Ω.

[2] Sucasinam Mommsen (Plin. N.H. III. v. 64): casinam MT: casinum Ω.

[3] senati consultum Alschefski: sic (or sic.) Ω: sicut U: senatus consultum c.

[4] profligato c: M. Valerio P. Decio coss. (or cōs or coñs.) profligato Ω: p̄ decio coss profligato TDLA.

[1] For the practice of driving a nail in the wall of the shrine of Minerva in the great temple of Jupiter on the Capitol, see VII. iii. But the writers referred to in the present passage are probably mistaken, as the Fasti arms. Within its walls, as the dictator drew near, B.C. 313 the whole Samnite population and the Nolani of the country-side had taken refuge. After examining the position of the city, the dictator, in order to open up approaches to the walls, caused all the buildings round them—and the tract was densely inhabited—to be burnt. Not very long after this Nola was captured, whether by Poetelius the dictator or the consul Gaius Junius—for the story is told both ways. Those who ascribe the honour of capturing Nola to the consul, add that Atina and Calatia were won by the same man, but that Poetelius was made dictator on the outbreak of a pestilence, that he might drive the nail.[1]

Colonies were planted in that same year at Suessa and Pontiae. Suessa had belonged to the Aurunci; Volscians had inhabited Pontiae, an island which lay within sight of their own coast. The senate also passed a resolution that a colony be sent out to Interamna Sucasina,[2] but it was left for the next consuls, Marcus Valerius and Publius Decius, to appoint the three commissioners and send out four thousand settlers.

XXIX. The war with the Samnites was practically B.C. 312 ended, but the Roman senators had not yet ceased to be concerned about it, when the rumour of an Etruscan war sprang up. In those days there was no other race—setting apart the risings of the Gauls Capitolini say that Poetelius was made dictator rei gerundae causa.

[2] So called (or sometimes Lirenas) to distinguish it from two other towns called Interamna—a name which is derived from the two streams (in this case the Casinus and the Liris) at whose confluence the town was situated.

A.U.C. 442

biliora essent cum propinquitate agri tum multi-3 tudine hominum. Itaque altero consule in Samnio reliquias belli persequente P. Decius, qui graviter aeger Romae restiterat, auctore senatu dictatorem C. Sulpicium Longum, is magistrum equitum C.
4 Iunium Bubulcum[1] dixit. Is, prout rei magnitudo postulabat, omnes iuniores sacramento adigit, arma quaeque alia res poscit summa industria parat; nec tantis apparatibus elatus de inferendo bello agitat, quieturus haud dubie, nisi ultro arma Etrusci infer-
5 rent. Eadem in comparando cohibendoque bello consilia et apud Etruscos fuere: neutri finibus egressi.

Et censura clara eo anno Ap. Claudi et C. Plauti fuit; memoriae tamen felicioris ad posteros nomen
6 Appi, quod viam munivit et aquam in urbem duxit;
7 eaque unus perfecit, quia ob infamem atque invidiosam senatus lectionem verecundia victus collega
8 magistratu se abdicaverat; Appius iam inde antiquitus insitam pertinaciam familiae gerendo solus
9 censuram obtinuit. Eodem Appio auctore Potitia gens, cuius ad aram maximam Herculis familiare sacerdotium fuerat, servos publicos ministerii dele-

[1] dictatorem C. Sulpicium Longum, is magistrum equitum C. Bubulcum Sigonius and Pighius (from the Fasti Capitolini): dictatorem C. Iunium Bubulcum Ω.

---

[1] The road was the Via Appia, which ran from Rome to Capua, and was later extended to Beneventum and, finally, to Brundisium. The aqueduct brought water from a point between seven and eight miles out, on the road to Gabii, and supplied the Circus Maximus and other low-lying parts of the City.

[2] An ancient altar erected in honour of Hercules. The origin of the cult is described at I. vii. 3–15.

—whose arms were more dreaded, not only because B.C. 312 their territory lay so near, but also because of their numbers. Accordingly, while the other consul was in Samnium, dispatching the last remnants of the war, Publius Decius, who was very sick and had stopped behind in Rome, in pursuance of a senatorial resolution named Gaius Sulpicius Longus dictator, who appointed Gaius Junius Bubulcus to be his master of the horse. Sulpicius, as the gravity of the circumstances required, administered the oath to all those of military age, and made ready arms and whatever else the situation called for, with the utmost assiduity. Yet he was not so carried away with these great preparations as to plan for an offensive war, clearly intending to remain inactive, unless the Etruscans should first take the field. But the Etruscans followed the same policy, preparing for war but preventing it from breaking out. Neither side went beyond their own frontiers.

Noteworthy, too, in that year was the censorship of Appius Claudius and Gaius Plautius; but the name of Appius was of happier memory with succeeding generations, because he built a road, and conveyed a stream of water into the City.[1] These undertakings he carried out by himself, since his colleague had resigned, overcome with shame at the disgraceful and invidious manner in which Appius revised the list of senators; and Appius, exhibiting the obstinacy which had marked his family from the earliest days, exercised the censorship alone. It was Appius, too, by whose warranty the Potitian clan, with whom the priesthood of Hercules at the Ara Maxima[2] was hereditary, taught the ritual of that sacrifice to public slaves,

A.U.C. 442 10 gandi causa sollemnia eius sacri docuerat. Traditur inde, dictu mirabile et quod dimovendis statu suo sacris religionem facere posset, cum duodecim familiae ea tempestate Potitiorum essent, puberes ad triginta, 11 omnes intra annum cum stirpe exstinctos; nec nomen tantum Potitiorum interisse sed censorem etiam memori deum ira post aliquot annos luminibus captum.

A.U.C. 443 XXX. Itaque consules qui eum annum secuti sunt, C. Iunius Bubulcus tertium et Q. Aemilius Barbula iterum, initio anni questi apud populum 2 deformatum ordinem prava lectione senatus, qua potiores aliquot lectis praeteriti essent, negaverunt eam lectionem se, quae sine recti pravique discrimine ad gratiam ac libidinem facta esset, observaturos et senatum extemplo citaverunt eo ordine qui ante censores Ap. Claudium et C. Plautium 3 fuerat. Et duo imperia[1] eo anno dari coepta per populum, utraque pertinentia ad rem militarem: unum, ut tribuni militum seni deni in quattuor legiones a populo crearentur, quae antea perquam paucis suffragio populi relictis locis dictatorum et consulum ferme fuerant beneficia—tulere eam rogationem tribuni plebei L. Atilius C. Marcius;— 4 alterum, ut duumviros navales classis ornandae

[1] imperia Ω: feria M: ministeria Madvig.

---

[1] For an instance of the popular election of tribuni militum cf. VII. v. 9. The plan adopted in 311 seems to have given the people the right to elect four of the six tribunes assigned to each legion, or sixteen in all. Soon after Livy wrote these words another change was made and the emperor thenceforth appointed all military tribunes.

in order to devolve the service upon them. Tradition B.C. 312 relates that after this a strange thing happened, and one that might well give men pause ere they disturb the established order of religious ceremonies. For whereas at that time there were twelve families of the Potitii, and grown men to the number of thirty, within the year they had perished, every man, and the stock had become extinct; and not only did the name of the Potitii die out, but even the censor, by the unforgetting ire of the gods, was a few years later stricken blind.

XXX. And so the consuls of the following year, B.C. 311
Gaius Junius Bubulcus (for the third time) and Quintus Aemilius Barbula (for the second), complained to the people, at the outset of their administration, that the senatorial order had been depraved by the improper choice of members, in which better men had been passed over than some that had been appointed. They then gave notice that they should ignore that list, which had been drawn up with no distinction of right and wrong, in a spirit of favouritism and caprice; and proceeded to call the roll of the senate in the order which had been in use before Appius Claudius and Gaius Plautius were censors. In that year, also, two commands—both military—began to be conferred by the people; for it was enacted, first, that sixteen tribunes of the soldiers should be chosen by popular vote for the four legions, whereas previously these places had been for the most part in the gift of dictators and consuls, very few being left to popular suffrage[1]; secondly, that the people should likewise elect two naval commissioners to have charge of equipping and refitting the fleet. The former of reficiendaeque causa idem populus iuberet; lator huius plebi sciti fuit M. Decius tribunus plebis.

A.U.C. 413

5 Eiusdem anni rem dictu parvam praeterirem, ni ad religionem visa esset pertinere. Tibicines, quia prohibiti a proximis censoribus erant in aede Iovis vesci quod traditum antiquitus erat, aegre passi Tibur uno agmine abierunt, adeo ut nemo in urbe 6 esset qui sacrificiis praecineret. Eius rei religio tenuit senatum, legatosque Tibur miserunt darent[1] operam, ut ii[2] homines Romanis restituerentur. 7 Tiburtini benigne polliciti primum accitos eos in curiam hortati sunt uti reverterentur Romam; postquam perpelli nequibant, consilio haud abhor- 8 rente ab ingeniis hominum eos adgrediuntur. Die festo alii alios per speciem celebrandarum cantu epularum invitant[3] et vino, cuius avidum ferme id 9 genus[4] est, oneratos sopiunt atque ita in plaustra somno vinctos coniciunt ac Romam deportant. Nec prius sensere quam plaustris in foro relictis plenos 10 crapulae eos lux oppressit. Tunc concursus populi factus, impetratoque ut manerent, datum ut triduum quotannis ornati cum cantu atque hac quae nunc sollemnis est licentia per urbem vagarentur, restitu-

[1] darent Gronovius: ut darent Ω.
[2] ut ii A^2 Alschefski Madvig: ut hii M: ut hi PF: ut id OTDLA.
[3] invitant ς: causa inuitant Ω.
[4] id gen s ς: genus Ω.

these measures was proposed by the tribunes of the plebs Lucius Atilius and Gaius Marcius; the latter by Marcus Decius, another tribune of the plebs. B.C. 311

I should omit, as an incident hardly worth narrating, a little thing that happened in that same year, but that it seemed to concern religion. The flute-players, angry at having been forbidden by the last censors to hold their feast, according to old custom, in the temple of Jupiter, went off to Tibur in a body, so that there was no one in the City to pipe at sacrifices. Troubled by the religious aspect of the case, the senate dispatched representatives to the Tiburtines, requesting them to use their best endeavours to restore these men to Rome. The Tiburtines courteously undertook to do so; and sending for the pipers to their senate-house, urged them to return. When they found it impossible to persuade them, they employed a ruse, not ill-adapted to the nature of the men. On a holiday various citizens invited parties of the pipers to their houses, on the pretext of celebrating the feast with music. There they plied them with wine, which people of that profession are generally greedy of, until they got them stupefied. In this condition they threw them, fast asleep, into waggons and carried them away to Rome; nor did the pipers perceive what had taken place until daylight found them—still suffering from the debauch—in the waggons, which had been left standing in the Forum. The people then flocked about them and prevailed with them to remain. They were permitted on three days in every year to roam the City in festal robes, making music and enjoying the licence that is now customary, and to such tumque in aede vescendi ius iis[1] qui sacris praecinerent. Haec inter duorum ingentium bellorum curam gerebantur.

A.U.C. 443

XXXI. Consules inter se provincias partiti: Iunio Samnites, Aemilio novum bellum Etruria sorte obvenit. In Samnio Cluviarum[2] praesidium Romanum, quia nequiverat vi capi, obsessum fame in deditionem acceperant Samnites verberibusque foedum in modum laceratos occiderant deditos. Huic infensus crudelitati Iunius, nihil antiquius oppugnatione Cluviana ratus, quo die adgressus est moenia vi cepit atque omnes puberes interfecit. Inde victor exercitus Bovianum ductus. Caput hoc erat Pentrorum Samnitium, longe ditissimum atque opulentissimum armis virisque. Ibi quia haud tantum irarum erat, spe praedae milites accensi oppido potiuntur. Minus itaque saevitum in hostes est; praedae plus paene quam ex omni Samnio unquam egestum benigneque omnis militi concessa.

Et postquam praepotentem armis Romanum nec acies subsistere ullae nec castra nec urbes poterant, omnium principum in Samnio eo curae sunt intentae ut insidiis quaereretur locus, si qua licentia populando effusus exercitus excipi ac circumveniri posset. Transfugae agrestes et captivi quidam, pars forte, pars consilio oblati, congruentia ad consulem adfe-

[1] iis ζ: his Ω: in (or iu) hiis A hiis A^2.

[2] Cluviarum Walters: cluuiaru (?) O: cluuiani (cluiani P) Ω: duliiani T: duuiani T^1.

[1] The story of the secession of the flute-players is found also in Ovid, Fasti, VI. 651 ff., and Plutarch, Quaestiones Romanae, 55. The three days (the so-called "lesser Quinquatrus") were June 13th, 14th, 15th, and were a festival peculiar to the guild of pipers.

[2] The site of Cluviae is not known.

as should play at sacrifices was given again the B.C. 311 privilege of banqueting in the temple.[1] These incidents occurred while men were preoccupied with two mighty wars.

XXXI. The consuls divided the commands between them: to Junius the lot assigned the Samnites, to Aemilius the new war with Etruria. In Samnium the Roman garrison at Cluviae,[2] which had defended itself successfully against assault, was starved into submission. The Samnites, having scourged their prisoners in brutal fashion, put them to death, although they had surrendered. Incensed by this act of cruelty, Junius felt that nothing should take precedence over an attack on Cluviae. He carried the place by storm on the day he arrived before it, and slew all the grown-up males. From there he led his victorious army to Bovianum. This was the capital of the Pentrian Samnites, a very wealthy city and very rich in arms and men. Against this town the soldiers were not so exasperated, but the hope of plunder spurred them on to capture it. And so there was less severity shown to the enemy, but there was almost more booty carried out than was ever collected from all the rest of Samnium, and the whole of it was generously made over to the soldiers.

When the conquering arms of the Romans might now no longer be withstood by any embattled host or camp or city, the leaders of the Samnites all eagerly directed their attention to the seeking out a place for an ambush, on the chance that the army might somehow be permitted to disperse for plundering, and so be surprised and surrounded. Certain rustic deserters and prisoners, some falling into the consul's hands by accident and some on purpose, rentes—quae et vera erant—pecoris vim ingentem in saltum avium compulsam esse, perpulerunt ut

A.U.C. 443

8 praedatum eo expeditae ducerentur legiones. Ibi ingens hostium exercitus itinera occultus insederat, et postquam intrasse Romanos vidit saltum, repente exortus cum clamore ac tumultu incautos invadit.
9 Et primo nova res trepidationem fecit, dum arma capiunt, sarcinas congerunt in medium; dein postquam, ut quisque liberaverat se onere aptaveratque arma,[1] ad signa undique coibant et notis ordinibus in vetere disciplina militiae iam sine praecepto
10 ullius sua sponte struebatur acies, consul ad ancipitem maxime pugnam advectus desilit ex equo et Iovem Martemque atque alios testatur deos se nullam suam gloriam inde sed praedam militi
11 quaerentem in eum locum devenisse neque in se aliud quam nimiam ditandi ex hoste militis curam reprehendi posse; ab eo se dedecore nullam rem
12 aliam quam virtutem militum vindicaturam. Coniterentur modo uno animo omnes invadere hostem victum acie, castris exutum, nudatum urbibus, ultimam spem furto insidiarum temptantem et loco 13 non armis fretum. Sed quem esse iam virtuti Romanae inexpugnabilem locum? Fregellana arx Soranaque et ubicumque iniquo successum erat loco memorabantur.

[1] arma Gronovius: armis Ω.

by giving all the same account—and a true one, B.C. 311 too—of enormous flocks that had been brought together in an inaccessible mountain meadow, persuaded him to lead thither his legions in light marching order to seize the booty. There a great army of the enemy had secretly beset the ways, and seeing that the Romans had entered the pass, rose up suddenly with much din and shouting and fell upon them unawares. At first the unexpectedness of the attack occasioned some trepidation, while the soldiers were putting on their armour and piling their packs in the midst. Afterwards, when everyone had got rid of his encumbrance and had armed himself, they began to assemble from every side about their standards. In the course of a long training in the army they had become familiar with their places, and formed a line of their own accord, without anyone's direction. The consul, riding up to the place where the fighting was most critical, leaped down from his horse, and called on Jupiter and Mars and the other gods to witness that he had come there seeking no glory for himself, but only booty for his soldiers: his sole fault, he said, was a too great desire to enrich his men; from this disgrace nothing could save him but their courage. Only let them all unite in singleness of purpose to assail an enemy conquered in battle, stripped of his camp, deprived of his cities, and pinning his last hopes to the treachery of an ambuscade, where his trust was in his position, not in arms. But what position was there now, he demanded, too strong for Roman valour to overwhelm? He reminded them of Fregellae's citadel and Sora's, and all the places where they had triumphed over disadvantage of ground.

A.U.C. 443
14 His accensus miles, omnium immemor difficultatium, vadit adversus imminentem hostium aciem. Ibi paulum laboris fuit, dum in adversum clivum
15 erigitur agmen: ceterum postquam prima signa planitiem summam ceperunt sensitque acies aequo se iam institisse loco, versus extemplo est terror in insidiatores easdemque latebras quibus se paulo ante texerant palati atque inermes fuga repetebant.
16 Sed loca difficilia hosti quaesita ipsos tum sua fraude impediebant. Itaque ergo perpaucis effugium patuit; caesa ad viginti milia hominum victorque Romanus ad oblatam ab hoste praedam pecorum discurrit.

XXXII. Dum haec geruntur in Samnio, iam omnes Etruriae populi praeter Arretinos ad arma ierant, ab oppugnando Sutrio, quae urbs socia Romanis
2 velut claustra Etruriae erat, ingens orsi bellum. Eo alter consul Aemilius cum exercitu ad liberandos obsidione socios venit. Advenientibus Romanis Sutrini commeatus benigne in castra ante urbem
3 posita advexere. Etrusci diem primum consultando maturarent traherentne bellum traduxerunt. Postero die, ubi celeriora quam tutiora consilia magis pla-

---

[1] The Fasti Capitolini record that Junius triumphed over the Samnites on August 5th (C.I.L., I², p. 45).

Roused by these words, the soldiers disregarded B.C. 311
every obstacle and advanced against the battle-line which their enemies had formed above them. There was a little hard fighting there, while the column was mounting the slope; but as soon as the foremost companies had reached the plateau at the top, and the soldiers perceived that their line was now established on level ground, the panic was straightway turned upon the waylayers, who fled, dispersing and throwing down their arms, in search of those very lurking-places where a little while before they had concealed themselves. But the ground which they had sought out for the difficulties it presented to an enemy caught the Samnites themselves in a trap of their own devising. And so, very few were able to get off: about twenty thousand men were slain; and the victorious Romans struck out this way and that to collect the booty of cattle which the enemy had thrown in their way.[1]

XXXII. While these events were taking place in Samnium, all the peoples of Etruria, except the Arretini, had already armed, and beginning with the siege of Sutrium, a city in alliance with the Romans, and forming as it were the key to Etruria, had set on foot a tremendous war. Thither the other consul, Aemilius, came with an army, to relieve the blockade of the allies. As the Romans came up, the Sutrini obligingly brought provisions to their camp, which was formed before the city. The Etruscans spent the first day in deliberating whether to accelerate the war or to draw it out. On the following day, their generals having decided on the swifter plan in preference to the safer, the cuere ducibus, sole orto signum pugnae propositum

A.U.C. 443

4 est armatique in aciem procedunt. Quod postquam consuli nuntiatum est, extemplo tesseram dari iubet ut prandeat miles firmatisque cibo viribus arma
5 capiat. Dicto paretur. Consul ubi armatos paratosque vidit, signa extra vallum proferri iussit et haud procul hoste instruxit aciem. Aliquamdiu intenti utrimque steterunt exspectantes, ut ab ad-
6 versariis clamor et pugna inciperet; et prius sol meridie se inclinavit quam telum hinc aut illinc emissum est. Inde, ne infecta re abiretur, clamor ab Etruscis oritur concinuntque tubae et signa inferuntur. Nec segnius a Romanis pugna initur.
7 Concurrunt infensis animis; numero hostis, virtute
8 Romanus superat; anceps proelium multos utrimque et fortissimum quemque absumit, nec prius inclinata res est quam secunda acies Romana ad prima signa,
9 integri fessis, successerunt, Etrusci,[1] quia nullis recentibus subsidiis fulta prima acies fuit, ante signa circaque omnes ceciderunt. Nullo unquam proelio fugae minus nec plus caedis fuisset, ni obstinatos
10 mori Tuscos nox texisset, ita ut victores prius quam victi pugnandi finem facerent. Post occasum solis signum receptui datum est; nocte utroque[2] in castra reditum.

[1] successerunt, Etrusci Walters and Conway: successerunt. Etrusci edd.

[2] utroque Madvig: ab utroque Ω: utrobique Walters and Conway (note).

signal for battle was displayed at sunrise and their B.C. 311 men in fighting array marched out upon the field. When this was reported to the consul, he at once commanded the word to be passed round that the men should breakfast, and having recruited their strength with food, should then arm. The order was obeyed; and the consul, seeing them equipped and ready, bade advance the standards beyond the rampart, and drew up his troops a little way off from the enemy. For some time both sides stood fast, observing one another closely, each waiting for the other to give a cheer and begin to fight, and the sun had begun his downward course in the heavens ere a missile was hurled on either side. Then the Etruscans, that they might not withdraw without accomplishing their purpose, set up a shout, and with sound of trumpets advanced their ensigns. The Romans were equally prompt to begin the battle. The two armies rushed together with great fury, the enemy having a superiority in numbers, the Romans in bravery. Victory hung in the balance and many perished on both sides, including all the bravest, and the event was not decided until the Roman second line came up with undiminished vigour to relieve their exhausted comrades in the first; and the Etruscans, whose fighting line was supported by no fresh reserves, all fell in front of their standards and around them. There would never in any battle have been more bloodshed or less running away, but when the Etruscans were resolved to die, the darkness shielded them, so that the victors gave over fighting before the vanquished. The sun had set when the recall was sounded, and in the night both armies retired to their camps.

A.U.C. 443 11 Nec deinde quicquam eo anno rei memoria dignae apud Sutrium gestum est, quia et ex hostium exercitu prima tota acies deleta uno proelio fuerat subsidiariis modo relictis, vix quod satis esset ad 12 castrorum praesidium, et apud Romanos tantum volnerum fuit ut plures post proelium saucii decesserint quam ceciderant in acie. A.U.C. 444 XXXIII. Q. Fabius, insequentis anni consul, bellum ad Sutrium excepit, collega Fabio C. Marcius Rutulus [1] datus 2 est. Ceterum et Fabius supplementum ab Roma adduxit et novus exercitus domo accitus Etruscis venit. 3 Permulti anni iam erant cum inter patricios magistratus tribunosque nulla certamina fuerant, cum ex ea familia cui velut fato lis [2] cum tribunis 4 ac plebe erat certamen oritur. Ap. Claudius censor circumactis decem et octo mensibus quod Aemilia lege finitum censurae spatium temporis erat, cum C. Plautius collega eius magistratu se abdicasset, nulla 5 vi compelli ut abdicaret potuit. P. Sempronius erat tribunus plebis, qui finiendae censurae intra legitimum tempus actionem susceperat, non popularem magis quam iustam nec in volgus quam optimo 6 cuique gratiorem. Is cum identidem legem Aemiliam recitaret auctoremque eius Mam. Aemilium dictatorem laudibus ferret, qui quinquennalem ante censuram et longinquitate potestatis [3] dominantem 7 intra sex mensum et anni coegisset spatium, "Die agedum" inquit, "Appi Claudi, quidnam facturus

[1] Rutulus Conway: rutilius (rutilus T?) Ω.

[2] cui velut fato lis M. Seuffert: quae uelut fatalis Ω: quae uelut fatales MPTDL.

[3] potestatis Crévier: potestatem Ω.

[1] 434 B.C. (IV. xxiv. 5).

Thereafter there was nothing done that year at Sutrium worth recording. The enemy had lost their whole first line in a single engagement, and had only their reserves remaining, who barely sufficed to garrison their camp; whilst the Romans had so many wounded that more died of their hurts after the battle than had fallen on the field. B.C. 311

XXXIII. Quintus Fabius, consul in the following year, took over the campaign at Sutrium. For colleague he was given Gaius Marcius Rutulus. Fabius brought up replacements from Rome, and a new army came from Etruria to reinforce the enemy. B.C. 310

For a great many years now there had been no contests between the patrician magistrates and the tribunes, when a dispute arose through that family which was fated, as it seemed, to wrangle with the tribunes and with the plebs. Appius Claudius the censor, on the expiration of the eighteen months which had been fixed by the Aemilian law[1] as the limit of the censorship, although his colleague Gaius Plautius had abdicated, could himself by no compulsion be prevailed upon to do likewise. It was Publius Sempronius, a tribune of the people, who commenced an action to confine the censorship to its legal limits—an action no less just than popular, and as welcome to every aristocrat as to the common people. Having repeatedly read out the Aemilian law, and praised its author, Mamercus Aemilius the dictator, for confining the censorship—which had until then been tenable for five years and was proving despotic by reason of the long continuance of its authority—within the space of a year and a half, he said, "Come, tell us, Appius Claudius, what

A.U.C. 444

fueris, si eo tempore quo C. Furius et M. Geganius
8 censores fuerunt censor fuisses." Negare Appius interrogationem tribuni magno opere ad causam
9 pertinere suam; nam etsi tenuerit lex Aemilia eos censores quorum in magistratu lata esset, quia post illos censores creatos eam legem populus iussisset quodque postremum iussisset id ius ratumque esset, non tamen aut se aut eorum quemquam qui post eam legem latam creati censores essent teneri ea lege potuisse.

XXXIV. Haec sine ullius adsensu cavillante Appio "En" [1] inquit, "Quirites, illius Appi progenies, qui decemvir in annum creatus altero anno se ipse creavit, tertio nec ab se nec ab ullo creatus privatus
2 fasces et imperium obtinuit, nec ante continuando abstitit magistratu quam obruerent eum male parta,
3 male gesta, male retenta imperia. Haec est eadem familia, Quirites, cuius vi atque iniuriis compulsi extorres patria Sacrum montem cepistis; haec adversus quam tribunicium auxilium vobis comparas-
4 tis; haec propter quam duo exercitus Aventinum insedistis; haec quae fenebres leges, haec quae
5 agrarias semper impugnavit. Haec conubia patrum

[1] "En" Aldus: ē FO: est Ω.

---

[1] Appius held that, whereas the election of Furius and Geganius for a period of five years had been set aside by the Aemilian law, which was then the latest enactment on the subject and so replaced any earlier one, nevertheless all those who were elected subsequently derived their powers from still later enactments, by which in its turn the Aemilian law was superseded.

[2] For the story of the Decemvir, see III. xxxiii–lviii.

[3] II. xxxii. 2.

you would have done had you been censor at the B.C. 310 time when Gaius Furius and Marcus Geganius were censors." Appius replied that the tribune's question had no particular bearing upon his own case; for even though the Aemilian law had bound those censors in whose term of office it had been passed, because the people had enacted the law after their election to the censorship and their latest enactment was always the effective law, yet neither himself nor any one of those who had been chosen censors subsequently to the passage of that law could have been bound by it.[1]

XXXIV. While Appius raised these quibbles, but found no one to support him, "Behold, Quirites," said Sempronius, "the descendant of that Appius, who having been elected decemvir for one year, himself declared his own election for a second year, and in the third, although a private citizen, with neither his own nor another's warrant of election, retained the fasces and authority, and relinquished not his hold on the magistracy until he was overwhelmed by his ill-gotten, ill-administered, and ill-continued powers.[2] It was this same family, Quirites, under compulsion of whose violence and abuse you banished yourselves from your native City and occupied the Sacred Mount[3]; the same against which you provided yourselves with the help of tribunes[4]; the same, because of which two armies of you encamped upon the Aventine[5]; the same that has ever attacked the laws restricting usury and throwing open the public lands.[6] This same

[4] II. xxxiii. 1–3.
[5] III. l. 13, and li. 10.
[6] II. xxix. 9; xliv. 1; lxi. 1; VI. xl. 11.

A.U.C. 444

et plebis interrupit: haec plebi ad curules magistratus iter obsaepsit. Hoc est nomen multo quam Tarquiniorum infestius vestrae libertati. Itane tandem, Appi Claudi? Cum centesimus iam annus sit ab Mam. Aemilio dictatore, tot censores fuerunt,[1] nobilissimi fortissimique viri, nemo eorum duodecim tabulas legit? Nemo id ius esse, quod postremo populus iussisset, sciit? Immo vero omnes scierunt[2] et ideo Aemiliae potius legi paruerunt quam illi antiquae qua primum censores creati erant, quia hanc postremam iusserat populus, et quia, ubi duae contrariae leges sunt, semper antiquae obrogat nova. "An hoc dicis, Appi, non teneri Aemilia lege populum? An populum teneri, te unum exlegem esse? Tenuit Aemilia lex violentos illos censores C. Furium[3] et M. Geganium, qui quid iste magistratus in re publica mali[4] facere posset indicarunt, cum ira finitae potestatis Mam. Aemilium, principem aetatis suae belli domique, aerarium fecerunt; tenuit deinceps omnes censores intra centum annorum spatium; tenet C. Plautium, collegam tuum iisdem[5] auspiciis, eodem iure creatum. An hunc non ut qui optimo iure censor creatus esset populus creavit? Tu unus eximius es in quo hoc praecipuum ac singu-

[1] fuerunt (fuēr) F: fuerin Ω.
[2] scierunt H. J. Mueller: sciuerunt Ω: sciuerint DA.
[3] C. Furium ζ: īm. furium Ω.
[4] mali A^2 (or A^1): male Ω: mala M.
[5] iisdem ζ: isdem T^2: hiisdem A: hisdem Ω.

[1] IV. i. vi. [2] e.g. IV. vi 7.

family broke off marriages between patricians and plebeians[1]; this same family blocked the path of the plebeians to curule offices.[2] It is a name that is far more hostile to your liberty than that of the Tarquinii. So, Appius Claudius! Though it is now a hundred years since Mamercus Aemilius was dictator, and in that time we have had all these censors, high-born and valiant men, has never one of them inspected the Twelve Tables? Has none of them known that the law was that which the people had last enacted? Nay, all of them knew it; and they obeyed the Aemilian law in preference to that ancient ordinance which governed the first elections of censors, precisely because it was the latest which the people had enacted, and because in a conflict of two laws the old is ever superseded by the new. B.C. 310

"Or will this be your contention, Appius, that the people is not bound by the Aemilian law? Or that the people is bound, but that you alone are exempt? The Aemilian law bound those violent censors Gaius Furius and Marcus Geganius, who showed what mischief that magistracy could accomplish in the state, when, in their rage at the abridgment of their powers, they reduced Mamercus Aemilius, the foremost man of his time in war and peace, to the lowest class of citizens; it bound all the censors who succeeded them, for the period of a hundred years; it binds Gaius Plautius, your colleague, who was given the office under the same auspices and with the same rights as yourself. Or did the people not make Plautius censor as one who had been elected with the fullest rights? Are you the sole exception in whose case this holds, as a unique and peculiar

A.U.C. 444

12 lare valeat? Quem tu regem sacrificiorum crees? Amplexus regni nomen, ut qui optimo iure rex Romae creatus sit, creatum se dicet. Quem semestri dictatura, quem interregno quinque dierum contentum fore putes? Quem clavi figendi aut ludorum
13 causa dictatorem audacter crees? Quam isti stolidos ac socordes videri creditis eos qui intra vicesimum diem ingentibus rebus gestis dictatura se abdicave-
14 runt aut qui vitio creati abierunt magistratu! Quid ego antiqua repetam? Nuper intra decem[1] annos C. Maenius dictator, quia, cum quaestiones severius quam quibusdam potentibus tutum erat exerceret, contagio eius quod quaerebat ipse criminis obiectata ab inimicis est, ut privatus obviam iret crimini,
15 dictatura se abdicavit. Nolo ego istam in te modestiam: ne degeneraveris a familia imperiosissima et superbissima; non die, non hora citius quam necesse est magistratu abieris, modo ne excedas finitum
16 tempus. Satis est aut diem aut mensem censurae adicere? Triennium, inquit, et sex menses ultra quam licet Aemilia lege censuram geram et solus geram. Hoc quidem iam regno simile est.
17 "An collegam subrogabis, quem ne in demortui
18 quidem locum subrogari fas est? Paenitet enim, quod antiquissimum sollemne et solum ab ipso cui

[1] decem Ω[1]: quinque Klockius Iac. Gronovius (chap. xxvi. § 7).

---

[1] II. ii. 1–2

[2] Livy has himself put the dictatorship of Maenius in the year 314. He is probably following another annalist here whose account like that of the Fasti Capitolini) assigned it to 320.

privilege? Whom, pray, could men elect as king for sacrifice?[1] He will seize on the title of sovereignty, and assert that he has been chosen as one elected with fullest rights to be king at Rome. Who, think you, will be content with six months as dictator; who with five days as interrex? Whom would you be so rash as to make dictator for the purpose of driving the nail or celebrating games? How dull and lumpish must those men seem to Appius, who after accomplishing great feats resigned the post of dictator within twenty days, or laid down the reins of office because of a flaw in their election! Why should I cite antiquity? Recently, within these ten years,[2] Gaius Maenius the dictator, for conducting an inquisition with more severity than was safe for certain great men, was accused by his ill-wishers of being tainted with that very felony which he was searching out, and abdicated the dictatorship, that he might face the charge as a private citizen. Far be it from me to require such self-denial of you! Fall not away from the most imperious and proud of families; quit not your magistracy one day, one hour, sooner than you must; only see that you overstep not the appointed limit. Is it enough to add a day, or a month, to his censorship? 'Three years,' quoth he, 'and six months beyond the time permitted by the Aemilian law will I administer the censorship, and administer it alone.' Surely this begins to look like monarchy! B.C. 310

"Or will you substitute a colleague for the other, though even in a dead man's place such substitution is forbidden by religion? You are not satisfied forsooth with having in your scrupulous exercise of a censor's powers diverted the service of our most

a.u.c. 444

fit institutum deo ab nobilissimis antistitibus eius
19 sacri ad servorum ministerium religiosus censor deduxisti, gens antiquior originibus urbis huius, hospitio deorum immortalium sancta, propter te ac tuam censuram intra annum ab stirpe exstincta est, nisi universam rem publicam eo nefario obstrinxeris
20 quod ominari etiam reformidat animus. Urbs eo lustro capta est quo demortuo collega C. Iulio[1] L. Papirius Cursor, ne abiret magistratu, M. Cornelium
21 Maluginensem collegam subrogavit. Et quanto modestior illius cupiditas fuit quam tua, Appi! Nec solus nec ultra finitum lege tempus L. Papirius censuram gessit; tamen neminem invenit qui se postea auctorem sequeretur; omnes deinceps censores post mortem collegae se magistratu abdicarunt.
22 Te nec quod dies exiit[2] censurae nec quod collega magistratu abiit nec lex nec pudor coercet: virtutem in superbia, in audacia, in contemptu deorum hominumque ponis.
23 "Ego te, Appi Claudi, pro istius magistratus maiestate ac verecundia quem gessisti non modo manu violatum sed ne verbo quidem inclementiori a me
24 appellatum vellem; sed et haec quae adhuc egi pervicacia tua et superbia coegit me loqui, et nisi
25 Aemiliae legi parueris, in vincula duci iubebo, nec cum ita comparatum a maioribus sit ut comitiis

[1] C. Iulio Walters and Conway: C. Iulio censore Ω.
[2] exiit ζ: exit Ω.

[1] The guilt of unlawfully prolonging his censorship.

ancient cult, the only one inaugurated by the god himself in whose honour it is observed, from the priesthood of the most exalted nobles to the ministry of slaves; it was not enough that a family more ancient than the beginnings of this City, and sanctified by the entertainment of the immortal gods, should through you and your censorship be within a year uprooted and destroyed; no, you must needs involve the entire state in such heinous guilt[1] as even to name is an omen that fills my mind with dread. The city was captured in that lustrum when, on the death of his colleague Gaius Julius, Lucius Papirius Cursor, to avoid having to vacate his office, caused Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis to be substituted in the room of the dead man. And how much more moderate, Appius, was his ambition than yours! The censorship of Lucius Papirius was neither a sole one nor one prolonged beyond the legally established term; yet he found none to follow his example; all succeeding censors have abdicated on the death of a colleague. But you neither the expiration of your time restrains nor the fact that your colleague has resigned, nor the law, nor a sense of decency: you reckon worth in terms of pride, of recklessness, of contempt for gods and men. B.C. 310

"For my own part, Appius Claudius, when I think of the dignity of that office you have held and the reverence attaching to it, I could wish that I might spare you not only personal violence but even an ungentle word: but your stubbornness and pride have compelled me to say what I have so far said, and unless you obey the Aemilian law, I shall order you to prison; nor, seeing that our forefathers have ordained that in the election of censors, if either fall

A.U.C. 414

censoriis, nisi duo confecerint legitima suffragia, non renuntiato altero comitia differantur, ego te, qui solus censor creari non possis, solum censuram gerere nunc[1] patiar."

26 Haec taliaque cum dixisset, prendi censorem et in vincula duci iussit. Approbantibus sex tribunis actionem collegae tres appellanti Appio auxilio fuerunt; summaque invidia omnium ordinum solus censuram gessit.

XXXV. Dum ea Romae geruntur, iam Sutrium ab Etruscis obsidebatur consulique Fabio imis montibus ducenti ad ferendam opem sociis temptandasque munitiones, si qua posset, acies hostium instructa
2 occurrit; quorum ingentem multitudinem cum ostenderet subiecta late planities, consul, ut loco paucitatem suorum adiuvaret, flectit paululum in clivos agmen—aspreta erant strata saxis—inde signa
3 in hostem obvertit. Etrusci omnium praeterquam multitudinis suae, qua sola freti erant, immemores proelium ineunt adeo raptim et avide ut abiectis missilibus, quo celerius manus consererent, stringerent
4 gladios vadentes in hostem; Romanus contra nunc tela, nunc saxa, quibus eos adfatim locus ipse
5 armabat, ingerere. Igitur scuta galeaeque ictae cum etiam quos non volneraverant turbarent neque

[1] gerere nunc γ: gerere non Ω: gerere γ.

[1] No one was held to be elected unless he had received the votes of an absolute majority of the centuries.

short of the legal vote,[1] the election shall be put off B.C. 310 and the other not be declared elected, will I now suffer you, who cannot be elected as sole censor, to administer the censorship alone."

Having uttered these and similar remonstrances, he ordered the censor to be arrested and carried off to prison. Six tribunes approved the action of their colleague: three protected Appius on his appeal, and, greatly to the indignation of all classes, he continued as sole censor.

XXXV. During the progress of this affair in Rome, the Etruscans were already laying siege to Sutrium; and the consul Fabius, leading his army along the foot of the mountains to relieve the allies, and, if in any way practicable, to attack the works of the besiegers, encountered the enemy drawn up in line of battle. The plain spreading out below him revealed to the consul their exceeding strength; and in order to make up for his own deficiency in numbers by the advantage of position, he altered slightly his line of march, so as to mount the hills—which were rough and covered with stones—and there turned and faced the enemy. The Etruscans, forgetting everything but their numbers, in which alone they trusted, entered the combat with such haste and eagerness that they cast away their missiles in order to come the sooner to close quarters, and drawing their swords rushed at the enemy. The Romans, on the contrary, fell to pelting them, now with javelins and now with stones, of which latter the ground itself provided a good supply; and even such of the Etruscans as were not wounded were confused by the blows that rattled down on their helms and shields. It was no easy matter to get close enough

A.U.C. 444

subire erat facile ad propiorem pugnam neque mis-
6 silia habebant, quibus eminus rem gererent—stantes et expositos ad ictus cum iam satis nihil tegeret, quosdam etiam pedem referentes fluctuantemque et instabilem aciem redintegrato clamore strictis gladiis
7 hastati et principes invadunt. Eum impetum non tulerunt Etrusci versisque signis fuga effusa castra repetunt. Sed equites Romani praevecti per obliqua campi cum se fugientibus obtulissent, omisso ad
8 castra itinere montes petunt; inde inermi paene agmine ac vexato volneribus in silvam Ciminiam penetratum. Romanus multis milibus Etruscorum caesis, duodequadraginta signis militaribus captis, castris etiam hostium cum praeda ingenti potitur. Tum de persequendo hoste agitari coeptum.

XXXVI. Silva erat Ciminia magis tum invia atque horrenda quam nuper fuere Germanici saltus, nulli ad eam[1] diem ne mercatorum quidem adita. Eam intrare haud fere quisquam praeter ducem ipsum audebat; aliis omnibus cladis Caudinae nondum
2 memoria aboleverat. Tum ex iis[2] qui aderant, consulis frater M. Fabius[3]—Caesonem alii, C. Claudium quidam, matre eadem qua consulem genitum, tradunt—speculatum se iturum professus bre-
3 vique omnia certa allaturum. Caere educatus apud hospites, Etruscis inde litteris eruditus erat lin-

[1] eam A ς : ea Ω.
[2] iis ς : hiis A : his Ω.
[3] frater M. Fabius—Weissenborn : fratrem m̄. fabium Ω.

---

[1] Livy is probably thinking of the German campaigns of Caesar in 55 and 53, and of Agrippa in 38 B.C.

for fighting hand to hand, and they had no javelins B.C. 310 for long-range work. There they stood, exposed to missiles, with no adequate cover of any sort, and as some of them gave ground and the line began to waver and be unsteady, the Roman first and second lines, giving a fresh cheer, charged them, sword in hand. Their onset was too much for the Etruscans, who faced about and fled headlong towards their camp. But the Roman cavalry, riding obliquely across the plain, presented themselves in front of the fugitives, who then abandoned the attempt to reach their camp and sought the mountains; from which they made their way in a body, unarmed and suffering from their wounds, to the Ciminian Forest. The Romans, having slain many thousand Etruscans and captured eight-and-thirty standards, took possession also of the enemy's camp, with a very large booty. They then began to consider the feasibility of a pursuit.

XXXVI. In those days the Ciminian Forest was more impassable and appalling than were lately the wooded defiles of Germany,[1] and no one—not even a trader—had up to that time visited it. To enter it was a thing that hardly anyone but the general himself was bold enough to do: with all the rest the recollection of the Caudine Forks was still too vivid. Then one of those present, the consul's brother Marcus Fabius,—some say that it was Caeso Fabius, others Gaius Claudius, a son of the same mother as the consul—offered to explore and return in a short time with definite information about everything. He had been educated at Caere in the house of family friends, and from this circumstance was learned in Etruscan writings and knew the Etruscan guamque Etruscam probe noverat. Habeo auctores volgo tum Romanos pueros, sicut nunc Graecis, ita

A.U.C. 444

4 Etruscis litteris erudiri solitos; sed propius est vero praecipuum aliquid fuisse in eo qui se tam audaci simulatione hostibus immiscuerit. Servus ei dicitur comes unus fuisse, nutritus una eoque haud ignarus
5 linguae eiusdem; nec quicquam aliud proficiscentes quam summatim regionis quae intranda erat naturam ac nomina principum in populis accepere, ne qua inter conloquia insigni nota haesitantes deprendi
6 possent. Iere pastorali habitu, agrestibus telis, falcibus gaesisque[1] binis, armati. Sed neque commercium linguae nec vestis armorumve habitus sic eos texit quam quod abhorrebat ab fide quemquam
7 externum Ciminios saltus intraturum. Usque ad Camertes Umbros penetrasse dicuntur. Ibi qui essent fateri Romanum ausum; introductumque in senatum consulis verbis egisse de societate amici-
8 tiaque atque inde comi hospitio acceptum nuntiare Romanis iussum commeatum exercitui dierum triginta praesto fore, si ea loca intrasset, iuventutemque Camertium Umbrorum in armis paratam imperio futuram.

9 Haec cum relata consuli essent, impedimentis prima vigilia praemissis, legionibus post impedi-

[1] gaesisque A^5 τ: caesisq. (gessis D^2 or D^1 in marg.) Ω.

language well. I have authority for believing that B.C. 310 in that age Roman boys were regularly wont to be schooled in Etruscan literature, as nowadays they are trained in Greek; but it seems more probable that this man possessed some exceptional qualification to induce him to venture amongst enemies in so daring a disguise. It is said that his only companion was a slave, brought up with him, and hence acquainted, like his master, with the language. They set out, after acquiring no more than a summary knowledge of the nature of the region they must enter and the names of the chief men in those tribes, to save them from being detected in conversation by boggling at any well-known fact. They went dressed as shepherds and armed with rustic weapons, namely billhooks and a brace of javelins apiece. But neither their familiarity with the tongue nor the fashion of their dress and weapons was so great a protection to them as the fact that it was repugnant to belief that any stranger would enter the Ciminian defiles. They are said to have penetrated as far as Camerinum in Umbria, where the Roman, having ventured to tell who they were, was introduced into the senate, and treated with them in the consul's name for friendship and an alliance. Having then been hospitably entertained, he was bidden to carry word back to the Romans that thirty days' provisions for their army would be waiting for them, if they came into that region, and that the young men of the Umbrian Camertes would be armed and ready to obey their orders.

On their success being made known to the consul, he sent the baggage ahead, in the first watch, and directed the legions to follow the baggage. He

A.U.C. 444 10 menta ire iussis ipse substitit cum equitatu et luce orta postero die obequitavit stationibus hostium, quae extra saltum dispositae erant; et cum satis diu tenuisset hostem, in castra sese recepit portaque altera egressus ante noctem agmen adsequitur. 11 Postero die luce prima iuga Ciminii montis tenebat; inde contemplatus opulenta Etruriae arva milites 12 emittit. Ingenti iam abacta praeda tumultuariae agrestium Etruscorum cohortes repente a principibus regionis eius concitatae Romanis occurrunt, adeo incompositae ut vindices praedarum prope ipsi 13 praedae fuerint. Caesis fugatisque his, late depopulato agro victor Romanus opulentusque rerum 14 omnium copia in castra rediit. Eo forte quinque legati cum duobus tribunis plebis venerant denuntiatum Fabio senatus verbis ne saltum Ciminium transiret. Laetati serius se quam ut impedire bellum possent venisse, nuntii victoriae Romam revertuntur.

XXXVII. Hac expeditione consulis motum latius erat quam profligatum bellum; vastationem namque sub Ciminii montis radicibus iacens ora senserat, conciveratque indignatione non Etruriae modo popu- 2 los sed Umbriae finitima. Itaque quantus non unquam antea exercitus ad Sutrium venit; neque e silvis tantummodo promota castra sed etiam avi-

[1] The tribunes were added to the embassy that they might, if necessary, compel obedience to the senate by the exercise of their sacrosanct authority. This was an unusual procedure, as the powers of the tribunes were held to extend no further than one mile from the City.

himself stopped behind with the cavalry, and at dawn of the following day made a demonstration against the enemy's outposts, which had been stationed at the entrance to the pass. Having kept the enemy in play for a sufficient time, he retired within his camp, and emerging from it by the opposite gate overtook the column before night. Next day, with the first rays of light, he was on the crest of the Ciminian mountain and, looking thence over the rich ploughlands of Etruria, sent his soldiers to plunder. The Romans had already brought away out enormous booty when certain improvised bands of Etruscan peasants, called together in hot haste by the chief men of that country, encountered them, but with so little discipline that in seeking to regain the spoils they had nearly been made a spoil themselves. Having slain or driven off these men and wasted the country far and wide, the Romans returned to their camp, victorious and enriched with all manner of supplies. There, as it happened, they found five legates, with two tribunes of the plebs,[1] who had come to order Fabius in the name of the senate not to cross the Ciminian Forest. Rejoicing that they had come too late to be able to hinder the campaign, they returned to Rome with tidings of victory. B.C. 310

XXXVII. This expedition of the consul's, instead of putting an end to the war, only gave it a wider range. For the district lying about the base of Mount Ciminius had felt the devastation, and had aroused not only Etruria to resentment but the neighbouring parts of Umbria also. So an army came to Sutrium that was larger than any they had raised before; and not only did they move forward their camp, out of the woods, but even, in their

A.U.C. 444

ditate dimicandi quam primum in campos delata
3 acies. Deinde instructa primo suo stare loco, relicto hostibus[1] ad instruendum contra spatio; dein, postquam detractare[2] hostem sensere pugnam, ad vallum
4 subeunt. Ubi postquam stationes quoque receptas intra munimenta sensere, clamor repente circa duces ortus, ut eo sibi e castris cibaria eius diei deferri iuberent: mansuros se sub armis et aut nocte aut
5 certe luce prima castra hostium invasuros. Nihilo quietior Romanus exercitus imperio ducis continetur. Decima erat fere diei hora, cum cibum capere consul milites iubet; praecipit ut in armis sint quacumque
6 diei noctisve hora signum dederit; paucis milites adloquitur, Samnitium bella extollit, elevat Etruscos; nec hostem hosti nec multitudinem multitudini comparandam ait; esse praeterea telum aliud occultum;
7 scituros in tempore; interea taceri opus esse. His ambagibus prodi simulabat hostes, quo animus militum multitudine territus restitueretur; et, quod sine munimento consederant,[3] veri similius erat quod simulabatur.

Curati cibo corpora quieti dant et quarta fere
8 vigilia sine tumultu excitati arma capiunt. Dolabrae calonibus dividuntur ad vallum proruendum fos-

[1] hostibus ζ: hostio O: hostium Ω: hosti Madvig.
[2] detractare A^2: detractare . . . pugnam omitted by M: detrec (-traec- or -trac- P) tare Ω.
[3] consederant ζ: considerant Ω: constiterant ζ.

[1] Perhaps about six o'clock.

eagerness for combat, came down into the plain at B.C. 310
the earliest opportunity in battle formation. At first, after forming up, they stood still in their positions, having left their enemies room to draw up opposite. Then, finding the Romans in no haste to engage them, they advanced up to the rampart. When they saw that even the outguards had retired within the works, they began shouting to their generals, to have their rations for the day sent out to them from the camp; they would wait under arms, they said, and either that night, or at daybreak at the latest, attack the enemy's stockade. The Roman army was every whit as restless, but was restrained by the general's authority. It was about the tenth hour of the day[1] when the consul bade the soldiers sup, and commanded them to be armed and ready at whatever hour of the day or night he might give the signal. In a brief address he magnified the Samnite wars and belittled the Etruscans: there was no comparison, he said, between the two enemies, or between their numbers; moreover, he had an additional weapon in concealment: they should know about it when the time came; until then it must remain a secret. By these obscure hints he sought to engender a belief that the enemy were being betrayed, in order to revive the spirits of his men, which were damped by the numbers of their enemies; and the fact that the Etruscans had thrown up no breastworks where they lay lent colour to the insinuation.

Refreshed with food, the soldiers gave themselves up to sleep, and at about the fourth watch were awakened without noise and put on their armour. Mattocks were issued to the soldiers' servants, that they might sasque implendas. Intra munimenta instruitur acies, delectae cohortes ad portarum exitus conlocantur. 9 Dato deinde signo paulo ante lucem, quod aestivis noctibus sopitae maxime quietis tempus est, proruto vallo erupit acies, stratos passim invadit hostes; alios immobiles, alios semisomnos in cubilibus suis, maximam partem ad arma trepidantes caedes oppressit; 10 paucis armandi se datum spatium est; eos ipsos non signum certum, non ducem sequentes fundit Romanus fugatosque persequitur. Ad castra, ad silvas diversi tendebant. Silvae tutius dedere refugium: nam castra in campis sita eodem die capiuntur. Aurum argentumque iussum referri ad consulem; cetera praeda militis fuit. Caesa aut capta eo die hostium milia ad sexaginta.

A.U.C. 444

11 Eam tam claram pugnam trans Ciminiam silvam ad Perusiam pugnatam quidam auctores sunt metuque in magno civitatem fuisse ne interclusus exercitus tam infesto saltu coortis undique Tuscis Vmbrisque 12 opprimeretur.[1] Sed ubicumque pugnatum est, res Romana superior fuit. Itaque a Perusia et Cortona[2] et Arretio, quae ferme capita Etruriae populorum ea tempestate erant, legati pacem foedusque ab Romanis petentes indutias in triginta annos impetraverunt.

XXXVIII. Dum haec in Etruria geruntur, consul alter C. Marcius Rutulus[3] Allifas de Samnitibus vi

[1] opprimeretur A^2 $\bar{r}$: opprimerentur Ω: opprimentur M.
[2] Cortona A^2 (marg.) A^3 $\bar{r}$: cortone (?) A^1: crotone Ω.
[3] Rutulus Conway: rutulius or rutilius Ω.

level the rampart and fill up the trenches. The line was drawn up inside the fortifications, and selected cohorts were posted at the exits. Then, on the signal being given a little before dawn, which on summer nights is the time of deepest sleep, the rampart was thrown down, and the Romans, rushing out in battle-formation, fell upon their enemies, who were lying all about the field. Some were slain without even stirring in their sleep, some were but half awake, the greatest number were reaching in terror for their weapons. Only a few were given time to arm themselves; and even these, with no definite standard to follow and no leader, the Romans routed and chased from the field. Some made for the camp and others for the mountains, as they fled this way and that. The forests afforded the surer refuge; for the camp, being situated in the plain, was captured the same day. Orders were issued that all gold and silver be brought to the consul; the rest of the booty went to the soldiers. On that day the enemy lost sixty thousand slain or captured. B.C. 310

Some historians relate that this famous battle was fought on the other side of the Ciminian Forest, near Perusia, and that Rome was in a panic lest the army should be surrounded and cut off in that dangerous defile by the Tuscans and Umbrians rising up on every hand. But, wherever it was fought, the Romans were the victors. And so from Perusia and Cortona and Arretium, which at that time might be the chief cities of the nations of Etruria, ambassadors came to Rome to sue for peace and an alliance. They obtained a truce for thirty years.

XXXVIII. While these things were going on in Etruria, the other consul, Gaius Marcius Rutulus,

A.U.C. 411 cepit. Multa alia castella vicique aut deleta hostiliter aut integra in potestatem venere.

2 Per idem tempus et classis Romana a P. Cornelio, quem senatus maritimae orae praefecerat, in Campaniam acta cum adpulsa Pompeios esset, socii inde navales ad depopulandum agrum Nucerinum profecti, proximis raptim vastatis unde reditus tutus ad naves esset, dulcedine, ut fit, praedae longius pro-
3 gressi excivere hostes. Palatis per agros nemo obvius fuit, cum occidione occidi possent; redeuntes agmine incauto haud procul navibus adsecuti agrestes exuerunt praeda, partem etiam occiderunt; quae superfuit caedi trepida multitudo ad naves compulsa est.

4 Profectio Q. Fabi trans Ciminiam silvam quantum Romae terrorem fecerat, tam laetam famam in Samnium ad hostes tulerat interclusum Romanum exercitum obsideri, cladisque imaginem Furculas
5 Caudinas memorabant: eadem temeritate avidam ulteriorum semper gentem in saltus invios deductam, saeptam non hostium magis armis quam locorum
6 iniquitatibus esse. Iam gaudium invidia quadam miscebatur, quod belli Romani decus ab Samnitibus

---

[1] At VIII. xxv. 4, Livy mentioned the acquisition of Allifae, but has nowhere spoken of its recapture by the Samnites.

[2] Diod. (XIX. lxv.) tells us that Nuceria (formerly an ally of Rome) had revolted to the Samnites.

captured Allifae from the Samnites by assault.[1] B.C. 310
Many forts and villages besides were either wiped out in the course of hostilities or came intact into the hands of the Romans.

At about this time a Roman fleet, commanded by Publius Cornelius, whom the senate had placed in charge of the coast, sailed for Campania and put into Pompeii. From there the sailors and rowers set out to pillage the territory of Nuceria.[2] Having quickly ravaged the nearest fields, from which they might have returned in safety to their ships, they were lured on, as often happens, by the love of booty, and going too far abroad aroused the enemy. While they roamed through the fields, nobody interfered with them, though they might have been utterly annihilated; but as they came trooping back, without a thought of danger, the country-folk overtook them not far from the ships, stripped them of their plunder, and even slew a part of them; those who escaped the massacre were driven, a disordered rabble, to their ships.

Great as had been the fears excited in Rome when Quintus Fabius marched through the Ciminian Forest, the rejoicings that took place in Samnium amongst the enemy were no less on their hearing a report that the Roman army was intercepted and besieged. They recalled the Caudine Forks as showing what the disaster would be like; with the same temerity, they said, a race that was ever reaching out for what lay beyond had been led into pathless forests and there hemmed in, more by the difficulties of the ground than by the arms of their enemy. Soon their joy began to be mixed with a kind of envy, that Fortune should have transferred the glory

A.U.C. 444

7 fortuna ad Etruscos avertisset. Itaque armis virisque ad opprimendum[1] C. Marcium consulem concurrunt, protinus inde Etruriam per Marsos ac Sabinos petituri, si Marcius dimicandi potestatem non faciat.
8 Obvius iis consul fuit. Dimicatum proelio utrimque atroci atque incerto eventu est, et cum anceps caedes fuisset, adversae tamen rei fama in Romanos vertit ob amissos quosdam equestris ordinis tribunosque militum atque unum legatum, et quod insigne maxime fuit, consulis ipsius volnus.
9 Ob haec etiam aucta fama, ut solet, ingens terror patres invasit dictatoremque dici placebat; nec quin Cursor Papirius diceretur in quo tum summa rei bellicae ponebatur, dubium cuiquam erat. Sed nec
10 in Samnium nuntium perferri omnibus infestis tuto posse nec vivere Marcium consulem satis fidebant. Alter consul Fabius infestus privatim Papirio erat;
11 quae ne ira obstaret bono publico, legatos ex consularium numero mittendos ad eum senatus censuit,
12 qui sua quoque eum, non publica solum auctoritate moverent ut memoriam simultatium patriae remit-
13 teret. Profecti legati ad Fabium cum senatus consultum tradidissent adiecissentque orationem convenientem mandatis, consul demissis in terram oculis tacitus ab incertis quidnam acturus esset legatis of the Roman war from Samnites to Etruscans. So B.C. 310

[1] opprimendum γ: optinendum (or ob-) Ω.

they hastened to bring all their strength to bear upon crushing Gaius Marcius, the consul; and resolved, if Marcius should avoid an encounter, to march forthwith into Etruria, through the countries of the Marsi and the Sabines. The consul met them, and the battle was fiercely contested on both sides, but without a decision being reached. Yet, doubtful though it was which side had suffered most, the report gained ground that the Romans had been worsted: they had lost certain members of the equestrian order, certain military tribunes, and one lieutenant, and—most conspicuous of their misfortunes—the consul himself was wounded.

These reverses as usual were further exaggerated in the telling, and the senate in great dismay determined on the appointment of a dictator. Nobody could doubt that Papirius Cursor, who was regarded as the foremost soldier of his time, would be designated. But the senators were not certain that a messenger could be got through in safety to Samnium, where all was hostile, nor that the consul Marcius was alive. The other consul, Fabius, had a private grudge against Papirius; and lest this enmity might hinder the general welfare, the senate decided to send a deputation of former consuls, in the hope that their personal influence, when added to the wishes of the government, might induce him to forget those quarrels for the good of the country. The ambassadors went to Fabius and delivered the resolution of the senate, with a discourse that suited their instructions. The consul, his eyes fixed on the ground, retired without a word, leaving the ambassadors uncertain what he proposed to do. Then in the

A.U.C. 444 14 recessit; nocte deinde silentio, ut mos est, L. Papirium dictatorem dixit. Cui cum ob animum egregie victum legati gratias agerent, obstinatum silentium obtinuit ac sine responso ac mentione facti sui legatos dimisit, ut appareret insignem dolorem ingenti comprimi animo.

15 Papirius C. Iunium Bubulcum magistrum equitum dixit: atque ei legem curiatam de imperio ferenti triste omen diem diffidit, quod Faucia curia fuit principium, duabus insignis cladibus, captae urbis et Caudinae pacis, quod utroque anno eiusdem curiae 16 fuerat principium. Macer Licinius tertia etiam clade, quae ad Cremeram accepta est, abominandam eam curiam facit.

XXXIX. Dictator postero die auspiciis repetitis pertulit legem; et profectus cum legionibus ad terrorem traducti silvam Ciminiam exercitus nuper 2 scriptis ad Longulam pervenit acceptisque a Marcio consule veteribus militibus in aciem copias eduxit. Nec hostes detractare visi pugnam. Instructos deinde armatosque, cum ab neutris proelium in- 3 ciperet, nox oppressit. Quieti aliquamdiu nec suis

---

[1] The consul rose and took the auspices after midnight because it was less likely that anything unlucky would then be said or done—in the absence of bystanders—to vitiate the ceremony.

[2] Under the kings the curiate assembly had been the only formal assembly of the people (cf. I. xiii. 6 for the origin of the curiae), but in the time of the republic its functions had largely passed to the centuriate assembly. It was, however, still called upon to ratify the election of new magistrates by passing a lex curiata de imperio, and retained certain other ceremonial duties.

[3] This was determined each time by lot.

[4] 477 B.C. (Book II, chap. I.).

silence of the night, as the custom is, he appointed B.C. 310
Lucius Papirius dictator.[1] When the envoys thanked him for nobly conquering his feelings, he continued obstinately silent, and dismissed them without making any reply or alluding to what he had done, so that it was clearly seen what agony his great heart was suppressing.

Papirius named Gaius Junius Bubulcus master of the horse. When he began to lay before the curiate assembly[2] a law confirming his authority, the proceedings were cut short by an evil omen, the first vote to be counted being that of the ward called Faucia, notorious for two calamities, the capture of the City and the Caudine Peace, which had both been incurred in years when this same curia had the right of the first return.[3] Licinius Macer makes this ward unlucky also for a third disaster—that of the Cremera.[4]

XXXIX. Next day the dictator sought the auspices afresh and carried the law through. Then, setting out with the legions which had recently been recruited on account of the fear occasioned by the army's march through the Ciminian Forest, he came to the vicinity of Longula,[5] and taking over from Marcius the consul his veteran troops, marched out and offered battle, which the enemy on their part seemed willing to accept. But while the two armies stood armed and ready for the conflict, which neither cared to begin, night overtook them. For some time after that they remained quietly in the camps

[5] Longula was a Volscian town, but was situated not far from the Samnite border. It is not necessary to assume, with Weissenborn-Mueller, that Livy is referring to an otherwise unknown Longula in Samnium.

A.U.C. 414 diffidentes viribus nec hostem spernentes, stativa in propinquo habuere.[1] Interea Etrusci[2] lege sacrata coacto exercitu, cum vir virum legisset, quantis nunquam alias ante simul copiis simul animis dimicarunt; tantoque irarum certamine gesta res est ut ab neutra parte emissa sint tela. Gladiis pugna coepit et acerrime commissa ipso certamine, quod aliquamdiu anceps fuit, accensa est, ut non cum Etruscis totiens victis, sed cum aliqua nova gente videretur dimicatio esse. Nihil ab ulla parte movetur fugae; cadunt antesignani, et ne nudentur propugnatoribus signa, fit ex secunda prima acies. Ab ultimis deinde subsidiis cietur miles; adeoque ad ultimum laboris ac periculi ventum est ut equites Romani omissis equis ad primos ordines peditum per arma, per corpora evaserint. Ea velut nova inter fessos exorta acies turbavit signa Etruscorum; secuta deinde impetum eorum, utcumque adfecta erat, cetera multitudo tandem perrumpit ordines hostium. Tunc vinci pertinacia coepta et averti manipuli quidam, et, ut semel dedere hi terga,[3] etiam ceteri item[4] capes-

[1] habuere Anderson (ed. of Bk. IX. p. 259): habuere. Nam et cum umbrorum exercitu acie depugnatum est; fusi tamen magis quam caesi hostes, quia coeptam acriter non tolerarunt pugnam: et ad Vadimonis lacum POTDLA: M has these words and also (before Nam the words et rurae (?): A^1 the words interea res in etruria geste: I^2 (or I^3*)* F? (marg.) U have them after pugnam (U adding et after res): F^3 has after pugnam (over erasure) interim ab fabio cōs in etruria res feliciter geste ad vadimonis lacum. Anderson supposes that we have here what was written as a comment on the first sentence of § 11.

[2] Interea Etrusci Walters (note): Et Etrusci Anderson: Etrusci Ω.

[3] dedere hi terga Walters and Conway: dedere terga Ω: dederunterga O: dederet terga TD?: dederet et terga L?: dederet (or dederat or dederē) terga D.

they had established near one another, neither lacking B.C. 310 confidence in themselves nor yet making light of their adversaries. Meanwhile the Etruscans, employing a lex sacrata,[1] had raised an army in which each man had chosen his comrade, and joined battle, with greater forces, and at the same time with greater valour, than ever before. The field was contested with such rivalry of rage that neither side discharged a missile. The battle began with swords, and, furious at the outset, waxed hotter as the struggle continued, for the victory was long undecided. It seemed as though the Romans were contending, not with the so oft defeated Etruscans, but with some new race. No sign of flight was visible in any quarter. As the front-rankers fell, the second line moved up to replace the first, that the standards might not want defenders. After that the last reserves were called upon; and to such extremity of distress and danger did the Romans come that their cavalry dismounted, and made their way over arms and over bodies to the front ranks of the infantry. Like a fresh line springing up amongst the exhausted combatants, they wrought havoc in the companies of the Etruscans. Then the rest of the soldiers, following up their charge, despite of weariness, at last broke through the enemy's ranks. At this their stubbornness began to be overcome, and certain companies to face about; and when these had once turned tail, the rest likewise took to flight. That

[1] One who violated the lex sacrata was forfeited to the gods. See chap. xl. § 9, IV. xxvi. 3, XXXVI. xxxviii. 1, and especially X. xxxviii. 3 ff.

[4] ceteri item Harant: certiorem Ω: tutiores A: certiores A^2 Koch: ceteri certiorem Walters and Conway.

A.U.C. 444 11 sere fugam. Ille primum dies fortuna vetere abundantes Etruscorum fregit opes. Caesum in acie, quod roboris fuit; castra eodem impetu capta direptaque.

A.U.C. 446 XL. Pari subinde periculo gloriaeque eventu bellum in Samnitibus erat, qui praeter cetoros belli apparatus, ut acies sua fulgeret novis armorum 2 insignibus fecerunt. Duo exercitus erant; scuta alterius auro, alterius argento caelaverunt; forma erat scuti: summum latius, qua pectus atque umeri teguntur, fastigio aequali; ad imum cuneatior mobi- 3 litatis causa. Spongia pectori tegumentum et sinistrum crus ocrea tectum; galeae cristatae, quae speciem magnitudini corporum adderent. Tunicae auratis militibus versicolores, argentatis linteae candidae. His vaginae argenteae, baltea argentea: auratae vaginae, aurea baltea illis erant, et equorum inaurata tapeta.[1] His dextrum cornu datum; illi in 4 sinistro consistunt. Notus iam Romanis apparatus insignium armorum fuerat doctique a ducibus erant horridum militem esse debere, non caelatum auro et 5 argento sed ferro et animis fretum: quippe illa praedam verius quam arma esse, nitentia ante rem, 6 deformia inter sanguinem et volnera. Virtutem

[1] The words his vaginae—tapeta are not found in the MSS. of Livy. Nonius (194, 20) cites (as from Liv. IX) auratae vaginae, aurata baltea illis erant, and Auctor explan. in Donatum, and Probus (cf. Keil, Gram. Lat. IV 542 and 129) ascribe to Livy ("Livy or Virgil," Probus) erant et equorum inaurata tapeta. Walters and Conway suggest placing them as in the text, prefixing his vaginae argenteae, baltea argentea which they conjecture to have stood in the original (Class. Quart. 12 (1918) p. 103).

[1] Weissenborn-Mueller think a breastplate resembling a sponge in appearance is intended. The translator follows day for the first time broke the might of the Etruscans, which had long flourished in prosperity. Their strength was cut off in the battle, and their camp was taken and plundered in the same attack. B.C. 310

XL. The war in Samnium, immediately afterwards, was attended with equal danger and an equally glorious conclusion. The enemy, besides their other warlike preparations, had made their battle-line to glitter with new and splendid arms. There were two corps: the shields of the one were inlaid with gold, of the other with silver. The shape of the shield was this: the upper part, where it protected the breast and shoulders, was rather broad, with a level top; below it was somewhat tapering, to make it easier to handle. They wore a sponge [1] to protect the breast, and the left leg was covered with a greave. Their helmets were crested, to make their stature appear greater. The tunics of the gilded warriors were parti-coloured; those of the silvern ones were linen of a dazzling white. The latter had silver sheaths and silver baldrics: the former gilded sheaths and golden baldrics, and their horses had gold-embroidered saddle-cloths. The right wing was assigned to these: the others took up their post on the left. The Romans had already learned of these splendid accoutrements, and their generals had taught them that a soldier should be rough to look on, not adorned with gold and silver but putting his trust in iron and in courage: indeed those other things were more truly spoil than arms, shining bright before a battle, but losing their beauty in the midst of blood and wounds; manhood they said, B.C. 308

[1] Professor Anderson in taking the expression literally, of a corslet made of sponge.

A.U.C. 464

esse militis decus et omnia illa victoriam sequi et ditem hostem quamvis pauperis victoris praemium esse.

7 His Cursor vocibus instinctos milites in proelium ducit. Dextro ipse cornu consistit, sinistro praefecit
8 magistrum equitum. Simul est concursum, ingens fuit cum hoste certamen, non segnius inter dictatorem et magistrum equitum ab utra parte victoria
9 inciperet. Prior forte Iunius commovit hostem, laevo dextrum cornu, sacratos more Samnitium milites eoque candida veste et paribus candore armis insignes; eos se Orco mactare Iunius dictitans [1] cum intulisset signa turbavit ordines et haud dubie impulit aciem.
10 Quod ubi sensit dictator, "Ab laevone cornu victoria incipiet" inquit, "et dextrum cornu, dictatoris acies, alienam pugnam sequetur, non partem maximam
11 victoriae trahet?" Concitat milites; nec peditum virtuti equites aut legatorum studia ducibus cedunt.
12 M. Valerius a dextro, P. Decius ab laevo cornu, ambo consulares, ad equites in cornibus positos evehuntur adhortatique eos ut partem secum capesserent decoris in transversa latera hostium incurrunt.
13 Is novus additus terror cum ex parte utraque circumvasisset aciem et ad terrorem hostium legiones Romanae redintegrato clamore intulissent gradum,

[1] intulisset T^2 (or T^1) ρ: intulissent Ω.

---

[1] Orcus—the Greek Pluto—was god of the dead.

was the adornment of a soldier; all those other B.C. 305 things went with the victory, and a rich enemy was the prize of the victor, however poor.

Whilst his men were animated by these words, Cursor led them into battle. He took up his own post on the right, and committed the left to the master of the horse. From the moment of encountering, there was a mighty struggle with the enemy, and a struggle no less sharp between the dictator and the master of the horse, to decide which wing was to inaugurate the victory. It so happened that Junius was the first to make an impression on the Samnites. With the Roman left he faced the enemy's right, where they had consecrated themselves, as their custom was, and for that reason were resplendent in white coats and equally white armour. Declaring that he offered up these men in sacrifice to Orcus,[1] Junius charged, threw their ranks into disorder, and clearly made their line recoil. When the dictator saw this, he cried, "Shall the victory begin upon the left? Shall the right, the dictator's division, follow the attack of others? Shall it not carry off the honours of the victory?" This fired the soldiers with new energy; nor did the cavalry display less valour than the foot, or the lieutenants less enthusiasm than the generals. Marcus Valerius on the right and Publius Decius on the left, both men of consular rank, rode out to the cavalry, which was posted on the wings, and, exhorting them to join with themselves in seizing a share of glory, charged obliquely against the enemy's flanks. Thus a new and appalling danger enveloped their line on either side, and when the Roman legions, observing the terror of the Samnites, pressed forward with 14 tum fuga ab Samnitibus coepta. Iam strage hominum armorumque insignium campi repleri. Ac primo pavidos Samnites castra sua accepere, deinde ne ea quidem retenta; captis direptisque ante noctem iniectus ignis.

A.U.C. 446

15 Dictator ex senatus consulto triumphavit, cuius triumpho longe maximam speciem captiva arma praebuere. Tantum magnificentiae visum in iis,[1] ut aurata scuta dominis argentariarum[2] ad forum ornandum dividerentur. Inde natum initium dicitur fori ornandi ab aedilibus cum tensae ducerentur. Et Romani quidem ad honorem deum insignibus armis hostium usi sunt: Campani ab superbia et odio Samnitium gladiatores, quod spectaculum inter epulas erat, eo ornatu armarunt Samnitiumque nomine compellarunt.

18 Eodem anno cum reliquiis[3] Etruscorum ad Perusiam, quae et ipsa indutiarum fidem ruperat, Fabius consul nec dubia nec difficili victoria dimicat. Ipsum oppidum—nam ad moenia victor accessit—cepisset, ni legati dedentes urbem exissent. Praesidio Perusiae

[1] iis γ: hiis A: his Ω.
[2] argentariarum Muretus: argentariorum (-oriorum O) Ω.
[3] reliquiis $F^3\gamma$: reliquis Ω.

[1] It was forty years later when the Romans began to coin silver for themselves; but there would be much coined silver in circulation by this time from Etruria and Magna Graecia, to furnish employment for money-changers (argentarii).

[2] A tensa is figured in Stuart Jones, Companion to Roman History, Pl. xlix. It was used to carry the images of the Capitoline gods in solemn procession to the Circus, at the time of the ludi circenses.

[3] The Romans seem to have obtained from Capua the idea of gladiators (Livy, Per. XVI.), and the "Samnite" redoubled shouts, the enemy began to flee. The B.C. 308 fields were soon heaped with slain and with glittering armour. At first the frightened Samnites found a refuge in their camp, but presently even that had to be abandoned, and ere nightfall it had been taken, sacked, and set on fire.

The dictator, as decreed by the senate, celebrated a triumph, in which by far the finest show was afforded by the captured armour. So magnificent was its appearance that the shields inlaid with gold were divided up amongst the owners of the money-changers' booths, to be used in decking out the Forum.[1] From this is said to have come the custom of the aediles adorning the Forum whenever the tensae, or covered chariots of the gods, were conducted through it.[2] So the Romans made use of the splendid armour of their enemies to do honour to the gods; while the Campanians, in consequence of their pride and in hatred of the Samnites, equipped after this fashion the gladiators who furnished them entertainment at their feasts, and bestowed on them the name of Samnites.[3]

In the same year the consul Fabius fought a battle with the remnants of the Etruscan forces near Perusia—which, together with other cities, had broken the truce[4]—and gained an easy and decisive victory. He would have taken the town itself—for after the battle he marched up to the walls—had not ambassadors come out and surrendered the place. Having placed a garrison in Perusia and having sent was always one of the standard types. The sentence is usually taken as implying that the Capuans had been present as allies of the Romans in the battle.

[4] Chap, xxxvii. § 12.

A.U.C. 446 imposito, legationibus Etruriae amicitiam petentibus prae se Romam ad senatum missis consul praestantiore etiam quam dictator victoria triumphans urbem est 21 invectus; quin etiam devictorum Samnitium decus magna ex parte ad legatos, P. Decium et M. Valerium, est versum; quos populus proximis comitiis ingenti consensu consulem alterum, alterum praetorem declaravit.

XLI. Fabio ob egregie perdomitam Etruriam continuatur consulatus; Decius collega datur. Valerius praetor quartum creatus. Consules partiti provincias:
2 Etruria Decio, Samnium Fabio evenit. Is profectus[1]
3 ad Nuceriam Alfaternam, cum pacem petentes, quod uti ea cum daretur noluissent, aspernatus esset,[2]
4 oppugnando ad deditionem subegit. Cum Samnitibus acie dimicatum. Haud magno certamine hostes victi; neque eius pugnae memoria tradita foret, ni Marsi eo primum proelio cum Romanis bellassent. Secuti Marsorum defectionem Paeligni eandem fortunam habuerunt.

5 Decio quoque, alteri consuli, secunda belli fortuna erat. Tarquiniensem metu subegerat frumentum exercitui praebere atque indutias in quadraginta
6 annos petere. Volsiniensium castella aliquot vi cepit; quaedam ex his diruit ne receptaculo hostibus essent; circumferendoque passim bello tantum ter-

[1] Is profectus Sigonius: profectus Ω.

[2] esset A^4 (or A^5, marg. Madvig: ea L: eā DA: est (or ē Ω: wanting in O.

[1] The Marsi, though of Samnite stock, had hitherto bee on good terms with the Romans.

on before him to the senate in Rome the Etruscan B.C. 308 deputations which had come to him seeking friendship, the consul was borne in triumph into the City, after gaining a success more brilliant even than the dictator's; indeed the glory of conquering the Samnites was largely diverted upon the lieutenants, Publius Decius and Marcus Valerius, of whom, at the next election, the people with great enthusiasm made the one consul and the other praetor.

XLI. In recognition of his remarkable conquest of Etruria, Fabius was continued in the consulship, and was given Decius for his colleague. Valerius was for the fourth time chosen praetor. The consuls cast lots for the commands, Etruria falling to Decius and Samnium to Fabius. The latter marched against Nuceria Alfaterna, and rejecting that city's overtures of peace because its people had declined it when it was offered them, laid siege to the place and forced it to surrender. A battle was fought with the Samnites, in which the enemy were defeated without much difficulty, nor would the engagement have been remembered but for the fact that it was the first time that the Marsi had made war against the Romans.[1] The Paeligni imitated the defection of the Marsi, and met with the same fate.

Decius, the other consul, was also successful in war. When he had frightened the Tarquinienses into furnishing corn for the army and seeking a truce for forty years, he captured by storm a number of strongholds belonging to the people of Volsinii. Some of these he dismantled, lest they should serve as a refuge for the enemy, and by devastating far and wide he made himself so feared that all who

A.U.C. 446

rorem sui fecit ut nomen omne Etruscum foedus ab
7 consule peteret. Ac de eo quidem nihil impetratum; indutiae annuae datae. Stipendium exercitu Romano ab hoste in eum annum pensum et binae tunicae in militem exactae; ea merces indutiarum fuit.
8 Tranquillas res iam in [1] Etruscis turbavit repentina defectio Umbrorum, gentis integrae a cladibus belli,
9 nisi quod transitum exercitus ager senserat. Ii concitata omni iuventute sua et magna parte Etruscorum ad rebellionem compulsa tantum exercitum fecerant ut relicto post se in Etruria Decio ad oppugnandam inde Romam ituros, magnifice de se ac contemptim
10 de Romanis loquentes, iactarent. Quod inceptum eorum ubi ad Decium consulem perlatum est, ad urbem ex Etruria magnis itineribus pergit et in agro Pupiniensi ad famam intentus hostium consedit.
11 Nec Romae spernebatur Umbrorum bellum, et ipsae minae metum fecerant expertis Gallica clade quam
12 intutam urbem incolerent. Itaque legati ad Fabium consulem missi sunt, ut si quid laxamenti a bello Samnitium esset, in Umbriam propere exercitum
13 duceret. Dicto paruit consul magnisque itineribus ad Mevaniam, ubi tum copiae Umbrorum erant, perrexit.
14 Repens adventus consulis, quem procul Umbria in Samnio bello alio occupatum crediderant, ita exterruit Umbros ut alii recedendum ad urbes munitas,

[1] iam in Madvig: iam Ω.

---

[1] Livy has not mentioned this before.
[2] South of the Anio not far from Gabii. See XXVI. ix. 12.
[3] In the neighbourhood of Perugia and Assisi.

bore the Etruscan name begged the consul to grant B.C. 308 them a treaty. This privilege they were denied, but a truce for a year was granted them. They were required to furnish the Roman army with a year's pay and two tunics for each soldier; such was the price they paid for a truce.

The tranquillity which now obtained in Etruria was disturbed by a sudden revolt of the Umbrians, a people which had escaped all the distress of war, except that an army had passed through their territory.[1] Calling up all their fighting men, and inducing great part of the Etruscans to rebel, they mustered so large an army, that they boasted, with much glorifying of themselves and fleering at the Romans, that they would leave Decius behind them in Etruria and march off to the assault of Rome. When this purpose of theirs was reported to the consul Decius, he hastened by forced marches from Etruria towards the City, and encamped in the fields belonging to Pupinia,[2] eagerly waiting for word of their approach. At Rome no one made light of an Umbrian invasion. Their very threats had excited fear in those who had learnt from the Gallic disaster how unsafe was the City they inhabited. Accordingly envoys were dispatched to carry word to Fabius the consul, that if there were any slackening in the Samnite war he should with all speed lead his army into Umbria. The consul obeyed the order, and advanced by long marches to Mevania,[3] where the forces of the Umbrians at that time lay.

The sudden arrival of the consul, whom they had believed to have his hands full with another war in Samnium, a long way from Umbria, so dismayed the Umbrians that some were for falling back on their

A.U.C. 446

15 quidam omittendum bellum censerent; plaga una —Materinam ipsi appellant—non continuit modo ceteros in armis sed confestim ad certamen egit. 16 Castra vallantem Fabium adorti sunt. Quos ubi effusos ruere in munimenta consul vidit, revocatos milites ab opere, prout loci natura tempusque patiebatur, ita instruxit; cohortatusque praedicatione vera qua in Tuscis, qua in Samnio partorum decorum exiguam appendicem Etrusci belli conficere iubet et vocis impiae poenas expetere, qua se urbem Romanam 17 oppugnaturos minati sint.[1] Haec tanta sunt alacritate militum audita ut clamor sua sponte ortus loquentem interpellaverit ducem. Ante imperium, deinde concentu[2] tubarum ac cornuum cursu effuso in hostem 18 feruntur. Non tamquam in viros aut armatos incurrunt; mirabilia dictu, signa primo eripi coepta signiferis, deinde ipsi signiferi trahi ad consulem, armatique milites ex acie in aciem transferri, et sicubi est certamen, scutis magis quam gladiis geritur res; umbonibus incussaque ala sternuntur hostes. 19 Plus capitur hominum quam caeditur, atque una vox ponere arma iubentium per totam fertur aciem. 20 Itaque inter ipsum certamen facta deditio est a primis auctoribus belli. Postero insequentibusque fortified cities, and others for giving up the war; but one canton—which they themselves call Materina—not only kept the rest to their arms, but brought them to an immediate engagement. Fabius was entrenching his camp when they attacked him. As soon as he saw them rushing madly upon his ramparts, he recalled the soldiers from their work and drew them up, as time and the nature of the ground permitted, and encouraging them with a true relation of the honours they had won, some in Etruria and some in Samnium, bade them end this trivial sequel to the Etruscan war, and revenge upon the foe his impious threat that he would assault the City of Rome. These words were received by the soldiers with such alacrity that the speech of the general was interrupted by a spontaneous cheer. Then, before the command could be given, they hurled themselves—to the blare of horns and trumpets—with the wildest abandon against the enemy. They fought not as though their opponents had been men and armed; but—marvellous to relate—began with tearing the standards out of the bearers' hands, and then fell to dragging the bearers themselves before the consul and to bringing armed men over from the other line to their own; wherever they met with resistance, they did their work more with shields than with swords, swinging them from the shoulder and knocking down their enemies with the bosses. The slain were outnumbered by the prisoners, and all along the battle line one cry was heard: that they should lay down their arms. And so, while the battle was still going on, the surrender was made, by the men who had first advocated war. On the next and on succeeding B.C. 308

[1] sint Modius: sunt Ω.

[2] deinde concentu (contentu PU: concerta F: conuentu T) Ω: ante concentu M: ante concentum M^3.

A.U.C. 416 diebus et ceteri Umbrorum populi deduntur; Ocriculani sponsione in amicitiam accepti.

A.U.C. 417–418 XLII. Fabius, alienae sortis victor belli, in suam
2 provinciam exercitum reduxit. Itaque ei ob res tam feliciter gestas, sicut priore anno populus continuaverat consulatum, ita senatus in insequentem annum, quo Ap. Claudius L. Volumnius consules fuerunt, prorogavit maxime Appio adversante imperium.
3 Appium censorem petisse consulatum comitiaque eius ab L. Furio tribuno plebis interpellata, donec se censura abdicarit,[1] in quibusdam annalibus invenio.
4 Creatus consul, cum collegae novum bellum, Sallentini[2] hostes decernerentur, Romae mansit ut urbanis artibus opes augeret quando belli decus penes alios esset.
5 Volumnium provinciae haud paenituit. Multa secunda proelia fecit, aliquot urbes hostium vi cepit. Praedae erat largitor et benignitatem per se gratam comitate adiuvabat militemque his artibus fecerat et periculi et laboris avidum.
6 Q. Fabius pro consule ad urbem Allifas cum Samnitium exercitu signis conlatis conflgit. Minime ambigua res fuit; fusi hostes atque in castra compulsi. Nec castra forent retenta, ni exiguum superfuisset

[1] abdicarit Ruperti: abdicauit Ω.
[2] Sallentini ~ Sigonius: salentini (-ne F) Ω.

[1] The senate had a grudge against Appius (see chap. xxx. § 1 f.), and so prolonged, unconstitutionally, the command of Fabius, and gave the other war to Volumnius.

days the other peoples of Umbria also capitulated: the men of Ocriculum were received into friendship under a stipulation. B.C. 308

XLII. Fabius, having won a war assigned by lot to another man, led his army back to his own province. Just as in the preceding year the people had rewarded his successful campaign by re-electing him to the consulship, so now the senate continued him in command for the year to follow. The new consuls were Appius Claudius and Lucius Volumnius, the former of whom had strongly opposed the resolution.[1] B.C. 307–306

I find in certain annals that Appius sought the consulship when censor, and that Lucius Furius, a tribune of the plebs, refused to let him stand until he should have resigned the censorship. The election over, his colleague was decreed the command in the new war—with the Sallentini—and Appius remained in Rome, to strengthen his power by civil arts, since the means of acquiring repute in war remained with others.

Volumnius had no cause to regret his assignment. He engaged in many successful battles and took several hostile towns by assault. Generous in his distribution of the spoil, he enhanced the effect of a liberality which was pleasing in itself by his friendly bearing—traits which had made his soldiers eager for toil and danger.

The proconsul Quintus Fabius fought near the city Allifae a pitched battle with the army of the Samnites. The result was anything but doubtful, for the enemy were routed and driven into their camp; and they could not have held the camp had there not been very little daylight left.

A.U.C. 447–448

diei; ante noctem tamen sunt circumsessa et nocte
7 custodita ne quis elabi posset. Postero die vixdum luce certa deditio fieri coepta et pacti qui Samnitium forent ut cum singulis vestimentis emitterentur;
8 ii omnes sub iugum missi. Sociis Samnitium nihil cautum; ad septem milia sub corona veniere. Qui se civem Hernicum dixerat seorsus in custodia
9 habitus. Eos omnes Fabius Romam ad senatum misit; et cum quaesitum esset dilectu an voluntarii
10 pro Samnitibus adversus Romanos bellassent per Latinos populos custodiendi dantur, iussique eam integram rem novi consules P. Cornelius Arvina Q. Marcius Tremulus—hi enim iam creati erant—ad
11 senatum referre. Id aegre passi Hernici; concilium populorum omnium habentibus Anagninis in circo quem Maritimum vocant praeter Aletrinatem Ferentinatemque et Verulanum omnes Hernici nominis populo Romano bellum indixerunt.

XLIII. In Samnio quoque, quia decesserat inde Fabius, novi motus exorti. Calatia et Sora praesidiaque quae in his Romana erant expugnata et in 2 captivorum corpora militum foede saevitum. Itaque eo P. Cornelius cum exercitu missus; Marcio novi hostes—iam enim Anagninis Hernicisque aliis bellum
3 iussum erat—decernuntur. Primo ita omnia oppor-

---

[1] The Hernici had been at peace with the Romans ever since their subjugation in 358 B.C. (VII. xv. 9).

[2] Calatia was mentioned in chap. ii. § 2 as a Samnite town, and its capture by the Romans in 314 B.C. is noted in chap. xxviii. § 6. Sora, on the borders of the Hernici, was taken in the same year (chap. xxiv. § 14).

Even so they were invested before dark, and guards were posted in the night to prevent anyone's escaping. Next day, before it was well light, they began to surrender. The Samnites among them bargained to be dismissed in their tunics; all these were sent under the yoke. The allies of the Samnites were protected by no guarantee, and were sold into slavery, to the number of seven thousand. Those who gave themselves out for Hernic citizens were detained apart in custody, and Fabius sent them all to the senate in Rome. There an enquiry was held as to whether they had been conscripted or had fought voluntarily for the Samnites against the Romans; after which they were parcelled out amongst the Latins to be guarded, and a resolution was passed directing the new consuls, Publius Cornelius Arvina and Quintus Marcius Tremulus—for these men had been elected—to refer the matter to the senate for fresh action. This the Hernici resented. The people of Anagnia assembled a council of all the states in the circus which they call the Maritime Circus, and all of the Hernic name, excepting the inhabitants of Aletrium, Ferentinum and Verulae, declared war on the Roman People.[1] B.C. 307–306

XLIII. In Samnium, too, the departure of Fabius was the cause of fresh disturbances. Calatia and Sora with their Roman garrisons were taken by assault, and the captured soldiers were treated with shameful rigour.[2] Accordingly Publius Cornelius was dispatched in that direction with an army. The new enemies—for by this time war had been declared on the men of Anagnia and the other Hernici—were allotted to Marcius. At the outset of the campaign the enemy were so successful in

A.U.C. 447–448

tuna loca hostes inter consulum castra interceperunt
4 ut pervadere expeditus nuntius non posset et per aliquot dies incerti rerum omnium suspensique de statu alterius uterque consul ageret, Romamque is metus manaret, adeo ut omnes iuniores sacramento adigerentur atque ad subita rerum duo iusti scribe-
5 rentur exercitus. Ceterum Hernicum bellum nequaquam pro praesenti terrore ac vetusta[1] gentis gloria
6 fuit. Nihil usquam dictu dignum ausi, trinis castris intra paucos dies exuti, triginta dierum indutias ita ut ad senatum Romam legatos mitterent, pacti sunt
7 bimestri stipendio frumentoque et singulis in militem tunicis. Ab senatu ad Marcium reiecti, cui senatus consulto permissum de Hernicis erat, isque eam gentem in deditionem accepit.

8 Et in Samnio alter consul superior viribus, locis impeditior erat. Omnia itinera obsaepserant hostes saltusque pervios ceperant, ne qua subvehi commeatus possent; neque eos, cum cottidie signa in aciem consul proferret, elicere ad certamen poterat;
9 satisque apparebat neque Samnitem certamen prae-
10 sens nec Romanum dilationem belli laturum. Adventus Marci, qui Hernicis subactis maturavit collegae
11 venire auxilio, moram certaminis hosti exemit. Nam ut qui ne alteri quidem exercitui se ad certamen

[1] vetusta Gronovius: vetustae Klockius: vetustate Ω.

seizing all the strategic points between the camps of the consuls, that not even a nimble courier could get through, and for some days the consuls were kept in uncertainty regarding everything and could only speculate about one another's state. Fears for their safety even extended to Rome, where all of military age were given the oath and two full armies were enlisted, to meet any sudden emergencies. But the war with the Hernici by no means answered to the present panic or to the nation's old renown. They ventured nothing to speak of at any point, and having lost three camps in the space of a few days they bargained for a thirty days' truce, to enable them to send envoys to the senate in Rome, and delivered up two months' pay and corn, and a tunic for every soldier. The senate sent them back to Marcius, having passed a resolution empowering him to deal with the Hernici as he saw fit. He received their submission on terms of unconditional surrender. B.C. 307–306

In Samnium the other consul was also stronger than the enemy, but was more embarrassed by the character of the ground. The enemy had blockaded all the roads and seized the practicable passes, to prevent supplies being brought up anywhere. But though the consul offered battle daily, he could not entice them to fight. It was quite apparent that the Samnites would not accept an immediate engagement, nor the Romans endure any prolongation of the war. The arrival of Marcius, who, having subdued the Hernici, made haste to come to the assistance of his colleague, deprived the enemy of any power to delay the struggle. For since they had not considered themselves equal to a credidissent pares, coniungi utique passi duos consulares exercitus nihil crederent superesse spei, advenientem incomposito agmine Marcium adgredi-

A.U.C. 417–418

12 untur. Raptim conlatae sarcinae in medium, et prout tempus patiebatur instructa acies. Clamor primum in stativa perlatus, dein conspectus procul pulvis tumultum apud alterum consulem in castris
13 fecit; isque confestim arma capere iussis raptimque eductis in aciem militibus transversam hostium aciem atque alio certamine occupatam invadit, clamitans
14 summum flagitium fore si alterum exercitum utriusque victoriae compotem sinerent fieri nec ad se sui
15 belli vindicarent decus. Qua impetum dederat perrumpit aciemque per mediam in castra hostium tendit et vacua defensoribus capit atque incendit.
16 Quae ubi flagrantia Marcianus miles conspexit et hostes respexere, tum passim fuga coepta Samnitium fieri; sed omnia obtinet caedes, nec in ullam partem tutum perfugium est.

17 Iam triginta milibus hostium caesis signum receptui consules dederant colligebantque in unum copias in vicem inter se gratantes, cum repente visae procul hostium novae cohortes, quae in supplementum scriptae fuerant, integravere caedem.
18 In quas nec iussu consulum nec signo accepto victores

---

[1] i.e. in a hollow square, as the words in medium show.

battle with even one army, and believed that, once they had suffered two consular armies to unite, there would be no hope for them, they made an attack on Marcius as he was approaching in loose marching order. Hastily throwing down their packs in the midst, the Romans formed up[1] as well as time permitted. The shouting was the first thing that was noticed in the camp of Cornelius. Then, far off, a cloud of dust was descried, and caused a commotion in the camp. The consul ordered his men to arm, and leading them quickly out into line attacked the enemy in the flank, when their hands were full with another struggle, crying out that it would be a burning shame if they let the other army win both victories, and failed to claim for themselves the glory of their own campaign. Bursting through at the point where he had charged, he advanced through the enemy's line, and capturing their camp, which was empty of defenders, set fire to it. When the soldiers of Marcius saw the blaze, and the enemy, looking over their shoulders, saw it too, the flight of the Samnites soon became general; but at every point death blocked the way, and there was no escaping anywhere. B.C. 307–306

Thirty thousand of the enemy had already fallen, and the consuls had sounded the recall and were proceeding to assemble their forces in one body, amid the mutual congratulations and rejoicings of the men, when suddenly some new cohorts of the Samnites, which had been levied as reliefs, were made out in the distance, and occasioned a renewal of the slaughter. The victors rushed upon them, without orders from the consuls or receiving any vadunt, malo tirocinio imbuendum Samnitem clami-19 tantes. Indulgent consules legionum ardori, ut qui probe scirent novum militem hostium inter perculsos fuga veteranos ne temptando quidem satis certamini

A.U.C. 447–448

20 fore. Nec eos opinio fefellit: omnes Samnitium copiae, veteres novaeque, montes proximos fuga capiunt. Eo et Romana erigitur acies, nec quicquam satis tuti loci victis est, et de iugis quae ceperant funduntur; iamque una voce omnes pacem petebant.
21 Tum trium mensum frumento imperato et annuo stipendio ac singulis in militem tunicis ad senatum pacis oratores missi.

22 Cornelius in Samnio relictus: Marcius de Hernicis triumphans in urbem rediit, statuaque equestris in foro decreta est, quae ante templum Castoris posita est.
23 Hernicorum tribus populis, Aletrinati Verulano Ferentinati, qui id[1] maluerunt quam civitatem, suae leges redditae, conubiumque inter ipsos, quod aliquamdiu
24 soli Hernicorum habuerunt, permissum. Anagninis quique alii[2] arma Romanis intulerant civitas sine suffragii latione: data concilia conubiaque adempta et magistratibus praeter quam sacrorum curatione interdictum.

25 Eodem anno aedes Salutis a C. Iunio Bubulco

[1] qui id Harant: qui FT^2 or T^3 (marg.): quia Ω.
[2] quinque alii H. G. Mueller: quique (quicque D? LA) Ω.

[1] The temple of Castor and Pollux had been vowed at the battle of Lake Regillus, 299 B.C., and dedicated fifteen years later (II. xx. 12, and xlii. 5).

signal, exclaiming that the Samnites must begin their soldiering with a bitter lesson. The consuls indulged the ardour of the legions, being well aware that the enemy's recruits, in the midst of routed veterans, would scarce be equal to so much as an attempt at fighting. They were not mistaken. All the forces of the Samnites, old and new, broke and fled to the nearest mountains, up which the Romans too advanced in pursuit of them. The conquered could find no refuge anywhere that afforded safety, but were driven pell-mell from the ridges where they had made a stand. And now with one voice they all begged for peace. They were required to furnish corn for three months, with a year's pay and a tunic for each Roman soldier, and envoys were then dispatched to the senate to sue for terms. B.C. 307–306

Cornelius was left in Samnium. Marcius returned to the City, which he entered in a triumph over the Hernici. An equestrian statue in the Forum was decreed him and was erected in front of the temple of Castor.[1] To the three Hernic peoples of Aletrium, Verulae, and Ferentinum their own laws were restored, because they preferred them to Roman citizenship, and they were given the right to intermarry with each other—a privilege which for some time they were the only Hernici to enjoy. The people of Anagnia and such others as had borne arms against the Romans were admitted to citizenship without the right of voting. They were prohibited from holding councils and from intermarrying, and were allowed no magistrates save those who had charge of religious rites.

In the same year the censor Gaius Junius

censore locata est, quam consul bello Samnitium
A.U.C. 447–448 voverat. Ab eodem collegaque eius M. Valerio 26 Maximo viae per agros publica impensa factae. Et cum Carthaginiensibus eodem anno foedus tertio renovatum, legatisque eorum, qui ad id venerant, comiter munera missa.

A.U.C. 449 XLIV. Dictatorem idem annus habuit P. Cornelium Scipionem cum magistro equitum P. Decio
2 Mure. Ab his, propter quae creati erant, comitia consularia habita, quia neuter consulum potuerat[1]
3 bello abesse. Creati consules L. Postumius Ti.[2] Minucius. Hos consules Piso Q. Fabio et P. Decio suggerit biennio exempto quo Claudium Volumniumque et Cornelium cum Marcio consules factos tradidi-4 mus. Memoriane fugerit[3] in annalibus digerendis, an consulto binos consules, falsos ratus, transcenderit, incertum est.

5 Eodem anno in campum Stellatem agri Campani
6 Samnitium incursiones factae. Itaque ambo consules in Samnium missi cum diversas regiones, Tifernum Postumius Bovianum Minucius petisset, Postumi prius ductu ad Tifernum pugnatum. Alii haud dubie Samnites victos ac viginti milia hominum capta tradunt, alii Marte aequo discessum et 8 Postumium metum simulantem nocturno itinere

[1] potuerat $A^{x}\varsigma$: potuerant Ω: poterant F.
[2] Ti. Sigonius (Diod. XX. lxxxi. 1, C.I.L. i², p. 132): t MPUT²A²: ·t P: ÷ (= et) F: et M^{1}: wanting in OTDLA.
[3] memoriane fugerit ς: memoriae (or -e)ne fugerit Ω: memorie ne fuerit U: wanting in O.

[1] On the Quirinal.
[2] VII. XXVII. 2 and note. Per. XIII., which speaks of a fourth treaty, would be in agreement with the present passage.
[3] Lucius Calpurnius Piso Frugi, the annalist, cos. 133 B.C.

Bubulcus let the contract for the temple of Safety,[1] which he had vowed, while consul, during the Samnite war. He and his colleague, Marcus Valerius Maximus, built roads through the country-side at the public costs. In this year also the treaty with the Carthaginians was renewed for the third time,[2] and their ambassadors, who had come for the purpose of arranging it, were treated with courtesy and given presents. B.C. 307–306

XLIV. The same year had a dictator in the person of Publius Cornelius Scipio, the master of the horse being Publius Decius Mus. These men held a consular election—for to this end they had been appointed, since neither consul had been able to leave the seat of war. The consuls chosen were Lucius Postumius and Tiberius Minucius. Piso[3] makes these men follow Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius, omitting the two years in which we have placed the consulship of Claudius and Volumnius and that of Cornelius and Marcius. Whether in the redaction of his annals he forgot them, or omitted two sets of consuls purposely, as not authentic, is uncertain. B.C. 305

In that year also the Samnites made forays upon the Campus Stellatis[4] in Campania. Both consuls were accordingly dispatched into Samnium in different directions, Postumius marching on Tifernum, and Minucius on Bovianum. The fighting began at Tifernum, where Postumius commanded. Some relate that the Samnites were decisively beaten and that twenty thousand prisoners were taken; others that the armies quitted the field on even terms, and that Postumius, feigning fear, in the night withdrew his [4] This was a tract forming part of the Ager Falernus, later celebrated for its choice wine.

A.U.C. 449

clam in montes copias abduxisse, hostes secutos duo milia inde locis munitis et ipsos consedisse. 9 Consul ut stativa tuta copiosaque—et ita erant—petisse videretur, postquam et munimentis castra firmavit et omni apparatu rerum utilium instruxit, 10 relicto firmo praesidio de vigilia tertia, qua duci proxime potest, expeditas legiones ad collegam, et 11 ipsum adversus alios sedentem, ducit. Ibi auctore Postumio Minucius cum hostibus signa confert, et, cum anceps proelium in multum diei processisset, tum Postumius integris legionibus defessam iam 12 aciem hostium improviso invadit. Itaque cum lassitudo ac volnera fugam quoque praepedissent, occidione occisi hostes, signa unum et viginti capta atque 13 inde ad castra Postumi perrectum. Ibi duo victores exercitus perculsum iam fama hostem adorti fundunt fugantque; signa militaria sex et viginti capta et imperator Samnitium Statius Gellius[1] multique alii 14 mortales et castra utraque capta. Et Bovianum urbs[2] postero die coepta oppugnari brevi capitur, magnaque gloria rerum gestarum consules triumpharunt. 15 Minucium consulem, cum volnere gravi relatum in castra, mortuum quidam auctores sunt, et M. Fulvium in locum eius consulem suffectum, et ab eo, cum ad exercitum Minuci missus esset, Bovianum captum.

[1] Gellius Sigonius (Diod. XX. xc. 4 Γέλλιος Γάιος): Cellius Ω.
[2] urbs Crevier: ubi Ω.

forces secretly to the mountains, where the enemy B.C. 305 followed him and themselves entrenched a camp, at a distance of two miles from his. The consul, that it might appear to have been his object to gain a position at once secure and abounding in supplies,—and such indeed it was—having fortified his camp and equipped it with all manner of useful things, left in it a strong garrison, and in the third watch led his legions in light marching order by the most direct route to his colleague, who likewise lay in camp, facing another army. There, at the instigation of Postumius, Minucius gave battle to the enemy; and when the doubtful struggle had been prolonged until late in the afternoon, Postumius with his fresh legions fell unexpectedly upon the now jaded forces of their opponents. The Samnites, debarred by their weariness and wounds even from flight, were utterly annihilated, and the Romans, having taken twenty-one standards, set out for the camp of Postumius. There the two victorious armies assailed the enemy, already dismayed by the tidings of the other battle, and overwhelmingly routed them, capturing six-and-twenty standards, the commander of the Samnites—Statius Gellius—and many other prisoners, besides both camps. On the following day they began the siege of the city of Bovianum, and on its capture, which quickly ensued, the consuls crowned their glorious achievements with a triumph. Some writers state that Minucius the consul was severely wounded and expired after being carried back to his camp. They add that Marcus Fulvius was made consul suffect in his place, and that it was he who, being sent out to the army of Minucius, captured Bovianum.

A.U.C. 449 16 Eo anno Sora Arpinum Cesennia recepta ab Samnitibus. Herculis magnum simulacrum in Capitolio positum dedicatumque.

A.U.C. 450 XLV. P. Sulpicio Saverrione[1] P. Sempronio Sopho consulibus Samnites, seu finem seu dilationem belli 2 quaerentes, legatos de pace Roman misere. Quibus suppliciter agentibus responsum est, nisi saepe bellum parantes pacem petissent Samnites, oratione ultro citro habita de pace transigi potuisse; nunc, quando verba vana ad id locorum fuerint, rebus standum 3 esse. P. Sempronium consulem cum exercitu brevi in Samnio fore; eum, ad bellum pacemne inclinent animi, falli non posse; comperta omnia senatui relaturum; decedentem ex Samnio consulem legati 4 sequerentur. Eo anno cum pacatum Samnium exercitus Romanus benigne praebito commeatu peragrasset, foedus antiquum Samnitibus redditum.

5 Ad Aequos inde, veteres hostes, ceterum per multos annos sub specie infidae pacis quietos, versa arma Romana, quod incolumi Hernico nomine missit- 6 averant simul cum iis Samniti auxilia et post Hernicos subactos universa prope gens sine dissimulatione consilii publici ad hostes desciverat; et postquam

[1] Saverrione Signius (X. ix. 14, C.I.L. i². p. 45): auerrione (auerione A) Ω.

---

[1] Site unknown.

[2] Perhaps to appease the god for the indignity mentioned in chap. xxix. § 9.

[3] In 354 B.C. the Samnites had sought and obtained a treaty with the Romans, upon what terms is not known, but they were doubtless liberal (VII. xix. 4)

[4] Since 388 B.C. (VI. iv. 8).

[5] Chap. xlii. § 8, where, however, the Aequi are not specified.

In that year Sora, Arpinum, and Cesennia[1] were won back from the Samnites. The great statue of Hercules was set up and dedicated on the Capitol.[2] B.C. 305

XLV. In the consulship of Publius Sulpicius Saverrio and Publius Sempronius Sophus, the Samnites, whether seeking to end or only to postpone hostilities, sent envoys to Rome to treat for peace. To their humble supplications the answer was returned, that if the Samnites had not frequently sought peace while preparing for war, a treaty could have been arranged by mutual discussion: as it was, since words had hitherto proved of no effect, the Romans must needs take their stand on facts. Publius Sempronius, the consul, would shortly be in Samnium with an army; he was one whom they would be unable to deceive as to whether their hearts inclined to peace or war; after a thorough investigation he would report his findings to the senate; and on his leaving Samnium their envoys might attend him. The Roman army marched all over Samnium; the people were peaceable and furnished the army liberally with supplies; accordingly their ancient treaty was in that year restored again to the Samnites.[3] B.C. 304

The arms of Rome were then directed against the Aequi, who had been her enemies of old, but for many years past had remained quiet,[4] under colour of a peace which they observed but treacherously. The reason for making war on them was as follows: before the overthrow of the Hernici they had repeatedly joined with them in sending assistance to the Samnites,[5] and after the subjugation of the Hernici, almost the entire nation had gone over to the enemy, without attempting to disguise their policy;

A.U.C. 450

icto Romae cum Samnitibus foedere fetiales venerant
7 res repetitum, temptationem aiebant esse ut terrore incusso belli Romanos se fieri paterentur; quod quanto opere optandum foret Hernicos docuisse, cum quibus licuerit suas leges Romanae civitati praeoptaverint:
8 quibus legendi quid mallent copia non fuerit pro poena necessariam civitatem fore. Ob haec volgo in conciliis iactata populus Romanus bellum fieri Aequis
9 iussit; consulesque ambo ad novum profecti bellum quattuor milia a castris hostium consederunt.
10 Aequorum exercitus, ut qui suo nomine permultos annos imbelles egissent, tumultuario similis, sine
11 ducibus certis, sine imperio, trepidare. Alii exeundum in aciem, alii castra tuenda censent; movet plerosque vastatio futura agrorum ac deinceps cum
12 levibus praesidiis urbium relictarum excidia. Itaque postquam inter multas sententias una, quae omissa cura communium ad respectum suarum quemque
13 rerum vertit, est[1] audita, ut prima vigilia diversi e castris ad deportanda omnia tuendasque moenibus urbes[2] abirent, cuncti eam sententiam ingenti ad-
14 sensu accepere. Palatis hostibus per agros prima luce Romani signis prolatis in acie consistunt, et ubi

[1] vertit, est Madvig: uertisset (-ent P) Ω: auertisset O.
[2] tuendasque moenibus urbes Madvig ²: tuendasque moenibus in urbes Ω: tuendasque in omnibus urbes O: tuendosque moenibus se in urbes H. J. Mueller.

---

[1] Cf. chap. xliii. 23 f. for the two groups.
[2] i.e. while Aequians had volunteered for service in other armies, they had engaged in no war as a nation—at any rate with Rome—since 388 B.C. (VI. iv. 8).

and when fetials had applied to them for reparation, B.C. 304
after the adoption of the Samnite treaty at Rome, they had persistently asserted that the Romans were attempting under threats of war to intimidate them into becoming Roman citizens; and how little that was a thing to be desired had been shown, they said, by the Hernici, since those who had been permitted to do so had chosen their own laws in preference to Roman citizenship, while those who had not been given an option were to have citizenship thrust upon them as a punishment.[1] Because of such expressions, publicly uttered in their assemblies, the Roman People decreed that war should be made upon the Aequi. Both consuls set out for the new seat of operations, and took up a position four miles from the enemy's camp.

The army of the Aequi, who for many years had made no war on their own account,[2] like a hastily levied militia, under no definite commanders and subject to no supreme authority, were in a state of panic. Some were for offering battle, others for defending the camp. The consideration that affected most of them was the devastation which their farms would suffer and the subsequent destruction of their cities, which they had left inadequately garrisoned. And so when a proposal was heard—amongst many others—which disregarded the common welfare and made every one think of his own interest, to wit, that in the first watch they should leave the camp, and going their several ways, carry off all their possessions from the fields and defend their cities by means of their walls, they all with loud acclaim adopted it. The enemy were scattered over the countryside when at break of day the Romans came

A.U.C. 450 nemo obvius ibat, pleno gradu ad castra hostium 15 tendunt. Ceterum postquam ibi neque stationes pro portis nec quemquam in vallo nec fremitum con-suetum castrorum animadverterunt, insolito silentio 16 moti metu insidiarum subsistunt. Transgressi deinde vallum cum deserta omnia invenissent, pergunt hostem vestigiis sequi. Sed vestigia in omnes aeque ferentia partes, ut in dilapsis passim, primo errorem 17 faciebant; post per exploratores compertis hostium consiliis ad singulas urbes circumferendo bello unum et triginta oppida intra dies quinquaginta, omnia oppugnando, ceperunt, quorum pleraque diruta atque incensa, nomenque Aequorum prope ad inter-18 necionem deletum. De Aequis triumphatum: ex-emploque eorum clades fuit, ut Marrucini Marsi Paeligni Frentani[1] mitterent Romam oratores pacis petendae amicitiaeque. His populis foedus petentibus datum.

XLVI. Eodem anno Cn. Flavius Cn. filius[2] scriba, patre libertino humili fortuna ortus, ceterum callidus vir 2 et facundus, aedilis curulis fuit. Invenio in quibusdam annalibus, cum appareret aedilibus fierique se pro tribu aedilem videret neque accipi nomen quia scriptum faceret, tabulam posuisse et iurasse se scriptum

[1] Frentani Sigonius (chap. xvi. § 1 and Conway, Ital. Dial. p. 212): feretani MA^2: feretrani Ω.

[2] Cn. filius A^2: cn̄ fil I^2: gn̄ fil̄ T: various corruptions Ω.

---

[1] The tribes were beginning to enter their votes in favour of Flavius, but the aedile presiding at the election refused to admit his candidacy, on the score that as an apparitor, a paid civil servant, he might not hold a magistracy. Flavius thereupon renounced his position as secretary and declined to serve as such at the election. With Livy's narrative in this chap. cf. Plin. N. H. XXXIII. i. 17–19, and Gellius, vii. (vi) 9, who quotes Piso as his authority, and uses language so much out and formed in order of battle, and encountering B.C. 304

nobody, advanced at a quick pace towards the Aequian camp. But not perceiving any outposts before the gates or anybody on the rampart, and missing the usual noises of a camp, they were troubled by the unaccustomed silence, and apprehending an ambush, halted. Later, when they had scaled the rampart and found everything deserted, they attempted to follow the enemy by his tracks; but the tracks, which led in all directions—as they would when an army had dispersed—at first bewildered them. Afterwards they found out through their scouts what the enemy designed to do; and attacking his cities in succession, one after another, they captured thirty-one of them within fifty days, in every instance by assault. Of these the greater number were dismantled and burnt, and the Aequian name was almost blotted out. A triumph was celebrated over the Aequi; and warned by the example of their downfall, the Marrucini, Marsi, Paeligni, and Frentani sent ambassadors to Rome to sue for peace and friendship. These nations, at their request, were granted a treaty of alliance.

XLVI. In the same year a government clerk, Gnaeus Flavius, the son of Gnaeus, was curule aedile. Born in humble circumstances—his father being a freedman—he was, for the rest, a man of shrewdness and eloquence. I find in certain annals that being in attendance upon the aediles, and perceiving that the tribes were supporting him for aedile, but that his name was thrown out because he was acting as a recorder, he put away his tablet and took an oath that he would keep no record.[1] like Livy's as to suggest that this annalist was Livy's source also.

A.U.C. 450

3 non facturum; quem aliquanto ante desisse scriptum facere arguit Macer Licinius tribunatu ante gesto triumviratibusque, nocturno altero, altero coloniae
4 deducendae. Ceterum, id quod haud discrepat, contumacia adversus contemnentes humilitatem suam
5 nobiles certavit; civile ius, repositum in penetralibus pontificum, evolgavit fastosque circa forum in albo
6 proposuit, ut quando lege agi posset sciretur; aedem Concordiae in area Volcani summa invidia nobilium dedicavit; coactusque consensu populi Cornelius Barbatus pontifex maximus verba praeire, cum more maiorum negaret nisi consulem aut imperatorem
7 posse templum dedicare. Itaque ex auctoritate senatus latum ad populum est ne quis templum aramve iniussu senatus aut tribunorum plebei partis maioris
8 dedicaret. Haud memorabilem rem per se, nisi documentum sit adversus superbiam nobilium plebeiae
9 libertatis, referam. Ad collegam aegrum visendi causa Flavius cum venisset consensuque nobilium adulescentium, qui ibi adsidebant, adsurrectum ei non esset, curulem adferri sellam eo iussit ac de sede[1] honoris sui anxios invidia inimicos spectavit.
10 Ceterum Flavium dixerat aedilem forensis factio, Ap.

[1] de sede Siesbye: sede Ω.

[1] These were commonly called tresviri capitales, and were police commissioners, who besides the duty referred to in the text, were charged with assisting the magistrates who had criminal jurisdiction, and particularly with executing sentences of death. Liv. Per. xi. would indicate that the office was not introduced until about 289 B.C.

Licinius Macer alleges that he had ceased some time B.C. 304 before to act as secretary, having been already a tribune, and on two occasions a triumvir, once on the commission which had charge of the night-watch,[1] and again on one appointed to found a colony. At all events there is no difference of opinion about the stubbornness of his contention with the nobles, who despised his lowly birth. He published the formulae of the civil law, which had been filed away in the secret archives of the pontiffs, and posted up the calendar on white notice-boards about the Forum, that men might know when they could bring an action. He dedicated a temple of Concord in the precinct of Vulcan, greatly to the resentment of the nobles; and Cornelius Barbatus, the chief pontiff, was forced by the unanimous wishes of the people to dictate the form of words to him, though he asserted that by custom of the elders none but a consul or commanding general might dedicate a temple. So, in accordance with a senatorial resolution, a measure was enacted by the people providing that no one should dedicate a temple or an altar without the authorization of the senate or a majority of the tribunes of the plebs.—I will relate an incident, of no importance in itself, which may serve to show how the plebs asserted their liberties against the arrogance of the nobles. Flavius had come to make a call upon a colleague who was sick, and the young nobles who were sitting by his bed with one consent omitted to rise on his entering; whereupon he ordered his curule chair to be fetched in, and from his official seat gazed at his adversaries, who were choking with resentment. Now Flavius had been elected aedile by the faction of the market-place,

A.U.C. 450

Claudi censura vires nacta, qui senatum primus
11 libertinorum filiis lectis inquinaverat, et posteaquam eam lectionem nemo ratam habuit nec in curia adeptus erat quas petierat opes, urbanis[1] humilibus per omnes tribus divisis forum et campum corrupit.
12 Tantumque Flavi comitia indignitatis habuerunt ut plerique nobilium anulos aureos et phaleras depone-
13 rent. Ex eo tempore in duas partes discessit civitas: aliud integer populus, fautor et cultor bonorum, 14 aliud forensis factio tendebat,[2] donec Q. Fabius et P. Decius censores facti, et Fabius simul concordiae causa, simul ne humillimorum in manu comitia essent, omnem forensem turbam exceretam in quattuor tribus 15 coniecit urbanasque eas appellavit. Adeoque eam rem acceptam gratis animis ferunt ut Maximi cognomen, quod tot victoriis non pepererat, hac ordinum temperatione pareret. Ab eodem institutum dicitur ut equites idibus Quinctilibus transveherentur.

[1] urbanis Gronovius: urbanas Ω.
[2] tendebat F ç Madvig: tenebat Ω (Walters and Conway cf. Cic. Par. I. 14.)

[1] The centuriate comitia met in the Campus Martius, the tribal comitia in the Forum. Membership in the former assembly—now for the first time imparted to the tradesmen and artisans who were not freeholders—implied also membership in the latter. The result of this reform was to extend the franchise to a large class of citizens, many of whom were men of substance.

which had become powerful in consequence of the censorship of Appius Claudius. Claudius had been the first to debase the senate by the appointment of the sons of freedmen, and afterwards, when no one allowed the validity of his selection, and he had failed to gain the influence in the senate-house which had been his object, he had distributed the humble denizens of the City amongst all the tribes, and had thus corrupted the Forum and the Campus Martius.[1] And so great was the indignation over the election of Flavius that many of the nobles laid aside their golden rings and medals. From that time the citizens were divided into two parties: the men of integrity, who favoured and cherished right principles, tended one way, the rabble of the market-place another; until Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius became censors, and Fabius, partly for the sake of harmony, partly that the elections might not be in the hands of the basest of the people, culled out all the market-place mob and cast them into four tribes, to which he gave the name of Urban. The arrangement, they say, was so gratefully received, that by this regulation of the orders he purchased the surname of the Great, which not all his victories had been able to procure him. It was Fabius too, so it is said, who instituted the parade of the knights on the fifteenth of July. B.C. 304

LIBRI IX PERIOCHA

T. Veturius Spurius Postumius coss. apud furcas Caudinas deducto in locum artum exercitu, cum spes nulla esset evadendi, foedere cum Samnitibus facto et sescentis equitibus Romanis obsidibus datis ita exercitum abduxerunt ut omnes sub iugum mitterentur ; idemque auctore Spurio Postumio cos. qui in senatu suaserat ut eorum deditione quorum culpa tam deforme foedus ictum erat, publica fides liberaretur, cum duobus trib. pl. et omnibus qui foedus spoponderant dediti Samnitibus non sunt recepti. nec multo post fusis a Papirio Cursore Samnitibus et sub iugum missis receptisque sescentis equitibus Romanis qui obsides dati erant, pudor flagitii prioris abolitus est. tribus duae adiectae sunt, Oufentina[1] et Falerna. Suessa et Pontia coloniae deductae sunt. Ap. Claudius censor aquam perduxit ; viam stravit quae Appia vocata est, libertinorum filios in senatum legit. ideoque, quoniam is ordo indignis inquinatus videbatur, sequentis anni coss. senatum observaverunt, quem ad modum ante proximos censores fuerat. res praeterea contra Apulos et Etruscos[2] et Umbros et Marsos et Paelignos et Aequos et Samnites, quibus foedus restitutum est, prospere gestas continet. Cn. Flavius[3] scriba, libertino patre natus, aedilis curulis fuit per forensem factionem creatus, quae, cum comitia et campum turbaret et in his propter nimias vires dominaretur, a Q. Fabio censore in quattuor tribus redacta

[1] Oufentina Hertz : ofentina (or osfentina) MSS.
[2] et Etruscos cod. Bergianus : Etruscos MSS.
[3] Cn. Flavius edd. : C. Flavius MSS.

SUMMARY OF BOOK IX

Titus Veturius and Spurius Postumius, the consuls, having led their army into a narrow place at the Caudine Forks, when there was no hope of escaping, made a treaty with the Samnites, and having given six hundred Roman knights as hostages, got their army off, on condition that all should be sent under the yoke. And these same men having been delivered up to the Samnites, together with two tribunes of the plebs and all those who had guaranteed the treaty—on the suggestion of Spurius Postumius the consul, who had advised the senate that the pledge of the State should be redeemed by the surrender of those by whose fault so disgraceful a treaty had been made—were by them rejected. Not long after, the Samnites were routed by Papirus Cursor and sent beneath the yoke, and the six hundred Roman knights who had been given as hostages were recovered, thus wiping out the shame of the earlier disgrace. Two tribes were added, the Oufentina and the Falerna. Colonies were planted at Suessa and Pontia. Appius Claudius the censor completed an aqueduct; paved the road which was called the Appian Way; and admitted the sons of freedmen to the senate, for which reason, since that order appeared to have been polluted with unworthy members, the consuls of the following year kept the senate as it had been before the last censors. The book also contains successful campaigns against the Apulians, the Etruscans, the Umbrians, the Marsi, the Paeligni, the Aequi, and the Samnites, to whom their treaty was restored. Gnaeus Flavius, a government clerk and a freedman's son, was elected curule aedile by the faction of the market-place, which since it threw into confusion the comitia and the Campus Martius, which it dominated by its overweening strength, was by Quintus Fabius the censor divided up into four tribes est, quas urbanas appellavit;[1] eaque res Fabio Maximo nomen dedit. in hoc libro mentionem habet Alexandri, qui temporibus his fuit, et aestimatis populi R. viribus, quae tunc erant, colligit si Alexander in Italiam traiecisset, non tam ei victoriam de populo Romano fore quam de iis gentibus quas ad orientem imperio suo subiecerat.

[1] quas urbanas appellavit cod. Guelferb.: omitted by best MSS.

which he called "urban"; and this circumstance procured Fabius his surname of Maximus. In this book the author mentions Alexander, who lived in those times, and, after appraising the strength of the Roman people in that age, gathers that if Alexander had crossed into Italy, he would not have gained the victory over the Roman People, as he had done over those races which he subjugated in the Orient.

BOOK X

LIBER X

.C. 452

1 L. Genucio Ser. Cornelio consulibus ab externis ferme bellis otium fuit. Soram atque Albam coloniae deductae. Albam in Aequos sex milia colonorum 2 scripta: Sora agri Volsci fuerat, sed possederant 3 Samnites; eo quattuor milia hominum missa. Eodem anno Arpinatibus Trebulanisque civitas data. Frusinates tertia parte agri damnati, quod Hernicos ab eis sollicitatos compertum, capitaque coniurationis eius quaestione ab consulibus ex senatus consulto[1] 4 habita virgis caesi ac securi percussi. Tamen ne prorsus imbellem agerent annum, parva expeditio in Umbriam facta est, quod nuntiabatur ex spelunca qua- 5 dam excursiones armatorum in agros fieri. In eam speluncam penetratum cum signis est, et ex loco[2] obscuro multa volnera accepta maximeque lapidum ictu, donec altero specus eius ore—nam pervius erat—invento utraeque fauces congestis lignis accensae. 6 Ita intus fumo ac vapore ad duo milia armatorum, ruentia novissime in ipsas flammas, dum evadere tendunt, absumpta.

[1] ex senatus consulto A^2: ex sōc MPT: ex sc̄ ODLA? ex sc̄c̄ I^2: exe·c̄·F.

[2] ex loco Madvig: ex eo (ea O) loco Ω.

BOOK X

I. In the consulship of Lucius Genucius and Servius Cornelius there was in general a respite from foreign wars. Colonies were established at Sora and Alba. Six thousand settlers were enrolled for Alba, in the Aequian country. Sora had belonged to the territory of the Volsci, but the Samnites had got possession of it; to this place were sent four thousand men. In this year also the Arpinates and Trebulani were granted citizenship. The Frusinates were mulcted in one-third of their land, because it was discovered that they had tampered with the Hernici; the ringleaders of the conspiracy, after the consuls, at the instance of the senate, had conducted an investigation, were scourged and beheaded. Nevertheless, that their year might not go by without any war whatever, the consuls made a little expedition into Umbria, because of a report that armed men issuing from a certain cave were making raids upon the farms. The soldiers carried their standards into the cave, and there in the murk received many wounds, particularly from stones that were thrown at them; until, having found the other mouth of the cavern—for there was a way of going through it—they heaped up faggots at both openings and set them afire. In this way about two thousand armed men perished in the cave from the smoke and heat, for they finally rushed into the very flames in their efforts to escape. B.C. 303–302

A.U.C. 451–452

7 M. Livio Dentre[1] M. Aemilio[2] consulibus redintegratum Aequicum bellum. Coloniam aegre patientes velut arcem suis finibus impositam summa vi expugnare adorti ab ipsis colonis pelluntur. 8 Ceterum tantum Romae terrorem fecere, quia vix credibile erat tam adfectis rebus solos per se Aequos ad bellum coortos, ut tumultus eius causa dictator 9 diceretur C. Iunius Bubulcus. Cum M. Titinio magistro equitum profectus primo congressu Aequos subegit, ac die octavo triumphans in urbem cum redisset, aedem Salutis, quam consul voverat censor locaverat, dictator dedicavit.

A.U.C. 452

II. Eodem anno classis Graecorum Cleonymo duce Lacedaemonio ad Italiae litora adpulsa Thurias[3] 2 urbem in Sallentinis cepit. Adversus hunc hostem consul Aemilius missus proelio uno fugatum compulit in naves. Thuriae redditae veteri cultori, 3 Sallentinoque agro pax parta. Iunium Bubulcum dictatorem missum in Sallentinos in quibusdam annalibus invenio et Cleonymum, priusquam confligendum esset cum Romanis, Italia excessisse.

4 Circumvectus inde Brundisii promunturium medioque sinu Hadriatico ventis latus, cum laeva importuosa Italiae litora, dextra Illyrii Liburnique et Histri, gentes ferae et magna ex parte latrociniis

[1] Dentre ζ: dentrice (or -cae) Ω: dentice (PFU (not in O)
[2] M. Aemilio Sigon. (Diod. xx. cvi. 1, CIL i², p. 132): ā U: c (or t) A^2 ζ: omitted by Ω.
[3] Thurias ζ: turias D^3: thurios (trurios T, turios A) Ω: durior D? L.

[1] If Thuriae is what Livy wrote, it must have been an otherwise unknown city in the heel of Italy, where the Sallentini lived.

When Marcus Livius Denter and Marcus Aemilius were consuls, the Aequi resumed hostilities. Indignant that a colony had been established, like a citadel, within their borders, they attacked it with great fury. They were beaten off by the colonists themselves, but occasioned such dismay at Rome—since it was scarce to be believed that the Aequi when in so weakened a condition should have begun a war relying solely on their own resources—that a dictator was appointed to cope with the outbreak, in the person of Gaius Junius Bubulcus. Setting out with Marcus Titinius, his master of the horse, he reduced the Aequi to submission at the first encounter, and having returned in triumph to the City eight days later, dedicated as dictator the temple of Safety which he had vowed as consul and for which as censor he had let the contract. B.C. 303–302

II. During the same year a Greek fleet commanded by Cleonymus the Lacedaemonian put in to the shores of Italy and seized the city of Thuriae in the country of the Sallentini.[1] The consul Aemilius was dispatched against this enemy, whom he routed in a single engagement and drove to his ships. Thuriae was restored to its old inhabitants, and peace was established in the Sallentine territory. I find in some annals that Junius Bubulcus the dictator was sent among the Sallentini, and that Cleonymus withdrew from Italy before it became necessary to fight the Romans. B.C. 302

Rounding then the promontory of Brundisium, he was swept on by the winds in the mid gulf of the Adriatic, and dreading the harbourless coasts of Italy on his left and on his right the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Histrians,—savage tribes and maritimis infames, terrerent, penitus ad litora Vene-5 torum pervenit. Expositis paucis qui loca explorarent, cum audisset[1] tenue praetentum litus esse, quod transgressis stagna ab tergo sint inrigua aestibus maritimis; agros haud procul[2] capestres cerni,[3] 6 ulteriora colles videri; esse ostium fluminis praealti, quo circumagi naves in stationem tutam possint[4]—

Meduacus amnis erat—: eo invectam classem subire 7 flumine adverso iussit. Gravissimas navium non per-tulit alveus fluminis; in leviora navigia transgressa multitudo armatorum ad frequentes agros, tribus maritimis Patavinorum vicis colentibus eam oram, 8 pervenit. Ibi egressi praesidio levi navibus relicto vicos expugnant, inflammant tecta, hominum pecu-dumque praedas agunt et dulcedine praedandi longius usque a navibus procedunt.

9 Haec ubi Patavium sunt nuntiata—semper autem eos in armis accolae Galli habebant—in duas partes iuventutem dividunt. Altera[5] in regionem, qua effusa populatio nuntiabatur, altera, ne cui praedonum obvia fieret, alio[6] itinere ad stationem navium—milia 10 autem quattuordecim ab oppido aberat—ducta. In naves ignaris[7] custodibus interemptis impetus factus, territique nautae coguntur naves in alteram ripam amnis traicere. Et in terra prosperum aeque in [1] audisset A^2 or $A^1\varsigma$: audissent Ω.

[2] haud procul Walters and Conway: haud procul proximos (proximus F) Ω: haut proximos A: haud procul agro pax . . . Salluntinos (repeated from § 3) proximos (omitting agros) O.

[3] cerni ς: cernit Ω.

[4] possint Walters and Conway: possint vidisse ς: possent vidisse Madvig: vidisse Ω: vidisset PFUOT^{2}.

[5] altera A^2 or A^1: alteram Ω: alterum F.

[6] alio Gronovius: altero (wanting in O) Ω.

[7] ignaris ς: paruis Ω: paruas $U\varsigma$: paruas ignaris ς.

notorious most of them for their piracies kept B.C. 302 straight on until he reached the coasts of the Veneti. Having sent a small party ashore to explore the country, and learning that it was a narrow beach that extended in front of them, on crossing which one found behind it lagoons which were flooded by the tides; that not far off level fields could be made out, and that hills were seen rising beyond them, and that a river of great depth—the Mediacus—debouched there, into which they could bring round their ships to a safe anchorage—having learned all this, I say, he ordered the fleet to sail in and make its way up stream. But the channel would not admit the heaviest ships, and the multitude of armed men, passing over into the lighter vessels, kept on till they came to thickly inhabited fields; for three maritime villages of the Patavini were situated there along the river-bank. Disembarking there they left a small body of men to defend the boats, burnt the houses, made spoil of men and cattle, and, lured on by the sweets of pillage, advanced to a greater and greater distance from their ships.

When word of these events was brought to the Patavians, whom the vicinity of the Gauls kept always under arms, they divided their young men into two divisions. One of these marched into the region where the scattered marauding was reported: the other, taking a different road, to avoid falling in with any of the marauders, proceeded to the place where the ships were moored, fourteen miles from the town. The latter party, slaying the guards, who were unaware of their approach, made a rush for the ships, and the terrified sailors were forced to get them over to the other side of the stream. On land,

c. palatos praedatores proelium fuerat refugientibusque 11 ad stationem Graecis Veneti obsistunt; ita in medio circumventi hostes caesique; pars capti classem indicant regemque Cleonymum tria milia abesse.
12 Inde captivis proximo vico in custodiam datis pars fluviatiles naves, ad superanda vada stagnorum apte planis alveis fabricatas, pars captiva navigia armatis complent profectique ad classem immobiles naves et loca ignota plus quam hostem timentes circumvadunt; 13 fugientesque in altum acrius quam repugnantes usque ad ostium amnis persecuti captis quibusdam incensisque navibus hostium, quas trepidatio in vada 14 intulerat, victores revertuntur. Cleonymus vix quinta parte navium incolumi, nulla regione maris Hadriatici prospere adita, discessit. Rostra navium spoliaque Laconum in aede Iunonis veteri fixa multi supersunt 15 qui viderunt Patavi. Monumentum navalis pugnae eo die quo pugnatum est quotannis sollemne certamen navium in flumine oppidi medio exercetur.

III. Eodem anno Romae cum Vestinis petentibus amicitiam ictum est foedus. Multiplex deinde ex-
2 ortus terror. Etruriam rebellare ab Arretinorum

[1] For Patavium see Introduction, Vol. I. p. ix f.

too, the battle waged against the straggling B.C. 302 plunderers was equally successful, and when the Greeks would have fled back to their station, the Veneti stood in their way. Thus the enemy were caught between two parties and were cut to pieces. Some of them, being taken prisoners, told how the fleet and King Cleonymus were three miles off. Thereupon the captives were consigned to the next village for safe-keeping, and armed men filling the river boats—suitably constructed with flat bottoms, to enable them to cross the shallow lagoons—and others manning the craft they had captured from the invaders, they descended upon the fleet and surrounded the unwieldy ships; which, being more fearful of the unknown waters than of the enemy, and more bent on escaping to the deep sea than on resisting, they pursued clear to the river's mouth, and having captured some of them and burnt them, after they had been run aground in the confusion, returned victorious. Cleonymus sailed off with barely a fifth part of his ships intact. In no quarter of the Adriatic had his attempts succeeded. There are many now living in Patavium [1] who have seen the beaks of the ships and the spoils of the Laconians which were fastened up in the old temple of Juno. In commemoration of the naval battle a contest of ships is held regularly, on the anniversary of the engagement, in the river that flows through the town.

III. A treaty was entered into at Rome this year with the Vestini, who solicited friendship. Thereafter there were alarms in several quarters. It was reported that Etruria was up in arms, in consequence of an outbreak that had its origin in dissensions at seditionibus motu orto nuntiabatur, ubi Cilnium genus praepotens divitiarum invidia pelli armis coeptum; simul Marsos agrum vi tueri, in quem colonia Carseoli deducta erat quattuor milibus hominum scriptis. 3 Itaque propter eos tumultus dictus M. Valerius Maximus dictator magistrum equitum sibi legit M. 4 Aemilium Paulum.—Id magis credo quam Q. Fabium ea aetate atque eis honoribus Valerio subiectum; ceterum ex Maximi cognomine ortum errorem haud 5 abnuerim.—Profectus dictator cum exercitu proelio uno Marsos fundit; compulsis deinde in urbes munitas, Milioniam, Plestinam, Fresiliam intra dies paucos cepit et parte agri multatis Marsis foedus restituit. 6 Tum in Etruscos versum bellum; et cum dictator auspiciorum repetendorum causa profectus Romam esset, magister equitum pabulatum egressus ex insidiis circumvenitur signisque aliquot amissis foeda militum 7 caede ac fuga in castra est compulsus.—Qui terror non eo tantum a Fabio abhorret quod, si qua alia arte cognomen suum aequavit tum maxime bellicis 8 laudibus, sed etiam quod memor Papirianae saevitiae nunquam ut dictatoris iniussu dimicaret adduci potuisset.

A.U.C. 452

IV. Nuntiata ea clades Romam maiorem quam res 2 erat terrorem excivit. Nam ut exercitu deleto ita

[1] Maecenas, the patron of Horace and Virgil, belonged to this family.

[2] This appears to be a mistake, Carseoli was probably not planted until four years later (chap. xiii. § 1)

[3] i.e. that a confusion arose between M. Valerius Maximus and Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus.

[4] See the story of Papirius and Fabius at VIII. XXX–XXXV.

Arretium, where a movement was begun to drive out B.C. 302 the Cilnii—a very powerful family [1]—because of the envy occasioned by their wealth. At the same time the Marsi forcibly resisted the confiscation of their land, where the colony of Carseoli had been planted with an enrolment of four thousand men.[2] In view, therefore, of these tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was appointed dictator and named Marcus Aemilius Paulus to be his master of the horse. This I choose rather to believe than that Quintus Fabius, at his time of life and after the offices he had held, was made subordinate to Valerius; but I would not deny that the error might have originated in the surname of Maximus.[3]—Setting out with his army, the dictator overthrew the Marsi in a single battle; then shutting them up in their walled cities, he captured Milionia, Plestina, and Fresilia, in the course of a few days, and having fined the Marsi in a part of their territory, renewed the treaty with them. The campaign was then directed against the Etruscans; the dictator having set out for Rome, to take the auspices over again, the master of the horse went out to forage, and being ambushed, lost a number of standards and was driven back into his camp, with a shameful rout and slaughter of his soldiers.—This discomfiture is very unlikely to have befallen Fabius, not only because if in any quality he came up to his surname, he assuredly did so in the glory of a soldier, but also because, remembering the severity of Papirius, he could never have been brought to engage in battle without the orders of the dictator.[4]

IV. The news of this reverse gave rise in Rome to a greater alarm than the situation warranted. For, as though the army had been destroyed, a

U.C. 452 iustitium indictum, custodiae in portis, vigiliae vicatim
3 exactae, arma tela in muros congesta. Omnibus iunioribus sacramento adactis dictator ad exercitum missus omnia spe tranquilliora et composita magistri
4 equitum cura, castra in tutiorem locum redacta, cohortes quae signa amiserant extra vallum sine tentoriis destitutas invenit, exercitum avidum pugnae,
5 quo maturius ignominia aboleretur. Itaque confestim castra inde in agrum Rusellanum promovit.
6 Eo et hostes secuti, quamquam ex bene gesta re summam et in aperto certamine virium spem habebant, tamen insidiis quoque, quas feliciter experti
7 erant, hostem temptant. Tecta semiruta vici per vastationem agrorum deusti haud procul castris Romanorum aberant. Ibi abditis armatis pecus in conspectu praesidii Romani, cui praeerat Cn. Fulvius
8 legatus, propulsum. Ad quam inlecebram cum moveretur nemo ab Romana statione, pastorum unus progressus sub ipsas munitiones inclamat alios, cunctanter ab ruinis vici pecus propellentes, quid cessarent cum per media castra Romana tuto agere
9 possent. Haec cum legato Caerites quidam interpretarentur et per omnes manipulos militum indignatio

---

[1] By way of punishment for their cowardice. Cf. the punishment meted out to his soldiers in 209 B.C. by Marcellus (XXVII. xiii. 9).

[2] In Western Etruria, on the river Umbro.

[3] The Caerites were citizens (without the suffrage), and as such might serve in the Roman army.

cessation of legal business was proclaimed, guards B.C. 302 were called into service at the gates, and night-watches in the several streets, arms and missiles being heaped upon the walls. After summoning all of military age to take the oath, the dictator was dispatched to the army, and there found everything more tranquil than he had expected and reduced to order by the careful measures of the master of the horse. The camp had been withdrawn to a safer site, the cohorts that had lost their standards had been left outside the rampart without tents,[1] and the army was eager for battle, that it might the sooner wipe out its disgrace. Accordingly he advanced without delay into the district of Rusellae.[2] To this place the enemy followed him; and although in consequence of their success they had every confidence in their ability to cope with the Romans even in the open field, yet they also attempted an ambuscade, which they had successfully essayed before. Not far from the Roman camp stood the half-ruined buildings of a village which had been burned when the country was laid waste. Concealing armed men in these ruins, they drove out some cattle in full sight of a Roman outpost, which was under the command of the lieutenant Gnaeus Fulvius. But when this tempting bait failed to lure any of the Romans from their post, one of the shepherds came up under the very works and called out to the others, who were hesitating to drive out their flock from amongst the tumble-down buildings, asking why they were so slow, for they could safely drive them through the midst of the Roman camp. Some men from Caere[3] interpreted these words to the lieutenant, and great was the indignation aroused ingens esset nec tamen iniussu movere auderent, iubet peritos linguae attendere animum, pastorum

A.U.C. 452

10 sermo agresti an urbano propior esset. Cum referrent sonum linguae et corporum habitum et nitorem cultiora quam pastoralia esse, "Ite igitur, dicite," inquit, "detegant nequiquam conditas insidias: omnia scire Romanum nec magis iam dolo capi quam
11 armis vinci posse." Haec ubi audita sunt et ad eos qui consederant in insidiis perlata, consurrectum repente ex latebris est et in patentem ad conspectum 12 undique campum prolata signa. Visa legato maior acies quam quae ab suo praesidio sustineri posset itaque propere ad dictatorem auxilia accitum mittit; interea ipse impetus hostium sustinet.

V. Nuntio allato dictator signa ferri ac sequi iubet armatos. Sed celeriora prope omnia imperio erant;
2 rapta extemplo signa armaque, et vix ab impetu et cursu tenebantur. Cum ira ab accepta nuper clade stimulabat, tum concitatior accidens clamor ab in-
3 crescente certamine. Urgent itaque alii alios hortanturque signiferos ut ocius eant. Quo magis festinantes videt dictator, eo impensius retentat through all the maniples of soldiers; yet they dared B.C. 302 not stir without the orders of their leader, who commanded those familiar with the language to mark whether the shepherds' speech were more like that of rustics or of city-folk. On their reporting that in accent, in carriage, and in complexion they were too refined for shepherds, "Go then," said he, "and bid them uncover the ambuscade they have laid in vain; for the Romans know all, and can now no more be entrapped than they can be conquered by force of arms." These words were no sooner heard and repeated to those who lay in ambush than they suddenly all rose up from their hiding-places and advanced in martial array into the plain which was spread open to the view on every side. Their army seemed to the lieutenant to be greater than his own detachment could withstand, and he therefore sent in all haste to the dictator to summon help, in the meantime resisting by himself the enemy's charges.

V. On receiving his message the dictator bade advance the standards, and commanded his men to arm and follow them. But everything was almost sooner done than ordered; standards and arms were hurriedly caught up, and the soldiers could hardly be restrained from pushing forward at a run. It was not anger alone that spurred them on, as they thought of the defeat they had recently sustained, but the shouts, as well, that fell faster on their hearing as the fight waxed more hot. So they urged one another forward and exhorted the standard-bearers to a faster pace. But the more haste the dictator saw them make, the more earnest was he to hold them in, and commanded them to

A.U.C. 452

4 agmen ac sensim incedere iubet. Etrusci contra, principio exciti pugnae, omnibus copiis aderant; et super alios alii nuntiant dictatori omnes legiones Etruscorum capessisse pugnam nec iam ab suis resisti posse, et ipse cernit ex superiore loco in 5 quanto discrimine praesidium esset. Ceterum satis fretus esse etiam nunc tolerando certamini legatum nec se procul abesse periculi vindicem, quam maxime volt fatigari hostem, ut integris adoriatur 6 viribus fessos. Quamquam lente procedunt, iam tamen ad impetum capiundum,[1] equiti utique, modicum erat spatium. Prima incedebant signa legionum, ne quid occultum aut repentinum hostis timeret; sed reliquerat intervalla inter ordines peditum, qua 7 satis laxo spatio equi permitti possent. Pariter sustulit clamorem acies et emissus eques libero cursu in hostem invehitur incompositisque adversus equestrem procellam subitum pavorem offundit. 8 Itaque, ut prope serum auxilium iam paene circumventis, ita universa requies data est. Integri accepere 9 pugnam, nec ea ipsa[2] longa aut anceps fuit. Fusi hostes castra repetunt inferentibusque iam signa Romanis cedunt et in ultimam castrorum partem

[1] capiundum M: capiendum TDLA: capiunt dum PFU: wanting in O.

[2] nec ea ipsa ς (IX. xi. 5): nec a ipsa M: nec ipsa Ω: ex ipsa P: nec h$^{e}_{c}$c ipsa P^2 or P^3: nec hec ipsa O: nec hec ex ipsa U: nec h$^{e}_{c}$c exposita F.

slow down their march. The Etruscans, on the contrary, having been called out at the beginning of the battle, had taken the field with all their troops. One messenger after another informed the dictator that all the Etruscan legions were engaged and that his own men could hold out no longer; and looking down from the higher ground, he could see for himself the perilous situation of his people. Still, feeling fairly confident that his lieutenant was capable, even then, of maintaining the fight, and that he was himself not too far off to rescue him from danger, he desired the enemy to become completely exhausted, that he might fall upon them with undiminished vigour when their strength was spent. Yet although the Romans advanced but slowly, they had now but a little space to charge in, especially the horse. In the van were the standards of the legions, lest the enemy should be apprehensive of any concealed or rapid movement; but the dictator had left intervals between the files of the infantry, to allow ample room for the horses to go through. The legionaries gave a cheer, and simultaneously the horsemen were let loose and with a free course galloped straight upon the enemy, who were not prepared to resist a shock of cavalry and were overwhelmed with a sudden panic. And so, though the help had nearly come too late for men who were already well-nigh surrounded, yet they were now all given a respite, and the battle was taken over by fresh troops—a battle of no long duration nor of doubtful issue. The routed enemy fled back to their camp, and when the Roman standard-bearers pressed in after them, they gave way and huddled up together in the farthest part

B.C. 302

B.C. 10 conglobantur. Haerent fugientes in angustiis portarum; pars magna aggerem vallumque conscendit, 352 si aut ex superiore loco tueri se aut superare aliqua et
11 evadere posset. Forte quodam loco male densatus agger pondere superstantium in fossam procubuit; atque ea, cum deos pandere viam fugae conclamassent, plures inermes quam armati evadunt.

12 Hoc proelio fractae iterum Etruscorum vires, et pacto annuo stipendio et duum mensum frumento permissum ab dictatore ut de pace legatos mitterent Romam. Pax negata, indutiae biennii datae.
13 Dictator triumphans in urbem rediit.—Habeo auctores sine ullo memorabili proelio pacatam ab dictatore Etruriam esse seditionibus tantum Aretinorum compositis et Cilnio[1] genere cum plebe in 14 gratiam reducto.—Consul ex dictatura factus M. Valerius. Non petentem atque adeo etiam absentem creatum tradidere quidam et per interregem ea comitia facta; id unum non ambigitur, consulatum cum Apuleio Pansa gessisse.

A.U.C. VI. M. Valerio et Q. Apuleio consulibus satis
451 2 pacatae foris res fuere: Etruscum adversae[2] belli

[1] Cilnio Gruter: licinio iacilnio M: licinio (omitted by F) Ω.
[2] adversae ς: aduersa Ω: aduersi U.

[1] The other occasion was in 309 B.C. (IX. xxxix. 11).
[2] This was the fifth consulship of M. Valerius Corvus. The first was 348 B.C. (VII. xxvi. 12). The year 301 B.C., according to the Fasti Consulares, had no consuls but only a dictator. Livy conceives the dictatorship as occupying a part of the year when Livius and Aemilius were consuls (302 B.C.).

of the enclosure. The narrow gates became choked B.C. 302 with fugitives and a great part of them climbed upon the mound and palisade, in hopes that from that elevation they might be able either to defend themselves, or to climb over somewhere and escape. It chanced that in a certain place the mound had not been solidly rammed down, and this, overburdened with the weight of those who stood upon it, slid over into the trench. By that opening—crying out that the gods were providing them a means of flight—they saved themselves, but more got away without their arms than with them.

In this battle the might of the Etruscans was broken for the second time.[1] By promising a year's pay for the soldiers, with two months' corn, they obtained permission from the dictator to send envoys to Rome to negotiate a peace. Peace was denied them, but they were granted a truce of two years. The dictator returned to Rome and triumphed.—I find historians who say that Etruria was pacified by the dictator without any memorable battle, only by settling the dissensions of the Arretini and reconciling the Cilnian family with the plebs.—Marcus Valerius resigned as dictator, to enter immediately upon the consulship.[2] Some authors have recorded that he was elected without seeking the office, indeed without even being present, and that the election was presided over by an interrex; this only is not disputed, that he held the consulship in company with Apuleius Pansa.

VI. During their year of administration the B.C. 300 foreign relations of the state were fairly peaceful: the Etruscans were kept quiet by their failure in

A.U.C. 451

res et indutiae quietum tenebant; Samnitem multorum annorum cladibus domitum hauddum foederis novi paenitebat. Romae quoque plebem quietam
3 exonerata[1] in colonias multitudo praestabat. Tamen ne undique tranquillae res essent, certamen iniectum inter primores civitatis, patricios plebeiosque, ab
4 tribunis plebis Q. et Cn. Ogulniis,[2] qui undique criminandorum patrum apud plebem occasionibus quaesitis, postquam alia frustra temptata erant, eam actionem susceperunt qua non infimam plebem
5 accenderent sed ipsa capita plebis, consulares triumphalesque plebeios, quorum honoribus nihil praeter sacerdotia, quae nondum promiscua erant,
6 deesset. Rogationem ergo promulgarunt ut, cum quattuor augures, quattuor pontifices ea tempestate essent placeretque augeri sacerdotum numerum, quattuor pontifices, quinque augures, de plebe
7 omnes, adlegerentur.—Quemadmodum ad quattuor augurum numerum nisi morte duorum id redigi collegium potuerit, non invenio, cum inter augures constet imparem numerum debere esse, ut tres antiquae tribus, Ramnes Titienses Luceres, suum
8 quaeque augurem habeant aut, si pluribus sit opus, pari inter se numero sacerdotes multiplicent, sicut multiplicati sunt cum ad quattuor quinque adiecti novem numerum, ut terni in singulas essent, expleve-

[1] exonerata Madvig: exhoneratam deducta A: et exon (or -hon-)eratam deducta Ω: et exon(or-hon-)eratam deductam MPFTL.

[2] Ogulniis ζ: Oguiniis Ω: oguinus L: ognimus F.

---

[1] Weissenborn thinks that Livy has in mind the colonies of a later day whose principal aim was to lighten the City war and by the truce; the Samnites, tamed by the defeats of many years, had not wearied as yet of the new covenant. At Rome also the relief afforded by the emigration of large numbers to the colonies had quieted the commons.[1] Nevertheless, that tranquillity might not be found everywhere, the plebeian tribunes Quintus and Gnaeus Ogulnius stirred up a quarrel among the first men of the state, both patrician and plebeian. They had sought in every quarter occasions for maligning the Fathers to the plebs; and having tried everything else in vain, they set on foot a project by which they might inflame, not the lowest of the rabble, but the very leaders of the plebs—the commoners, namely, who had enjoyed consulships and triumphs, and who lacked nothing but priesthoods, which were not yet open to all, to complete their list of honours. The Ogulnii accordingly proposed a law, that whereas there were then four augurs and four pontiffs and it was desired to augment the number of priests, four pontiffs and five augurs should be added, and should all be taken from the plebs.—How this college could have been reduced to four augurs, unless by the death of two, I cannot discover; since it is a settled principle amongst the augurs that their number should be uneven, to the end that the three ancient tribes, the Ramnes, Titienses and Luceres, should each have its augur, or else—if a larger number should be needed—that they should increase the priests in the same proportion; as in fact they were increased when five were added to the four, and, making up the number of nine, gave each tribe B.C. 300 of its over-population. The colonies actually alluded to were intended primarily to protect the frontiers.

u.c. 454 9 runt. Ceterum, quia de plebe adlegebantur, iuxta eam rem aegre passi patres quam cum consulatum 10 volgari viderent. Simulabant ad deos id magis quam ad se pertinere : ipsos visuros ne sacra sua polluantur ; id se optare tantum, ne qua in rem publicam 11 clades veniat. Minus autem tetendere, adsueti iam tali [1] genere certaminum vinci ; et cernebant adversarios non, id quod olim vix speraverint, adfectantes magnos honores sed omnia iam in quorum spem dubiam erat certatum adeptos, multiplices consulatus censurasque et triumphos.

VII. Certatum tamen suadenda dissuadendaque lege inter Ap. Claudium maxime ferunt et inter P. 2 Decium Murem. Qui cum eadem ferme de iure patrum ac plebis quae pro lege Licinia quondam contraque eam dicta erant cum plebeiis consulatus 3 rogabatur disseruissent,[2] rettulisse dicitur Decius parentis sui speciem, qualem eum multi qui in contione erant viderant, incinctum Gabino cultu super telum stantem, quo se habitu pro populo ac 4 legionibus Romanis devovisset : tum P. Decium

[1] tali Ω : in tali Harant supported by PF which have in certaminum below).
[2] disseruissent γ : disseruisset Ω : deseruisset L.

[1] Livy means that originally there had been three augurs and that each subsequent increase in their number had been by multiples of three. He can only account for the tradition that there were four at this time on the assumption that two had died, and their places had not yet been filled when the Ogulnii made their proposal.

three.[1]—But since they were to be added from the plebs, the patricians were as distressed by the proposal as they had been when they saw the consulship thrown open. They pretended that the gods were more concerned than they themselves were: the gods would see to it that their rites should not be contaminated; for their own part they only hoped that no disaster might come upon the state. They made, however, no great struggle, accustomed as they now were to being worsted in contests of this kind; and they beheld their adversaries no longer reaching out after great honours which they had formerly scarce any hopes of attaining, but in full possession of all the things for which they had striven with dubious prospects of success—repeated consulships, censorships, and triumphs. B.C. 300

VII. There is said, however, to have been a vigorous discussion as to the passage or rejection of the bill, in which Appius Claudius and Publius Decius Mus were the principal speakers. After they had brought up nearly the same arguments concerning the rights of patricians and plebeians as had formerly been employed in behalf of and against the Licinian Law,[2] when the plebeians sought access to the consulship, it is related that Decius evoked the image of his father as he had been seen by many who were then present in the assembly, wearing his toga with the Gabine cincture,[3] and standing over his weapon, as he had done when offering himself a sacrifice for the Roman People and the legions. Publius Decius the consul had consulem purum piumque deis immortalibus visum aeque ac si T. Manlius collega eius devoveretur: 5 eundem P. Decium qui sacra publica populi Romani faceret legi rite non potuisse? Id esse periculum, ne suas preces minus audirent di quam Ap. Claudi? Castius eum sacra privata facere et religiosius deos 6 colere quam se? Quem paenitere votorum quae pro re publica nuncupaverint tot consules plebeii, tot dictatores, aut ad exercitus euntes aut inter ipsa 7 bella? Numerarentur duces eorum annorum, quibus plebeiorum ductu et auspicio res geri coeptae sint;[1] numerarentur triumphi: iam ne nobilitatis 8 quidem suae plebeios paenitere. Pro certo habere, si quod repens bellum oriatur non plus spei fore senatui populoque Romano in patriciis quam in plebeiis ducibus.

[2] Enacted 367 B.C. (VI. XXXV. 5).

[3] Prescribed in the ceremony of devotion, as in certain others.

A.U.C. 454

9 "Quod cum ita se habeat, cui deorum hominumve indignum videri potest" inquit, "eos viros, quos vos sellis curulibus, toga praetexta, tunica palmata et toga picta et corona triumphali laureaque honoraritis, quorum domos spoliis hostium adfixis insignes inter alias feceritis, pontificalia atque auguralia insignia

[1] coeptae sint Duker: coeptae sunt Ω: coepta sunt F: c$^{e}_{c}$pte sunt O: cepte s̄ A: coactae sunt L.

[1] The toga praetexta (white with purple border) was worn by those who had been elected to curule magistracies; the tunica palmata (embroidered with palm-leaves) and the toga picta (of purple embroidered with gold) were worn by the triumphator, who was also adorned with a wreath of laurel, while a public slave who stood beside him in the chariot held a golden chaplet over his head.

on that occasion seemed to the immortal gods an oblation no less pure and holy than if his colleague Titus Manlius had been offered up; could not then this same Publius Decius—he asked—have been duly chosen to solemnize the public sacrifices of the Roman People? Or was it to be feared that the gods would hearken less readily to the speaker's prayers than to those of Appius Claudius? Did Appius perform with more devotion the rites of domestic religion, and worship the gods more scrupulously than he did himself? Who was there that repented him of the vows that had been uttered in the state's behalf by so many plebeian consuls and so many dictators, either on going to their armies or in the midst of their campaigns? Let them enumerate the generals of those years that had elapsed since campaigns were first conducted under the leadership and auspices of plebeians; let them enumerate the triumphs; even on the score of their nobility, the plebeians had now nothing to regret. He felt quite sure that if suddenly some war should arise, the senate and the Roman People would rest their hopes no more on patrician than on plebeian generals. B.C. 300

"Since this is so," he proceeded, "what god or man can deem it inappropriate that those heroes whom you have honoured with curule chairs, with the purple-bordered robe, with the tunic adorned with palms, and with the embroidered toga, the triumphal crown and the laurel wreath,[1] whose houses you have made conspicuous amongst the rest with the spoils of your enemies which you have fastened to their walls,—who, I say, can object if such men add thereto the insignia of the pontiffs

A.U.C. 454

10 adicere? Qui Iovis optimi maximi ornatu decoratus curru aurato per urbem vectus in Capitolium ascenderit, is non[1] conspiciatur cum capide ac lituo, cum[2] capite velato victimam caedet auguriumve ex arce
11 capiet? Cuius in imaginis[3] titulo consulatus censuraque et triumphus aequo animo legetur, si auguratum aut pontificatum adieceritis, non sustinebunt legen-
12 tium oculi? Equidem—pace dixerim deum—eos nos iam populi Romani beneficio esse spero, qui sacerdotiis non minus reddamus dignatione nostra honoris[4] quam acceperimus et deorum magis quam nostra causa expetamus ut quos privatim colimus publice colamus.

VIII. Quid autem ego sic adhuc egi, tamquam integra sit causa patriciorum de sacerdotiis et non iam in possessione unius amplissimi simus sacerdotii?
2 Decemviros sacris faciundis, carminum Sibyllae ac fatorum populi huius interpretes, antistites eosdem Apollinaris sacri caerimoniarumque aliarum plebeios
3 videmus. Nec aut tum patriciis ulla iniuria facta est, cum duumviris sacris faciundis adiectus est propter plebeios numerus, et nunc tribunus, vir

[1] is non Weissenborn: is Ω.
[2] cum capide ac lituo, cum Walters: cum capide ac lituo F: cum li capide ac tuo M: cum lituo PFOT^{2} (or T^1): cum litua U: cum TDLA.
[3] in imaginis Wesenberg: imaginis (sic) A: imaginis Ω.
[4] honoris D^s: honores Ω.

[1] The capis, according to Varro (L.L., v. 121), got its name from capere, because it was provided with a handle; it was used in the ceremonial of the pontiffs. The lituus was used and the augurs? May the man who, decked with B.C. 300

the robes of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, has been borne through the City in a gilded chariot and has mounted the Capitol—may that man not be seen with chalice and crook,[1] when, covering his head, he offers up the victim, or receives an augury from the Citadel? If men shall read with equanimity, in the inscription that accompanies his portrait, of consulship, censorship, and triumph, will their eyes be unable to endure the brightness, if you add to these the augurate or pontificate? For my own part—under Heaven's favour be it spoken—I trust that we are now, thanks to the Roman People, in a position to reflect upon the priesthoods—in consequence of our recognized fitness for office—no less credit than we shall receive from them, and to seek, more for the service of the gods than for ourselves, that those whom we worship privately we may also worship in the name of the state.

VIII. "But why have I been reasoning hitherto as if the patrician claim on the priesthoods were intact, and we were not already in possession of the one supremely honourable priesthood? We see that plebeians are members of the Ten charged with the sacred rites, interpreters of the Sibylline oracles and the destinies of this people, the same being also overseers of Apollo's ritual and of other ceremonies. And yet the patricians were in no way wronged at the time when the two commissioners in charge of sacred rites were increased in number on account of the plebeians; and our brave and vigorous tribune, in proposing at the present time to [1] by the augur; Livy says (I. xviii. 7) that it was a crooked staff without a knot.

A.U.C. 454

fortis ac strenuus, quinque augurum loca, quattuor pontificum adicit,[1] in quae plebeii nominentur, non ut vos, Appi, vestro loco pellant sed ut adiuvent vos homines plebeii divinis quoque rebus procurandis, sicut in ceteris humanis pro parte virili adiuvant. Noli erubescere, Appi, collegam in sacerdotio habere quem in censura quem in consulatu collegam habere potuisti, cuius tam dictatoris magister equitum quam magistri equitum dictator esse potes. Sabinum advenam, principem nobilitatis[2] vestrae, seu Attium[3] Clausum seu Ap. Claudium mavoltis, illi antiqui patricii in suum numerum acceperunt: tu ne[4] fastidieris nos in sacerdotum numerum accipere. Multa nobiscum decora adferimus, immo omnia eadem quae vos superbos fecerunt: L. Sextius primus de plebe consul est factus, C. Licinius Stolo primus magister equitum, C. Marcius Rutulus[5] primus et dictator et censor, Q. Publilius Philo primus praetor. Semper ista audita sunt eadem, penes vos auspicia esse, vos solos gentem habere, vos solos iustum imperium et auspicium domi militiaeque; aeque adhuc prosperum plebeium et patricium fuit porroque erit. En umquam fando audistis patricios primo esse factos non de caelo demissos sed qui patrem ciere possent, id est nihil ultra quam ingenuos? Consulem iam patrem ciere possum,

[1] adicit Duker: adiciet A^2 (or A^3): adiecit Ω.

[2] nobilitatis A^1 (or A^2) ς: nobilitati Ω.

[3] Attium Alschefski (II. xvi. 4): at(or ac-)ium MPFUO: appū tum TDLA.

[4] tu ne Siesbye: ne Ω.

[5] Rutulus Conway and Walters on III. vii. 6: rutilius (or -cil-) Ω. The same correction at chap. ix. § 2.

add five augurs' places and four pontiffs', to which B.C. 300 plebeians may be named, has not desired to oust you patricians, Appius, from your places, but that men of the plebs may help you in the administration also of divine affairs, even as they help you in other and human matters, to the measure of their strength. Blush not, Appius, to have a colleague in the priesthood whom you might have had in the censorship or consulship. It is quite as possible that he should be dictator and you his master of the horse as that it should be the other way about. A Sabine immigrant, the first of your house to be ennobled—call him Attius Clausus or Appius Claudius, as you will—was admitted to their number by the patricians of that olden time: be not too proud to admit us into the number of the priests. We bring many distinctions with us, aye, every one of those same distinctions that have made you so high and mighty. Lucius Sextius was the first plebeian consul, Gaius Licinius Stolo the first master of the horse; Gaius Marcius Rutulus the first dictator and censor, Quintus Publilius Philo the first praetor. From you we have heard always the same song—that the auspices belong to you, that you alone are of noble birth, that you alone have the full imperium and right to divination, both at home and in the field. But the authority and divination of plebeian and patrician have prospered in equal measure until now, and so they shall do in the future. Pray, has it ever been wafted to your ears that those who were first appointed to be patricians were not beings descended from celestial regions, but were such as could name their fathers—were free-born men, that is, and nothing more? I can already name a consul for

A.U.C. 454 avumque iam poterit filius meus. Nihil est aliud in re, Quirites, nisi ut omnia negata adipiscamur; certamen tantum patricii petunt nec curant quem 12 eventum certaminum habeant. Ego hanc legem, quod bonum faustum felixque sit vobis ac rei publicae, uti rogas, iubendam[1] censeo."

A.U.C. 455 IX. Vocare tribus extemplo populus iubebat, apparebatque accipi legem; ille tamen dies inter- 2 cessione est sublatus. Postero die deterritis tribunis ingenti consensu accepta est. Pontifices creantur suasor legis P. Decius Mus P. Sempronius Sophus C. Marcius Rutulus M. Livius Denter; quinque augures item de plebe, C. Genucius P. Aelius Paetus M. Minucius Faesus C. Marcius T. Publilius. Ita octo pontificum, novem augurum numerus factus.

3 Eodem anno M. Valerius consul de provocatione legem tulit diligentius sanctam. Tertio ea tum post reges exactos lata est, semper a familia eadem. 4 Causam renovandae saepius haud aliam fuisse reor quam quod plus paucorum opes quam libertas plebis poterat. Porcia tamen lex sola pro tergo civium lata videtur, quod gravi poena, si quis verberasset 5 necassetve civem Romanum, sanxit; Valeria lex cum

[1] iubendam ϝ: subendam ϝ: subeundam Ω.

[1] For the earlier laws de provocatione, see II. viii. 2, and III. lv. 4.

[2] This law was not passed until (probably) 198 B.C., at the instance of the elder Cato, who was then praetor.

my father, and my son will presently be able to B.C. 300 name one for his grandfather. In truth the matter is simply, Quirites, that we must always be first denied, and yet have our way in the end. A struggle is all that the patricians ask: they care not what may be the outcome of the struggle. I hold that this law—and may good come of it and favour and prosperity, to yourselves and to the state!—should be ordered, as proposed."

IX. The people straightway commanded the tribes B.C. 299 to be called, and it seemed that the measure would be accepted; nevertheless it was put off for that day on account of a veto. On the following day the tribunes were cowed and the law was passed with acclamation. To be pontiffs were chosen the advocate of the law, Publius Decius Mus, with Publius Sempronius Sophus, Gaius Marcius Rutulus, and Marcus Livius Denter; the five augurs were likewise of the plebs, Gaius Genucius, Publius Aelius Paetus, Marcus Minucius Faesus, Gaius Marcius, and Titus Publilius. Thus the number of pontiffs became eight and of augurs nine.

In the same year Marcus Valerius the consul proposed a law of appeal with stricter sanctions. This was the third time since the expulsion of the kings that such a law had been introduced, by the same family in every instance.[1] The reason for renewing it more than once was, I think, simply this, that the wealth of a few carried more power than the liberty of the plebs. Yet the Porcian law alone seems to have been passed to protect the persons of the citizens, imposing, as it did, a heavy penalty if anyone should scourge or put to death a Roman citizen.[2] The Valerian law, having forbidden that eum qui provocasset virgis caedi securique necari vetuisset, si quis adversus ea fecisset, nihil ultra 6 quam "improbe factum" adiecit. Id, qui tum pudor hominum erat, visum, credo, vinculum satis validum legis: nunc vix serio[1] ita minetur quisquam.

A.U.C. 455

7 Bellum ab eodem consule haudquaquam memorabile adversus rebellantes Aequos, cum praeter animos feroces nihil ex antiqua fortuna haberent,
8 gestum est. Alter consul Apuleius in Vmbria Nequinum oppidum circumsedit. Locus erat arduus atque in parte una praeceps, ubi nunc Narnia sita
9 est, nec vi nec munimento capi poterat. Itaque eam infectam rem M. Fulvius Paetus T. Manlius Torquatus novi consules acceperunt.
10 In eum annum cum Q. Fabium consulem non petentem omnes dicerent centuriae, ipsum auctorem fuisse Macer Licinius ac Tubero tradunt differendi
11 sibi consulatus in bellicosiorem annum: eo anno maiori se usui rei publicae fore urbano gesto magistratu. Ita nec dissimulantem quid mallet nec petentem tamen, aedilem curulem cum L. Papirio 12 Cursore factum. Id ne pro certo ponerem vetustior annalium auctor Piso effecit, qui eo anno aediles curules fuisse tradit Cn. Domitium[2] Cn. filium Calvi-

[1] vix serio Pithoeus, Perizonius: uix seruo OTA[2]: uix seru (or other corruptions) Ω.

[2] Cn. Domitium Pighius (C.I.L. i², p. 134): CN̄ (or cl or C.L. or C.L.) Domitium Ω: l.c. domitium T.

[1] The Acta Triumphorum (C.I.L., i², p. 171) give him as son of Gnaeus and grandson of Gnaeus; he is therefore not the same as the M. Fulvius who was consul in 305 B.C. (IX. xliv. 15), whose father and grandfather were both named Lucius.

[2] Fabius had already held this office, 331 B.C. (VIII. xviii. 4).

he who had appealed should be scourged with rods B.C. 299 or beheaded, merely provided that if anyone should disregard these injunctions it should be deemed a wicked act. This seemed, I suppose, a sufficiently strong sanction of the law, so modest were men in those days; at the present time one would hardly utter such a threat in earnest.

The same consul conducted an insignificant campaign against the rebellious Aequi, who retained nothing of their ancient fortune but a warlike spirit. Apuleius, the other consul, laid siege to the town of Nequinum in Umbria. It was a steep place and on one side precipitous—the site is now occupied by Narnia—and could be captured neither by assault nor by siege operations. The enterprise was therefore still unfinished when Marcus Fulvius Paetus[1] and Titus Manlius Torquatus, the new consuls, took it over.

Licinius Macer and Tubero declare that all the centuries were for naming Quintus Fabius consul for this year, though he was not a candidate, but that Fabius himself urged them to defer his consulship to a year when there was more fighting; just then he would be of greater service to the state if invested with an urban magistracy. And so, neither dissembling what he had in mind nor yet seeking it, he was elected curule aedile, with Lucius Papirius Cursor.[2] I have been unable to put this down for certain, because Piso, one of the older annalists,[3] states that the curule aediles for that year were Gnaeus Domitius Calvinus, the son of

[3] For Piso and the other annalists see Vol. I. pp. xxviii–xxx.

A.U.C. 455

13 num et Sp. Carvilium Q. filium Maximum. Id credo cognomen errorem in aedilibus fecisse secutamque fabulam mixtam ex aediliciis et consularibus comitiis, 14 convenientem errori. Et lustrum eo anno conditum a P. Sempronio Sopho[1] et P. Sulpicio Saverrione censoribus, tribusque additae duae, Aniensis ac Terentina.[2] Haec Romae gesta.

X. Ceterum ad Nequinum oppidum cum segni obsidione tempus tereretur, duo ex oppidanis, quorum erant aedificia iuncta muro, specu facto ad stationes
2 Romanas itinere occulto perveniunt; inde ad consulem deducti praesidium armatum se intra moenia
3 et muros accepturos confirmant. Nec aspernanda res visa neque incaute credenda. Cum altero eorum —nam alter obses retentus—duo exploratores per 4 cuniculum missi; per quos satis comperta re trecenti armati transfuga duce in urbem ingressi nocte portam quae proxima erat cepere. Qua refracta consul
5 exercitusque Romanus sine certamine urbem invasere. Ita Nequinum in dicionem populi Romani venit. Colonia eo adversus Umbros missa a Nare flumine[3] Narnia appellata; exercitus cum magna praeda Romam reductus.

6 Eodem anno ab Etruscis adversus indutias paratum bellum; sed eos talia[4] molientis Gallorum ingens

[1] P. Sempronio Sopho et edd (from § 2): P. Sulpicio Sopho et MTDLA: omitted by PFUO.

[2] Terentina Ω: tarentina TDLA: terentia Periocha: Teretina Mommsen (cf. Conway, Italic Dialects, i, p. 340).

[3] Nare flumine ς: flumine Ω.

[4] talia Glareanus: alia Ω.

[1] The "closing of the lustrum" was accomplished by the sacrifice of a swine, a sheep and an ox (the suovetaurilia), and completed the ceremonies incidental to the census.

Gnaeus, and Spurius Carvilius Maximus, the son of Quintus. I fancy that this surname occasioned an error in regard to the aediles, and that a story afterwards grew up in harmony with the error, from a confusion of the aedilician with the consular elections. This year witnessed also the closing of the lustrum,[1] by the censors Publius Sempronius Sophus and Publius Sulpicius Saverrio, and two tribes were added—the Aniensis and the Terentina. So much for affairs at Rome. B.C. 299

X. Meantime, at the town of Nequinum, while the siege dragged slowly on, two of the townsmen, whose dwellings abutted on the wall, dug a tunnel and made their way in secret to the Roman outposts. Thence they were conducted to the consul, whom they assured of their readiness to admit a party of soldiers within the fortifications and the walls. It was not thought wise to spurn this offer, nor yet rashly to confide in it. In company with one of these men—the other being held as a hostage—two scouts were sent through the tunnel; the result of their investigation was satisfactory, and three hundred armed men, with the renegade as guide, effected an entrance by night into the city and seized the nearest gate. Once this had been broken down, the Roman consul and his army captured the place without a struggle. Thus Nequinum came under the sway of the Roman People. A colony was sent there to make head against the Umbrians, and was given the name of Narnia from the river Nar. The army, enriched with spoil, marched back to Rome.

The Etruscans planned to go to war that year in violation of the truce; but while they were busy

A.U.C. 455 exercitus finis ingressus paulisper a proposito avertit.
7 Pecunia deinde, qua multum poterant, freti, socios
ex hostibus facere Gallos conantur ut eo adiuncto 8 exercitu cum Romanis bellarent. De societate haud abnuunt barbari: de mercede agitur. Qua pacta acceptaque cum parata cetera ad bellum essent sequique Etruscus iuberet, infitias eunt mercedem 9 se belli Romanis inferendi pactos: quidquid acce-perint accepisse ne agrum Etruscum vastarent armis-10 que lacesserent cultores; militaturos tamen se, si utique Etrusci velint, sed nulla alia mercede quam ut in partem agri accipiantur tandemque aliqua sede
11 certa consistant. Multa de eo concilia populorum Etruriae habita, nec perfici quicquam potuit, non tam quia imminui agrum quam quia accolas sibi quisque adiungere tam efferatae gentis homines 12 horrebat. Ita dimissi Galli pecuniam ingentem sine labore ac periculo partam[1] rettulerunt. Romae terrorem praebuit fama Gallici tumultus ad bellum Etruscum adiecti; eo minus cunctanter foedus ictum cum Picenti populo est.

A.U.C. 456 XI. T. Manlio consuli provincia Etruria sorte evenit; qui vixdum ingressus hostium finis cum

[1] partam ϛ: paratam Ω.

[1] Now mentioned for the first time by Livy.

with this project an enormous army of Gauls in- B.C. 299
vaded their borders and diverted them for a little while from their purpose. Afterwards, putting their trust in money, of which they had great store, they endeavoured to convert the Gauls from enemies into friends, to the end that, uniting the Gallic army with their own, they might fight the Romans. The barbarians made no objection to an alliance: it was only a question of price. When this had been agreed upon and received, and the Etruscans, having completed the rest of their preparations for the war, bade their new allies follow them, the Gauls demurred. They had made no bargain, they said, for a war with Rome; whatever they had received had been in consideration of their not devastating the Etruscan territory and molesting its inhabitants; nevertheless they would take the field, if the Etruscans were bent on having them, but on one condition only—that the Etruscans admit them to a share in their land, where they might settle at last in a permanent home. Many councils of the peoples of Etruria were held to consider this offer, but nothing could be resolved upon, not so much from a reluctance to see their territory lessened as because everyone shrank from having men of so savage a race for neighbours. So the Gauls were dismissed, and departed with a vast sum of money, acquired without any toil or risk. The Romans were alarmed by the rumour of a Gallic rising in addition to a war with the Etruscans, and lost no time in concluding a treaty with the people of Picenum.[1]

XI. The command in Etruria fell by lot to Titus B.C. 298 Manlius the consul. He had barely entered the exerceretur inter equites, ab rapido cursu circumagendo equo effusus extemplo prope exspiravit; tertius ab eo casu dies finis vitae consuli fuit. Quo velut omine belli accepto deos pro se commisisse bellum memorantes Etrusci sustulere animos. Romae cum desiderio viri tum incommoditate temporis tristis nuntius fuit; patres ab iubendo dictatore consulis subrogandi comitia ex sententia principum habita deterruerunt.[1] M. Valerium consulem omnes centuriae[2] dixere, quem senatus dictatorem dici iussurus fuerat. Tum extemplo in Etruriam ad legiones proficisci iussit. Adventus eius compressit Etruscos adeo ut nemo extra munimenta egredi auderet timorque ipsorum obsidioni similis esset. Neque illos novus consul vastandis agris urendisque tectis, cum passim non villae solum sed frequentes quoque vici incendiis fumarent, elicere ad certamen potuit.

A.U.C. 456

Cum hoc segnius bellum opinione esset, alterius belli, quod multis in vicem cladibus haud immerito terribile erat, fama, Picentium novorum sociorum indicio exorta est: Samnites arma et rebellionem spectare seque ab iis sollicitatos esse. Picentibus gratiae actae et magna pars curae patribus ab Etruria in Samnites versa est.

[1] patres . . . deterruerunt Gronovius: ut patres . . . delirruerint Ω.
[2] centuriae Cobet: sententiae centuriaeque Ω.

territory of the enemy, and was exercising with the B.C. 295 cavalry, when, in wheeling his horse about after a swift gallop, he was thrown and ere long breathed his last, for the third day following the accident saw the end of the consul's life. Taking this as an omen of the war, and declaring that the gods had begun hostilities in their behalf, the Etruscans plucked up courage. It was sad news to the Romans; not only could they ill spare the man, but his death occurred at an embarrassing moment. The Fathers would have ordered the nomination of a dictator had not the election held to choose a substitute for the consul fallen out in accordance with the wishes of the leaders. Marcus Valerius was the choice of all the centuries for consul. It was he whom the senate had intended to have named as dictator, and they now commanded him to proceed forthwith to the legions in Etruria. His arrival so damped the ardour of the Etruscans that none ventured outside their fortifications, and their own fear was like a besieging host. Nor could the new consul entice them into giving battle by wasting their lands and firing their buildings, though the smoke was rising on every side from the conflagration not only of farm-houses but of many villages as well.

While this war was prolonged beyond anticipation, another war—justly dreaded by reason of the many losses which the parties to it had inflicted on each other—was beginning to be talked of in consequence of information given by the Picentes, Rome's new allies. The Samnites, they said, were looking to arms and a renewal of hostilities, and had solicited their help. The Picentes were thanked, and the senate's anxiety was diverted, in great measure, from Etruria to the Samnites.

A.U.C. 456

9 Caritas etiam annonae sollicitam civitatem habuit ventumque ad inopiae ultimum foret, ut scripsere quibus aedilem fuisse eo anno Fabium Maximum placet, ni eius viri cura, qualis in bellicis rebus multis tempestatibus fuerat, talis domi tum in annonae dispensatione praeparando ac convehendo frumento fuisset.

10 Eo anno—nec traditur causa—interregnum initum. interreges fuere Ap. Claudius, dein P. Sulpicius. Is comitia consularia habuit; creavit L. Cornelium Scipionem, Cn. Fulvium consules.

11 Principio huius anni oratores Lucanorum ad novos consules venerunt questum, quia condicionibus perlicere se nequiverint ad societatem armorum, Samnites infesto exercitu ingressos fines suos vastare 12 belloque ad bellum cogere. Lucano populo satis superque erratum quondam nunc ita obstinatos animos esse: ut omnia ferre ac pati tolerabilius ducant, quam ut unquam postea nomen Romanum 13 violent. Orare patres ut et Lucanos in fidem accipiant et vim atque iniuriam ab se Samnitium arceant: se, quamquam bello cum Samnitibus suscepto necessaria iam facta adversus Romanos fides sit, tamen obsides dare paratos esse.

XII. Brevis consultatio senatus fuit; ad unum omnes iungendum foedus cum Lucanis resque

---

[1] This is said to be the first recorded instance of the aediles being charged with the oversight of the City's food-supply.

[2] The Lucanians had entered upon friendly relations with the Romans in 326 B.C. (VIII. XXV. 3), but had been seduced from their loyalty by the Samnites (VIII. XXVII. 10). A Roman army invaded them in 317 (IX. XX. 9).

The citizens were also concerned at the dearness B.C. 298 of provisions, and would have experienced the direst need, as those writers have recorded who are pleased to represent Fabius Maximus as having been aedile in that year, if that heroic man, who had on many occasions managed military undertakings, had not at this juncture shown himself equally expert in the administration of the market and the purchase and importation of corn.[1]

In this year—for no cause assigned—there befell an interregnum. The interreges were Appius Claudius, and afterwards Publius Sulpicius. The latter held a consular election, and announced that the choice had fallen on Lucius Cornelius Scipio and Gnaeus Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year Lucanian envoys came to the new consuls to complain that the Samnites, since they had been unable by offering inducements to entice them into an armed alliance, had invaded their territories with a hostile army and by warring on them were obliging them to go to war. The people of Lucania, they said, had on a former occasion strayed all too far from the path of duty, but were now so resolute as to deem it better to endure and suffer anything than ever again to offend the Romans.[2] They besought the Fathers both to take the Lucanians under their protection and to defend them from the violence and oppression of the Samnites. Though their having gone to war with the Etruscans was necessarily a pledge of loyalty to the Romans, yet they were none the less ready to give hostages.

XII. Discussion in the senate was soon over. Every opinion was for entering into a treaty with

A.U.C. 456

2 repetendas ab Samnitibus censent. Benigne responsum Lucanis ictumque foedus; fetiales missi, qui Samnitem decedere agro sociorum ac deducere exercitum finibus Lucanis iuberent; quibus obviam missi ab Samnitibus, qui denuntiarent, si quod adissent in 3 Samnio concilium, haud inviolatos abituros. Haec postquam audita sunt Romae, bellum Samnitibus et patres censuerunt et populus iussit.

Consules inter se provincias partiti sunt: Scipioni Etruria, Fulvio Samnites obvenerunt, diversique ad 4 suum quisque bellum proficiscuntur. Scipioni segne bellum et simile prioris anni militiae exspectanti hostes ad Volaterras instructo agmine occurrerunt. 5 Pugnatum maiore parte diei magna utrimque caede; nox incertis qua data victoria esset intervenit. Lux insequens victorem victumque ostendit; nam Etrusci 6 silentio noctis castra reliquerant.[1] Romanus egressus in aciem, ubi profectione hostium concessam victoriam videt, progressus ad castra vacuis cum plurima praeda—nam et stativa et trepide deserta fuerant— 7 potitur. Inde in Faliscum agrum copiis reductis cum impedimenta Faleriis cum modico praesidio

[1] reliquerant Heusinger: reliquerunt Ω.

[1] This was the so-called Third Samnite War.

[2] The phrase instructo agmine seems to be used of a column formed for marching in such a way that the soldiers merely

Lucania and demanding satisfaction of the Samnites. B.C. 298
The Lucanians received a friendly answer, and the league was formed. Fetials were then sent to command the Samnites to leave the country belonging to Rome's allies, and withdraw their army from the territory of Lucania. They were met on the way by messengers, whom the Samnites had dispatched to warn them that if they went before any Samnite council they would not depart unscathed. When these things were known at Rome, the senate advised and the people voted a declaration of war against the Samnites.[1]

The consuls divided the commands between them, Scipio getting Etruria and Fulvius the Samnites, and set out for their respective wars. Scipio looked forward to a slow campaign like that of the previous year, but was met near Volaterrae by the enemy drawn up in column.[2] The fighting, which lasted for the best part of a day, was attended with heavy losses on both sides; and night came on while it was yet uncertain to which nation victory had been vouchsafed. The morning showed who was victor and who vanquished, for in the silence of the night the Etruscans had decamped. The Romans marched out into line of battle; and when they saw that the enemy by his retreat had conceded their superiority, they advanced and possessed themselves of the camp, which was unoccupied and contained much booty, for it had been a permanent post and had been hurriedly abandoned. Scipio then led his troops back into the Faliscan territory, and having left his baggage with a small guard in Falerii, set out with by executing a right (or left) face would constitute a battle-line.

A.U.C. 456

reliquisset, expedito agmine ad populandos[1] hostium
8 fines incedit. Omnia ferro ignique vastantur; praedae undique actae. Nec solum modo vastum hosti relictum sed castellis etiam vicisque inlatus ignis: urbibus oppugnandis temperatum, in quas timor Etruscos compulerat.

9 Cn. Fulvi consulis clara pugna in Samnio ad Bovianum haudquaquam ambiguae victoriae fuit. Bovianum inde adgressus nec ita multo post Aufidenam vi cepit.

XIII. Eodem anno Carseolos colonia in agrum
2 Aequicolorum deducta. Fulvius consul de Samnitibus triumphavit. Cum comitia consularia instarent, fama exorta Etruscos Samnitesque ingentes conscribere
3 exercitus: palam omnibus conciliis vexari principes Etruscorum, quod non Gallos quacumque condicione traxerint ad bellum; increpari[2] magistratus Samnitium, quod exercitum adversus Lucanum hostem
4 comparatum obiecerint Romanis; itaque suis sociorumque viribus consurgere hostes ad bellum, et haudquaquam pari defungendum esse certamine.

5 Hic terror, cum illustres viri consulatum peterent, omnes in Q. Fabium Maximum primo non petentem, deinde, ut inclinata studia vidit, etiam recusantem
6 convertit: quid se iam senem ac perfunctum laboribus

[1] populandos MPUOA[2]: depopulandos FTDLA.
[2] increpari γ: increpare Ω.

---

[1] We had already been told of the colony at Carseoli in chap. iii § 2. Livy seems here to be following a different authority, and perhaps a better one, as the town is here correctly located among the Aequicoli (mentioned in I. xxxii. 5 as an ancient tribe from whom Ancus Marcius copied the ritual of the fetials instead of among the Marsi.

his army in light marching order to ravage the territory of the enemy. The whole country was laid waste with fire and sword and booty was brought in from all directions. Not only was the soil left bare for the enemy, but even strongholds and villages were burned. The consul stopped short of attacking the walled towns, into which the frightened Etruscans had fled for refuge. B.C. 298

The other consul, Gnaeus Fulvius, fought a famous battle in Samnium, near Bovianum, and gained a victory that was by no means doubtful. He then attacked and captured Bovianum, and not long afterwards Aufidena.

XIII. A colony was founded in that same year at Carseoli in the land of the Aequicoli.[1] The consul Fulvius triumphed over the Samnites. As the consular elections drew near, a rumour arose that the Etruscans and the Samnites were levying huge forces; it was said that in all their councils the leaders of the Etruscans were openly censured for not having brought the Gauls into the war, on whatever terms; and the Samnite magistrates were attacked for having confronted the Romans with an army raised to oppose a Lucanian foe; thus their enemies were girding themselves for war, in their own might and the might of their allies, and they would have to contend with them on far from even terms.

This danger, though illustrious men were candidates for the consulship, made everyone turn to Quintus Fabius Maximus, who was not a candidate, in the first place, and who, when he saw the direction of the people's wishes, actually refused to stand. Why must they trouble him, he asked, laborumque praemiis sollicitarent? Nec corporis nec animi vigorem remanere eundem, et fortunam ipsam vereri, ne cui deorum nimia iam in se et constantior

A.U.C. 456

7 quam velint humanae res videatur. Et se gloriae seniorum succrevisse et ad suam gloriam consurgentes alios laetum aspicere; nec honores magnos fortissimis viris Romae nec honoribus deesse fortes viros.
8 Acuebat hac moderatione tam iusta studia; quae verecundia legum restinguenda ratus, legem recitari iussit qua intra decem annos eundem consulem refici
9 non liceret. Vix prae strepitu audita lex est tribunique plebis nihil id impedimenti futurum aiebant:
10 se ad populum laturos uti legibus solveretur. Et ille quidem in recusando perstabat: quid ergo attineret leges ferri,[1] quibus per eosdem qui tulissent fraus
11 fieret. Iam regi leges, non regere. Populus[2] nihilo minus suffragia inibat, et ut quaeque intro vocata erat centuria, consulem haud dubie Fabium dicebat.
12 Tum demum consensu civitatis victus, "Dei approbent" inquit, "quod agitis acturique estis, Quirites. Ceterum, quoniam in me quod vos voltis facturi estis, in collega sit meae apud vos gratiae locus:

[1] ferri Walters: ferri ros(or-rof-)itans M: ferri cogitans O: ferri rogitans (in PFU rogitans comes after quibus) Ω.
[2] populus A^2: populos Ω (uncertain which letter in O).

[1] The statute dated from 342 B.C. and applied equally to all magistracies, but was frequently disregarded. As Fabius had not been consul since 308, his election now would not have contravened the statute, and Luterbacher suggests that the story may have originated in connexion with the election of two years before (chap. ix. § 10).

[2] There was an enclosure (the saepta) in the Campus Martius, into which the centuries were summoned, and there, one by one, proclaimed their choice.

who was an old man now and had done with toil and the rewards of toil? Neither his body nor his mind retained their vigour undiminished, and he feared Fortune herself, lest some god might deem that she had already been too kind to him and more constant than human beings were meant to find her. He himself had risen to the glory of his elders, and he rejoiced to see others growing up to the measure of his own. There was no lack of great offices in Rome for the bravest men, nor of brave men for the offices. B.C. 298

Such moderation but intensified the well-merited enthusiasm of his friends; and Fabius, thinking that it would have to be restrained by respect for the laws, bade read aloud the statute which prohibited the re-election of the same man to the consulship within ten years.[1] Whereupon there was such a clamouring that the law could scarce be heard, and the tribunes of the plebs declared that it should be no impediment, for they would propose to the people that he be granted a dispensation from the laws. Fabius, for his part, stoutly persisted in his refusal. What, in that case, he demanded, was the good of making laws, when their very makers broke them? The laws were no longer in control, but were themselves controlled. Nevertheless the people proceeded to the election, and every century, as it was summoned within, in no uncertain terms named Fabius consul.[2] Then at last, overborne by the consent of all the citizens, "May Heaven," he said, "approve, Quirites, of what you are doing and propose to do. For the rest, since you are bound to have your way with me, grant me a favour in the matter of my colleague and make consul 13 P. Decium, expertum mihi concordi collegio virum, dignum vobis, dignum parente suo, quaeso mecum consulem faciatis." Iusta suffragatio visa. Omnes quae supererant centuriae Q. Fabium, P. Decium consules dixere.

A.U.C. 456

14 Eo anno plerisque dies dicta ab aedilibus, quia plus quam quod lege finitum erat agri possiderent; nec quisquam ferme est purgatus vinculumque ingens immodicae cupiditati[1] iniectum est.

A.U.C. 457
XIV. Consules novi, Q. Fabius Maximus quartum et P. Decius Mus tertium, cum inter se agitarent 2 uti alter Samnites hostes, alter Etruscos deligeret, quantaeque in hanc aut in illam provinciam copiae satis et uter ad utrum bellum dux idoneus magis 3 esset, ab Sutrio et Nepete et Faleriis legati, auctores concilia[2] Etruriae populorum de petenda pace haberi,[3] totam belli molem in Samnium averterunt. 4 Profecti consules, quo expeditiores commeatus essent et incertior hostis qua venturum bellum foret, Fabius per Soranum, Decius per Sidicinum agrum, in Samnium legiones ducunt.

5 Ubi in hostium fines ventum est, uterque populabundus effuso agmine incedit. Explorant tamen 6 latius quam populantur; igitur non fefellere ad Tifernum hostes in occulta valle instructi, quam ingressos Romanos superiore ex loco adoriri para-

[1] cupiditati ζ: cupiditatis Ω.
[2] concilia D^3: concilii Ω: aoncilii M: concilium U.
[3] haberi Ω: habiti Conway (reading concilii above with the MSS.).

---

[1] The elder Decius had devoted himself in 340 B.C. The son had been consul with Fabius in 308 B.C. (VIII. ix. and xli).

with me Publius Decius, a man whose friendliness B.C. 298
I have experienced in the fellowship of office, a man worthy of you and worthy of his sire."[1] The recommendation seemed a reasonable one. All the remaining centuries voted for Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius.

In that year many men were prosecuted by the aediles on the charge of possessing more land than the law allowed. Hardly anybody was acquitted, and exorbitant greed was sharply curbed.

XIV. While the new consuls, Quintus Fabius B.C. 297
Maximus (in his fourth term) and Publius Decius Mus (in his third), were laying plans together how one should take the field against the Samnites, and the other against the Etruscans, and were considering what forces would suffice for these respective provinces and which of them was the better suited to the one command and which to the other, there came deputies from Sutrium and Nepete and Falerii, with the news that the nations of Etruria were counselling together how they might sue for peace, and thus diverted upon Samnium the whole burden of war. When the consuls set out, in order to lessen the difficulty of getting supplies and to keep the enemy uncertain where the attack would come, Fabius marched into Samnium by way of Sora, Decius through the territory of the Sidicini.

Arrived at the borders of the enemy, each spread his army over a wide front and pillaged. Yet they scouted more widely than they pillaged, and the enemy were therefore unable to surprise them near Tifernum, where they had drawn their forces up in a secluded valley, and were preparing to assail the Romans from above, once they should have

A.U.C. 457

7 bant. Fabius impedimentis in locum tutum remotis praesidioque modico imposito praemonitis militibus adesse certamen, quadrato agmine ad praedictas 8 hostium latebras succedit. Samnites desperato improviso tumultu, quando in apertum semel discrimen evasura esset res, et ipsi acie iusta maluerunt concurrere. Itaque in aequum descendunt ac fortunae 9 se maiore animo quam spe committunt. Ceterum, sive quia ex omnium Samnitium populis, quodcumque roboris fuerat contraxerant, seu quia discrimen summae rerum augebat[1] animos, aliquantum aperta quoque[2] pugna praebuerunt terroris.

10 Fabius, ubi nulla ex parte hostem loco moveri vidit, Maximum filium et M. Valerium tribunos militum, cum quibus ad primam aciem procurrerat, 11 ire ad equites iubet et adhortari ut, si quando unquam equestri ope adiutam rem publicam meminerint, illo die adnitantur ut ordinis eius gloriam invictam 12 praestent: peditum certamine immobilem hostem restare; omnem reliquam spem in impetu esse equitum. Et ipsos nominatim iuvenes, pari comitate utrumque, nunc laudibus nunc promissis onerat. 13 Ceterum quando ne ea quoque temptata vis parum proficeret timeri poterat, consilio[3] grassandum, si

[1] augebat ζ: agebat TDL: angebat MO: ăgebat A.

[2] aliquantum aperta quoque ζ: aliquantum quoque aperta MOTDLA.

[3] ceterum . . . consilio Madvig: ceterum quando ne (nec OL) ea quoque temptata vis proficeret consilio Ω.

entered it. Removing the baggage to a place of B.C. 297 safety and appointing a small force to guard it, Fabius warned his troops that a struggle was at hand, and forming them into a hollow square, led them up towards the place where the enemy lay, as I have said, concealed. Balked of their surprise attack, the Samnites—since it must ultimately come to an open trial of strength—likewise preferred to fight a regular engagement. They accordingly descended to level ground, and committed their cause to Fortune, with courage greater than their hopes. However, whether owing to their having assembled the fighting strength of all the Samnite nations, or because a contest on which everything was staked heightened their valour, they occasioned some perturbation amongst the Romans, even in an open battle.

When Fabius saw that the enemy were nowhere giving way, he ordered Maximus his son[1] and Marcus Valerius—military tribunes with whom he had hurried to the front—to go to the horsemen and tell them that if they remembered ever an occasion when the state had been helped by the horse, now was the time for them to exert their strength to preserve untarnished the glory of that body: in the struggle of infantry the enemy were yielding not an inch; no hope remained save in a charge of cavalry. Addressing each of the young men by name, he loaded them now with praise and now with promises. But since it was conceivable that even their prowess might prove to be inadequate, he thought proper to resort to strategy, if strength

[1] Quintus Fabius Maximus Gurges, aedile two years later (chap. xxxi. § 9) and consul 293 B.C. (chap. xlvii. § 5).

a.u.c. 457

14 nihil vires iuvarent ratus, Scipionem legatum hastatos primae legionis subtrahere ex acie et ad montes proximos quam posset occultissime circumducere iubet; inde ascensu abdito a conspectu erigere in montes agmen aversoque hosti ab tergo repente se ostendere.

15 Equites ducibus tribunis haud multo plus hostibus quam suis ex improviso ante signa evecti praebuerunt 16 tumultus. Adversus incitatas turmas stetit immota Samnitium acies nec parte ulla pelli aut perrumpi potuit; et postquam inritum inceptum erat, recepti 17 post signa proelio excesserunt. Crevit ex eo hostium animus, nec sustinere frons prima tam longum certamen increscentemque fiducia sui vim potuisset, ni secunda acies iussu consulis in primum succes- 18 sisset. Ibi integrae vires sistunt invehentem se iam Samnitem: et tempore in ipso visa[1] ex montibus signa clamorque sublatus non vero tantum metu 19 terruere Samnitium animos: nam et Fabius Decium collegam adpropinquare exclamavit, et pro se quisque miles adesse alterum consulem, adesse legiones 20 gaudio alacres fremunt; errorque[2] utilis Romanis oblatus fugae formidinisque Samnites implevit, maxime[3] territos ne ab altero exercitu integro 21 intactoque fessi opprimerentur. Et quia passim in

[1] et tempore in ipso visa Drakenborch: et tempore inprovisa MOTDLA: et tempore in se uisa PF: eo tempore uisa U: et tempore ipso visa I. Perizonius: et tempore inferri uisa Conrad.

[2] errorque ζ Modius: terrorque Ω.

[3] maxime ζ: maximeq. Ω.

[1] These "spearmen" formed the first of the three lines of battle, but would ordinarily after being engaged a little while be reinforced or replaced as here) by the principes (second line troops).

should not achieve his purpose. So he ordered B.C. 297
Scipio, his lieutenant, to withdraw the hastati[1] of the first legion from the battle and conduct them, as secretly as possible, by a circuitous route to the nearest mountains; they were then, concealing their ascent from observation, to climb the heights and suddenly show themselves on the enemy's rear.

The cavalry, led by the tribunes, occasioned hardly more confusion in their enemies than in their friends, as they rode out unexpectedly in front of the standards. The Samnite line held firm against their galloping squadrons, and could at no point be forced back or broken, and the cavalry, finding their attack abortive, retired behind the lines and left the battle. This gave the enemy a fresh access of spirits; and the front ranks would have been incapable of sustaining so long a struggle and the increasing violence with which the enemy's confidence inspired him, had not the second line, by the consul's order, come up to relieve them. Their fresh strength halted the Samnites, who were now pressing forward; and catching sight just at this juncture of our detachments descending from the mountains, and hearing the cheer they gave, the enemy was filled with terror of worse things than actually threatened him; for Fabius shouted that his colleague Decius was approaching, and the soldiers themselves in their joy and eagerness cried out that the other consul was at hand—that the legions were at hand; and this mistake, occurring in a good hour for the Romans, filled the Samnites with fear and bewilderment, for they dreaded nothing so much as that the other army, fresh and entire, might overwhelm them in their exhausted

A.U.C. 457 fugam dissipati sunt, minor caedes quam pro tanta victoria fuit: tria milia et quadringenti caesi, capti octingenti ferme et triginta, signa militaria capta tria et viginti.

A.U.C. 458 XV. Samnitibus Apuli se ante proelium coniunxissent, ni P. Decius consul iis ad Maleventum castra obiecisset, extractos deinde ad certamen fudisset. 2 Ibi quoque plus fugae fuit quam caedis: duo milia Apulorum caesa; spretoque eo hoste Decius in Sam- 3 nium legiones duxit. Ibi duo consulares exercitus diversis vagati partibus omnia spatio quinque men- 4 sum evastarunt. Quinque et quadraginta[1] loca in Samnio fuere in quibus Deci castra fuerunt, alterius 5 consulis sex et octoginta; nec valli tantum ac fossarum vestigia relicta, sed multo alia illis[2] insigniora monumenta vastitatis circa regionumque depopula- 6 tarum. Fabius etiam urbem Cimetram cepit. Ibi capta armatorum duo milia nongenti, caesi pugnantes ferme nongenti triginta.

7 Inde comitiorum causa Romam profectus maturavit eam rem agere. Cum primo vocatae[3] Q. Fabium consulem dicerent omnes centuriae, Ap. 8 Claudius, consularis candidatus, vir acer et ambitiosus, non sui magis honoris causa quam ut patricii reciperarent duo consularia loca, cum suis tum totius nobilitatis viribus incubuit ut se cum Q. Fabio con-

[1] quinque et quadraginta Walters and Conway: xl et v (or at length) MPFUO: et xl et xv (or at length) TDLA.
[2] alia illis Walters and Conway: aliis Ω : illis ϛ.
[3] vocatae ϛ: uocatum Ω.

[1] Later Beneventum. See IX. xxvii. 14 and note.

state. The slaughter was less than is usual in so great a victory, for the enemy scattered far and wide in their flight. Three thousand four hundred were slain; about eight hundred and thirty were made prisoners, and twenty-three standards were taken. B.C. 297

XV. The Apulians would have joined the Samnites before the battle had not Publius Decius the consul encamped over against them at Maleventum,[1] and then drawn them into an engagement and defeated them. In this instance also the rout was greater than the slaughter: two thousand Apulians were killed, and Decius, scorning such an enemy, led his legions into Samnium. There the two consular armies, overrunning the land in different directions, had laid all waste within four months' time. There were forty-five places in Samnium where Decius had encamped; the other consul had encamped in eighty-six. Nor did they leave behind them only the traces of their ramparts and their trenches, but other much more conspicuous memorials, in the havoc and devastation of the country round about. Fabius also captured the city of Cimetra. In this siege two thousand nine hundred men-at-arms were taken and some nine hundred and thirty were slain fighting. B.C. 296

After this he set out for Rome for the election, which he made haste to call. The centuries that voted first were all naming Quintus Fabius for consul, when Appius Claudius, who was a candidate for that post and a pushing and ambitious man, but no more eager to gain the honour for himself than to have the patricians recover two consular places, exerted his own strength and that of the whole nobility to induce them to elect him as Fabius's

A.U.C. 458

9 sulem dicerent. Fabius de se[1] eadem fere quae priore anno dicendo abnuere. Circumstare sellam omnis nobilitas; orare ut ex caeno plebeio consulatum extraheret maiestatemque pristinam cum
10 honori tum patriciis gentibus redderet. Fabius silentio facto media oratione studia hominum sedavit; facturum enim se fuisse dixit ut duorum patriciorum nomina reciperet, si alium quam se con-
11 sulem fieri videret; nunc se suam rationem comitiis, cum contra leges futurum sit, pessimo exemplo non 12 habiturum. Ita L. Volumnius de plebe cum Ap. Claudio consul est factus, priore item consulatu inter se comparati. Nobilitas obiectare Fabio fugisse eum Ap. Claudium collegam, eloquentia civilibusque artibus haud dubie praestantem.

XVI. Comitiis perfectis veteres consules iussi bellum in Samnio gerere prorogato in sex menses
2 imperio. Itaque insequenti quoque anno L. Volumnio Ap. Claudio consulibus P. Decius, qui consul in Samnio relictus a collega fuerat, proconsul idem populari non destitit agros, donec Samnitium exercitum nusquam se proelio committentem postremo 3 expulit finibus.

Etruriam pulsi petierunt, et quod legationibus nequiquam saepe temptaverant, id se tanto agmine

[1] de se Walters note : primo de se Ω : de se primo F.

[1] 307 B.C. (IX. xlii. 2).

colleague. Fabius would not have it so, raising B.C. 296 virtually the same objections he had raised in the previous year. The nobles all thronged about his seat, and besought him to lift up the consulship out of the plebeian mire and restore both to the office and to the aristocratic families their old-time dignity. Obtaining silence, Fabius soothed their excited feelings with a temperate speech, in which he said that he would have done as they desired and have received the names of two patricians, if he had seen another than himself being made consul; as it was, he would not entertain his own name at an election, for to do so would violate the laws and establish a most evil precedent. So Lucius Volumnius, a plebeian, was returned, together with Appius Claudius, with whom he had also been paired in an earlier consulship.[1] The nobles taunted Fabius with having avoided Appius Claudius for a colleague, as a man clearly his superior in eloquence and statecraft.

XVI. The election over, the old consuls were bidden to carry on the war in Samnium, having received an extension of their command for six months. So in the following year likewise—the consulship of Lucius Volumnius and Appius Claudius—Publius Decius, who had been left behind in Samnium, when consul, by his colleague, ceased not as proconsul to lay waste the farms, until finally he forced the army of the Samnites—which would nowhere risk a battle—to withdraw from the country.

They retreated into Etruria, and thinking that what they had often tried in vain to bring about by means of embassies they might with so great armatorum mixtis terrore precibus acturos efficacius rati, postulaverunt principum Etruriae con-

A.U.C. 458

4 cilium. Quo coacto per quot annos pro libertate dimicent cum Romanis exponunt: omnia expertos esse si suismet ipsorum viribus tolerare tantam
5 molem belli possent; temptasse etiam haud magni momenti finitimarum gentium auxilia. Petisse pacem a populo Romano, cum bellum tolerare non possent; rebellasse, quod pax servientibus gravior
6 quam liberis bellum esset. Unam sibi spem reliquam in Etruscis restare; scire gentem Italiae oppulentissimam armis, viris, pecunia esse; habere accolas Gallos, inter ferrum et arma natos, feroces cum suopte ingenio tum adversus Romanum populum, quem captum a se auroque redemptum, haud vana
7 iactantes, memorent; nihil abesse, si sit animus Etruscis qui Porsinnae quondam maioribusque eorum fuerit, quin Romanos omni agro cis Tiberim pulsos dimicare pro salute sua non de intolerando Italiae
8 regno cogant. Samnitem illis exercitum paratum, instructum armis, stipendio venisse, et confestim secuturos, vel si ad ipsam Romanam urbem oppugnandam ducant.

XVII. Haec eos in Etruria iactantes molientesque bellum domi Romanum urebat. Nam P. Decius, ubi

[1] See II. IX.–XV.

a body of armed men and the menace which would be added to their entreaties accomplish more effectually, called for a council of the Etruscan leaders. On its assembling, they pointed out for how many years they had been fighting with the Romans for their liberty. They had made every effort, they said, if haply they might of their own strength bear up under so great a war; and had also—but to little purpose—made trial of the help of neighbouring nations. Unable to sustain the war, they had sought peace of the Roman People; but had renewed hostilities, because peace with servitude was harder to endure than war with liberty. Their sole remaining hope lay in the Etruscans, whom they knew for the richest nation of Italy, in arms, in men, and in money; a nation, too, that marched with the Gauls, men born amid the clash of arms and possessing not only an instinctive love of fighting but a feeling of enmity to the Roman People, whose defeat at their hands and ransom for gold they were wont to relate with no idle boast. If the Etruscans had the spirit that once had animated Porsinna[1] and their forefathers, there was no reason why they should not expel the Romans from all the country north of the Tiber, and compel them to fight, not for an intolerable sovereignty over Italy, but for their own existence. Here was a Samnite army, provided with arms and pay, and ready to follow on the instant, though they should lead it to the assault of Rome itself. B.C. 296

XVII. While they were thus boasting and intriguing in Etruria, the Roman invasion was distressing their countrymen at home. For Publius Decius, having

A.U.C. 458

comperit per exploratores profectum Samnitium
2 exercitum, advocato consilio "Quid per agros" inquit "vagamur vicatim circumferentes bellum? Quin urbes et moenia adgredimur? Nullus iam exercitus Samnio
3 praesidet; cessere finibus ac sibimet ipsi exsilium consciverе." Adprobantibus cunctis ad Murgantiam, validam urbem, oppugnandam ducit, tantusque ardor militum fuit et caritate ducis et spe maioris quam ex agrestibus populationibus praedae ut uno die vi atque
4 armis urbem caperent. Ibi duo milia Samnitium et centum pugnantes circumventi captique, et alia praeda ingens capta est. Quae ne impedimentis gravibus agmen oneraret, convocari milites Decius
5 iubet. "Hacine" inquit "victoria sola aut hac praeda contenti estis futuri? Voltis vos pro virtute spes gerere? Omnes Samnitium urbes fortunaeque in urbibus relictae vestrae sunt, quando legiones eorum tot proeliis fusas postremo finibus expulistis.
6 Vendite ista et inlicite lucro mercatorem ut sequatur agmen; ego subinde suggeram quae vendatis. Ad Romuleam urbem hinc eamus, ubi vos labor haud maior, praeda maior manet."

7 Divendita praeda ultro adhortantes imperatorem ad Romuleam pergunt. Ibi quoque sine opere, sine tormentis, simul admota sunt signa, nulla vi deterriti ascertained through scouts that the Samnite army B.C. 296 had departed, summoned a council, and said, "Why do we range about the countryside, bringing war to this, that, and the other village? Why do we not assail cities and walled towns? There is no longer any army defending Samnium; they have withdrawn beyond their borders, sentenced to banishment by their own decree." With their unanimous approval he led them to the assault of Murgantia, a strong city; and such was the ardour of the troops, by reason both of affection for their general and the hopes that they entertained of greater booty than was to be got by ranging the country, that they took the place by force of arms in a single day. There two thousand one hundred Samnites were surrounded and made prisoners as they fought, and vast spoils of other kinds were seized. Lest these should encumber the marching army with heavy baggage, Decius called the soldiers together and thus addressed them: "Will this single victory or these spoils content you? Will your expectations not be equal to your courage? All the cities of the Samnites and the riches left behind in them are yours, since, after defeating their legions in so many battles, you have in the end expelled them from their country. Sell these prizes and with hope of gain lure the traders on to follow your column; I will find you from time to time wares to dispose of. Let us go from here to the city Romulea, where no greater toil awaits you, but greater booty."

The booty was sold off, and the men themselves urging on their general, they marched to Romulea. There, too, they used no siege-works or artillery; but once they had come up under the walls, no force

A.U.C. 458

a muris, qua cuique proximum fuit, scalis raptim 8 admotis in moenia evasere. Captum oppidum ac direptum est; ad duo milia et trecenti occisi et sex 9 milia hominum capta, et miles ingenti praeda potitus, quam vendere, sicut priorem, coactus; Ferentinum inde, quamquam nihil quietis dabatur, tamen summa 10 alacritate ductus est.[1] Ceterum ibi plus laboris ac periculi fuit: et defensa summa vi moenia sunt, et locus erat munimento naturaque tutus; sed evicit omnia adsuetus praedae miles. Ad tria milia hostium circa muros caesa; praeda militis fuit.

11 Huius oppugnatarum urbium decoris pars maior in quibusdam annalibus ad Maximum trahitur: Murgantiam ab Decio, a Fabio Ferentinum Romu-12 leamque oppugnatas tradunt. Sunt qui novorum consulum hanc gloriam faciant, quidam non am-borum sed alterius, L.[2] Volumni: ei Samnium provinciam evenisse.

XVIII. Cum[3] ea in Samnio cuiuscumque ductu auspicioque gererentur, Romanis in Etruria interim bellum ingens multis ex gentibus concitur, cuius
2 auctor Gellius Egnatius ex Samnitibus erat. Tusci fere omnes conciverant bellum; traxerat contagio proximos Umbriae populos, et Gallica auxilia mercede sollicitabantur; omnis ea multitudo ad castra Sam-
3 nitium conveniebat. Qui tumultus repens postquam

[1] ductus est Madvig: ductus Ω.
[2] L. Sigonius (cf. § 3 and Chap. xvi. § 2, and C.I.L. i², p. 132): p̄. Ω (wanting in O).
[3] cum Gronovius: dum Ω (wanting in O).

could constrain them to retire; quickly setting up their ladders at the nearest places, they swarmed over the battlements. The town was captured and sacked; two thousand three hundred were slain and six thousand made prisoners, and the soldiers came into possession of huge spoils which they were obliged, as before, to sell. After that they marched with the utmost alacrity—though they had been allowed no time to rest—to Ferentinum. But there they encountered more difficulty and danger: the city was defended with the utmost energy, and fortification and nature had combined to make it safe; yet all obstacles were overcome by a soldiery grown used to plunder. Some three thousand of the enemy were slain about the walls; the spoils went to the men. B.C. 296

Of the glory accruing from these sieges the larger share is in certain annals assigned to Maximus; they allow that Murgantia was stormed by Decius, but give to Fabius Ferentinum and Romulea. There are those who claim the credit for the new consuls, and some give it not to both but to one of them, Lucius Volumnius, to whom, they say, fell the command in Samnium.

XVIII. Whilst these operations were being carried out in Samnium—whoever had the command and auspices—a mighty war was preparing against the Romans in Etruria, on the part of many nations, at the instigation of a Samnite named Gellius Egnatius. The Tuscans had almost all voted for war: the nearest Umbrian tribes had caught the contagion; and Gallic auxiliaries were being solicited for pay. All this multitude was assembling at the camp of the Samnites. When news of this sudden rising est Romam perlatus, cum iam L. Volumnius consul cum legione secunda ac tertia sociorumque milibus quindecim profectus in Samnium esset, Ap. Claudium primo quoque tempore in Etruriam ire placuit. 4 Duae Romanae legiones secutae, prima et quarta, et sociorum duodecim milia; castra haud procul ab hoste posita.

A.U.C. 458

5 Ceterum magis eo profectum est quod mature ventum erat ut quosdam spectantes iam arma Etruriae populos metus Romani nominis comprimeret quam quod ductu consulis quicquam ibi satis scite aut 6 fortunate gestum sit: multa proelia locis et temporibus iniquis commissa, spesque in dies graviorem hostem faciebat, et iam prope erat ut nec duci 7 milites nec militibus dux satis fideret. Litteras ad collegam accersendum ex Samnio missas in trinis annalibus invenio; piget tamen in certo[1] ponere, cum ea ipsa inter consules populi Romani, iam iterum eodem honore fungentes, disceptatio[2] fuerit, Appio abnuente missas, Volumnio adfirmante Appi se litteris accitum.

8 Iam Volumnius in Samnio tria castella ceperat, in quibus ad tria milia hostium caesa erant, dimidium fere eius captum, et Lucanorum seditiones a plebeiis et egentibus ducibus ortas summa optimatium voluntate per Q. Fabium, pro consule missum eo cum 9 vetere exercitu, compresserat. Decio populandos hos-

[1] in certo Walters: incertum Ω: id certum Buettner.
[2] disceptatio M^1 or M^2: discepatio M: discrepatio M^1 (or M^2) PFUOTDLA.

[1] This is the first time that Livy has designated the legions by number. A consular army regularly comprised two legions (with their cavalry and auxiliaries), but in the present instance the consular armies of the previous year are still in the field.

was brought to Rome, Lucius Volumnius the consul, B.C. 296 with the second and third legions and fifteen thousand of the allies, had already set out for Samnium, and it was resolved to send Appius Claudius into Etruria at the earliest possible moment. Two Roman legions followed him, the first and fourth, and twelve thousand of the allies. They encamped not far from the enemy.[1]

But the consul's prompt arrival accomplished more, by checking, through dread of the Roman name, certain peoples of Etruria that were already meditating war, than he gained by his generalship, which was characterized neither by much ability nor by good fortune. He repeatedly joined battle at untoward times and places, and the enemy grew every day more hopeful and more formidable, until now the soldiers were near losing confidence in their commander and he in them. I find it recorded by three annalists that he dispatched a letter sending for his colleague out of Samnium; yet am I loath to set it down for certain, since the consuls of the Roman People, now holding that office for the second time, disputed about that very point—Appius denying that he had sent a letter, Volumnius affirming that a letter from Appius had summoned him.

Volumnius had already captured three fortresses in Samnium, in which some three thousand of the enemy had been slain and about half as many taken prisoners; and dispatching Quintus Fabius as proconsul with a seasoned army into Lucania, he had suppressed—with the hearty approval of the optimates—certain insurrections which had broken out there at the instigation of necessitous plebeian agitators. Leaving to Decius the devastation of tium agros relinquit, ipse cum suis copiis in Etruriam ad collegam pergit. Quem advenientem laeti omnes 10 accepere. Appium ex conscientia sua credo animum habuisse—haud immerito iratum si nihil scripserat, inliberali et ingrato animo, si eguerat ope, dissimu-

A.U.C 458

11 lantem,—vix enim salute mutua reddita cum obviam egressus esset, "Satin salvae"[1] inquit, "L. Volumni? Ut sese in Samnio res habent? Quae te causa, ut 12 provincia tua excederes induxit?" Volumnius in Samnio res prosperas esse ait, litteris eius accitum venisse; quae si falsae fuerint nec usus sui sit in 13 Etruriam, extemplo conversis signis abiturum. "Tu vero abeas" inquit, "neque te quisquam moratur; etenim minime consentaneum est, cum bello tuo forsitan vix sufficias, huc[2] te ad opem ferendam aliis 14 gloriari venisse." Bene Hercules verteret, dicere Volumnius: malle frustra operam insumptam, quam quicquam incidisse cur non satis esset Etruriae unus consularis exercitus.

XIX. Digredientes iam consules legati tribunique ex Appiano exercitu circumsistunt. Pars imperatorem suum orare, ne collegae auxilium, quod accien-
2 dum ultro fuerit, sua sponte oblatum sperneretur; plures abeunti Volumnio obsistere; obtestari ne pravo cum collega certamine rem publicam prodat:

[1] salvae ζ: salue Ω (wanting in O).
[2] huc A^3 (or A^4) ζ: hic Ω (wanting in O).

the fields, Volumnius himself with his own troops B.C. 296 marched to join his colleague in Etruria, where he was welcomed on his arrival with general rejoicings. But what Appius was feeling his conscience alone could tell!—indeed he was justly angered if he had sent no word, but illiberal and ungracious if he had needed help and now sought to dissemble —for coming forth to meet his colleague, before they had fairly greeted one another, he demanded, "Is all well, Lucius Volumnius? How stand affairs in Samnium? What has moved you to come out of your own province?" Volumnius replied that affairs were prospering in Samnium, and that he was come being sent for by Appius' own letter; but if this were a forgery and he were not needed in Etruria, he would immediately face about and march back. "By all means go!" cried Appius. "No one hinders you! For truly it is no way fitting that when, perhaps, you are hardly equal to your own war, you should boast of coming hither to help others." Volumnius prayed that Hercules might direct all for the best; he had rather, he said, his trouble should go for naught than that anything should have befallen to make one consular army insufficient for Etruria.

XIX. The consuls were parting, when the lieutenants and tribunes from the army of Appius gathered round them. Some of them besought their general not to spurn his colleague's help—which ought even to have been asked for—now that it was proffered voluntarily; the greater number threw themselves in the way of Volumnius, as he turned to go, and conjured him not to betray the welfare of the state by an unworthy quarrel with his colleague: if any si qua clades incidisset, desertori magis quam deserto noxae fore: eo rem adductam ut omne[1] rei bene aut secus gestae in Etruria decus dedecusque ad L. Volumnium sit delegatum; neminem quaesiturum quae verba Appi sed quae fortuna exercitus fuerit; dimitti ab Appio eum sed a re publica et ab exercitu retineri: experiretur modo voluntatem militum.

A.U.C. 458

Haec monendo obtestandoque prope restitantes consules in contionem pertraxerunt. Ibi orationes longiores habitae in eandem ferme sententiam in quam inter paucos certatum verbis fuerat. Et cum Volumnius, causa superior, ne infacundus quidem adversus eximiam eloquentiam collegae visus esset, cavillansque Appius sibi acceptum referre diceret debere, quod ex muto atque elingui facundum etiam consulem haberent: priore consulatu, primis utique mensibus, hiscere eum nequisse, nunc iam populares orationes serere, "Quam mallem" inquit Volumnius, "tu a me strenue facere quam ego abs te scite loqui didicissem." Postremo condicionem ferre quae decretura sit non orator—neque enim id desiderare rem publicam—sed imperator uter sit melior. Etruriam et Samnium provincias esse: utram mallet eligeret; suo exercitu se vel in Etruria vel in Samnio rem gesturum.

Tum militum clamor ortus ut simul ambo bellum

[1] omne γ Muretus: omni Ω: omnis TDLA.

[1] In their former consulship (307 B.C.) Volumnius had conducted a successful campaign against the Sallentini, while Appius had been left in Rome without any military command. See IX. xlii. 4–5.

disaster should occur, the blame would lie more B.C. 293 with the deserter than the deserted; to such a pass had matters come that the entire credit or disgrace of success or failure in Etruria was referred to Lucius Volumnius; no one would enquire what the words of Appius had been, but what the fortune of the army; he was being dismissed by Appius, but retained by the republic and the army; let him but test the wishes of the soldiers.

Thus admonishing and entreating them they dragged the all but resisting consuls to the place of assembly. There they spoke at greater length, but substantially to the same effect as they had argued before in the hearing of a few; and when Volumnius, besides having the better cause, likewise showed himself to be no mean orator in opposing the rare eloquence of his colleague, Appius jeeringly remarked that they ought to give himself the credit, for that instead of a mute and tongue-tied consul they had got one who was actually fluent, since in his former consulship, at all events in its early months, he had been incapable of opening his mouth, but was now delivering popular orations. — "How I could wish," exclaimed Volumnius, "that you might rather have learnt from me to act with vigour than that I should have learnt to speak cleverly from you!" In conclusion he proposed a compact which would determine, not which was the better orator—for this was not what the republic wanted—but the better general.[1] Etruria and Samnium were the nations to be conquered; let Appius choose which he liked; with his own army he would campaign either in Etruria or in Samnium.

Then the soldiers began to cry out that both

A.U.C. 458

11 Etruscum susciperent. Quo animadverso consensu Volumnius "Quoniam in collegae voluntate interpretanda" inquit "erravi, non committam ut quid vos velitis obscurum sit: manere an abire me velitis
12 clamore significate." Tum vero tantus est clamor exortus ut hostes e castris exciret. Armis arreptis in aciem[1] descendunt. Et Volumnius signa canere ac vexilla efferri castris iussit; Appium addubitasse
13 ferunt, cernentem seu pugnante seu quieto se fore collegae victoriam; deinde veritum ne suae quoque legiones Volumnium sequerentur, et ipsum flagitantibus suis signum dedisse.
14 Ab neutra parte satis commode instructi fuerunt; nam et Samnitium dux Gellius Egnatius pabulatum cum cohortibus paucis ierat suoque impetu magis milites quam cuiusquam ductu aut imperio pugnam capessebant et Romani exercitus nec pariter ambo
15 ducti nec satis temporis ad instruendum fuit. Prius concurrit Volumnius quam Appius ad hostem per-
16 veniret; itaque fronte inaequali concursum est; et velut sorte[2] quadam mutante adsuetos inter se hostes Etrusci Volumnio, Samnites parumper cunctati, 17 quia dux aberat, Appio occurrere. Dicitur Appius in medio pugnae discrimine, ita ut inter prima signa manibus ad caelum sublatis conspiceretur, ita precatus

[1] in aciem T^2A^2: in acie Ω (wanting in O).
[2] et velut sorte = Duker (VI. xxi. 2): et velut forte MTDLA: et ut forte PFV: ut et forte U.

---

[1] i.e. from the higher ground on which their camp lay, into the plain below.
[2] The ancients prayed with the arms outstretched and palms turned upwards.

should undertake the Etruscan war together. Perceiving them to be of one mind in this, Volumnius said, "Since I erred in interpreting my colleague's wishes, I will not make the blunder of leaving yours in doubt: do you signify by a shout whether you would have me stay or go." Then in truth they cheered so loud that the enemy were drawn out from their camp, and snatching up their arms went down[1] into line of battle. Volumnius, too, bade sound the signal and advance the banners from the camp. Appius, they say, was uncertain what to do, perceiving that, whether he fought or refrained from fighting, the victory would be his colleague's; then, fearing that even his own legions would follow Volumnius, he, too, gave his men the signal for which they were clamouring. B.C. 296

On neither side had the forces been very advantageously marshalled; for the Samnite commander Gellius Egnatius had taken a few cohorts and gone off to forage, and his soldiers were entering the battle more as their own impulse guided them than under anybody's leadership or orders, and the Roman armies were not both led out together nor had they sufficient time to form. Volumnius was engaged before Appius came within reach of the enemy, and the line of attack was accordingly uneven. Moreover, as though lots had been cast, there was a shifting of the customary opponents, the Etruscans confronting Volumnius, and the Samnites—after a little hesitation, owing to the absence of their general—meeting Appius. It is said that when the conflict was at its hottest, Appius was seen to lift up his hands[2] in the very forefront of the standards and utter this petition: "Bellona, esse: "Bellona, si hodie hobis victoriam duis, ast 18 ego tibi templum voveo." Haec precatus, velut instigante dea, et ipse collegae et exercitus virtutem aequavit ducis. Iam et duces imperatoria[1] opera exsequuntur, et milites ne ab altera parte prius

A.U.C. 458

19 victoria incipiat adnituntur. Ergo fundunt fugantque hostes, maiorem molem haud facile sustinentes quam
20 cum qua manus conserere adsueti fuerant. Urgendo cedentes insequendoque effusos compulere ad castra. Ibi interventu Gelli cohortiumque Sabellarum paulisper recruduit pugna. Iis quoque mox fusis iam a 21 victoribus castra oppugnabantur; et cum Volumnius ipse portae signa inferret, Appius Bellonam victricem identidem celebrans accenderet[2] militum animos, 22 per vallum, per fossas inruperunt. Castra capta direptaque; praeda ingens parta et militi concessa est. Septem milia octingenti[3] hostium occisi, duo milia et centum viginti capti.

XX. Dum ambo consules omnisque Romana vis in Etruscum bellum magis inclinat, in Samnio novi exercitus exorti ad populandos imperii Romani fines per Vescinos[4] in Campaniam Falernumque agrum
2 transcendunt ingentesque praedas faciunt. Volumnium magnis itineribus in Samnium redeuntem—iam enim Fabio Decioque prorogati imperii finis

[1] Iam et duces imperatoria Walters and Conway (note): et duces imperatoria Weissenborn: imperatoria Ω.
[2] accenderet ζ: accenderant MPTDLA: accenderat Ω.
[3] octingenti edd.: accc PFUOTDLA: accce MA^2.
[4] Vescinos Sigonius (Conway, Ital. Dial. i, p. 283): uestinos Ω.

if to-day thou grant us the victory, then do I vow B.C. 296 thee a temple." Having pronounced this prayer, as though the goddess were inspiring him, he kept pace with the courage of his colleague and the army kept pace with his. And now the generals were quitting themselves like true commanders, and the soldiers were striving that victory might not come first on the other wing. They therefore routed and put to flight the enemy, who found it no easy task to withstand a greater force than they had been wont to engage with. Pressing hard upon them when they faltered and pursuing where they fled, the Romans drove them to their camp. There, on the appearance of Gellius and the Sabellian cohorts, the battle was renewed for a little while; but presently, when these too had been dispersed, the conquering troops assailed the camp, and while Volumnius himself led a charge against the gate, and Appius, calling from time to time on Bellona, goddess of victory, inspirited his soldiers, they burst through the trenches and the rampart. The camp was taken and pillaged, and the vast booty found there was given over to the soldiers. Seven thousand eight hundred of the enemy were slain, two thousand one hundred and twenty taken prisoners.

XX. While both consuls and all the strength of Rome were being devoted mainly to the Etruscan war, new armies rose up in Samnium to waste the territories under Roman sway, and crossing over into Campania and the Falernian district, through the land of the Vescini, gathered in huge spoils. As Volumnius was returning by long marches into Samnium—for now the extension of authority granted to Fabius and Decius was drawing to a aderat—fama de Samnitium exercitu populationibusque Campani agri ad tuendos socios convertit. 3 Ut in Calenum venit, et ipse cernit recentia cladis vestigia et Caleni narrant tantum iam praedae hostes 4 trahere ut vix explicare agmen possint: itaque iam propalam duces loqui extemplo eundum in Samnium esse, ut relicta ibi praeda in expeditionem redeant nec tam oneratum agmen dimicationibus committant. 5 Ea quamquam similia veris erant, certius tamen exploranda ratus dimittit equites, qui vagos praedatores in agris palantes intercipiant;[1] ex quibus 6 inquirendo cognoscit ad Volturnum flumen sedere hostem, inde tertia vigilia moturum; iter in Samnium esse.

A.U.C. 458

7 His satis exploratis profectus tanto intervallo ab hostibus consedit ut nec adventus suus propinquitate nimia nosci posset et egredientem e castris hostem 8 opprimeret. Aliquanto ante lucem ad castra accessit gnarosque Oscae linguae exploratum quid agatur mittit. Intermixti hostibus, quod facile erat in nocturna trepidatione, cognoscunt infrequentia armatis signa egressa, praedam praedaeque custodes exire, immobile agmen et sua quemque molientem

[1] intercipiant M^3 (or M^1)A^2: incipiant M: excipiant Ω.

[1] Their command had been extended for six months (chap. xvi. § 1).

close [1]—a rumour about the Samnite army and its B.C. 296 depredations in the territory of Campania turned him aside to the defence of the allies. When he came to the Calenian country, he saw for himself the fresh traces of the enemy's ravages, and the Calenians informed him that the Samnites had already so great a train of booty as to march with difficulty, and their leaders were saying openly that they must retire at once into Samnium, and leaving their plunder there, return to the invasion, and not subject an army so heavily burdened to the risks of battle. These reports were plausible enough; nevertheless he thought it right to obtain more authentic information. He therefore sent out horsemen in various directions, to intercept straggling plunderers in the fields, from whom he learned, on questioning them, that their army was encamped at the Volturnus river, whence they would set forward in the third watch and march towards Samnium.

Being satisfied of the truth of these reports, he followed the enemy and encamped at such a distance from them that while they could not learn of his arrival from his being too close at hand, he yet might surprise them as they were leaving their camp. A little before dawn he approached the camp and sent ahead men who knew the Oscan language to find out what was being done. Mingling with their enemies, as they could easily do in the confusion of the dark, they learned that the standards had gone forward with a scanty following of men-at-arms, that the booty and its escort were just setting out, but that the column was incapable of progress, since every man was intent upon his nullo inter ullos[1] consensu nec satis certo imperio.

A.U.C. 458

9 Tempus adgrediendi aptissimum visum est, et iam lux adpetebat; itaque signa canere iussit agmenque
10 hostium adgreditur. Samnites praeda impediti, infrequentes armati, pars addere gradum ac prae se agere praedam, pars stare incerti utrum progredi an regredi in castra tutius foret: inter cunctationem opprimuntur et Romani iam transcenderant vallum
11 caedesque ac tumultus erat in castris. Samnitium agmen praeterquam hostili tumultu, captivorum etiam repentina defectione turbatum erat, qui partim
12 ipsi soluti vinctos solvebant, partim arma in sarcinis deligata rapiebant tumultumque proelio ipso terribiliorem intermixti agmini praebebant. Memo-
13 randum deinde edidere facinus; nam Staium Minatium ducem adeuntem ordines hortantemque invadunt; dissipatis inde equitibus qui cum eo aderant ipsum circumsistunt insidentemque equo
14 captum ad consulem Romanum rapiunt. Revocata eo tumultu prima signa Samnitium, proeliumque iam profligatum integratum est; nec diutius sustineri
15 potuit. Caesa ad sex milia hominum, duo milia et quingenti capti—in eis tribuni militum quattuor—signa militaria triginta, et quod laetissimum

[1] inter ullos Madvig: inter alios Ω: deleted as a gloss by Walters and Conway.

---

[1] The Samnites, not anticipating any fighting, had put up their arms in the bundles, which were tied to a pole that was carried on the shoulder.

own affairs, with no common understanding among any of them nor any very definite leadership. The time seemed highly suitable for delivering an attack, and the day was breaking. Volumnius therefore ordered them to sound the charge and assailed the enemy's column. The Samnites were impeded by their booty and few of them were armed; some quickened their pace and drove the cattle before them, some stood still, uncertain whether it were safer to go on or to return to camp; while they hesitated, the Romans were upon them, and now they had scaled the rampart and the camp was filled with carnage and commotion. The Samnite column, besides being charged by the enemy, had also been disordered by a sudden outbreak of the prisoners, some of whom, being loose, were releasing those who were bound, while others were catching up the weapons tied up in the soldiers' packs,[1] and, mixed up with the column as they were, caused a hurly-burly that was more terrifying than the battle itself. They presently performed a remarkable exploit; for as Staius Minatius, the Samnite general, was riding along the ranks and encouraging them, they made a rush at him, and scattering the horsemen who were with him, surrounded him, and hurried him off a prisoner, horse and all, to the Roman consul. This tumult had the effect of bringing back the vanguard of the Samnites, who renewed the battle, which had been almost finished. But prolonged resistance was impossible. The slain amounted to six thousand men, and twenty-five hundred were captured—among them four military tribunes—as well as thirty standards. What caused most joy among the victors was the recovery of B.C. 296

A.U.C. victoribus fuit, captivorum recepta septem milia et 458 quadringenti, et praeda [1] ingens sociorum; accitique edicto domini ad res suas noscendas recipiendasque 16 praestituta die. Quarum rerum non exstitit dominus, militi concessae, coactique vendere praedam, ne alibi quam in armis animum haberent.

XXI. Magnum ea populatio Campani agri tu-
2 multum Romae praebuerat; et per eos forte dies ex Etruria allatum erat post deductum inde Volumnianum exercitum Etruriam concitam in arma, et Gellium Egnatium, Samnitium ducem, et Umbros ad defectionem vocari et Gallos pretio ingenti solli-3 citari. His nuntiis senatus conterritus iustitium indici, dilectum omnis generis hominum haberi iussit.
4 Nec ingenui modo aut iuniores sacramento adacti sed seniorum etiam cohortes factae libertinique centuriati; et defendendae urbis consilia agitabantur summaeque rerum praetor P. Sempronius praeerat.
5 Ceterum parte curae exonerarunt senatum L. Volumni consulis litterae, quibus caesos fusosque
6 populatores Campaniae cognitum est. Itaque et supplicationes ob rem bene gestam consulis nomine decernunt et [2] iustitium remittitur quod fuerat dies duodeviginti; supplicatioque perlaeta fuit.

[1] et praeda Madvig: praeda Ω.
[2] decernunt et ς Madvig: decernunt Ω (-tur F^3).

seven thousand four hundred prisoners and a vast quantity of spoils belonging to the allies. The owners were summoned by proclamation to identify and recover their property on an appointed day. Those things for which no owner appeared were made over to the soldiers, and they were compelled to sell their booty, that they might have no concern in anything but fighting. B.C. 296

XXI. This raid upon the Campanian countryside had occasioned a great alarm in Rome; and just at that time, as it happened, there came news out of Etruria, that after the withdrawal of the army of Volumnius the Etruscans had been induced to arm, that Gellius Egnatius, the Samnite general, and the Umbrians were being invited to join in the revolt, and that the Gauls were being tempted with great sums of money. Terrified by these reports, the senate ordered that a cessation of the courts should be proclaimed, and that a levy should be held of every sort of men. Not only was the oath administered to free citizens of military age, but cohorts were also formed out of older men, and freedmen were mustered into centuries. Plans were discussed for defending the City, and the supreme command was given to the praetor, Publius Sempronius. But the senators were relieved of a part of their anxiety by a dispatch from Lucius Volumnius, the consul, apprising them of the slaughter and dispersion of the army that had ravaged Campania. They accordingly voted a thanksgiving for the victory, in the consul's name, and reopened the courts, which had been closed for eighteen days. The thanksgiving was a very joyful one.

A.U.C. 458

7 Tum de praesidio regionis depopulatae ab Samnitibus agitari coeptum; itaque placuit ut duae coloniae circa Vescinum[1] et Falernum agrum deducerentur,
8 una ad ostium Liris fluvii, quae Minturnae appellata, altera in saltu Vescino Falernum contingente agrum, ubi Sinope dicitur Graeca urbs fuisse, Sinuessa
9 deinde ab colonis Romanis appellata. Tribunis plebis negotium datum est, ut plebei scito iuberetur P. Sempronius praetor triumviros in ea loca colonis 10 deducendis creare. Nec qui nomina darent facile inveniebantur, quia in stationem se prope perpetuam infestae regionis, non in agros mitti rebantur.
11 Avertit ab eis curis senatum Etruriae ingravescens bellum et crebrae litterae Appi monentis ne regionis
12 eius motum neglegerent: quattuor gentes conferre arma, Etruscos Samnites Umbros Gallos; iam castra bifariam facta esse, quia unus locus capere tantam
13 multitudinem non possit. Ob haec et—iam[2] appetebat tempus—comitiorum causa L. Volumnius consul Romam revocatus; qui priusquam ad suffragium centurias vocaret, in contionem advocato populo
14 multa de magnitudine belli Etrusci disseruit: iam tum cum ipse ibi cum collega rem pariter gesserit, fuisse tantum bellum ut nec duce uno nec exercitu

[1] Vescinum (and in § 8, Vescino) as at chap. xx. § 1.
[2] et—iam Walters and Conway: et iam Ω: et nam Madvig: et iam enim Weissenborn.

[1] Perhaps situated between Mons Massicus and the sea on the heights of Mondragone.

They next considered how they might protect B.C. 296
the region devastated by the Samnites, and resolved to plant two colonies in the Vescinian and Falernian country, one, which was named Minturnae, at the mouth of the river Liris, the other in the Vescinian forest,[1] hard by the Falernian district, where the Greek city of Sinope is said to have stood, thereafter called Sinuessa by the Roman settlers. The tribunes of the plebs were assigned the task of obtaining a plebiscite directing Publius Sempronius the praetor to appoint three commissioners to conduct the colonists to these places; yet it was not easy to find men who would enroll, since they regarded themselves as sent, not to settle on the land, but to serve almost as a perpetual outpost in a hostile territory.

The senate's attention was diverted from these cares by the growing seriousness of the war in Etruria, and by a succession of dispatches from Appius, in which he warned them not to make light of the disturbance in that region. Four races, he said, were uniting their arms, the Etruscans, Samnites, Umbrians, and Gauls; and they had already divided their camp into two, one place not being able to hold so great a multitude. For these reasons and because of the elections—the time for which was rapidly approaching—the consul Lucius Volumnius was recalled to Rome. Before summoning the centuries to vote, he brought the people together in an assembly, and discoursed at length of the magnitude of the war in Etruria: even earlier, when he himself and his colleague had campaigned there together, the war had been so great that one general and one army could not have conducted it;

A.U.C. 458 geri potuerit; accessisse postea dici Umbros et 15 ingentem exercitum Gallorum; adversus quattuor populos duces consules illo die deligi meminissent.
Se, nisi confideret eum consensu populi Romani consulem declaratum iri qui haud dubie tum primus omnium ductor habeatur, dictatorem fuisse extemplo 16 dicturum.

A.U.C. 459 XXII. Nemini dubium erat quin Fabius quintum omnium consensu destinaretur; eumque et praero-gativae et primo vocatae omnes centuriae consulem 2 cum L. Volumnio dicebant. Fabi oratio fuit qualis biennio ante; deinde, ut vincebatur consensu, versa 3 postremo ad collegam P. Decium poscendum: id senectuti suae adminiculum fore. Censura duobusque consulatibus simul gestis expertum se nihil concordi collegio firmius ad rem publicam tuendam esse. Novo imperii socio vix iam adsuescere senilem 4 animum posse; cum moribus notis facilius se communicaturum consilia. Subscripsit orationi eius consul cum meritis P. Deci laudibus, tum quae ex concordia consulum bona quaeque ex discordia mala in administratione rerum militarium evenirent me-5 morando, quamque[1] prope ultimum discrimen suis et collegae certaminibus nuper ventum foret, admo-6 nendo; Decium Fabiumque uno animo, una mente[2]

[1] quamque Duker: quam Ω.
[2] uno . . . vivere Ussing: ut uno . . . uiuerent Ω: qui uno . . . viverent Harant.

[1] The praerogativae were the 18 centuries of knights; the others here referred to were the 80 centuries of the first class, cf. I. xliii. 11.

but it was said that the Umbrians had since then B.C. 296 been added to the enemy's forces, as well as a huge army of Gauls; they should remember that on that day they were choosing consuls to oppose four peoples; for his own part, were he not confident that the Roman People would unanimously choose for consul the man who was then looked upon as unquestionably the first of all commanders, he would at once have named him dictator.

XXII. No one doubted that Fabius would by the B.C. 295 common voice of all be for the fifth time elected; and in fact the prerogative centuries and all those which were summoned first [1] were naming him consul, together with Lucius Volumnius. Fabius then made a speech, to the same purport as he had done two years before; but, overborne by the general agreement, he ended by requesting that he might have for colleague Publius Decius, who would be a prop to his old age. In the censorship and the two consulships which he had shared with Decius, he had found that nothing more tended to the preservation of the commonwealth than the harmony of colleagues. To a new partner in authority he could now hardly hope to adapt an old man's mind: with one whose character he knew, it would be easier to share his counsels. His plea was seconded by the consul, who bestowed well-merited praise on Publius Decius, and recalling the advantages that accrued from harmony betwixt the consuls to the administration of military measures and the harm that resulted from their discord, reminded his hearers how dire had been the danger occasioned lately by the strife between himself and his colleague. Decius and Fabius, he said, were of one heart and vivere; esse praeterea viros natos militiae, factis magnos, ad verborum linguaeque certamina rudes. 7 Ea ingenia consularia esse: callidos sollertesque, iuris atque eloquentiae consultos, qualis Ap. Claudius esset, urbi ac foro[1] praesides habendos praetoresque 8 ad reddenda iura creandos esse. His agendis dies est consumptus. Postridie ad praescriptum consulis 9 et consularia et praetoria comitia habita. Consules creati Q. Fabius et P. Decius, Ap. Claudius praetor, omnes absentes; et L. Volumnio ex senatus consulto et scito plebis prorogatum in annum imperium est.

A.U.C. 459

XXIII. Eo anno prodigia multa fuerunt, quorum averruncandorum causa supplicationes in biduum 2 senatus decrevit; publice vinum ac tus praebitum;[2] 3 supplicatum iere frequentes viri feminaeque. Insignem supplicationem fecit certamen in sacello Pudicitiae Patriciae, quae in foro Bovario est ad aedem 4 rotundam Herculis, inter matronas ortum. Verginiam, Auli filiam, patriciam plebeio nuptam, L. Volumnio consuli, matronae, quod e patribus enupsisset, sacris arcuerant. Brevis altercatio inde ex iracundia muliebri in contentionem animorum ex-

[1] foro $F^3D^3A^3$: fori (tori M) Ω: fortes A.
[2] praebitum A^2: prae(or pre-)bituum MPA: p (or per-)biduum P^2FUT^2: plebitum TD: plebi tuum L.

[1] Where the law-courts were held.

[2] Fabius and Decius can only have been absent from the voting place, but Appius was away from Rome.

[3] It is likely that the tradition of a shrine to Pudicitia in the Forum Boarium is due to a confusion of this goddess with Fortuna Virgo, who had a chapel there near the temple of Mater Matuta (a birth-goddess), and was, like her, a woman's goddess. Young brides dedicated to her their maiden's dress, on marrying, and the mistake was favoured one mind, and were, besides, men born for war, B.C. 295 great in their deeds, but unskilled in the strife of words and of the tongue. Theirs were talents meet for the consul's office. But shrewd and clever men, masters of the law and of eloquence, like Appius Claudius, should be had to preside over the City and the Forum,[1] and should be elected praetors to administer justice. With these transactions the day was taken up. On the following day, by the direction of the consul, elections were held both of consuls and of praetors. Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius were chosen consuls and Appius Claudius praetor—all three being absent[2]—and the senate passed a decree, which the people ratified, prolonging for a year the command of Lucius Volumnius.

XXIII. In that year were many portents, to avert which the senate decreed supplications for two days. Wine and incense were provided by the state, and the people went in throngs to offer their prayers —both men and women. The supplication was rendered memorable by a quarrel that broke out among the matrons in the chapel of Patrician Modesty, which stands in the Cattle Market, by the round temple of Hercules.[3] Verginia, Aulus's daughter, a patrician wedded to a commoner, Lucius Volumnius the consul, had been excluded by the matrons from their ceremonies, on the ground that she had married out of the patriciate. This led to a short dispute, which the hot anger of the sex soon kindled to a blaze of passionate contention.

by the unusual circumstance that the image of Fortuna Virgo was veiled. The story preserved by Livy is an attempt to explain the epithet of Pudicitia Plebeia (§ 7). See Wissowa, Religion und Kultus der Römer (1912²), pp. 257, 333.

A.U.C. 459

5 arsit, cum se Verginia et patriciam et pudicam in Patriciae Pudicitiae templum ingressam et uni nuptam ad quem virgo deducta sit, nec se viri honorumve eius ac rerum gestarum paenitere, ex vero[1] gloriaretur.
6 Facto deinde egregio magnifica verba adauxit: in vico Longo, ubi habitabat, ex parte aedium quod satis esset loci modico sacello exclusit, aramque ibi posuit et convocatis plebeiis matronis conquesta iniuriam
7 patriciarum "Hanc ego aram" inquit "Pudicitiae Plebeiae dedico vosque hortor, ut quod certamen
8 virtutis viros in hac civitate tenet, hoc pudicitiae inter matronas sit detisque operam ut haec ara quam illa, si quid potest, sanctius et a castioribus
9 coli dicatur." Eodem ferme ritu et haec ara quo illa antiquior culta est, ut nulla nisi spectatae pudicitiae matrona et quae uni viro nupta fuisset ius
10 sacrificandi haberet. Volgata dein religio a pollutis,[2] nec matronis solum sed omnis ordinis feminis, postremo in oblivionem venit.
11 Eodem anno Cn. et Q. Ogulnii aediles curules aliquot
12 feneratoribus diem dixerunt; quorum bonis multatis ex eo quod in publicum redactum est aenea in Capitolio limina et trium mensarum argentea vasa in cella Iovis Iovemque in culmine cum quadrigis et ad ficum Ruminalem simulacra infantium conditorum

[1] ex vero Madvig: uero Ω: uerum A^2: vere Douiatius.
[2] a pollutis Ω: cum pollutis H. J. Mueller: pollutis Duker.

[1] Popular etymology made Ruminalis come from Romularis and that from Romulus. It was in the overflow of the Tiber near this fig-tree that the twins were exposed (I. iv. 5).

Verginia boasted, and with reason, that she had B.C. 295 entered the temple of Patrician Modesty both a patrician and a modest woman, as having been wedded to the one man to whom she had been given as a maiden, and was neither ashamed of her husband nor of his honours and his victories. She then added a noble deed to her proud words. In the Vicus Longus, where she lived, she shut off a part of her mansion, large enough for a shrine of moderate size, and, erecting there an altar, called together the plebeian matrons, and after complaining of the injurious behaviour of the patrician ladies, said, "I dedicate this altar to Plebeian Modesty; and I urge you, that even as the men of our state contend for the meed of valour, so the matrons may vie for that of modesty, that this altar may be said to be cherished—if it be possible—more reverently than that, and by more modest women." This altar, too, was served with almost the same ritual as that more ancient one, so that no matron but one of proven modesty, who had been wedded to one man alone, should have the right to sacrifice. Afterwards the cult was degraded by polluted worshippers, not matrons only but women of every station, and passed finally into oblivion.

In that same year Gnaeus and Quintus Ogulnius the curule aediles brought a number of usurers to trial, and, confiscating their possessions, employed the share which came into the public treasury to put brazen thresholds in the Capitol, and silver vessels for the three tables in the shrine of Jupiter, and a statue of the god in a four-horse chariot on the roof, and at the fig-tree Ruminalis[1] a representation of the infant Founders of the City being

A.U.C. 459 urbis sub uberibus lupae posuerunt semitamque saxo
13 quadrato a Capena porta ad Martis straverunt. Et ab aedilibus plebeiis L. Aelio Paeto et C. Fulvio Curvo ex multaticia item pecunia, quam exegerunt pecuariis damnatis, ludi facti pateraeque aureae ad Cereris positae.

XXIV. Q. inde Fabius quintum et P. Decius
2 quartum consulatum ineunt, tribus consulatibus censuraque collegae nec gloria magis rerum, quae ingens erat, quam concordia inter se clari. Quae ne perpetua esset, ordinum magis quam ipsorum inter se certamen intervenisse reor, patriciis tenden-
3 tibus ut Fabius Etruriam [1] extra ordinem provinciam haberet, plebeis auctoribus Decio ut ad sortem rem
4 vocaret.[2] Fuit certe contentio in senatu et postquam ibi Fabius plus poterat, revocata res ad populum est. In contione,[3] ut inter militares viros et factis potius quam dictis fretos, pauca verba habita.
5 Fabius, quam arborem consevisset,[4] sub ea legere alium fructum indignum esse dicere ;[5] se aperuisse Ciminiam silvam viamque per devios saltus Romano
6 bello fecisse. Quid se id aetatis sollicitassent, si alio duce gesturi bellum essent? Nimirum adver-

[1] Etruriam γ: in Etruriam MPFTLA^{2}: in etruria U.
[2] rem vocaret Conway: rem revocaret Listovius: reuocaret Ω.
[3] in contione γ: in contionem MTA^{2}: in contentionem PFUDLA.
[4] consevisset $I^3F^3A^2$(or A^3)Glareanus: conseruisset (-set et I Ω.
[5] dicere A^2 or A^3: diceret Ω.

[1] Convicted probably of using for grazing purposes more of the public domain than they were legally entitled to control.

suckled by the wolf. They also made a paved walk B.C. 295 of squared stone from the Porta Capena to the temple of Mars. And the plebeian aediles Lucius Aelius Paetus and Gaius Fulvius Curvus, likewise with the money from fines, which they exacted from convicted graziers,[1] held games and provided golden bowls for the temple of Ceres.

XXIV. After that Quintus Fabius (for the fifth time) and Publius Decius (for the fourth) began their consulship, having thrice been colleagues in that office and once in the censorship, and being not more distinguished for the renown, great though that was, of their achievements than for their harmonious co-operation. This, however, was not destined to be permanent, though its interruption was due, I think, more to rivalry between the orders than to their own; for the patricians strove that Fabius should have the command in Etruria without drawing lots, and the plebeians insisted that Decius should demand that method of determining the question. At all events there was a contention in the senate, and Fabius proving to be the stronger there, the case was carried before the people. In the assembly the speeches were short, as befitted soldiers and men who trusted more to deeds than to words.

Fabius argued that when one man had planted a tree, it was unfair that another should gather the fruit that dropped from it; it was he that had opened up the Ciminian Forest and had made a path for Roman arms through remote and desert tracts. Why, pray, had they troubled him, old as he was, if they had meant to wage the war with another general? It was only too clear, he said—sarium se, non socium imperii legisse sensim exprobrat et invidisse Decium concordibus collegiis tribus. 7 Postremo se tendere nihil ultra quam ut, si dignum provincia ducerent, in eam mitterent: in senatus arbitrio se fuisse et in potestate populi futurum.

A.U.C. 459

P. Decius senatus iniuriam querebatur: quoad 8 potuerint, patres adnisos ne plebeiis[1] aditus ad magnos honores esset; postquam ipsa virtus pervi- 9 cerit ne in ullo genere hominum inhonorata esset, quaeri quemadmodum inrita sint non suffragia modo populi sed arbitria etiam fortunae et in paucorum 10 potestatem vertantur. Omnes ante se consules sortitos provincias esse: nunc extra sortem Fabio 11 senatum provinciam dare,—si honoris eius causa, ita eum de se deque re publica meritum esse ut faveat Q. Fabi gloriae quae modo non sua contumelia 12 splendeat. Cui autem dubium esse, ubi unum bellum sit asperum ac difficile, cum id alteri extra sortem mandetur, quin alter consul pro supervacaneo atque 13 inutili habeatur? Gloriari Fabium rebus in Etruria gestis: velle et P. Decium gloriari. Et forsitan, quem ille obrutum ignem reliquerit, ita ut totiens novum 14 ex improviso incendium daret, eum se exstincturum. Postremo se collegae honores praemiaque conces-

[1] plebeiis (or plebeis) Dc edd. : plebis (plebi A^4) Ω.

taking gradually a more reproachful tone—that he B.C. 295 had selected an adversary, not a partner in command, and that Decius had begrudged the friendly spirit in which they had administered three offices together. Finally, he asked no more than that if they thought him worthy of the command they should give it to him; he had submitted to the decision of the senate and would obey the people.

Publius Decius complained of the senate's injustice: as long as they were able, the Fathers had striven to deny the plebeians access to great honours; and since native worth had of its own strength won the right to be recognized in any class of men, they were seeking to make of none effect not only the suffrages of the people but also the awards of Fortune, and to subject them to the control of a few. All the consuls who had preceded him had drawn lots for their commands, but the senate was now conferring a command on Fabius without the lot. If they were doing this to honour him, he would say that the man had deserved so well both of himself and of the state that he stood ready to promote the glory of Fabius, provided only that its lustre were not purchased with insult to himself. But who could doubt, when there was one difficult, dangerous war, and this was entrusted without lots to one of the consuls, that the other was regarded as superfluous and useless? Fabius gloried in his Etruscan victories: Publius Decius would fain glory too. And perhaps that fire which Fabius had left covered up, but so that it was continually breaking out into new flames, might be by him extinguished. In short he was willing, for the reverence he bore his colleague's years and dignity, to yield to him

A.U.C. 459

surum verecundia aetatis eius maiestatisque ; cum periculum, cum dimicatio [1] proposita sit, neque cedere 15 sua sponte neque cessurum ; et si nihil aliud ex eo certamine tulerit, illud certe laturum ut quod populi sit populus iubeat potius quam patres gratificen-
16 tur. Iovem optimum maximum deosque immortales se precari ut ita sortem aequam sibi cum collega dent si eandem virtutem felicitatemque in bello
17 administrando daturi sint. Certe et id natura aequum et exemplo utile esse et ad famam populi Romani pertinere, eos consules esse quorum utrolibet duce bellum Etruscum geri recte possit.

18 Fabius nihil aliud precatus populum Romanum quam ut, priusquam intro vocarentur ad suffragium tribus, Ap. Claudi praetoris allatas ex Etruria litteras audirent, comitio abiit.[2] Nec minore populi consensu quam senatus provincia Etruria extra sortem Fabio decreta est.

XXV. Concursus inde ad consulem factus omnium ferme iuniorum et pro se quisque nomina dabant ; tanta cupido erat sub eo duce stipendia faciendi.
2 Qua circumfusus turba "Quattuor milia" inquit "peditum et sescentos equites dumtaxat scribere in animo est ; hodierno et crastino die qui nomina
3 dederitis mecum ducam. Maiori mihi curae est ut omnes locupletes reducam quam ut multis rem
4 geram militibus." Profectus apto exercitu et eo

[1] cum dimicatio ζ : tum dimicatio MA^2 : dimicatio Ω.
[2] comitio abiit A^2 or A^4 : comitio abit ζ : comitia habuit (perhaps abuit A) Ω.

honours and rewards; but when peril, when strife, B.C. 295 was set before them—he yielded not, of his own consent—nor ever would. And if he got nothing else by this contest, one thing at any rate he would get—that what belonged to the people should be disposed of by the people, not bestowed by the Fathers as a favour. To Jupiter Optimus Maximus and the immortal gods he prayed that they would grant him an equal chance in the lot with his colleague only if they were ready to grant him the same courage and the same good fortune in the administration of the war. At least it was a thing in its nature reasonable, in its example salutary, and material to the reputation of the Roman People, that the consuls should be such that the Etruscan war could be managed aright under the leadership of either one of them.

Fabius only prayed the Roman people to listen, before the tribes were called to vote, to a dispatch of Appius Claudius the praetor that had been brought in from Etruria. He then left the comitium, and the people then, as unanimously as the senate had done, decreed that Fabius should have the command in Etruria without drawing lots.

XXV. Nearly all the younger men now flocked about the consul, and each gave in his name, so eager were they to serve under such a captain. Surrounded by this throng he said, "I have in mind to enrol no more than four thousand foot and six hundred horse; I will take with me those of you who give in your names to-day and to-morrow. I am more concerned to bring all my men back with their purses filled than to wage war with many soldiers." Marching out with a fit army, which was plus fiduciae ac spei gerente quod non desiderata multitudo erat, ad oppidum Aharnam, unde haud procul hostes erant, ad castra Appi praetoris pergit. 5 Paucis citra milibus lignatores ei cum praesidio occurrunt; qui ut lictores praegredi viderunt Fabiumque esse consulem accepere, laeti atque alacres dis populoque Romano grates agunt quod eum sibi 6 imperatorem misissent. Circumfusi deinde cum consulem salutarent, quaerit Fabius quo pergerent, respondentibusque lignatum se ire, "Ain tandem?" 7 inquit, "num castra vallata non habetis?" Ad hoc cum succlamatum esset duplici quidem vallo et fossa et tamen in ingenti metu esse, "Habetis igitur" inquit "adfatim lignorum; redite et vellite vallum." 8 Redeunt in castra terroremque ibi vellentes vallum et iis qui in castris remanserant militibus et ipsi 9 Appio fecerunt; tum pro se quisque alii aliis dicere consulis se Q. Fabi facere iussu. Postero inde die castra mota et Appius praetor Romam dimissus. 10 Inde nusquam stativa Romanis fuere. Negabat utile esse uno loco sedere exercitum; itineribus ac mutatione locorum mobiliorem ac salubriorem esse. Fiebant autem itinera, quanta fieri sinebat hiemps hauddum exacta.

A.U.C. 459

11 Vere inde primo relicta secunda legione ad Clu-

[1] Probably = Arna, across the Tiber from Perusia, and about six miles due east of it.

[2] sc. for use as firewood.

all the more confident and hopeful because he had B.C. 295 not desired a great host, he took his way towards the town of Aharna,[1] from which the enemy were not far distant, to the camp of Appius the praetor. A few miles this side the camp he encountered some men who had come out with an armed escort to gather wood. These people, seeing the lictors in the van and learning that Fabius was consul, with lively manifestations of satisfaction gave thanks to the gods and to the Roman People for having sent him to be their general. Then, as they trooped about him and hailed him consul, Fabius asked whither they were bound, and they answered that they were come out to get wood. "Is it possible," he cried, "that you have no rampart round your camp?" and, on their shouting back that they had a double rampart and a trench and yet were in mortal fear, "Then you have quite wood enough," said he; "go back and pull up your stockade."[2] Returning to camp they began pulling up the palings, to the terror of their comrades who had stayed behind, as well as of Appius himself, till the news was spread, as each talked with his neighbours, that they were acting under orders of the consul Quintus Fabius. On the morrow the camp was removed and the praetor Appius was sent away to Rome. Thenceforward the Romans had no permanent camp anywhere. It was of no use, Fabius maintained, for the army to sit down in one place: by marching and shifting its position it grew more mobile and more healthy. The marches, of course, were such as could be made at a season when winter was not yet over.

In the early spring, leaving the second legion in sium, quod Camars olim appellabant, praepositoque castris L. Scipione pro praetore Romam ipse ad consultandum de bello rediit, sive ipse sponte sua, quia bellum ei maius in conspectu erat quam quantum esse famae crediderat sive senatus consulto accitus; nam in utrumque auctores sunt. Ab Ap. Claudio praetore retractum quidam videri volunt, cum in senatu et apud populum, id quod per litteras adsidue fecerat, terrorem belli Etrusci augeret: non suffecturum ducem unum nec exercitum unum adversus quattuor populos; periculum[1] esse, sive iuncti unum premant sive diversi gerant bellum, ne ad omnia simul obire unus non possit. Duas se ibi legiones Romanas reliquisse et minus quinque milia peditum equitumque cum Fabio venisse. Sibi placere P. Decium consulem primo quoque tempore in Etruriam ad collegam proficisci, L. Volumnio Samnium provinciam dari; si consul malit in suam provinciam ire, Volumnium in Etruriam ad consulem cum exercitu iusto consulari proficisci. Cum magnam partem moveret oratio praetoris, P. Decium censuisse ferunt ut omnia integra ac libera Q. Fabio servarentur, donec vel ipse, si per commodum rei publicae posset, Romam venisset vel aliquem ex legatis misisset, a quo disceret senatus quantum in Etruria belli esset

A.U.C. 459

[1] periculum ~ Gronovius: periculos MP: periculosum Ω.

[1] i.e. two Roman legions with the usual complement of cavalry and allies.

the neighbourhood of Clusium—which they used of B.C. 295 old to call Camars—and putting Lucius Scipio, as propraetor, in charge of the camp, Fabius himself returned to Rome to consult about the war, either voluntarily, because he had a task in prospect that was greater than he had believed the reports to signify, or, it may be, summoned by the senate; for both accounts are vouched for. Some would have it appear that he was compelled to return by Appius Claudius the praetor, who continued to exaggerate the perils of the Etruscan war in the senate and before the people, as he had done persistently in his dispatches. It was not enough, he said, to have one commander and one army against four nations: the danger was—whether they united to overwhelm him or campaigned separately—that one man would be incapable of meeting simultaneously all emergencies. He himself had left on the ground two Roman legions, and less than five thousand infantry and cavalry had come with Fabius. It was his opinion that Publius Decius the consul should march at the very earliest moment to Etruria, to join his colleague, and that Lucius Volumnius should be given the command in Samnium; or, if the consul preferred to go out to his own province, that Volumnius should set out for Etruria with a regular consular army.[1] The majority were moved by the praetor's speech, but Publius Decius—so they say—advised that all be left to the free and unhampered judgment of Quintus Fabius, until Fabius should either come to Rome himself—if this were compatible with public policy—or send some one of his lieutenants, to inform the senate how great a war was on foot

A.U.C. 459 quantisque administrandum copiis et quot per duces esset.

XXVI. Fabius, ut Romam rediit, et in senatu et productus ad populum mediam orationem habuit, ut nec augere nec minuere videretur belli famam magisque in altero adsumendo duce aliorum indulgere timori quam suo aut rei publicae periculo consulere. Ceterum si sibi adiutorem belli sociumque imperii darent, quonam modo se oblivisci P. Deci consulis per tot collegia experti posse? Neminem omnium secum coniungi malle; et copiarum satis sibi cum P. Decio et nunquam nimium hostium fore; sin collega quid aliud mallet,[1] at sibi L. Volumnium darent adiutorem. Omnium rerum arbitrium et a populo et a senatu et ab ipso collega Fabio permissum est; et cum P. Decius se vel in Samnium vel[2] in Etruriam proficisci paratum esse ostendisset, tanta laetitia ac gratulatio fuit ut praeciperetur victoria animis triumphusque non bellum decretum consulibus videretur.

Invenio apud quosdam extemplo consulatu inito profectos in Etruriam Fabium Deciumque sine ulla mentione sortis provinciarum certaminumque inter collegas quae exposui. Sunt quibus ne haec quidem

[1] mallet Weissenborn: mallit Ω: malit $I^2FUT^2D^xA^x$.
[2] vel in Samnium vel H. J. Mueller: in Samnium uel Ω.

in Etruria, and with what forces, commanded by B.C. 295 how many generals, it ought to be conducted.

XXVI. Fabius, when he returned to Rome, both in the senate and afterwards in speaking to the people, steered a middle course, that he might appear neither to exaggerate the current reports about the war nor minimize them, and in accepting an additional commander to be rather consulting the fears of others than guarding against a danger to himself or the republic. For the rest, if they chose to give him a helper in the war and a partner in authority, how—he asked—could he possibly forget Publius Decius the consul, whom he had proved so often when they had been colleagues? There was no one living with whom he would sooner share his commission; he should have troops enough, if Decius were with him, and his enemies would never be too numerous. But if his colleague preferred some other arrangement, let them give him Lucius Volumnius to be his coadjutor. The decision in regard to everything was left by the people and the senate, and by his colleague himself, entirely to Fabius; and when Publius Decius had made known his readiness to set out either for Samnium or Etruria, there were such rejoicings and congratulations that men tasted the sweets of victory in anticipation, and it seemed as though the consuls had been voted a triumph and not a war.

I find in some historians that Fabius and Decius set out for Etruria at the very beginning of their consulship, and they make no mention of the casting of lots for provinces or of the disputes betwixt the colleagues which I have described. On the other hand, even these disputes have not been enough certamina exponere satis fuit; adiecerunt[1] et Appi criminationes de Fabio absente ad populum et pertinaciam adversus praesentem consulem praetoris contentionemque aliam inter collegas, tendente Decio 7 ut suae quisque provinciae sortem tueretur. Constare res incipit ex eo tempore quo profecti ambo consules ad bellum sunt.

A.U.C. 459

Ceterum antequam consules in Etruriam pervenirent, Senones Galli multitudine ingenti ad Clusium venerunt legionem Romanam castraque oppugnaturi.
8 Scipio, qui castris praeerat, loco adiuvandam paucitatem suorum militum ratus, in collem[2] qui inter
9 urbem et castra erat aciem erexit. Sed, ut in re subita, parum explorato itinere ad iugum perrexit quod hostes ceperant parte alia adgressi. Ita caesa ab tergo legio atque in medio, cum hostis undique
10 urgeret, circumventa. Deletam quoque ibi legionem, ita ut nuntius non superesset, quidam auctores
11 sunt, nec ante ad consules, qui iam haud procul a Clusio aberant, famam eius cladis perlatam quam in conspectu fuere Gallorum equites, pectoribus equorum suspensa gestantes capita et lanceis infixa
12 ovantesque moris sui carmine. Sunt qui Umbros fuisse non Gallos tradant, nec tantum cladis acceptum et circumventis pabulatoribus cum L. Manlio Torquato legato Scipionem propraetorem subsidium

[1] adiecerunt Heinsius: adiecerint Ω.
[2] in collem ζ: in colle (cole P) Ω.

[1] Possibly a son of the consul who was thrown from his horse and killed in 299 B.C. See chap. xi. § 1.

for some, but they have added invectives pronounced B.C. 295
by Appius before the people against the absent Fabius, and stubborn opposition on the praetor's part to the consul who was present, and another quarrel between the colleagues, when Decius urged that each should attend to his allotted province. The authorities begin to be in agreement from the moment that both consuls set out for the seat of war.

But before the consuls could reach Etruria, the Senonian Gauls were come with a great multitude to Clusium, to besiege the Roman legion in camp there. Scipio, who was in command, thought it necessary that he should gain the advantage of position to eke out the smallness of his numbers, and marched his troops up a hill situated between the city and his camp; but, as happens in sudden emergencies, he had sent no scouts ahead of him, and led his men up to a ridge which was held by the enemy, who had approached it from another direction. Thus the legion was attacked in the rear and found itself surrounded, with the enemy assailing it from every quarter. Some writers say that the legion was even annihilated there, so that none survived to bear away the tidings, and that the consuls, who were not far from Clusium, got no report of the disaster till some Gallic horsemen came in sight, with heads hanging at their horses' breasts or fixed on their lances, and singing their customary song of triumph. Others allege that they were not Gauls but Umbrians, and that the reverse experienced was not so great. Some foragers, according to their account, under Lucius Manlius Torquatus,[1] a lieutenant, had been cut off, and Scipio the propraetor sallied forth from the

A.U.C. 459 e castris tulisse victoresque Umbros redintegrato proelio victos esse captivosque eis ac praedam 13 ademptam. Similius vero est a Gallo hoste quam Umbro eam cladem acceptam, quod cum saepe alias tum eo anno Gallici tumultus praecipuus terror
14 civitatem tenuit. Itaque praeterquam quod ambo consules profecti ad bellum erant cum quattuor legionibus et magno equitatu Romano Campanisque mille equitibus delectis, ad id bellum missis, et sociorum nominisque Latini maiore exercitu quam
15 Romano, alii duo exercitus haud procul urbe Etruriae oppositi, unus in Falisco alter in Vaticano agro. Cn. Fulvius et L. Postumius Megellus[1] propraetores ambo, stativa in eis locis habere iussi.

XXVII. Consules ad hostes transgressos Appenninum[2] in agrum Sentinatem pervenerunt. Ibi quattuor milium ferme intervallo castra posita.
2 Inter hostes deinde consultationes habitae atque ita convenit ne unis castris miscerentur omnes
3 neve in aciem descenderent simul; Samnitibus Galli, Etruscis Umbri adiecti. Dies indicta pugnae; Samniti Gallisque delegata pugna; inter ipsum certamen Etrusci Umbrique iussi castra Romana
4 oppugnare. Haec consilia turbarunt transfugae Clusini tres clam nocte ad Fabium consulem transgressi, qui editis hostium consiliis dimissi cum

[1] Megellus Sigonius (from chap. xxxii. § 1): megillus megillius A) Ω.

[2] transgressos Appenninum Gronovius: transgresso Appennino Ω.

camp to their relief, and renewing the battle de- B.C. 295
feated the victorious Umbrians and took from them their prisoners and their booty. It is more probable that the discomfiture was incurred at the hands of a Gallic than of an Umbrian enemy, since apprehensions of a Gallic rising, which had often at other times troubled the Romans, were in that year particularly alarming. And so, not only did both consuls go out to war, having four legions and a strong body of Roman cavalry, together with a thousand picked horse from Campania—furnished for this campaign—and an army of allies and Latins that outnumbered the Romans; but two other armies were posted over against Etruria, not far from the City, one in the Faliscan district and the other in the Vatican. Gnaeus Fulvius and Lucius Postumius Megellus—propraetors both—were ordered to maintain a standing camp there.

XXVII. The consuls came up with the enemy—who had crossed the Apennines—in the territory round Sentinum, and went into camp about four miles off. Consultations were then held amongst the enemy and they decided not to unite all their forces in one camp nor to give battle all together; to the Samnites were joined the Gauls and to the Etruscans the men of Umbria. A day was designated for the battle, and the Samnites and Gauls were appointed to make the attack; in the midst of the engagement the Etruscans and the Umbrians were to assault the Roman camp. These plans were upset by three Clusinian deserters who came over secretly in the night to Fabius, and having informed him of the enemy's designs were rewarded and sent back again, so that from time to time, as each new donis, ut subinde ut quaeque res nova decreta esset exploratam perferrent. Consules Fulvio ut ex Falisco, Postumio ut ex Vaticano exercitum ad Clusium admoveant summaque vi fines hostium depopulentur scribunt. Huius populationis fama Etruscos ex agro Sentinate ad suos fines tuendos movit. Instare inde consules, ut absentibus iis pugnaretur. Per biduum lacessiere proelio hostem; biduo nihil dignum dictu actum: pauci utrimque cecidere magisque inritati sunt ad iustum certamen animi quam ad discrimen summa rerum adducta.[1] Tertio die descensum in campum omnibus copiis est.

A.U.C. 459

Cum instructae acies starent, cerva fugiens lupum e montibus exacta per campos inter duas acies decurrit; inde diversae ferae, cerva ad Gallos, lupus ad Romanos cursum deflexit. Lupo data inter ordines via; cervam Galli confixere. Tum ex antesignanis Romanus miles "Illac fuga" inquit "et caedes vertit, ubi sacram Dianae feram iacentem videtis: hinc victor Martius lupus, integer et intactus, gentis nos Martiae et conditoris nostri admonuit."

Dextro cornu Galli, sinistro Samnites constiterunt. Adversus Samnites Q. Fabius primam ac tertiam legionem pro dextro cornu, adversus Gallos pro sinistro Decius quintam et sextam instruxit; secunda

[1] adducta A^2 (or A^1): adducti F^3: addicta (-dita) U Ω.

[1] See chap. xxiii. § 12 for the bronze group which had recently been erected of the wolf suckling the twins (the Sons of Mars) and cf. the reference at XXII. i. 12 to a statue of Mars and images of wolves (a group?) on the Appian Way. Virgil uses the epithet Martius of the wolf (Aen. IX. 566) and Horace has Martialis lupos, at Carm. I. xvii. 9.

step should be decided on, they might find it out B.C. 295 and report upon it. The consuls wrote to Fulvius and Postumius to march from their respective posts in the Faliscan and Vatican districts to Clusium, and lay waste the territories of the enemy with the utmost rigour. The reports of this devastation drew off the Etruscans from the region of Sentinum to the defence of their own frontiers. Thereupon the consuls strove to bring about an engagement in their absence. For the space of two days they harassed the enemy, but in these two days there was nothing done worth telling: a few were slain on either side and spirits were whetted for a downright battle, but the main issue was not brought to a decision. On the third day the opposing armies descended in full strength into the field.

As they stood arrayed for battle, a hind, pursued by a wolf that had chased it down from the mountains, fled across the plain and ran between the two lines. They then turned in opposite directions, the hind towards the Gauls, the wolf towards the Romans. For the wolf a passage was opened between the ranks, but the hind was killed by the Gauls. Then one of the front-rankers on the Roman side called out, "That way flight and slaughter have shaped their course, where you see the beast lie slain that is sacred to Diana; on this side the wolf of Mars, unhurt and sound, has reminded us of the Martian race and of our Founder."[1]

On the right wing stood the Gauls, on the left the Samnites. Facing the Samnites, Quintus Fabius drew up the first and third legions, to form the Roman right, while Decius marshalled the fifth and sixth on the Roman left, against the Gauls. The et quarta cum L. Volumnio proconsule in Samnio gerebant[1] bellum. Primo concursu adeo aequis viribus gesta res est ut si adfuissent Etrusci et Umbri, aut in acie aut in castris, quocumque se inclinassent accipienda clades fuerit.

A.U.C. 459

XXVIII. Ceterum quamquam communis adhuc Mars belli erat necdum discrimen Fortuna fecerat qua datura vires esset, haudquaquam similis pugna 2 in dextro laevoque cornu erat. Romani apud Fabium arcebant magis quam inferebant pugnam extrahebaturque in quam maxime serum diei cer- 3 tamen, quia ita persuasum erat duci, et Samnites et Gallos primo impetu feroces esse, quos sustinere satis sit; longiore certamine sensim residere Sam- 4 nitium animos, Gallorum quidem etiam corpora intolerantissima laboris atque aestus fluere primaque eorum proelia plus quam virorum, postrema minus 5 quam feminarum esse. In id tempus igitur quo vinci solebat hostis, quam integerrimas vires militi 6 servabat. Ferocior Decius et aetate et vigore animi quantumcumque virium habuit certamine primo effudit. Et quia lentior videbatur pedestris pugna, 7 equitatum in pugnam concitat et ipse fortissimae iuvenum turmae immixtus orat proceres iuventutis in hostem ut secum impetum faciant: duplicem

[1] gerebant ϛ: gerebat Ω.

second and the fourth were campaigning in Samnium B.C. 295 under Lucius Volumnius the proconsul. At the first shock the strength put forth on both sides was so equal that if the Etruscans and the Umbrians had been present either in the battle or at the camp, in whichever quarter they had thrown their weight the Romans must have suffered a disaster.

XXVIII. But, though so far it was a doubtful battle and Fortune had given no indication where she intended to bestow her might, the fighting was very different on the right wing from what it was on the left. The Romans with Fabius were rather defending themselves than attacking, and were trying to prolong the struggle to as late an hour in the day as possible. This was because their general was persuaded that both Samnites and Gauls fought fiercely at the outset of an engagement, but only needed to be withstood; when a struggle was prolonged, little by little the spirits of the Samnites flagged, while the physical prowess of the Gauls, who could least of all men put up with heat and labour, ebbed away, and, whereas in the early stages of their battles they were more than men, they ended with being less than women. So until the time should come when the enemy were wont to fail, he was keeping his men as fresh as he could contrive to do. But Decius, with the greater impetuosity of his youth and spirits, expended all the strength he could muster in the first encounter. And because the fighting of the infantry seemed to languish, he called on the cavalry to attack, and attaching himself to the bravest squadron of troopers besought the youthful nobles to join him in a charge. Theirs, he said, would be a double share

A.U.C. 459

illorum gloriam fore si ab laevo cornu et ab equite
8 victoria incipiat. Bis avertere Gallicum equitatum; iterum longius evectos et iam inter media peditum[1] agmina proelium cientes novum pugnae conterruit
9 genus: essedis carrisque superstans armatus hostis ingenti sonitu equorum rotarumque advenit et insolitos[2] eius tumultus Romanorum conterruit equos.
10 Ita victorem equitatum velut lymphaticus pavor dissipat; sternit inde ruentes equos virosque im-
11 provida fuga. Turbata hinc etiam signa legionum multique impetu equorum ac vehiculorum raptorum per agmen obtriti antesignani; et insecuta, simul territos hostes vidit, Gallica acies nullum spatium respirandi recipiendique se dedit.

12 Vociferari Decius, quo fugerent quamve in fuga spem haberent; obsistere cedentibus ac revocare fusos; deinde, ut nulla vi perculsos sustinere poterat, 13 patrem P. Decium nomine compellans "Quid ultra moror" inquit "familiare fatum? Datum hoc nostro generi est ut luendis periculis publicis piacula simus. Iam ego mecum hostium legiones mactandas Telluri ac dis Manibus dabo."

14 Haec locutus M. Livium pontificem, quem descendens in aciem digredi vetuerat ab se, praeire

[1] peditum Madvig: equitum (quitum M) Ω.
[2] insolitos ς: insolitus Ω.

of glory, if victory should come first to the left wing B.C. 295 and to the cavalry. Twice they drove the Gallic cavalry back. The second time they were carried on for a considerable distance and soon found themselves in the midst of the companies of infantry, when they were subjected to a new and terrifying kind of assault; for, standing erect in chariots and waggons, armed enemies came rushing upon them with a mighty clattering of hoofs and wheels, frightening the horses of the Romans with the unfamiliar din. Thus the victorious cavalry were scattered, as if by a panic fit of madness, and, suddenly fleeing, were overthrown, both horse and rider. From them the disorder was communicated to the standards of the legions, and many of the first line were trodden underfoot, as horses and chariots swept through their ranks. No sooner did the Gallic infantry perceive the confusion of their enemies than they charged, without leaving them a moment to recover or regain their breath.

Decius cried out to them to tell him whither they were fleeing, or what hope they had in flight; he endeavoured to stop them as they broke and ran, and to call them back; then, his exertions proving powerless to stay their rout, he cried aloud on the name of his father Publius Decius. "Why," he asked, "do I seek any longer to postpone the doom of our house? It is the privilege of our family that we should be sacrificed to avert the nation's perils. Now will I offer up the legions of the enemy, to be slain with myself as victims to Earth and the Manes."

On going down into the field of battle he had ordered Marcus Livius the pontifex not to leave his side. He now commanded this man to recite before

A.U.C. 459 iussit verba quibus se legionesque hostium pro 15 exercitu populi Romani Quiritium devoveret. Devotus inde eadem precatione eodemque habitu quo pater P. Decius ad Veserim bello Latino se iusserat 16 devoveri, cum secundum sollemnes precationes adiecisset prae se agere sese formidinem ac fugam 17 caedemque ac cruorem, caelestium inferorum iras, contacturum[1] funebribus diris signa tela arma hostium, locumque eundem suae pestis ac Gallorum ac Sam-18 nitium fore,—haec exsecratus in se hostesque, qua confertissimam cernebat Gallorum aciem concitat equum inferensque se ipse infestis telis est interfectus.

XXIX. Vix humanae inde opis videri pugna potuit. Romani duce amisso, quae res terrori alias esse solet, sistere fugam ac novam de integro velle instaurare
2 pugnam: Galli, et maxime globus circumstans consulis corpus, velut alienata mente vana in cassum iactare tela; torpere quidam et nec pugnae memi-
3 nisse nec fugae. At ex parte altera pontifex Livius, cui lictores Decius tradiderat iusseratque pro praetore[2] esse, vociferari vicisse Romanos defunctos
4 consulis fato; Gallos Samnitesque Telluris matris ac deorum Manium esse; rapere ad se ac vocare Decium devotam secum aciem furiarumque ac formidinis
5 plena omnia ad hostes esse. Superveniunt deinde

[1] contacturum γ: contracturum Ω.
[2] pro praetore γ: propr. T^2 (or T^1): pro pr. T^3: ꝓ p̄ A^1*?*: propraetorem (or other corruptions) Ω.

[1] For the details of this earlier devotion consult VIII. ix. 12.

him the words with which he proposed to devote B.C. 295 himself and the enemy's legions in behalf of the army of the Roman People, the Quirites. He was then devoted with the same form of prayer and in the same habit his father, Publius Decius, had commanded to be used, when he was devoted at the Veseris, in the Latin war[1]; and having added to the usual prayers that he was driving before him fear and panic, blood and carnage, and the wrath of gods celestial and gods infernal, and should blight with a curse the standards, weapons and armour of the enemy, and that one and the same place should witness his own destruction and that of the Gauls and Samnites,—having uttered, I say, these imprecations upon himself and the enemy, he spurred his charger against the Gallic lines, where he saw that they were thickest, and hurling himself against the weapons of the enemy met his death.

XXIX. From that moment the battle seemed scarce to depend on human efforts. The Romans, after losing their general—an occurrence that is wont to inspire terror—fled no longer, but sought to redeem the field; the Gauls, and especially the press about the body of the consul, as though deprived of reason, were darting their javelins at random and without effect, while some were in a daze, and could neither fight nor run away. But in the other army the pontifex Livius, to whom Decius had handed over his lictors, bidding him act as propraetor, cried aloud that the Romans had won the victory, being quit of all danger by the consul's doom. The Gauls, he said, and the Samnites were made over to Mother Earth and to the Manes; Decius was haling after him their devoted host and calling it to join him, and with the enemy all was madness and despair. While the his restituentibus pugnam L. Cornelius Scipio et C. Marcius cum subsidiis ex novissima acie iussu Q. Fabi consulis ad praesidium collegae missi. Ibi auditur P. Deci eventus, ingens hortamen ad omnia 6 pro re publica audenda. Itaque cum Galli structis ante se scutis conferti starent nec facilis pede conlato videretur pugna, iussu legatorum collecta humi pila quae strata inter duas acies iacebant atque in 7 testudinem hostium coniecta; quibus plerisque in scuta rarisque[1] in corpora ipsa fixis sternitur cuneus ita ut magna pars integris corporibus attoniti conciderent. Haec in sinistro cornu Romanorum fortuna variaverat.

A.U.C. 459

8 Fabius in dextro primo, ut ante dictum est, cunctando extraxerat diem; dein, postquam nec clamor hostium nec impetus nec tela missa eandem vim 9 habere visa, praefectis equitum iussis ad latus Samnitium circumducere alas, ut signo dato in transversos quanto maximo possent impetu incurrerent, sensim suos signa inferre iussit et commovere hostem. 10 Postquam non resisti vidit et haud dubiam lassitudinem esse, tum collectis omnibus subsidiis, quae ad id tempus reservaverat, et legiones concitavit et signum 11 ad invadendos hostes equitibus dedit. Nec sustinuerunt Samnites impetum praeterque aciem ipsam

[1] rarisque (or raris) Hertz: uerarisque rutis MTDLA: uerutis U: uerrutis PF: uerutisque ζ: plerisque uerutus $A^1\zeta$: uerutisque raris Walters and Conway (rarisque verutis Drakenborch).

---

[1] Testudo, "tortoise," was the name given to a formation in which the shields were held so close together as to form a sort of pent-house or shell over the soldiers.

Romans were restoring the battle, up came Lucius B.C. 295
Cornelius Scipio and Gaius Marcius, whom Quintus Fabius the consul had ordered to take reserves from the rearmost line and go to his colleague's support. There they learned of Decius's death, a great incentive to dare everything for the republic. And so, though the Gauls stood crowded together with their shields interlocked in front of them, and it looked no easy battle at close quarters, the lieutenants bade their men gather up the javelins that were scattered about on the ground between the hostile lines and cast them against the testudo[1] of their enemies; and as many of these missiles stuck fast in the shields and now and then one penetrated a soldier's body, their phalanx was broken up—many falling, though unwounded, as if they had been stunned. Such were the shifts of Fortune upon the Roman left.

On the right, Fabius had begun, as has been said before, by holding back and delaying the decision; later, when neither the shouts of the foe, nor their assaults, nor the missiles they discharged, seemed to have any longer the same force, he ordered the praefects of the cavalry to lead their squadrons round the wing of the Samnites, that, on the signal being given, they might attack them in the flank with all possible vigour, and commanded his own men to push forward by degrees and dislodge the enemy. When he saw that they made no resistance and there could be no question of their weariness, he gathered up all the troops which he had hitherto held in reserve, and, sending in his legions, made a signal to the cavalry to charge. The Samnites could not withstand their onset and fled in confusion past the Gallic line itself, abandon-

A.U.C. 459 Gallorum relictis in dimicatione sociis ad castra effuso 12 cursu ferebantur: Galli testudine facta conferti stabant. Tum Fabius audita morte collegae Campanorum alam, quingentos fere equites, excedere acie iubet et circumvectos ab tergo Gallicam invadere aciem;
13 tertiae deinde legionis subsequi principes, et qua turbatum agmen hostium viderent impetu equitum, 14 instare ac territos caedere. Ipse aedem Iovi Victori spoliaque hostium cum vovisset, ad castra Samnitium perrexit, quo multitudo omnis consternata agebatur.
15 Sub ipso vallo, quia tantam multitudinem portae non recepere, temptata ab exclusis turba suorum pugna
16 est; ibi Gellius Egnatius, imperator Samnitium, cecidit. Compulsi deinde intra vallum Samnites parvoque certamine capta castra et Galli ab tergo
17 circumventi. Caesa eo die hostium viginti quinque milia, octo capta. Nec incruenta victoria fuit;
18 nam ex P. Deci exercitu caesa septem milia, ex Fabi mille septingenti.[1] Fabius dimissis ad quaerendum collegae corpus spolia hostium coniecta in acervum
19 Iovi Victori cremavit. Consulis corpus eo die, quia obrutum superstratis Gallorum cumulis erat, inveniri non potuit: postero die inventum relatumque est

[1] septingenti A^6*Drakenborch*: acc MPUTL: ac. c. FT^2: ·a· cc DA: ac ducenti ς.

ing their comrades in the midst of the fighting and B.C. 295 seeking refuge in their camp. The Gauls had formed a testudo and stood there closely packed together. Then Fabius, who had learned of his colleague's death, commanded the squadron of Campanians, about five hundred lances, to withdraw from the line, and fetching a compass, assail the Gallic infantry in the rear; these the principes, or middle line, of the third legion were to follow, and, pushing in where they saw that the cavalry charge had disordered the enemy's formation, make havoc of them in their panic. He himself, after vowing a temple and the enemy's spoils to Jupiter Victor, kept on to the Samnite camp, whither the whole affrighted throng was being driven. Under the very rampart, since the gates could not receive so great a multitude, those who were shut out by the crowding of their fellows attempted some resistance; there Gellius Egnatius, the commander-in-chief of the Samnites, fell; in the upshot the Samnites were driven within the rampart and after a short struggle their camp was taken and the Gauls were cut off in the rear. There were slain that day five-and-twenty thousand of the enemy, and eight thousand were captured; nor was it a bloodless victory; for of the army of Publius Decius seven thousand were slain and seventeen hundred of the army of Fabius. Fabius sent out men to search for the body of his colleague, and, piling up the spoils of the enemy, burned them in sacrifice to Jupiter the Victor. The consul's body could not be found that day, having been buried under heaps of Gauls who had been slain above him; on the day after, it was found and brought in, amidst the lamentations of the 20 cum multis militum lacrimis. Intermissa inde omnium aliarum rerum cura Fabius collegae funus omni honore laudibusque meritis celebrat.

A.U.C. 459

XXX. Et in Etruria per eosdem dies ab Cn. Fulvio propraetore res ex sententia gesta et praeter ingentem inlatam populationibus agrorum hosti 2 cladem pugnatum etiam egregie est Perusinorumque et Clusinorum caesa amplius milia tria et signa 3 militaria ad viginti capta. Samnitium agmen cum per Paelignum agrum fugeret, circumventum a Paelignis est: ex milibus quinque ad mille caesi.

4 Magna eius diei quo in Sentinati agro bellatum 5 fama est, etiam vero stanti; sed superiecere quidam augendo fidem, qui in hostium exercitu peditum sexiens centena milia,[1] equitum sex et quadraginta milia, mille carpentorum scripsere fuisse, scilicet cum 6 Umbris Tuscisque, quos et ipsos pugnae adfuisse; et ut Romanorum quoque augerent copias, L. Volumnium pro consule ducem consulibus exercitumque 7 eius legionibus consulum adiciunt. In pluribus annalibus duorum ea consulum propria victoria est, Volumnius in Samnio interim res gerit Samnitiumque exercitum in Tifernum montem compulsum, non deterritus iniquitate loci, fundit fugatque.

8 Q. Fabius, Deciano exercitu relicto in Etruriae praesidio, suis legionibus deductis ad urbem de Gallis Etruscisque ac Samnitibus triumphavit.

[1] sexiens centena milia Walters (deciens centena milia Niebuhr): X. CCCXXX M: XL. CCCXXX PFU: (i.e. XL) $\overline{\text{XL}}$ (or XL) CCCXXX DLA: quadraginta milia trecentos triginta (tricentos triginta milia T) T^2.

soldiers. Postponing his concern for everything else, B.C. 295
Fabius celebrated the funeral of his colleague with every show of honour and well-merited eulogiums.

XXX. In Etruria too at the same time Gnaeus Fulvius the propraetor was succeeding according to his wishes, and, besides the enormous damage which his forays inflicted on the enemy, fought also a victorious battle with them. The Perusini and Clusini lost upwards of three thousand men, and some twenty military standards were captured from them. The Samnite army, as it fled through the Paelignian territory, was surrounded by the inhabitants, and of five thousand men about a thousand were slain.

Great is the glory of that day on which the battle was fought in the district of Sentinum, even if a man hold fast to truth; but some writers have so exaggerated as to over-shoot the credible, and have written that in the army of the enemy—including, of course, the Umbrians and Tuscans, for these, too, were present in the battle—there were six hundred thousand infantry, forty-six thousand horse, and a thousand cars; and, to enlarge in like manner the forces of the Romans, they add to the consuls as a general Lucius Volumnius the proconsul, and his army to their legions. In the majority of histories this victory is reserved to the two consuls, and Volumnius is waging war at the same time in Samnium, where, having driven the Samnite army up Mount Tifernus, he routs and scatters them, undeterred by the difficulties of the ground.

Quintus Fabius, leaving the Decian army on guard over Etruria, led down his own legions to Rome and triumphed over the Gauls, the Etruscans, and the 9 Milites triumphantem secuti sunt. Celebrata inconditis militaribus non magis victoria Q. Fabi quam mors praeclara P. Deci est, excitataque memoria parentis, aequata eventu publico privatoque, filii 10 laudibus. Data ex praeda militibus aeris octogeni bini sagaque et tunicae, praemia illa tempestate militiae haudquaquam spernenda.

A.U.C. 459

XXXI. His ita rebus gestis nec in Samnitibus adhuc nec in Etruria pax erat; nam et Perusinis auctoribus post deductum ab consule exercitum 2 rebellatum fuerat et Samnites praedatum in agrum Vescinum[1] Formianumque et parte alia in Aeserninum[2] quaeque Volturno adiacent flumini descendere. 3 Adversus eos Ap. Claudius praetor cum exercitu Deciano missus. Fabius in Etruria rebellante denuo quattuor milia et quingentos Perusinorum occidit, cepit ad mille septingentos quadraginta, qui redempti 4 singuli aeris trecentis decem: praeda alia omnis mili- 5 tibus concessa. Samnitium legiones, cum partem Ap. Claudius praetor partem L. Volumnius pro consule sequeretur, in agrum Stellatem convenerunt. Ibi ad Caiatiam omnes[3] considunt et Appius Volumniusque 6 castra coniungunt. Pugnatum infestissimis animis, hinc ira stimulante adversus rebellantes totiens,

[1] Vescinum Sigonius (cf. chap. xx. § 1): uestinum Ω.

[2] Aeserninum Gronovius: aesernium MA^3: aeserunium PFUT: aes (or es-)etrunium DLA.

[3] ad Caiatiam omnes Conway: ad Samnitium omnes PF: ad Samnium omnes U: et Samnitium omnes MTDLA: et Samnitium legiones A^6: et Samnitium legiones omnes γ: et Samnitium omnes copiae Madvig.

Samnites. The soldiers followed his triumphal B.C. 295 chariot and in their rude verses celebrated no less the glorious death of Publius Decius than the victory of Fabius, reviving by their praise of the son the memory of the father, whose death (and its service to the commonwealth) had now been matched. Every soldier received from the spoils a present of eighty-two asses of bronze, with a cloak and tunic, a reward for military service in those days far from contemptible.

XXXI. Despite these victories, there was not yet peace either with the Samnites or in Etruria; for war had broken out afresh at the instigation of the Perusini, after the consul had withdrawn his army, and the Samnites were raiding the lands of Vescini and of Formiae on the one hand, and on the other the territory of Aesernia and the region adjacent to the Volturnus river. Against these the praetor Appius Claudius was dispatched with the army that Decius had commanded. Fabius dealt with the new outbreak in Etruria, where he slew four thousand five hundred of the Perusini and took one thousand seven hundred and forty prisoners, who were ransomed at three hundred and ten asses each, the rest of the booty being made over to the soldiers. The Samnite levies, of whom a part were being pursued by Appius Claudius the praetor and a part by Lucius Volumnius the pro-consul, effected a junction in the Stellate district, where they all took up a position near Caiatia. Appius and Volumnius also combined their forces. The ensuing battle was very bitterly contested, the Romans being incited by resentment against a people who had so often rebelled, while those on the other side were staking their last hopes 7 illinc ad ultimam iam dimicantibus spem. Caesa ergo Samnitium sedecim milia trecenti, capta duo milia septingenti; ex Romano exercitu cecidere duo milia septingenti.

A.U.C. 459

8 Felix annus bellicis rebus, pestilentia gravis prodigiisque sollicitus: nam et terra[1] multifariam pluvisse et in exercitu Ap. Claudi plerosque fulmini-
9 bus ictos nuntiatum est, librique ob haec aditi. Eo anno Q. Fabius Gurges, consulis filius, aliquot matronas ad populum stupri damnatas pecunia multavit; ex quo multaticio aere Veneris aedem quae prope circum est faciendam curavit.

10 Supersunt etiam nunc Samnitium bella, quae continua per quartum iam volumen annumque sextum et quadragensimum a M. Valerio A. Cornelio consulibus,[2] qui primi Samnio arma intulerunt, 11 agimus. Et ne tot annorum clades utriusque gentis laboresque actos nunc referam, quibus nequiverint
12 tamen dura illa pectora vinci, proximo anno Samnites in Sentinati agro, in[3] Paelignis, ad Tifernum, Stellatibus campis, suis ipsi legionibus mixti alienis, ab quattuor exercitibus, quattuor ducibus Romanis 13 caesi fuerant; imperatorem clarissimum gentis suae amiserant; socios belli, Etruscos Umbros Gallos, in 14 eadem fortuna videbant qua ipsi erant; nec suis nec

[1] terra ζ (cf. III. x. 6 and VII. xxviii. 7): terram Ω.
[2] consulibus A^2(or A^4): consule Ω.
[3] agro, in Luterbacher: agro Ω: agros PF.

[1] Fabius was presumably an aedile (cf. chap. xxiii. § 11 and chap. xxxiii. § 9). We learn from Servius, the commentator on Virgil, that the goddess was worshipped as Venus Obsequens (ad Aen. I. 720).

[2] i.e. the mountain of that name; or perhaps Livy means the town, Tifernum.

on the conflict. The Samnites accordingly lost six- B.C. 295 teen thousand three hundred slain and two thousand seven hundred captured; in the Roman army two thousand seven hundred fell.

The year, though one of success in war, was saddened by a pestilence and vexed with prodigies. Showers of earth were reported to have fallen in many places, and it was said that in the army of Appius Claudius many had been struck by lightning. On account of these signs the Sibylline books were consulted. In this year Quintus Fabius Gurges, the consul's son, assessed a fine of money against a number of married women who were convicted before the people of adultery, and with this money erected the temple of Venus which is near the Circus.[1]

There are more Samnite wars still to come, though we have dealt with them continuously throughout four books, covering a period of forty-six years, from the consulship of Marcus Valerius and Aulus Cornelius, who were the first that made war on Samnium: and—not to go over now the disasters sustained in so many years on either side and the toils endured, by which nevertheless those sturdy hearts could not be daunted—in the year just past the Samnites had fought in the territory of Sentinum, in the Pelignian country, at Tifernus,[2] and in the Stellate plains, now by themselves, with their own levies, now in company with troops from other nations, and had been cut to pieces by four armies under four Roman generals: they had lost their nation's most distinguished commander; they beheld their comrades in war, the Etruscans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the same plight as their own; nor could they longer maintain themselves, either by their own resources

A.U.C. 459 externis viribus iam stare poterant; tamen bello non abstinebant. Adeo ne infeliciter quidem defensae libertatis taedebat et vinci quam non temptare victoriam malebant. Quinam sit ille, quem pigeat longinquitatis bellorum scribendo legendoque, quae gerentes non fatigaverunt?

A.U.C. 460 XXXII. Q. Fabium P. Decium L. Postumius Megellus[1] et M. Atilius Regulus consules secuti sunt. Samnium ambobus decreta provincia est, quia tres scriptos hostium exercitus, uno Etruriam, altero populationes Campaniae repeti, tertium tuendis parari finibus, fama erat. Postumium valetudo adversa Romae tenuit; Atilius extemplo profectus, ut in Samnio hostes—ita enim placuerat patribus—nondum egressos opprimeret. Velut ex composito ibi obvium habuere hostem ubi et vastare ipsi Samnitium agrum prohiberentur et egredi inde in pacata sociorumque populi Romani fines Samnitem prohiberent. Cum castra castris conlata essent, quod vix Romanus totiens victor auderet ausi Samnites sunt—tantum desperatio ultima temeritatis facit—castra Romana oppugnare; et quamquam non venit ad finem tam audax inceptum, tamen haud omnino vanum fuit. Nebula erat ad multum diei densa adeo ut lucis usum eriperet non prospectu

[1] Megellus (megallus T) Ω: megillus F^3 (cf. chap. xxvi. § 15).

[1] Livy seems to forget that the fighters were now and then relieved.

or by those of outside nations; yet would they not B.C. 295 abstain from war;—so far were they from wearying of a liberty which they had unsuccessfully defended, preferring rather to be conquered than not to try for victory. Who, pray, could grudge the time for writing or reading of these wars, when they could not exhaust the men who fought them?[1]

XXXII. Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius were B.C. 294 succeeded in the consulship by Lucius Postumius Megellus and Marcus Atilius Regulus. Samnium was assigned them both for their province, in consequence of a report that the enemy had raised three armies, with one of which they meant to return into Etruria, with another to resume the devastation of Campania, while the third was making ready for the defence of their frontiers. Postumius was detained in Rome by ill health: Atilius marched out at once, that he might put down the enemy in Samnium—for such was the senate's plan—ere they could cross the border. As though it had been prearranged, they encountered the foe in a place where they themselves were prevented from laying waste the territory of their enemies, while they prevented the Samnites from coming out into the district which had been pacified and the territory of the allies of the Roman People. On the camps being established over against each other, what the Romans would hardly have dared to do, victorious as they had so often been, the Samnites ventured—such temerity does utter hopelessness beget,—that is, to assault the enemy's camp; and although their desperate enterprise did not fully succeed, still, it was not altogether futile. There was a fog which lasted well on into the day, so dense as to shut out the light and

A.U.C. 460

modo extra vallum adempto sed propinquo etiam
7 congredientium inter se conspectu. Hac velut latebra insidiarum freti Samnites vixdum satis certa luce et eam ipsam premente caligine ad stationem Romanam in porta segniter agentem vigilias per-
8 veniunt. Improviso oppressis nec animi satis ad resistendum nec virium fuit. Ab tergo castrorum
9 decumana porta impetus factus; itaque captum quaestorium quaestorque ibi L. Opimius Pansa occisus. Conclamatum inde ad arma.

XXXIII. Consul tumultu excitus cohortes duas sociorum, Lucanam Suessanamque, quae proximae forte erant, tueri praetorium iubet; manipulos
2 legionum principali via inducit. Vixdum satis aptatis armis in ordines eunt et clamore magis quam oculis hostem noscunt nec quantus numerus sit
3 aestimari potest. Cedunt primo incerti fortunae suae et hostem introrsum in media castra accipiunt; inde, cum consul vociferaretur, expulsine extra
4 vallum castra deinde sua oppugnaturi essent,[1] clamore sublato conixi primo resistunt, deinde inferunt pedem urgentque et impulsos semel terrore eodem quo[2] coeperunt expellunt extra portam
5 vallumque. Inde pergere ac persequi, quia turbida lux metum circa insidiarum faciebat, non ausi,

[1] essent ~ Duker | Walters, Class. Quart, 12 (1918) p. 113) essent rogitans Ω.

[2] eodem quo Madvig: eodem agunt (or cogunt) quo Ω.

---

[1] Situated behind the praetorium (headquarters) and between it and the decuman gate.

[2] A wide street parallel with the front and rear lines of the camp, at either end of which was a gate—the porta principalis dextra and porta principalis sinistra respectively.

render it impossible to see, not only beyond the rampart, but even at a little way off, when people approached each other. Relying on this, as on a screen for their operations, the Samnites came up, when day had scarcely dawned, and even so was hidden behind the murk, to the Roman outpost that was negligently standing guard before the gate. Falling upon them unawares they encountered neither courage nor strength sufficient to hold them in check. They charged in by the decuman gate in the rear of the camp, captured the quaestor's tent,[1] and slew the quaestor, Lucius Opimius Pansa; whereupon a general alarm was cried. B.C. 294

XXXIII. The consul, aroused by the din, commanded the two allied cohorts which happened to be nearest—those from Lucania and Suessa—to guard headquarters, and put himself at the head of the legionary maniples in the via principalis.[2] The men fell in ere they had fairly fitted on their armour, and, knowing the enemy more by their shouting than by the sight of them, were unable to form any estimate of their numbers. At first they gave ground, uncertain how fortune stood with them, and admitted the foe into the middle of the camp: then, on the consul's asking them whether they meant to be driven without the wall and afterwards make an assault on their own camp, they gave a cheer, and, exerting themselves, first made a successful stand, and afterwards pushed forward and forced their enemies back, and, having once repulsed them, left them no time to recover their first dismay, but thrust them out of gate and rampart. Not venturing then to go on and pursue them, since the dim light made them fear an ambush, they retired—content to have

A.U.C. 440 liberatis castris contenti receperunt se intra vallum 6 trecentis ferme hostium occisis. Romanorum stationis primae [1] et eorum qui circa quaestorium oppressi periere ad septingentos [2] triginta.
7 Animos inde Samnitibus non infelix audacia auxit et non modo proferre inde castra Romanum sed ne pabulari quidem per agros suos patiebantur; retro in pacatum Soranum agrum pabulatores ibant.
8 Quarum rerum fama, tumultuosior etiam quam res erant, perlata Romam coegit L. Postumium consulem 9 vixdum validum proficisci ex urbe. Prius tamen quam exiret, militibus edicto Soram iussis convenire ipse aedem Victoriae, quam aedilis curulis ex multa-10 ticia pecunia faciendam curaverat, dedicavit. Ita ad exercitum profectus, ab Sora in Samnium ad castra collegae perrexit. Inde postquam Samnites diffisi duobus exercitibus resisti posse recesserunt, diversi consules ad vastandos agros urbesque oppugnandas discedunt.

XXXIV. Postumius Milioniam oppugnare adortus vi [3] primo atque impetu, dein, postquam ea parum procedebant, opere ac vineis demum iniunctis muro 2 cepit. Ibi capta iam urbe ab hora quarta usque ad octavam fere horam omnibus partibus urbis diu incerto eventu pugnatum est; postremo potitur

[1] primae Conway: primae uigilumque (or uigiliumque or uiciumque or uiiiumque) Ω.

[2] septingentos edd.: acc (for DCC) or other corruptions Ω.

[3] vi ϝ: ut PFUT: omitted by MDLA.

---

[1] Probably on the Palatine, since Livy mentions a shrine of Victory as being there at XXIX. xiv. 13.

[2] An unidentified Samnite city.

cleared their camp—within the palisade, having B.C. 294 slain about three hundred of the enemy. The Roman loss, at the outpost and amongst those who were taken by surprise at the quaestor's tent, was some seven hundred and thirty.

This bold and not unsuccessful venture of the Samnites raised their spirits; and not only would they not permit the Romans to go forward, but they would not even permit them to forage in their fields; the foragers fell back on the peaceful territory about Sora. The rumour of these events—more startling even than the events themselves—being brought to Rome compelled the consul Lucius Postumius, though barely recovered, to take the field. But after issuing a proclamation calling upon his soldiers to assemble at Sora, he himself, before leaving the City, dedicated a shrine to Victory, which he had built,[1] as curule aedile, with money received from fines. Having then set out to join the army, he led it from Sora to his colleague's camp in Samnium. The Samnites then retreated, having no confidence in their ability to resist two armies, and the consuls separated and marched in different directions to waste their fields and attack their cities.

XXXIV. Postumius essayed to capture Milionia.[2] Unsuccessful in his first attempt to storm the place, he proceeded against it by regular approaches, and, having brought his pent-houses into contact with the walls, effected an entrance. Thereupon, though the city was already taken, there ensued in every quarter without interruption, from the fourth hour till about the eighth, a desperate struggle, the result of which was long in doubt. At last the 3 oppido Romanus. Samnitium caesi tria milia ducenti, capti quattuor milia septingenti[1] praeter praedam aliam.

A.U.C. 460

4 Inde Feritrum ductae legiones, unde oppidani omnibus rebus suis quae ferri agique potuerunt nocte
5 per aversam portam silentio excesserunt. Igitur, simul advenit consul, primo ita compositus instructusque moenibus successit, tamquam idem quod ad
6 Milioniam fuerat certaminis foret; deinde, ut silentium vastum in urbe nec arma nec viros in turribus ac muris vidit, avidum invadendi deserta moenia militem detinet, ne quam occultam in fraudem in-
7 cautus rueret; duas turmas sociorum Latini nominis circumequitare moenia atque explorare omnia iubet. Equites portam unam alteramque eadem regione in propinquo patentes conspiciunt itineribusque iis
8 vestigia nocturnae hostium fugae. Adequitant deinde sensim portis urbemque ex tuto rectis itineribus perviam conspiciunt et consuli[2] referunt excessum urbe; solitudine haud dubia id perspicuum esse et recentibus vestigiis fugae ac strage rerum in trepi-
9 datione nocturna relictarum passim. His auditis consul ad eam partem urbis quam adierant equites circumducit agmen. Constitutis haud procul porta

[1] septingenti A^6 Drakenborch: acc (or other corruptions) Ω.
[2] et consuli ϝ: et coñs (or other corruptions) Ω.

[1] Otherwise unknown.

Romans made themselves masters of the place. B.C. 294
The Samnites lost three thousand two hundred slain and four thousand seven hundred captured, besides other booty.

From there the legions were led to Feritrum,[1] which the townspeople, with all their possessions which they could carry or drive away, evacuated in the silence of the night, by the opposite gate. So, then, the consul was no sooner come than he advanced up to the walls with all the order and circumspection of one who looked for the same resistance that he had met with at Milionia; but afterwards, finding the city as silent as a desert and neither arms nor men upon the battlements and towers, he restrained his soldiers, who were eager to scale the abandoned walls, lest they should rush improvidently into some hidden trap. He ordered two squadrons of Latin allies to make a circuit of the fortifications and effect a thorough reconnaissance. The troopers discovered a wide-open gate, and near it in the same quarter another one, and saw in the roads leading out of them the traces of the enemy's nocturnal flight. Riding up then slowly and cautiously to the gates, they saw that the city could be safely traversed by streets that led straight through it, and reported to the consul that it had been abandoned. This was evident, they said, from the unmistakable solitude and the fresh signs of flight and the objects that lay scattered about where they had been discarded in the confusion of the darkness. On receiving this account, the consul led his army round to that side of the city which the horsemen had approached. Halting the troops not far from the gate, he commanded

A.U.C. 460 signis quinque equites iubet intrare urbem et modicum spatium progressos tres manere eodem loco, si
10 tuta videantur, duos explorata ad se referre. Qui ubi redierunt rettuleruntque eo se progressos unde in omnes partes circumspectus esset longe lateque
11 silentium ac solitudinem vidisse, extemplo consul cohortes expeditas in urbem induxit, ceteros interim
12 castra communire iussit. Ingressi milites refractis foribus paucos graves aetate aut invalidos inveniunt
13 relictaque quae migratu difficilia essent. Ea direpta; et cognitum ex captivis est communi consilio aliquot circa urbes conscisse fugam; suos prima vigilia profectos; credere eandem in aliis urbibus solitudinem
14 inventuros. Dictis captivorum fides exstitit, desertis oppidis consul potitur.

XXXV. Alteri consuli M. Atilio nequaquam tam facile bellum fuit. Cum ad Luceriam duceret legiones, quam oppugnari ab Samnitibus audierat, ad finem Lucerinum ei hostis obvius fuit. Ibi ira
2 vires aequavit; proelium varium et anceps fuit, tristius tamen eventu Romanis, et quia insueti erant vinci et quia digredientes magis quam in ipso certamine senserunt quantum in sua parte plus volnerum

five horsemen to enter and advance for a short distance; then, if all seemed safe, three of these were to remain there together, and the other two were to report to him what they had found. When they came back and reported that they had advanced to a place from which a view could be had in all directions, and that silence and solitude reigned far and wide, the consul at once led some light-armed cohorts into the city and ordered the rest to construct a camp in the meanwhile. Having entered the place and broken in the house-doors, the soldiers discovered some few decrepit or bed-ridden people and certain things abandoned as too difficult to remove. These things were seized. It was learned from the prisoners that a number of communities in the vicinity had agreed together in planning flight; their own people had left in the first watch; they believed that the Romans would find the same solitude in the other cities. The statements of the prisoners turned out to be true, and the consul took possession of the deserted towns. B.C. 294

XXXV. The other consul, Marcus Atilius, had by no means so easy a war. He was marching, at the head of his legions, towards Luceria, which he had heard was being besieged by the Samnites, when the enemy met him at the Lucerine frontier. On this occasion rage made their strength as great as his, and the battle was one of shifting fortunes and doubtful issue. Yet its outcome was more discouraging to the Romans, both as having been unaccustomed to defeat, and because, as they were retiring from the field, they could see, even better than during the actual engagement, how much their side had got the worst of it in killed and wounded.

A.U.C. 460

3 ac caedis fuisset. Itaque is terror in castris ortus, qui si pugnantes cepisset, insignis accepta clades foret; tum quoque sollicita nox fuit iam invasurum castra Samnitem credentibus aut prima luce cum victoribus conserendas manus.

4 Minus cladis ceterum non plus animorum ad hostes erat. Ubi primum inluxit, abire sine certamine cupiunt; sed via una et ea ipsa praeter hostes erat, qua ingressi praebuere speciem recta tendentium ad
5 castra oppugnanda. Consul arma capere milites iubet et sequi se extra vallum; legatis tribunis praefectis sociorum imperat quod apud quemque facto opus est.
6 Omnes adfirmant se quidem omnia facturos, sed militum iacere animos; tota nocte inter volnera et 7 gemitus morientium vigilatum esse; si ante lucem ad castra ventum foret, tantum pavoris fuisse ut relicturi signa fuerint; nunc pudore a fuga contineri, alioqui pro victis esse.

8 Quae ubi consul accepit, sibimet ipsi circumeundos adloquendosque milites ratus, ut ad quosque venerat,
9 cunctantes arma capere increpabat: quid cessarent tergiversarenturque? Hostem in castra venturum nisi illi extra castra exissent, et pro tentoriis suis pugnaturos si pro vallo nollent. Armatis ac dimi-

The consequence of this was such a panic in the camp as, had it come over them whilst they were fighting, must have led to a signal overthrow. Even so the night was an anxious one, for they thought that the Samnites would soon be attacking the camp, or else that they would have to fight their victorious enemy at break of day. B.C. 294

The enemy had suffered less, but was not less faint-hearted. As soon as it grew light they wished to retire without giving battle. But there was only one road, and this led past their enemies, and when they had started to go that way, they looked as if marching straight to attack the camp. The consul ordered the soldiers to arm and follow him outside the rampart. To the lieutenants, tribunes, and prefects of the allies he explained what part it was needful for their several commands to play. They all assured him that, as for themselves, they were ready for anything, but that the soldiers were dispirited; all night long they had been kept awake by the groans of the wounded and the dying; had the enemy attacked the camp before daylight, their fear would have been so great as to cause them to desert their ranks: as it was, they were withheld by shame from running away, but were otherwise as good as beaten.

On hearing this, the consul thought he had best go about himself among the men and talk to them. Wherever he went he scolded those who were hesitating to arm themselves: Why did they linger and hold back? The enemy would come into the camp, unless they went out; and they would be fighting before their tents, if they were not willing to fight before the palisade. If men armed themselves

A.U.C. 459

10 cantibus dubiam victoriam esse; qui nudus atque inermis hostem maneat, ei aut mortem aut servitutem
11 patiendam. Haec iurganti increpantique respondebant confectos se pugna hesterna esse, nec virium quicquam nec sanguinis superesse; maiorem multitudinem hostium apparere quam pridie fuerit.
12 Inter haec appropinquabat agmen; et iam breviore intervallo certiora intuentes, vallum secum portare Samnitem adfirmant nec dubium esse quin castra
13 circumvallaturi sint. Tunc enimvero consul indignum facinus esse vociferari tantam contumeliam ignominiamque ab ignavissimo accipi hoste. "Etiamne
14 circumsedebimur" inquit "in castris, ut fame potius per ignominiam quam ferro, si necesse est, per virtutem moriamur?" Di bene verterent; facerent
15 quod[1] se dignum quisque ducerent: consulem M. Atilium vel solum, si nemo alius sequatur, iturum adversus hostes casurumque inter signa Samnitium potius quam circumvallari castra Romana videat.
16 Dicta consulis legati tribunique et omnes turmae equitum et centuriones primorum ordinum approbavere.
17 Tum pudore victus miles segniter arma capit, segniter e castris egreditur longo agmine nec continenti; maesti ac prope victi procedunt adversus
18 hostem nec spe nec animo certiorem. Itaque simul conspecta sunt Romana signa, extemplo a primo

[1] Di bene verterent: facerent quod Duker: di (or dii) bene uerterent facerentque quod Ω.

---

[1] The true explanation being that the Samnites were quitting their camp and were carrying the stakes to use in constructing the next one.

and fought, it was a question whose the victory B.C. 294 would be; but a man who waited for the enemy, unarmed and helpless, must put up with either death or slavery. To these objurgations and reproaches they replied that they were exhausted with the battle of the previous day and had no strength left nor blood to shed; while the enemy appeared to be in greater numbers than on the day before.

Meanwhile the column was approaching; and presently, as the soldiers obtained a closer view of them, they declared that the Samnites were carrying stakes and were doubtless going to fence in the camp.[1] At this the consul lost all patience, and shouted out that it was a shameful thing to suffer such disgrace and humiliation at the hands of the most cowardly of foes. "Shall we even be pent up within our camp," he cried, "to die shamefully of hunger, rather than, if need be, by the sword, like gallant men?" Heaven prosper them! They must act as each thought worthy of himself; but the consul, Marcus Atilius—alone if there were none to follow him—would charge the enemy, and sooner fall amongst the standards of the Samnites than see a Roman camp beleaguered. The consul's words were approved by the lieutenants and the tribunes and by all the squadrons of horse and the centurions of highest rank.

Then the soldiers began, for very shame, to arm, and slowly emerged from the stockade; in a long and straggling column, discouraged and almost beaten, they advanced towards the enemy, who were no better off for hopefulness or courage. Accordingly, no sooner had they beheld the Roman standards than a murmur ran through the column

A.U.C. 460

Samnitium agmine ad novissimum fremitus perfertur, exire, id quod timuerint, ad impediendum iter 19 Romanos; nullam inde ne fugae quidem patere viam; illo loco aut cadendum esse aut stratis hostibus per corpora eorum evadendum.

XXXVI. In medium[1] sarcinas coniciunt; armati 2 suis quisque ordinibus instruunt aciem. Iam exiguum inter duas acies erat spatium, et stabant exspectantes dum ab hostibus prius impetus prius clamor inci- 3 peret. Neutris animus est ad pugnandum, diversique integri atque intacti abissent, ni cedenti instaturum alterum timuissent. Sua sponte inter invitos tergiversantesque segnis pugna clamore incerto atque impari coepit; nec vestigio quisquam movebatur.

4 Tum consul Romanus, ut rem excitaret, equitum paucas turmas extra ordinem immisit; quorum cum plerique delapsi ex equis essent et alii turbati, et a Samnitium acie ad opprimendos eos qui ceciderant 5 et ad suos tuendos ab Romanis procursum est. Inde paulum inritata pugna est; sed aliquanto et impigre magis et plures procurrerant Samnites et turbatus eques sua ipse subsidia territis equis proculcavit. 6 Hinc fuga coepta totam avertit aciem Romanam; iamque in terga fugientium Samnites pugnabant, cum consul equo praevectus ad portam castrorum ac

[1] in medium Iac. Gronovius: in medio Ω.

of the Samnites, from the foremost to the hindmost, B.C. 294 that the Romans—just as they had feared—were coming out to dispute their passing; there was no way open even for flight; they must fall where they stood, or else cut down their foes and escape over their bodies.

XXXVI. They heaped up their baggage together, and, being armed, went every man to his own place in the ranks, and the battle-line was formed. And now there was but a little space between the armies, and they halted, each waiting for the other to be first to attack and first to raise a cheer. Neither side had any stomach for fighting, and they would have gone off in opposite directions, scatheless and unhurt, had they not been afraid that, if they retired, their enemies would advance. No signal was given, but though unwilling and reluctant, they began to fight, in a half-hearted manner, with an uncertain and unequal shout; nor would any man stir from his place.

Then the Roman consul, to put some life into the work, detached a few troops of cavalry and sent them in. Of these the most part were unhorsed, and, the rest being thrown into confusion, there was a rush on the part of the Samnites to dispatch the fallen and on that of the Romans to save their comrades. This infused a little spirit into the fighting; but the Samnites had charged somewhat more briskly and in greater numbers, and the disordered cavalry, their horses becoming terrified, rode down their own supports, who began a flight that spread to the whole Roman army. And now the Samnites were on the backs of the fugitives, when the consul, galloping on before to the gate of the camp, posted

A.U.C. 460

7 statione equitum ibi opposita edictoque ut quicumque ad vallum tenderet, sive ille Romanus sive Samnis esset, pro hoste haberetur,[1] haec ipse minitans obstitit
8 profuse tendentibus suis in castra. "Quo pergis" inquit, "miles? Et hic arma et viros invenies nec vivo consule tuo nisi victor castra intrabis; proinde elige, cum cive an hoste pugnare malis."
9 Haec dicente consule equites infestis cuspidibus circumfunduntur ac peditem in pugnam redire iubent. Non virtus solum consulis sed fors etiam adiuvit, quod non institerunt Samnites spatiumque circumagendi signa vertendique aciem a castris in hostem fuit.
10 Tum alii alios hortari ut repeterent pugnam; centuriones ab signiferis rapta signa inferre et ostendere suis paucos et ordinibus inconpositis effuse venire
11 hostes. Inter haec consul manus ad caelum attollens voce clara, ita ut exaudiretur, templum Iovi Statori vovet, si constitisset a fuga Romana acies redintegratoque proelio cecidisset vicissetque legiones Sam-
12 nitium. Omnes undique adnisi ad restituendam pugnam, duces milites, peditum equitumque vis. Numen etiam deorum respexisse nomen Romanum visum; adeo facile inclinata res repulsique a castris hostes, mox etiam redacti ad eum locum in quo

[1] haberetur (followed by erasure) A τ: haberent Ω: haberet MA^2 (or A^1).

there a guard of horse and commanded them, whosoever should make for the rampart, be he Roman or Samnite, to treat him as a foe. He likewise threatened the men himself, and stopped them as they made in disorder for the camp. "Where are you going, men?" he shouted: "Here too you will find arms and soldiers, and while your consul lives you shall not enter the camp, except as victors. Choose, therefore, whether you would sooner fight with fellow-citizens or enemies!" B.C. 294

As the consul spoke these words, the cavalry gathered round the infantry and levelling their spears bade them return into the battle. Not only the consul's bravery but Fortune also helped; for the Samnites did not press their advantage, and he had time to reverse his standards and change his front from the camp to the enemy. They then began to encourage each other to resume the fight; the centurions snatched the standards from the standard-bearers and carried them forward, pointing out to their men that the enemy were few in number and were coming on in irregular and ill-formed ranks. At this juncture the consul lifted up his hands to heaven, and in a clear voice, so as to be overheard, vowed a temple to Jupiter the Stayer, if the Roman army should stay its flight, and renewing the struggle cut to pieces and overcome the legions of the Samnites. Everybody, all along the line—officers, soldiers, infantry and horse—made an effort to restore the day. It even seemed that the divine power of the gods was concerned for the renown of Rome, so easily was the struggle turned and the enemy repulsed from the camp, and in a short time driven back to the place where the fighting had

A.U.C. 460

13 commissa pugna erat. Ibi obiacente sarcinarum cumulo, quas coniecerant in medium, haesere impediti; deinde, ne diriperentur res, orbem armatorum
14 sarcinis circumdant. Tum vero eos a fronte urgere pedites, ab tergo circumvecti equites; ita in medio caesi captique. Captivorum numerus fuit septem milium octingentorum,[1] qui omnes nudi sub iugum missi; caesos rettulere ad quattuor milia octingentos.
15 Ne Romanis quidem laeta victoria fuit; recensente consule biduo acceptam cladem amissorum militum numerus relatus septem milium octingentorum.
16 Dum haec in Apulia gerebantur, altero exercitu Samnites Interamnam, coloniam Romanam, quae via Latina est, occupare conati urbem non tenuerunt;
17 agros depopulati, cum praedam aliam inde mixtam hominum atque pecudum colonosque captos agerent, in victorem incidunt consulem ab Luceria redeuntem; nec praedam solum amittunt sed ipsi longo atque
18 impedito agmine incompositi caeduntur. Consul Interamnam edicto dominis ad res suas noscendas recipiendasque revocatis et exercitu ibi relicto
19 comitiorum causa Romam est profectus. Cui de triumpho agenti negatus honos et ob amissa tot milia militum et quod captivos sine pactione sub iugum misisset.

XXXVII. Consul alter Postumius, quia in Samnitibus materia belli deerat, in Etruriam[2] transducto

[1] octingentorum (dccc) A^6 Drakenborch: accc (or other corruptions) Ω.

[2] in Etruriam ζ: etruriam Ω.

[1] The consul was blamed not for humiliating the enemy, but for letting them off with the humiliation—as though they had surrendered upon that understanding—instead of selling them as slaves, which he had it in his power to do.

begun. There they were held up by the heap of B.C. 294 bundles which they had piled together, and, to keep their effects from being rifled, they formed around them a circle of armed men. Then the foot-soldiers fell hotly upon them in the front, and the cavalry rode round and assailed them in the rear; and so between the two they were slaughtered or made prisoners. The number of the captives was seven thousand eight hundred, who were all stripped and sent under the yoke: the slain were reported at four thousand eight hundred. Even the Romans had no joy of their victory, for the consul found, on reckoning up the two days' casualties, that he had lost seven thousand eight hundred men.

Whilst these affairs were taking place in Apulia, the Samnites with a second army attempted to seize Interamna, a Roman colony on the Latin Way, but could not take it; having pillaged the farms, they were driving off a miscellaneous booty of men and beasts, together with the captured settlers, when they encountered the victorious consul returning from Luceria, and not only lost their spoils, but, marching without order in a long and encumbered column, were massacred themselves. The consul made proclamation summoning the owners back to Interamna to identify and receive again their property, and, leaving there his army, went to Rome for the purpose of conducting the elections. When he sought to obtain a triumph, the honour was denied him, on the ground that he had lost so many thousand men, and because he had sent the prisoners under the yoke, though they had made no terms.[1]

XXXVII. The other consul, Postumius, in default of enemies in Samnium, transferred his army to exercitu primum pervastaverat Volsiniensem agrum;

A.U.C. 460

2 dein cum egressis ad tuendos fines haud procul moenibus ipsorum depugnat: duo milia octingenti[1]
Etruscorum caesi; ceteros propinquitas urbis tutata 3 est. In Rusellanum[2] agrum exercitus traductus; ibi non agri tantum vastati sed oppidum etiam expugnatum; capta amplius duo milia hominum, minus 4 duo milia circa muros caesa. Pax tamen clarior maiorque quam bellum in Etruria eo anno fuerat parta est. Tres validissimae urbes, Etruriae capita, 5 Volsinii Perusia Arretium, pacem petiere; et vestimentis militum frumentoque pacti cum consule, ut mitti Romam oratores liceret, indutias in quadraginta annos impetraverunt. Multa praesens quingentum milium aeris in singulas[3] civitates imposita.
6 Ob hasce res gestas consul cum triumphum ab senatu moris magis causa quam spe impetrandi 7 petisset videretque alios quod tardius ab urbe exis-set, alios quod iniussu senatus ex Samnio in Etruriam transisset, partim suos inimicos, partim collegae amicos ad solacium aequatae repulsae sibi quoque 8 negare triumphum, "Non ita" inquit, "patres conscripti, vestrae maiestatis meminero, ut me consulem esse obliviscar. Eodem iure imperii quo bella gessi,

[1] octingenti (dccc) A^5 Drakenborch: accc (or other corruptions) Ω.

[2] Rusellanum Gronovius (chap. iv. § 5): rosellanum (or other corruptions) Ω.

[3] aeris in singulas Andreas (ed. Rom. 1469): aerisingulas MPT: aeris singulas M^3: aeris singulis $P^2UT^2A^6$: aeris R: aeris in R^2: omitted by DLA.

Etruria. There he first devastated the lands of the Volsinienses, and then, when they came out to defend their territory, defeated them at no great distance from their own walls. Two thousand eight hundred Etruscans were slain; the rest were saved by their nearness to the city. The army was then led into the territory of Rusellae. There not only were the fields laid waste, but the town was captured too. More than two thousand were made prisoners and somewhat fewer were killed in the fighting about the walls. Yet a peace was made that year in Etruria that was more glorious and of more importance than the fighting had been. Three very powerful cities, the chief places in that country, namely Volsinii, Perusia, and Arretium, made overtures of peace, and arranged with the consul, in return for clothing and corn for his troops, to be permitted to send ambassadors to Rome, who obtained a truce for forty years. A fine of five hundred thousand asses, to be paid at once, was assessed upon each state. B.C. 294

In view of these achievements, the consul asked the senate for a triumph, more as a matter of custom than with any hope of obtaining his request. When he perceived that some were for denying him on the ground of his tardiness in leaving the City, and others because he had gone over without the authorization of the senate from Samnium into Etruria—a part of these critics being his personal enemies, and the rest friends of his colleague, who were minded to console the latter for his rebuff by denying a triumph to Postumius also—seeing, I say, how matters stood, he spoke as follows: "I shall not be so mindful, Conscript Fathers, of your dignity as to forget that I am consul. In virtue of the same authority with bellis feliciter gestis, Samnio atque Etruria subactis, 9 victoria et pace parta triumphabo." Ita senatum reliquit. Inde inter tribunos plebis contentio orta; pars intercessuros, ne novo exemplo triumpharet aiebat, pars auxilio se adversus collegas triumphanti

A.U.C. 460

10 futuros. Iactata res ad populum est vocatusque eo consul cum M. Horatium L.[1] Valerium consules, C. Marcium Rutulum[2] nuper, patrem eius qui tunc censor esset, non ex auctoritate senatus sed iussu
11 populi triumphasse diceret, adiciebat se quoque laturum fuisse ad populum, ni sciret mancipia nobilium, tribunos plebis, legem impedituros; voluntatem sibi ac favorem consentientis populi pro
12 omnibus iussis esse ac futura. Posteroque die auxilio tribunorum plebis trium adversus intercessionem septem tribunorum et consensum senatus celebrante populo diem triumphavit.
13 Et huius anni parum constans memoria est. Postumium auctor est Claudius in Samnio captis aliquot urbibus in Apulia fusum fugatumque saucium ipsum cum paucis Luceriam compulsum: ab Atilio in 14 Etruria res gestas eumque triumphasse. Fabius ambo consules in Samnio et ad Luceriam res gessisse

[1] M. Horatium L. Glareanus and Sigonius: L. Horatium M. Ω (cf. C.I.L. i², p. 44, A.U.C. 305).
[2] Rutulum (see III. vii. 6 and VII. xxxviii. 8) rutilium Ω.

[1] i.e. the law granting the triumph.
[2] Compare chap. xxvi. §§ 5–7, and chap. xxx. §§ 4–7.
[3] Q. Claudius Quadrigarius composed his annals about 80 B.C., covering the period from the Gallic invasion to his own times.
[4] Q. Fabius Pictor was a contemporary of Hannibal and wrote an annalistic history of Rome in Greek.

which I conducted my wars, I intend, now that those wars are happily concluded with the subjugation of Samnium and Etruria and the winning of victory and peace, to celebrate a triumph." So saying he left the senate. A dispute then arose amongst the tribunes of the plebs; some declared that they would interpose their veto to prevent this unprecedented kind of triumph, others that they would support his claims against the opposition of their colleagues. The question was discussed in an assembly and the consul was asked to speak. He reminded them that Marcus Horatius and Lucius Valerius, the consuls, and lately Gaius Marcius Rutulus, father of him who was then censor, had triumphed not by authorization of the senate but by command of the people; and he added that he, too, would have referred the question to the people, had he not known that there were tribunes who were owned by the nobles and would obstruct the law[1]; but the wishes and approbation of the people when they were of one accord had all the binding force with him—and ever would have—of any orders whatsoever. And so, on the following day, with the support of three tribunes of the plebs, against the opposition of seven who forbade the proceedings and a unanimous senate, Postumius triumphed, with the people thronging in attendance. B.C. 294

Of this year, too, the tradition is uncertain.[2] Postumius, if we follow Claudius,[3] after capturing several cities in Samnium, was defeated in Apulia and put to flight, and, being wounded himself, was forced to take refuge with a few followers in Luceria; while Atilius campaigned in Etruria and obtained a triumph. Fabius[4] writes that both consuls fought in Samnium and at Luceria; that the army was led

A.U.C. 460 scribit traductumque in Etruriam exercitum—sed ab utro consule non adicit[1]—et ad Luceriam utrimque
15 multos occisos inque ea pugna Iovis Statoris aedem votam, ut Romulus ante voverat; sed fanum tantum, 16 id est locus templo effatus, fuerat. Ceterum hoc demum anno ut aedem etiam fieri senatus iuberet bis eiusdem voti damnata re publica[2] in religionem venit.

A.U.C. 461 XXXVIII. Sequitur hunc annum et consul insignis, L. Papirius Cursor, qua paterna gloria qua sua, et bellum ingens victoriaque quantam de Samnitibus nemo ad eam diem praeter L. Papirium
2 patrem consulis[3] pepererat. Et forte eodem conatu apparatuque omni opulentia insignium armorum bellum adornaverant, et deorum etiam adhibuerant opes, ritu quodam sacramenti vetusto velut initiatis militibus, dilectu per omne Samnium habito nova
3 lege, ut qui iuniorum non convenisset ad imperatorum edictum quique iniussu abisset eius caput[4]
4 Iovi sacraretur.[5] Tum exercitus omnis Aquiloniam est indictus. Ad quadraginta[6] milia militum, quod roboris in Samnio erat, convenerunt.
5 Ibi mediis fere castris locus est consaeptus cratibus pluteisque et linteis contectus, patens ducentos
6 maxime pedes in omnes pariter partis. Ibi ex libro

[1] adicit adii- Madvig: adiecit Ω.
[2] re publica A^2 Gronovius: respublica Ω.
[3] consulis $\bar{c}$: cōs P: consulem MTDLA: eius consulem U.
[4] eius caput M. Mueller (II. viii. 2): caput (capud A) Ω.
[5] sacraretur Madvig: sacratum erat Ω.
[6] quadraginta (XL) MULA[2] (or A^6): sexaginta (LX) PTDA.

[1] The same, that is, as in the year 309 B.C., when they had over into Etruria—by which consul he does not state B.C. 294

—and that at Luceria both sides suffered heavy losses; in the course of the battle a temple was vowed to Jupiter Stator, as Romulus had vowed one before; but only the fanum, or place set apart for the temple, had been consecrated; this year, however, their scruples demanded that the senate should order the erection of the building, since the state had now been obligated for the second time by the same vow.

XXXVIII. The following year brought with it a B.C. 293 consul, Lucius Papirius Cursor, remarkable both for his father's glory and for his own, and a mighty war, with a victory such as no one, save Lucius Papirius, the consul's father, had until that day obtained over the Samnites. And it happened that the enemy had made their preparations for the war with the same[1] earnestness and pomp and all the magnificence of splendid arms, and had likewise invoked the assistance of the gods, initiating, as it were, their soldiers, in accordance with a certain antique form of oath. But first they held a levy throughout Samnium under this new ordinance, that whosoever of military age did not report in response to the proclamation of the generals, or departed without their orders, should forfeit his life to Jupiter. Which done, they appointed all the army to meet at Aquilonia, where some forty thousand soldiers, the strength of Samnium, came together.

There, at about the middle of the camp, they had enclosed an area, extending approximately two hundred feet in all directions, with wicker hurdles, and roofed it over with linen. In this place they

[1] fought against the Romans, who were commanded by the elder Papirius (IX. xl. 2 ff.).

A.U.C. 461

vetere linteo lecto[1] sacrificatum sacerdote Ovio Paccio quodam, homine magno natu, qui se id sacrum petere adfirmabat ex vetusta Samnitium religione, qua quondam usi maiores eorum fuissent, cum adimendae Etruscis Capuae clandestinum cepissent 7 consilium. Sacrificio perfecto per viatorem imperator acciri iubebat nobilissimum quemque genere
8 factisque: singuli introducebantur. Erat cum alius apparatus sacri qui perfundere religione animum posset, tum in loco circa omni contecto arae in medio victimaeque circa caesae et circumstantes cen-
9 turiones strictis gladiis. Admovebatur altaribus magis ut victima quam ut sacri particeps adigebaturque[2] iure iurando quae visa auditaque in eo loco
10 essent,[3] non enuntiaturum. Dein iurare cogebant diro quodam carmine, in exsecrationem capitis familiaeque et stirpis composito, nisi isset in proelium quo[4] imperatores duxissent et si aut ipse ex acie fugisset aut si quem fugientem vidisset non ex-
11 templo occidisset. Id primo quidam abnuentes iuraturos se obtruncati circa altaria sunt; iacentes deinde inter stragem victimarum documento ceteris 12 fuere ne abnuerent. Primoribus Samnitium ea detestatione obstrictis, decem nominatis ab imperatore, eis dictum ut vir virum legerent donec sedecim

[1] lecto Ω: tecto Madvig.

[2] adigebaturque L^3?: adicebaturque MPTDA: adiciebaturque UL.

[3] essent M^2 (or M^1) P^2 (or P^3) u T^2 (or T^1) D^3A^6: eo essent MP: coissent TDLA.

[4] quo P^2uT^2 (or T^1) A^6: quod MPTDLA.

[1] At IV. xxxvii. 1 f. we were told how the Etruscan city of Volturnum was captured by the Samnites and renamed Capua.

offered sacrifice in accordance with directions read B.C. 293 from an old linen roll. The celebrant was one Ovius Paccius, an aged man, who claimed to derive this ceremony from an ancient ritual of the Samnites which the forefathers of those present had formerly employed when they had gone secretly about to get Capua away from the Etruscans.[1] On the conclusion of the sacrifice, the general by his apparitor commanded to be summoned all those of the highest degree in birth and deeds of arms; and one by one they were introduced. Besides other ceremonial preparations, such as might avail to strike the mind with religious awe, there was a place all enclosed, with altars in the midst and slaughtered victims lying about, and round them a guard of centurions[2] with drawn swords. The man was brought up to the altar, more like a victim than a partaker in the rite, and was sworn not to divulge what he should there see or hear. They then compelled him to take an oath in accordance with a certain dreadful form of words, whereby he invoked a curse upon his head, his household, and his family, if he went not into battle where his generals led the way, or if he either fled from the line himself or saw any other fleeing and did not instantly cut him down. Some there were at first who refused to take this oath; these were beheaded before the altars, where they lay amongst the slaughtered victims—a warning to the rest not to refuse. When the leading Samnites had been bound by this imprecation, the general named ten of them and bade them choose every man another, and so to proceed until they had brought [2] These are called "armed priests" at chap. xli. § 3.

A.U.C. 461

milium numerum confecissent. Ea legio linteata ab integumento consaepti, in quo[1] sacrata nobilitas erat, appellata est: his arma insignia data et cri-
13 statae galeae, ut inter ceteros eminerent. Paulo plus viginti milium alius exercitus fuit nec corporum specie nec gloria belli nec apparatu linteatae legioni dispar.[2] Hic hominum numerus, quod roboris erat, ad Aquiloniam[3] consedit.

XXXIX. Consules profecti ab urbe, prior Sp. Carvilius, cui veteres legiones quas M. Atilius superioris anni consul in agro Interamnati reliquerat decretae
2 erant. Cum eis in Samnium profectus, dum hostes operati superstitionibus concilia secreta agunt, Ami-
3 ternum oppidum de Samnitibus vi cepit. Caesa ibi milia hominum duo ferme atque octingenti, capta
4 quattuor milia ducenti septuaginta. Papirius novo exercitu—ita enim decretum erat—scripto Duroniam urbem expugnavit: minus quam collega cepit hominum, plus aliquanto occidit: praeda opulenta utro-
5 bique est parta. Inde pervagati Samnium consules, maxime depopulato Atinate agro, Carvilius ad Cominium, Papirius ad Aquiloniam, ubi summa rei Samni-
6 tium erat, pervenit. Ibi aliquamdiu nec cessatum ab armis est neque naviter pugnatum: lacessendo quietos, resistentibus cedendo comminandoque magis

[1] in quo Freudenberg: a quo γ: quo Ω.
[2] dispar Ω (Walters): par u (Conway).
[3] ad Aquiloniam γ: Aquiloniam Ω.

---

[1] See IX. xxxix. 5, where this mode of selection is described as having been employed by the Etruscans.

[2] To be consistent with the total given in § 4, this number should be 24,000.

their number up to sixteen thousand.[1] These were named the "Linen Legion," from the roof of the enclosure wherein the nobles had been sworn, and were given splendid arms and crested helmets, to distinguish them from the rest. A little over twenty thousand[2] men composed another corps, which neither in physical appearance nor in martial renown nor in equipment was inferior to the Linen Legion. This was the size of the army, comprising their effective forces, which encamped at Aquilonia. B.C. 293

XXXIX. The consuls set out from the City, Spurius Carvilius, to whom had been assigned the veteran legions which Marcus Atilius the consul of the previous year had left in the territory of Interamna, being the first to take the field. Proceeding with these forces into Samnium, while the enemy, busy with their superstitious rites, were holding secret councils, he carried the Samnite town of Amiternum by assault. There about two thousand eight hundred men were slain and four thousand two hundred and seventy made prisoners. Papirius, having levied a new army—for so it had been decreed—took by storm the city of Duronia, making fewer prisoners than his colleague but killing many more. In each place a rich booty was obtained. Afterwards, the consuls having ranged over Samnium and laid waste especially the district of Atina, Carvilius appeared before Cominium and Papirius before Aquilonia, where the main power of the Samnites lay encamped. There for some days there was neither cessation from hostilities nor downright fighting, but the time was spent in provoking the enemy when they were quiet and retreating when they offered resistance—in a word, in feinting rather

A.U.C. 461

7 quam inferendo pugnam dies absumebatur. Quodcumque[1] inciperetur remittereturque, omnium rerum etiam parvarum eventus perferebatur inde in[2] altera Romana castra, quae viginti milium spatio aberant, et absentis collegae consilia omnibus gerendis intererant rebus, intentiorque Carvilius, quo in maiore[3] discrimine res vertebatur, in Aquiloniam quam ad
8 Cominium, quod obsidebat, erat.

L. Papirius, iam per omnia ad dimicandum satis paratus, nuntium ad collegam mittit sibi in animo
9 esse postero die, si per auspicia liceret, confligere cum hoste; opus esse et illum quanta maxima vi posset Cominium oppugnare, ne quid laxamenti sit 10 Samnitibus ad subsidia Aquiloniam mittenda. Diem ad proficiscendum nuntius habuit; nocte rediit, 11 approbare collegam consulta referens. Papirius nuntio misso extemplo contionem habuit; multa de universo genere belli, multa de praesenti hostium apparatu, vana magis specie quam efficaci ad even-
12 tum, disseruit: non enim cristas volnera facere, et per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum, et candore tunicarum fulgentem aciem, ubi
13 res ferro geratur, cruentari. Auream olim atque argenteam Samnitium aciem a parente suo occidione occisam spoliaque ea honestiora victori hosti
14 quam ipsis arma fuisse. Datum hoc forsan nomini familiaeque suae, ut adversus maximos conatus Samnitium opponerentur duces spoliaque ea referrent quae insignia publicis etiam locis decorandis

[1] Quodcumque Madvig: quodcum Ω: quaecum A^6?.
[2] inde in Madvig: in dies Ω.
[3] quo in maiore Madvig: quom aiore T: quo maiore Ω.

[1] In 310 B.C. See IX. xl. 1–17.

than attacking. Whatever was undertaken or given B.C. 293 over, the result of every skirmish, no matter how trivial it might be, was reported at the other camp, which was twenty miles away. The other colleague, Carvilius, though absent, shared in every plan of operations, and was more intent upon Aquilonia, as the crisis became more imminent, than upon Cominium, to which he was laying siege.

Lucius Papirius, being now prepared at all points for the battle, sent word to his colleague that he purposed, if the auspices permitted, to engage the enemy on the following day; it was needful, he said, that Carvilius should also direct an assault, as violent as possible, on Cominium, that no relaxation of the pressure there might allow of the Samnites' sending relief to Aquilonia. The messenger had a day for the journey. Returning in the night, he reported that Carvilius approved the measures taken by his colleague. Papirius had no sooner sent off the courier than he addressed his troops, and said many things of war in general and much regarding the present equipment of the enemy, more vain and showy than effective. For crests, said he, dealt no wounds, and painted and gilded shields would let the Roman javelin through, and their battle-array, resplendent in white tunics, would be stained with blood when sword met sword. Long ago a gilt and silvern Samnite army had been utterly destroyed by his father, and the spoils had done their conquerors more credit than the arms had brought to their bearers.[1] It had perhaps been granted to his name and family to be sent forth as generals against the mightiest efforts of the Samnites, and to win such trophies as should strikingly adorn even public

A.U.C. 461

15 essent. Deos immortales adesse propter totiens 16 petita foedera, totiens rupta: si[1] qua coniectura mentis divinae sit, nulli unquam exercitui fuisse infestiores quam qui nefando sacro mixta hominum pecudumque caede respersus, ancipiti deum irae devotus, hinc foederum cum Romanis ictorum 17 testes deos, hinc iuris iurandi adversus foedera suscepti exsecrationes horrens, invitus iuraverit, oderit sacramentum, uno tempore deos cives hostes metuat.

XL. Haec comperta perfugarum indiciis cum apud infensos iam sua sponte milites disseruisset, simul divinae humanaeque spei pleni clamore consentienti pugnam poscunt: paenitet in posterum diem dilatum
2 certamen: moram diei noctisque oderunt. Tertia vigilia noctis, iam relatis litteris a collega, Papirius silentio surgit et pullarium in auspicium mittit.
3 Nullum erat genus hominum in castris intactum cupiditate pugnae, summi infimique aeque intenti erant: dux militum, miles ducis ardorem spectabat.
4 Is ardor omnium etiam ad eos qui auspicio intererant pervenit: nam cum pulli non pascerentur, pullarius auspicium mentiri ausus tripudium soli-
5 stimum consuli nuntiavit. Consul laetus auspicium

[1] si Luterbacher: tum si Ω.

[1] For the use of sacred chickens in augury see VI. xli. 8 and note (Vol. III., p. 344).

places. The immortal gods, he said, were ready to B.C. 293 intervene in behalf of treaties so often sought and so often broken. If it were possible in any way to surmise the feelings of the gods, they had never been more enraged with any army than with this one, which with horrid rites and stained with the commingled blood of men and beasts, doubly devoted to the wrath of Heaven, as it trembled now at the gods that attested the treaties it had made with the Romans, and now at the curses called down when it undertook to break those treaties, had sworn unwillingly, hated its oath, and dreaded at one and the same moment its gods, its fellow-citizens, and its enemies.

XL. These fears had been made known to Papirius by deserters; and when he had described them to his soldiers, incensed as they already were of themselves, their hopes both of gods and men ran high, and they called out in unison demanding battle; they were vexed at the postponement of the struggle until the morrow, and to wait for a day and night disgusted them. In the third watch of the night, having now received his colleague's answer, Papirius rose silently and sent the keeper of the chickens [1] to take the auspices. There was no class of men in camp who were not affected by the lust of battle; both high and low felt the same eagerness; the general could see the ardour of the men, the men that of their general. This universal zeal spread even to those who took the auspices, for when the chickens refused to feed, their keeper dared to falsify the presage and reported that the corn danced on the ground as it fell from their greedy beaks. The consul joyfully announced that egregium esse et deis auctoribus rem gesturos pro-6 nuntiat signumque pugnae proponit. Exeunti iam forte in aciem nuntiat perfuga viginti cohortes Samnitium—quadringenariae ferme erant—Cominium profectas. Quod ne ignoraret collega, ex-templo nuntium mittit; ipse signa ocius proferri 7 iubet: subsidia[1] suis quaeque locis et praefectos subsidiis attribuerat; dextro cornu L. Volumnium, sinistro L. Scipionem, equitibus legatos alios, C.

A.U.C. 461

8 Caedicium et T. Trebonium,[2] praefecit; Sp. Nautium mulos detractis clitellis cum tribus cohortibus[3] alariis in tumulum conspectum propere circumducere iubet atque inde inter ipsam dimicationem quanto maxime posset moto pulvere se[4] ostendere.

9 Dum his intentus imperator erat, altercatio inter pullarios orta de auspicio eius diei exauditaque ab equitibus Romanis, qui rem haud spernendam rati
Sp. Papirio, fratis filio consulis, ambigi de auspicio 10 renuntiaverunt. Iuvenis ante doctrinam deos spernentem natus rem inquisitam, ne quid incompertum 11 deferret, ad consulem detulit. Cui ille: "Tu quidem macte virtute diligentiaque esto! Ceterum qui auspicio adest si quid falsi nuntiat, in semet ipsum

[1] subsidia Madvig: subsidiaque Ω.
[2] T. Trebonium Weissenborn: Trebonium Ω.
[3] tribus cohortibus Hertz: cohortibus (cohortir P: cohortis F) Ω.
[4] moto pulvere se Madvig: moto puluere Ω.

[1] For a similar use of pack-animals to simulate cavalry, compare VII. xiv. 7–10.

[2] Compare the caustic remark at III. xx. 5: But there had not yet come about that contempt for the gods which possesses the present generation; nor did everybody seek to construe oaths and laws to suit himself, but rather shaped his own practices by them.

the omens were most favourable, and that the gods B.C. 293 would be with them as they fought. So saying, he displayed the signal for a battle. It chanced, as he was already moving out to the field, that a deserter came up with the information that twenty cohorts of the Samnites—of about four hundred each—had set out for Cominium. That his colleague might not be ignorant of this, he instantly dispatched a messenger to him, and ordered his own troops to advance in double time. He had assigned supports to take their posts at favourable points and officers to command them; the right wing he had given to Lucius Volumnius, the left to Lucius Scipio; to lead the cavalry he appointed the other lieutenants, Gaius Caedicius and Titus Trebonius. Spurius Nautius he directed to remove the pack-saddles from the mules, and with three cohorts of auxiliaries to make a hasty detour to a hill which lay in full view, and thence to show himself, in the heat of the engagement, raising as much dust as possible.[1]

While the general was thus employed, a dispute which broke out amongst the keepers of the chickens about the auspices for that day was overheard by some Roman cavalrymen, who, deeming it no negligible matter, reported to Spurius Papirius, the consul's nephew, that the auspices were being called in question. The young man had been born before the learning that makes light of the gods,[2] and having inquired into the affair, that he might not be the bearer of an uncertain rumour, acquainted the consul with it. The consul replied: "For yourself, I commend your conduct and your diligence; but he who takes the auspices, if he reports aught that is false, draws down the wrath of Heaven upon religionem recipit: mihi quidem tripudium nuntiatum; populo Romano exercituique egregium auspicium est." Centurionibus deinde imperavit uti pullarios inter prima signa constituerent. Promovent et Samnites signa; insequitur acies ornata armataque, ut hostium[1] quoque magnificum spectaculum esset. Priusquam clamor tolleretur concurreretur-que, emisso temere pilo ictus pullarius ante signa cecidit. Quod ubi consuli nuntiatum est, "Di in proelio sunt" inquit; "habet poenam noxium caput!" Ante consulem haec dicentem corvus voce clara occinuit; quo laetus augurio consul, adfirmans nunquam humanis rebus magis praesentes interfuisse deos, signa canere et clamorem tolli iussit.

A.U.C. 461

XLI. Proelium commissum atrox, ceterum longe disparibus animis: Romanos ira spes ardor certaminis avidos hostium sanguinis in proelium rapit; Samnitium magnam partem necessitas ac religio invitos magis resistere quam inferre pugnam cogit. Nec sustinuissent primum clamorem atque impetum Romanorum, per aliquot iam annos vinci adsueti, ni potentior alius metus insidens pectoribus a fuga retineret. Quippe in oculis erat omnis ille occulti paratus sacri et armati sacerdotes et promiscua hominum pecudumque strages et respersae fando nefandoque sanguine arae et dira exsecratio ac himself; as for me, I was told that the corn had B.C. 293 danced; it is an excellent omen for the Roman People and the army." He then ordered the centurions to station the keepers of the chickens in the front rank. The Samnites, too, advanced their standards, which were followed by the battle-line in gorgeous armour—a splendid spectacle, though composed of enemies. Before the first shout and the clash of arms, a random javelin struck the chicken-keeper and he fell before the standards. The consul, on being told of this, exclaimed, "The gods are present in the battle; the guilty wretch has paid the penalty!" In front of the consul a raven, just as he spoke, uttered a clear cry, and Papirius, rejoiced with the augury, and declaring that never had the gods been more instant to intervene in human affairs, bade sound the trumpets and give a cheer.

[1] hostium Ω : hostibus (or hosti) edd.

XLI. The battle was fought fiercely, but with far from equal spirit. The Romans were filled with rage and hope and ardour for the combat, and, thirsting for their enemies' blood, rushed into the engagement. As for the Samnites, in most cases it was necessity and the fear of Heaven that compelled them, however reluctant, rather to resist than to attack. Nor would they have held out against the first battle-cry and onset of the Romans, accustomed, as they had now been for some years, to being beaten, had not another yet more powerful fear benumbed their hearts and prevented them from fleeing. For their eyes beheld all that array of the secret rite, and the armed priests, and the mingled slaughter of men and beasts, and the altars spattered with the blood of victims—and with that other blood—and they could hear the baleful execrations

A.U.C. 461 furiale carmen, detestandae familiae stirpique compositum; iis vinculis fugae obstricti stabant, civem magis quam hostem timentes. Instare Romanus a cornu utroque, a media acie, et caedere deorum hominumque attonitos metu; repugnatur segniter, ut ab iis[1] quos timor moraretur a fuga.

Iam prope ad signa caedes pervenerat, cum ex transverso pulvis velut ingentis agminis incessu motus apparuit; Sp. Nautius—Octavium Maecium quidam eum tradunt—cum auxiliaribus[2] cohortibus erat; pulverem maiorem quam pro numero excitabant; incidentes mulis calones frondosos ramos per terram trahebant. Arma signaque per turbidam lucem in primo apparebant; post altior densiorque pulvis equitum speciem cogentium agmen dabat fefellitque non Samnites modo sed etiam Romanos; et consul adfirmavit errorem clamitans inter prima signa, ita ut vox etiam ad hostis accideret, captum Cominium, victorem collegam adesse: adniterentur vincere, priusquam gloria alterius exercitus fieret. Haec insidens equo; inde tribunis centurionibusque imperat, ut viam equitibus patefaciant; ipse Trebonio Caedicioque praedixerat, ubi se cuspidem erectam quatientem vidissent, quanta maxima vi possent concitarent equites in hostem. Ad nutum omnia, ut

[1] iis γ: his Ω: hiis A.
[2] cum auxiliaribus Madvig: dux alaribus (laribus A) Ω: dux cum alaribus Koch.

and that dire oath, framed to invoke perdition on B.C. 293 their families and on their stock. These were the chains that stayed them from flight, and they feared their countrymen more than they feared their foes. On came the Romans from either wing and from the centre, and cut them down as they stood there dazed by the dread of gods and men. They resisted, but sluggishly, like men whom cowardice restrained from running.

The carnage had now reached almost to the standards, when a cloud of dust appeared on their flank, as though raised by the oncoming of a mighty host. It was Spurius Nautius—some say Octavius Maecius—with the auxiliary cohorts; they made more dust than their numbers warranted, for the grooms who rode the mules were dragging leafy branches along the ground. Arms and standards were made out in the van through the murky air, and behind them another denser cloud of dust seemed to show that cavalry were closing the rear, and deceived not only the Samnites, but the Romans as well. This mistake the consul confirmed by calling out in the front ranks, so loud that his voice carried even to the enemy, that Cominium was taken, and that his victorious colleague was at hand; let them therefore strive to conquer before the other army won the glory. He was on horseback as he shouted these words. He then commanded the tribunes and centurions to open a path for the cavalry, having previously admonished Trebonius and Caedicius that when they saw him holding his lance aloft and shaking it, they should make their horsemen run full tilt against the enemy. Everything fell out according to his wishes, ex ante praeparato, fiunt; panduntur inter ordines viae; provolat eques atque infestis cuspidibus in medium agmen hostium ruit perrumpitque ordines quacumque impetum dedit. Instant Volumnius et Scipio et perculsos sternunt.

A.U.C. 461

10 Tum iam deorum hominumque victa vi, funduntur linteatae cohortes; pariter iurati iniuratique fugiunt
11 nec quemquam praeter hostes metuunt. Peditum[1] quod superfuit pugnae in castra aut Aquiloniam compulsum est; nobilitas equitesque Bovianum perfugerunt. Equites eques sequitur, peditem pedes; diversa cornua dextrum ad castra Samnitium, laevum
12 ad urbem tendit. Prior aliquanto Volumnius castra cepit; ad urbem Scipioni maiore resistitur vi, non quia plus animi victis est sed melius muri quam vallum armatos arcent; inde lapidibus propulsant
13 hostem. Scipio, nisi in primo pavore priusquam colligerentur animi transacta res esset, lentiorem fore munitae urbis oppugnationem ratus, interrogat milites satin aequo animo paterentur ab altero cornu castra capta esse, se victores pelli a portis urbis.
14 Reclamantibus universis primus ipse scuto super caput elato pergit ad portam; secuti alii testudine facta in urbem perrumpunt deturbatisque Samnitibus quae circa portam erant muri occupavere; penetrare

[1] peditum Gronovius: peditum agmen Ω.

as happens when plans are laid beforehand. Lanes were opened up between the files: the cavalry dashed out, and with levelled spears assailed the midst of the enemy's array, and broke his ranks wherever they charged. Hard after them came Volumnius and Scipio, and made havoc of the disordered Samnites. B.C. 293

Then at last, overwhelmed by gods and men, the Linen Cohorts were put to rout; the sworn and the unsworn fled alike, and knew no fear but fear of the enemy. Such portion of the foot as survived the battle was driven to the camp or to Aquilonium; the nobles and cavalry escaped to Bovianum. Horse were pursued by horse, infantry by infantry. The Roman wings advanced on different objectives, the right on the Samnite camp, the left on their city. Volumnius succeeded somewhat sooner in capturing the camp. From the city Scipio met with a more violent resistance—not that vanquished men are more courageous, but walls avail better to keep out armed enemies than does a rampart; and from thence they drove their assailants off with stones. Scipio, fearing that it would be a tedious task to reduce a fortified city, unless the affair were concluded during the first panic of his enemies and before they should collect their spirits, asked his soldiers whether they could be content that the other wing should have taken the camp, while they, though victors, were repulsed from the city gates. When they all together cried out "No!" he himself led the way to the gate, shield over head, and the others, following him, formed a testudo, burst into the city, and hurling down the defenders seized the walls adjoining the gate; they durst not

A.U.C. 461 in interiora urbis, quia pauci admodum erant, non audent.

XLII. Haec primo ignorare consul et intentus recipiendo exercitui esse; iam enim praeceps in occasum sol erat et appetens nox periculosa et 2 suspecta omnia etiam victoribus faciebat. Progressus longius ab dextra capta castra videt, ab laeva clamorem in urbe mixtum pugnantium ac paventium fremitu esse; et tum forte certamen ad portam erat. 3 Advectus deinde equo propius, ut suos in muris videt nec iam integri quicquam esse, quoniam temeritate paucorum magnae rei parta occasio esset, acciri quas receperat copias signaque in urbem inferri 4 iussit. Ingressi proxima ex parte [1] quia nox appropinquabat, quievere. Nocte oppidum ab hostibus desertum est.

5 Caesa illo die ad Aquiloniam Samnitium milia viginti trecenti quadraginta, capta tria milia octingenti et septuaginta, signa militaria nonaginta septem. 6 Ceterum illud memoriae traditur, non ferme alium ducem laetiorem in acie visum seu suopte ingenio 7 seu fiducia bene gerundae rei. Ab eodem robore animi neque controverso auspicio revocari a proelio potuit et in ipso discrimine quo templa deis immorventure into the middle of the city, because their numbers were so small. B.C. 293

[1] ex parte Ω: ea parte Iac. Gronovius.

XLII. Of these events the consul was at first unaware, and was intent upon the withdrawal of his army; for the sun was now rapidly sinking in the west, and night coming on apace made all things dangerous and suspect, even to the victors. As he rode farther forward, he saw on his right hand that the camp was taken, while from the city, on his left, a confused uproar was rising in which the shouts of the combatants were mingled with screams of terror; and it so happened that at that very moment the struggle at the gate was in progress. Then, riding nearer and perceiving that his men were on the walls and that his course was already marked out for him, since the adventurousness of a few men had provided him with a great opportunity, he gave orders that the troops withdrawn should be called back and advance against the city. They entered it on the nearest side, and, as night was approaching, bivouacked; in the night the town was abandoned by the enemy.

There were slain that day of the Samnites at Aquilonia twenty thousand three hundred and forty, and three thousand eight hundred and seventy were captured, with ninety-seven military standards. Tradition also avers that hardly had there ever been a general more joyous in combat, whether owing to his native temper or to his confidence that he should gain the victory. It resulted from the same stoutness of heart that he was not to be recalled from giving battle by the dispute about the omen, and that in the hour of crisis, when it was customary to vow temples to the immortal gods, he made a talibus voveri mos erat voverat Iovi Victori, si legiones hostium fudisset, pocillum mulsi priusquam temetum biberet, sese facturum. Id votum dis cordi fuit et auspicia in bonum verterunt.

A.U.C. 461

XLIII. Eadem fortuna ab altero consule ad Cominium[1] gesta res. Prima luce ad moenia omnibus copiis admotis corona cinxit urbem subsidiaque 2 firma, ne qua eruptio fieret, portis opposuit. Iam signum dantem eum nuntius a collega trepidus de viginti cohortium adventu et ab impetu moratus est et partem copiarum revocare instructam intentamque 3 ad oppugnandum coegit. D. Brutum Scaevam legatum cum legione prima et decem cohortibus alariis equitatuque ire adversus subsidium hostium iussit: 4 quocumque in loco fuisset obvius, obsisteret ac moraretur manumque, si forte ita res posceret, conferret, modo ne ad Cominium eae copiae admoveri 5 possent. Ipse scalas ferri ad muros ab omni parte urbis iussit ac testudine ad portas successit; simul et refringebantur portae et vis undique in muros fiebat. Samnites sicut antequam in muris viderent armatos satis animi habuerunt ad prohibendos urbis 6 aditu hostes, ita, postquam iam non ex intervallo nec missilibus sed comminus gerebatur res et qui aegre

[1] Cominium A^x: cō(or com-)minium Ω: cōmonium P: cōmineum (? F.

[1] The consul's vow was by no means prompted by a spirit of mockery, but was merely an hilarious expression of confidence and good understanding—not without a playful assumption of superiority as a toper, implied in the contrast between pocillum mulsi and temetum. That Jupiter should have savoured the jest shows him to have been blessed with a livelier sense of humour than the elder Pliny, who cites the anecdote (N. H., xiv. 91) as evidence how sparingly wine was used in the old days.

vow to Jupiter the Victor that if he routed the B.C. 293 legions of the enemy he would present him with a thimbleful of mead before he drank strong wine himself. This vow was pleasing to the gods and they gave a good turn to the auspices.[1]

XLIII. The same good fortune attended the other consul at Cominium. With the dawn he led up all his forces under the walls and invested the city, posting strong supports to prevent any sally from the gates. He was in the act of giving the signal when the courier from his colleague came up with the alarming news about the twenty cohorts,[2] thus delaying the assault and obliging him to recall a part of his troops who were already drawn up and eager to attack. He commanded Decimus Brutus Scaeva, his lieutenant, to proceed with the first legion, ten auxiliary cohorts, and the cavalry, to confront the new forces of the enemy: wherever he fell in with them, he was to block their path and delay them, giving battle if the situation happened to require it; but on no account must these troops be suffered to approach Cominium. He himself gave orders to bring up scaling-ladders from every side against the walls of the city, and under a mantlet of shields approached the gates. Thus at the same instant the gates were burst open and the walls assaulted. The Samnites, although, until they beheld armed men upon their walls, they had pluck enough to keep their enemies from coming near the city, yet when the combat was no longer carried on with missiles at long range, but was fought hand-to-hand, and when those who had

[2] See chap. xl. § 6.

A.U.C. 461

successerant ex plano in muros, loco quem magis timuerant victo, facile in hostem imparem ex aequo
7 pugnabant, relictis turribus murisque in forum omnes compulsi paulisper inde temptaverunt extremam
8 pugnae fortunam; deinde abiectis armis ad undecim milia hominum et quadringenti in fidem consulis venerunt; caesa ad quattuor milia octingenti[1] octoginta.

9 Sic ad Cominium, sic ad Aquiloniam gesta res; in medio inter duas urbes spatio, ubi tertia exspectata erat pugna, hostes non inventi. Septem milia passuum cum abessent a Cominio, revocati ab suis
10 neutri proelio occurrerunt. Primis ferme tenebris, cum in conspectu iam castra, iam Aquiloniam habuissent, clamor eos utrimque par accidens susti-
11 nuit; deinde regione[2] castrorum, quae incensa ab Romanis erant, flamma late fusa[3] certioris cladis
12 indicio progredi longius prohibuit; eo ipso loco temere sub armis strati passim inquietum omne tempus noctis exspectando timendoque lucem egere.
13 Prima luce incerti quam in partem intenderent iter repente in fugam consternantur[4] conspecti ab equitibus, qui egressos nocte ab oppido Samnites persecuti viderant multitudinem non vallo, non stationibus

[1] octingenti Gronovius: accc (or other corruptions) Ω.
[2] regione $uA^{1}\zeta$: regionem (or -ē)Ω: e regione ζ.
[3] flamma late fusa $u\zeta$: flammae late fusae Ω.
[4] consternantur $D^{2}\zeta$: consternuntur Ω.

mounted with difficulty from the plain on to the B.C. 293 walls—overcoming the inequality of position, which was what they had chiefly dreaded—were making easy work of it on the level ground with an enemy that was no match for them, they forsook their towers and battlements, and, huddled all together in the market-place, made there one last brief attempt to redeem the day. Then, throwing down their arms, some eleven thousand four hundred men cast themselves on the mercy of the consul; about four thousand eight hundred had been slain.

Such were the operations at Cominium and at Aquilonia. In the place between, where a third battle had been looked for, the enemy were not encountered. Recalled by their leaders when seven miles from Cominium, they had not been present at either engagement. As the evening shadows began to fall, when they had already come within sight of the camp and of Aquilonia, they had been halted by the shouts, which were equally loud from both directions. But afterwards, from the direction of the camp, which had been fired by the Romans, the flames broke out so extensively, with their warning of an unmistakable disaster, as to keep them from advancing further, and throwing themselves on the ground at random, just where they were, without stopping to remove their arms, they passed the whole weary night in waiting for the dawn, which at the same time they dreaded. As the day broke, they were hesitating which way to march, when the Roman cavalry, who had pursued the Samnites when they left their town in the night, caught sight of the army, lying there without breastworks or outpost, and instantly routed them.

A.U.C. 461 14 firmatam. Conspecta et ex muris Aquiloniae ea multitudo erat iamque etiam legionariae cohortes sequebantur; ceterum nec pedes fugientes persequi potuit et ab equite novissimi agminis ducenti ferme et octoginta interfecti; arma multa pavidi ac signa 15 militaria duodeviginti reliquere; alio agmine incolumi, ut ex tanta trepidatione, Bovianum perventum est.

XLIV. Laetitiam utriusque exercitus Romani auxit et ab altera parte feliciter gesta res. Uterque ex alterius sententia consul captum oppidum diri- 2 piendum militi dedit, exhaustis deinde tectis ignem iniecit; eodemque die Aquilonia et Cominium deflagravere et consules cum gratulatione mutua legionum 3 suaque castra coniunxere. In conspectu duorum exercituum et Carvilius suos pro cuiusque merito laudavit donavitque; et Papirius, apud quem multiplex in acie, circa castra, circa urbem fuerat certamen, Sp. Nautium,[1] Sp. Papirium, fratris filium, et quattuor centuriones manipulumque hastatorum armillis 4 aureisque coronis donavit: Nautium propter expeditionem qua magni agminis modo terruerat hostes, iuvenem Papirium propter navatam cum equitatu et in proelio operam et nocte qua fugam[2] infestam 5 Samnitibus ab Aquilonia[3] clam egressis fecit, centuriones militesque quia primi portam murumque Aquiloniae ceperant; equites omnes ob insignem

[1] Sp. Nautium ς (chap. xl. § 8): p. nautium Ω.
[2] qua fugam Aldus: quia fugam Ω.
[3] ab Aquilonia ς: ab Aquiloniam (or -ā) PF: ad aquiloniā (or -am) Ω.

[1] Front-line troops.
[2] This interference was not mentioned at chap. xlii. § 4.

Their mass had been seen, too, from the walls of Aquilonia, and presently the legionary cohorts were likewise in pursuit of them. But the infantry could not overtake the fugitives, though the cavalry killed some two hundred and eighty of the rear-guard, who in their fright abandoned a quantity of arms and eighteen military standards. The rest of the column made good its escape, as safely as could be in so great a confusion, to Bovianum. B.C. 293

XLIV. The rejoicing in each of the Roman armies was enhanced by the good fortune the other had enjoyed. Each consul, with the approval of his fellow, made over the town he had captured to be sacked by the soldiers, and when the houses had been emptied, gave it to the flames. So on the same day Aquilonia and Cominium were destroyed by fire, and the consuls, amid the mutual exultations and good wishes of their legions and themselves, united their camps. In the full sight of both armies Carvilius commended his men as each had merited, and presented them with decorations; and Papirius, who had fought an engagement of many sorts—in line of battle, round the camp, and about the city—awarded armlets and wreaths of gold to Spurius Nautius and to his nephew Spurius Papirius, and to four centurions and a maniple of hastati[1]—to Nautius for the charge by which, as though with a huge force, he had dismayed the enemy; to the young Papirius for his valiant service with the cavalry, both in the battle and in the night when he harassed[2] the flight of the Samnites after their secret departure from Aquilonia; to the centurions and soldiers because they had been the first to capture the gate and wall of Aquilonia. All the horsemen, in recog-multis locis operam corniculis armillisque argenteis donat.

A.U.C. 461

6 Consilium inde habitum iamne [1] tempus esset deducendi de Samnio [2] exercitus aut utriusque aut
7 certe alterius, optimum visum, quo magis fractae res Samnitium essent, eo pertinacius et infestius agere cetera et persequi ut perdomitum Samnium insequentibus consulibus tradi posset.

8 Quando iam nullus esset hostium exercitus, qui signis conlatis dimicaturus videretur, unum superesse belli genus, urbium oppugnationes, quarum per excidia militem locupletare praeda et hostem pro
9 aris ac focis dimicantem conficere possent. Itaque litteris missis ad senatum populumque Romanum de rebus ab se gestis diversi Papirius ad Saepinum, Carvilius ad Veliam [3] oppugnandam legiones ducunt.

XLV. Litterae consulum ingenti laetitia et in curia et in contione auditae, et quadridui supplicatione publicum gaudium privatis studiis celebratum
2 est. Nec populo Romano magna solum sed peropportuna etiam ea victoria fuit, quia per idem forte
3 tempus rebellasse Etruscos allatum est. Subibat cogitatio animum quonam modo tolerabilis futura Etruria fuisset si quid in Samnio adversi evenisset, quae coniuratione Samnitium erecta, quoniam ambo

[1] iamne Conway: cum iam nec TDLA$_2$: cum iam MPFu.
[2] de Samnio Weissenborn: ab (or a) Samnio Ω.
[3] Veliam A^2 and A^5 (marg.): uellam Ω.

nition of their distinguished conduct in many places, B.C. 293 he decorated with little silver horns and silver armlets.

A council of war was then held, and the question was debated whether the time were now come for withdrawing both armies, or at any rate one of the two, from Samnium. But they decided that the greater the damage they had inflicted on the Samnites, the more sharply and pertinaciously ought they to carry out such measures as remained, and to persist until they could hand over to the consuls who succeeded them a Samnium utterly subdued.

Since there was no longer any hostile army that seemed likely to engage in a pitched battle with them, one form of war alone remained, the storming of cities; by destroying which they would be able to enrich their troops with booty and crush their enemies, who would fight for their altars and their hearths. Accordingly, after dispatching letters to the senate and the Roman People recounting their achievements, the consuls parted company, Papirius marching to attack Saepinum, and Carvilius Velia.

XLV. The consuls' letters were listened to with vast exultation both in Senate-house and in assembly, and the general rejoicing found expression in the eagerness with which a thanksgiving of four days' duration was observed by individual citizens. For the Roman People, moreover, it was not only a great but also a very seasonable victory, since it happened that they got news at about the same time that the Etruscans had commenced hostilities again. Men wondered how they could have withstood Etruria if anything had gone wrong in Samnium; for the Samnite coalition and the diversion of both consuls consules omnisque Romana vis aversa in Samnium esset, occupationem populi Romani pro occasione rebellandi habuisset.

A.U.C. 461

4 Legationes sociorum, a M. Atilio praetore in senatum introductae, querebantur uri ac vastari agros a finitimis Etruscis quod desciscere a populo 5 Romano nollent, obtestabanturque patres conscriptos ut se a vi atque iniuria communium hostium tutarentur. Responsum legatis curae senatui futurum ne socios fidei suae paeniteret: Etruscorum propediem eandem fortunam quam Samnitium fore. 6 Segnius tamen, quod ad Etruriam attinebat, acta res esset, ni Faliscos quoque, qui per multos annos in amicitia fuerant, allatum foret arma Etruscis 7 iunxisse. Huius propinquitas populi acuit curam patribus, ut fetiales mittendos ad res repetendas censerent: quibus non redditis ex auctoritate pa- 8 trum iussu populi bellum Faliscis indictum est iussique consules sortiri uter ex Samnio [1] in Etruriam cum exercitu transiret.

9 Iam Carvilius Veliam [2] et Palumbinum et Herculaneum ex Samnitibus ceperat, Veliam [3] intra paucos 10 dies, Palumbinum eodem quo ad muros accessit. Ad Herculaneum etiam signis conlatis ancipiti proelio et cum maiore sua quam hostium iactura dimicavit; castris deinde positis moenibus hostem inclusit; 11 oppugnatum oppidum captumque. In his tribus

[1] Samnio $M^{x}P^{2}P^{3}uD^{3}A^{2}$: samnito $MTDA$: samnitio L: samntio PF?

[2] Veliam $A^{2}\zeta$: ueletiam Ω: uellam etiam u.

[3] Veliam M^{1} (or M^{3}) TA^{1}: ueletiam DLA: uetiam M.

[1] The situation of none of these three towns is known.

and all Rome's military strength to Samnium had B.C. 293 encouraged these other enemies to revolt while the Roman People had their hands full.

Deputations from the allies, introduced into the senate by Marcus Atilius the praetor, complained that their lands were being burnt and devastated by the neighbouring Etruscans, because they were not willing to forsake the Roman People, and besought the Conscript Fathers to defend them against the violence and injuries of their common foes. Answer was made to the deputations that the senate would see to it that the allies should not regret their loyalty: the Etruscans would shortly meet with the same fortune as the Samnites. Nevertheless, the Etruscan business would have dragged but for intelligence that the Faliscans likewise, who had for many years been friendly, were now united in arms with the Etruscans. The proximity of this people sharpened the anxiety of the Fathers, and they decreed that fetials should be dispatched to demand redress. On the refusal of this demand, war was declared against the Faliscans, by command of the people, on the authorization of the senate, and the consuls were bidden to cast lots to determine which should cross over with his army from Samnium into Etruria.

Carvilius had already taken Velia and Palumbinum and Herculaneum[1] from the Samnites—Velia in a few days' time, and Palumbinum the same day that he approached its walls. At Herculaneum he even fought a regular engagement, of which the issue was for some time in doubt and his losses heavier than the enemy's; he then pitched his camp and shut the enemy up within his walls, and finally stormed the town and captured it. In these three urbibus capta aut caesa ad decem milia hominum, ita ut parvo admodum plures caperentur. Sortientibus provincias consulibus Etruria Carvilio evenit secundum vota militum, qui vim frigoris iam in 12 Samnio non patiebantur. Papirio ad Saepinum maior vis hostium restitit. Saepe in acie, saepe in agmine, saepe circa ipsam urbem adversus eruptiones hostium pugnatum. Nec obsidio sed bellum ex aequo erat; non enim muris magis se Samnites quam armis ac viris moenia tutabantur.

A.U.C. 461

13 Tandem pugnando in obsidionem iustam coegit hostes obsidendoque vi atque operibus urbem ex-
14 pugnavit. Itaque ab ira plus caedis editum capta urbe; septem milia quadringenti caesi, capta minus tria milia hominum. Praeda, quae plurima fuit congestis Samnitium rebus in urbes paucas, militi concessa est.

XLVI. Nives iam omnia oppleverant nec durari extra tecta poterat; itaque consul exercitum de
2 Samnio deduxit. Venienti Romam triumphus omnium consensu est delatus. Triumphavit in magistratu, insigni, ut illorum temporum habitus erat,
3 triumpho. Pedites equitesque insignes donis transiere ac transvecti sunt;[1] multae civicae coronae
4 vallaresque ac murales conspectae; inspectata spolia

[1] transvecti sunt ζ: transuectis M$^{2}a\zeta$: transuecti Ω.

[1] The Samnites lived for the most part in small, unfortified villages; cf. chap. xvii. § 2.

[2] The civic crown was conferred on a soldier who saved the life of a fellow-citizen; the others on the first man to mount the enemy's rampart and city wall, respectively.

places ten thousand or so of the enemy were taken B.C. 293 or put to death, with the prisoners very slightly outnumbering the slain. When the consuls cast lots for their commands, Etruria fell to Carvilius, thus answering the prayers of his soldiers, who could endure no longer the rigorous cold in Samnium. Papirius, before Saepinum, had a larger body of the enemy still to reckon with. His troops were many times engaged in regular battle, many times when marching, and many times about the city itself, in resisting the sorties of the enemy. It was not a siege, but war upon even terms; for the Samnites protected their walls with arms and men full as much as the walls protected them. At length, fighting hard, he forced the enemy to submit to a regular blockade, and by assault and siege-works captured the place. The exasperation of the Romans made the massacre more bloody when the city fell. Seven thousand four hundred were slain and fewer than three thousand were made prisoners. The booty, which was very great, since the Samnites had gathered their wealth together in a few cities,[1] was handed over to the soldiers.

XLVI. The ground was now covered with snow and men could no longer live out of doors. The consul therefore withdrew his army from Samnium. On his coming to Rome he was unanimously voted a triumph. This he celebrated, while still holding office, in a style which, for the circumstances of those days, was magnificent. Foot-soldiers and horsemen marched or rode past the crowds adorned with their decorations; many civic crowns were seen, and many that had been won at the escalade of a rampart or a city wall.[2] Men inspected the spoils that he had

A.U.C. 461

Samnitium et decore[1] ac pulchritudine paternis spoliis, quae nota frequenti publicorum ornatu locorum erant, comparabantur: nobiles aliquot captivi,[2] clari suis patrumque factis, ducti. Aeris gravis travecta viciens centum milia et quingenta[3] triginta tria milia; id aes redactum ex captivis dicebatur; argenti quod captum ex urbibus erat pondo mille[4] octingenta[5] triginta. Omne aes argentumque in aerarium conditum, militibus nihil datum ex praeda est; auctaque ea invidia est ad plebem quod tributum etiam in stipendium militum conlatum est, cum, si spreta gloria fuisset captivae pecuniae in aerarium inlatae, et militi tum donum[6] dari ex praeda et stipendium militare praestari[7] potuisset. Aedem Quirini dedicavit—quam in ipsa dimicatione votam apud neminen veterem auctorem invenio neque hercule tam exiguo tempore perficere potuisset—ab dictatore patre votam filius consul dedicavit exornavitque hostium spoliis; quorum tanta multitudo fuit ut non templum tantum forumque iis ornaretur sed sociis etiam coloniisque[8] finitimis ad templorum locorumque publicorum ornatum dividerentur. Ab triumpho exercitum in agrum Vescinum,[9] quia regio ea infesta ab Samnitibus erat, hibernatum duxit.

[1] decore $M^{2}uL^{3}A^{2}$: decorem MPT: decoram F: decor DLA.
[2] captivi $I^{2}uT^{2}D^{3}A^{2}$: actiui F: captivis Ω.
[3] quingenta Gelenius: a Ω: ad $T^{2}u$: omitted by L.
[4] pondo mille Alschefski: p̄ co (or other corruptions) Ω.
[5] octingenta Alschefski: accc (or similar corruptions) Ω.
[6] militi tum donum Walters and Conway: militi tum (or militum) Ω.
[7] praestari $F^{3}uL^{3}$(or L^{5})A^{2}(or A^{1}): praestare Ω.
[8] coloniisque uA^{3}Madvig: colonisque Ω.

taken from the Samnites, and compared them for splendour and beauty with those his father had won, which were familiar to them from being often used in the decoration of public places. A number of noble captives, famous for their own and their fathers' deeds, were led in the procession. Of heavy bronze there were carried past two million five hundred and thirty-three thousand pounds. This bronze had been collected, it was said, from the sale of captives. Of silver which had been taken from the cities there were eighteen hundred and thirty pounds. All the bronze and silver was placed in the Treasury, none of the booty being given to the soldiers. The ill-feeling which this gave rise to in the plebs was increased by the gathering of a war-tax to pay the troops, since, if the consul had forgone the glory of depositing the captured money in the Treasury, the booty would then have afforded the soldiers a donative, as well as providing for their pay. Papirius dedicated the temple of Quirinus. I find no ancient authority who states that it was vowed in the hour of conflict, nor indeed could it possibly have been completed in so short a time: his father had vowed it when dictator, and the son as consul dedicated it, adorning it with the spoils of the enemy. Of these there was such a great quantity that not only were the temple and the Forum bedecked with them, but they were distributed also amongst the allies and the neighbouring colonies for the decoration of their temples and public squares. After triumphing, Papirius led his army into the country of the Vescini—a district infested by the Samnites—to pass the winter. B.C. 293

[9] Vescinum Sigonius (cf. chap. XX. § 1): uestinum MPFuDLA.

A.U.C. 461

10 Inter haec Carvilius consul in Etruria Troilum primum oppugnare adortus quadringentos septuaginta ditissimos, pecunia grandi pactos ut abire inde 11 liceret, dimisit; ceteram multitudinem oppidumque ipsum vi cepit. Inde quinque castella locis sita 12 munitis expugnavit. Caesa ibi hostium duo milia quadringenti, minus duo milia capta. Et Faliscis pacem petentibus annuas indutias dedit, pactus centum milia gravis aeris et stipendium eius anni militi- 13 bus. His rebus actis ad triumphum decessit, ut minus clarum de Samnitibus quam collegae triumphus fuerat 14 ita cumulo Etrusci belli aequatum. Aeris gravis tulit in aerarium trecenta octoginta milia; reliquo aere aedem Fortis Fortunae de manubiis faciendam locavit prope aedem eius deae ab rege Ser. Tullio[1] 15 dedicatam, et militibus ex praeda centenos binos asses et alterum tantum centurionibus atque equitibus, malignitate collegae gratius accipientibus 16 munus, divisit. Favor consulis tutatus ad populum est L. Postumium legatum eius, qui dicta die a M. Scantio tribuno plebis fugerat legatione,[2] ut fama ferebat, populi iudicium; iactarique magis quam peragi accusatio eius poterat.

[1] Tullio u_2: tullo Ω.
[2] legatione Perizonius: in legatione F: in legationem Ω.

[1] Site unknown.

[2] The temple was not mentioned by Livy in his account of that king's reign (I. xxxix.–xlviii.).

[3] The course of events somewhat obscurely indicated here would seem to have been as follows:—When Scantius lodged the indictment, Carvilius procured Postumius immunity for a year by making him a legatus. On the expiration of the year some successor of Scantius revived the prosecution, but was induced by the friends of Carvilius to let the proceedings drop.

In Etruria meanwhile the consul Carvilius, having B.C. 293 made his preparations to begin with an attack on Troilum,[1] agreed with four hundred and seventy of the wealthiest inhabitants for a large sum of money to let them go; the rest of the population and the town itself he took by assault. He then stormed five fortresses situated in positions of great strength. There he slew two thousand four hundred of the enemy, making fewer than two thousand prisoners. He also granted a year's truce to the Faliscans—who came to him seeking peace—having stipulated for a hundred thousand of heavy bronze and the year's pay for his soldiers. After these exploits he departed to enjoy his triumph, which, though less distinguished than his colleague's had been for success against the Samnites, was a match for it when the Etruscan war was counted in. Of heavy bronze he lodged in the Treasury three hundred and eighty thousand pounds; with what remained he contracted for a temple to Fors Fortuna to be erected from the general's spoils, near the temple of that goddess dedicated by King Servius Tullius,[2] while to the soldiers he apportioned from the rest of the booty one hundred and two asses each, and as much again to the centurions and horsemen. These allowances were all the more welcome because of the parsimony of his colleague. The consul's popularity served to shield his lieutenant Lucius Postumius from the people. He had been indicted by Marcus Scantius, a plebeian tribune, but had escaped trial before the people—so the story ran—through his appointment to the lieutenancy; so that it was easier to threaten him than to carry home the accusation.[3]

A.U.C. 462

XLVII. Exacto iam anno novi tribuni plebis magistratum inierant; hisque ipsis, quia vitio creati
2 erant, quinque post dies alii[1] suffecti. Lustrum conditum eo anno est a P. Cornelio Arvina C. Marcio Rutulo[2] censoribus: censa capitum milia ducenta sexaginta duo trecenta viginti unum. Censores vicesimi sexti a primis censoribus, lustrum unde-
3 vicesimum fuit. Eodem anno coronati primum ob res bello bene gestas ludos Romanos spectarunt palmaeque tum primum translato e Graeco more victori-
4 bus datae. Eodem anno ab aedilibus curulibus qui eos ludos fecerunt damnatis aliquot pecuariis, via a Martis silice ad Bovillas perstrata est.

5 Comitia consularia L. Papirius habuit; creavit consules Q. Fabium Maximi filium Gurgitem et D. Iunium Brutum Scaevam. Ipse Papirius praetor factus.

6 Multis rebus laetus annus vix ad solacium unius mali, pestilentiae urentis simul urbem atque agros, suffecit:[3] portentoque iam similis clades erat, et libri aditi quinam finis aut quod remedium eius mali

[1] alii $M^{z}uI^{z}A^{z}$: aliis Ω.
[2] Rutulo Conway: rutilo MP: rutilio Ω.
[3] suffecit uA^{3}; sufficit (or sub-) Ω.

[1] This was a sacrifice of purification performed as the final ceremony of the census-taking. "To close the lustrum" is therefore to complete the census.

XLVII. The year having now run its course, new B.C. 292 tribunes of the plebs came in, but owing to a flaw in their election they were themselves supplanted by others, five days later. The lustrum[1] was closed that year by the censors Publius Cornelius Arvina and Gaius Marcius Rutulus; there were enrolled two hundred and sixty-two thousand three hundred and twenty-one. The censors were the twenty-sixth pair from the first censors; the lustrum was the nineteenth. This year for the first time those who had been presented with crowns because of gallant behaviour in the war wore them at the Roman games, and palms were then for the first time conferred upon the victors, in accordance with a custom borrowed from the Greeks. The same year the curule aediles who gave those games procured the conviction of a number of graziers,[2] and with their fines paved the road from the temple of Mars as far as Bovillae.[3]

The consular comitia were held by Lucius Papirius, who declared the election of Quintus Fabius Gurges, the son of Maximus, and Decimus Junius Brutus Scaeva. Papirius himself was chosen praetor.

The year had been one of many blessings, which yet were hardly a consolation for one misfortune—a pestilence which ravaged both city and country-side. Its devastation was now grown portentous, and the Books were consulted to discover what end

[2] The men were probably fined for appropriating more than the legal maximum of public land. Compare chap. xxiii. § 13.

[3] This refers to the Via Appia itself (which had apparently not been fully paved—perstrata—before) rather than to the footway referred to at chap. xxiii. § 12.

A.U.C. 462

7 ab dis[1] daretur. Inventum in libris Aesculapium ab Epidauro Romam arcessendum; neque eo anno, quia bello occupati consules erant, quicquam de ea re actum, praeterquam quod unum diem Aesculapio supplicatio habita est.

[1] ab dis Madvig: ab (or a) diis Ω.

[1] It was two or three years later and the pestilence was still raging when a deputation under Q. Ogulnius was disor what remedy the gods proposed for this misfortune. B.C. 292

It was discovered in the Books that Aesculapius must be summoned to Rome from Epidaurus; but nothing could be done about it that year, because the consuls were occupied with the war, except that for one day a supplication to that god was held.[1] patched to Epidaurus and brought away a serpent to Rome which passed for the god himself. A temple of Aesculapius was then erected on the island in the Tiber. See Summary of Book XI.

LIBRI X PERIOCHA

Coloniae deductae sunt Sora et Alba et Carsioli. Marsi in deditionem accepti sunt. Collegium augurum ampliatum est, ut essent novem, cum antea quaterni fuissent. Lex de provocatione ad populum a Murena cos. tertio tunc lata est. Duae tribus adiectae sunt, Aniensis et Terentina. Samnitibus bellum indictum est et adversus eos saepe prospere pugnatum est. Cum adversus Etruscos Umbros Samnites Gallos P. Decio et Q. Fabio ducibus pugnaretur et Romanus exercitus in magno discrimine esset, P. Decius, secutus patris exemplum, devovit se pro exercitu et morte sua victoriam eius pugnae populo R. dedit. Papirius Cursor Samnitium exercitum, qui de iureiurando obstrictus, quo maiore constantia virtutis pugnaret, in aciem descenderat, fudit. Census actus est, lustrum conditum. Censa sunt civium capita CCLXXII et CCCXX.

---

[1] M. Valerius, according to Livy, chap. ix. § 3.

SUMMARY OF BOOK X

Colonies were planted at Sora, at Alba, and at Carseoli. The surrender of the Marsi was received. The augural college was enlarged so that there were nine where before there had been four. A law about appeals was then for the third time laid before the people by the consul Murena.[1] Two tribes were added, the Aniensis and the Terentina. War was declared upon the Samnites and victories were often gained over them. When the Etruscans, Umbrians, Samnites, and Gauls were being fought under the leadership of Publius Decius and Quintus Fabius and the Roman army was in sore peril, Publius Decius, following the example of his father, devoted himself on behalf of the army and by his death gave the victory in that battle to the Roman People. Papirius Cursor routed the army of the Samnites, which had taken the field after binding itself with an oath, that it might fight with a more constant courage. The census was taken and the lustrum closed. There were enumerated 272,320 citizens.

LIBRI XI PERIOCHA

Cum Fabius Gurges cos. male adversus Samnites pugnasset et senatus de removendo eo ab exercitu ageret, Fabius Maximus pater deprecatus hanc filii ignominiam eo maxime senatum movit quod iturum se filio legatum pollicitus est, idque praestitit. Eius consiliis et opera filius consul adiutus caesis Samnitibus triumphavit; C. Pontium, imperatorem Samnitium, ductum in triumpho, securi percussit. Cum pestilentia civitas laboraret, missi legati ut Aesculapi signum Romam ab Epidauro transferrent, anguem, qui se in navem eorum contulerat, in quo ipsum numen esse constabat, deportaverunt; eoque in insulam Tiberis egresso eodem loco aedis Aesculapio constituta est. L. Postumius consularis, quoniam, cum exercitui praeesset, opera militum in agro suo usus erat, damnatus est. Pacem petentibus Samnitibus[1] foedus quarto renovatum est. Curius Dentatus cos. Samnitibus caesis et Sabinis, qui rebellaverant, victis et in deditionem acceptis bis in eodem magistratu triumphavit. Coloniae deductae sunt Castrum Sena Hadria. Triumviri capitales tunc primum creati sunt. Censu acto lustrum conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita CCLXXII. Plebs propter aes alienum post[2] graves et longas seditiones ad ultimum secessit in Ianiculum, unde a Q. Hortensio dictatore deducta est; isque in ipso magistratu decessit. Res praeterea contra Vulsinienses gestas continet, item adversus Lucanos, contra quos auxilium Thurinis[3] ferre placuerat.

[1] petentibus Samnitibus a late MS.: petentibus MSS.
[2] post Sigonius ex. vet. lib.: propter MSS.
[3] Thurinis Pighius (Plin. N. H. XXXIV. 32, Val. Max. I. viii. 6, Dion. Hal. XIX. xiii): tyrrhenis or tyrrinis MSS.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XI

When Fabius Gurges the consul had fought an unsuccessful battle with the Samnites and the senate was debating his removal from the command, Fabius Maximus his father begged them to spare his son this ignominy. What particularly moved the senate was his promise to go out as his son's lieutenant, which he did. Aided by his advice and services, his son the consul defeated the Samnites and triumphed. Gaius Pontius, the general of the Samnites, was led in the triumph and beheaded. When the state was troubled with a pestilence, the envoys dispatched to bring over the image of Aesculapius from Epidaurus to Rome fetched away a serpent, which had crawled into their ship and in which it was generally believed that the god himself was present. On the serpent's going ashore on the island of the Tiber, a temple was erected there to Aesculapius. The consular Lucius Postumius was convicted of having used the labour of soldiers on his own land when in command of the army. The Samnites sought peace and the treaty with them was renewed for the fourth time. Curius Dentatus the consul having slaughtered the Samnites and conquered the Sabines, who had revolted, and received their submission, triumphed twice in the same year of office. Colonies were established at Castrum, Sena, and Hadria. A board of three to deal with capital offences was then chosen for the first time. The number of citizens was returned as 272,000. Because of their debts, the plebs, after serious and protracted quarrels, seceded to Janiculum, whence they were brought back by Quintus Hortensius the dictator, who died before the expiration of his term. The book contains also campaigns with the Vulsinienses and likewise with the Lucanians, against whom the Romans had voted to assist the people of Thurii.

LIBRI XII PERIOCHA

Cum legati Romanorum a Gallis Senonibus interfecti essent, bello ob id Gallis indicto, L. Caecilius praetor ab his cum legionibus caesus est. Cum a Tarentinis classis Romana direpta esset, IIviro qui praeerat classi occiso, legati ad eos a senatu, ut de his iniuriis quererentur, missi pulsati sunt. Ob id bellum his indictum est. Samnites defecerunt. Adversus eos et Lucanos et Brittios et Etruscos aliquot proeliis a compluribus ducibus bene pugnatum est. Pyrrhus, Epirotarum rex, ut auxilium Tarentinis ferret, in Italiam venit. Cum in praesidium Reginorum legio Campana cum praefecto Decio Vibellio missa esset, occisis Reginis Regium[1] occupavit.

LIBRI XIII PERIOCHA

Valerius Laevinus cos. parum prospere adversus Pyrrhum pugnavit, elephantorum maxime inusitata facie territis militibus. Post id proelium cum corpora Romanorum qui in acie ceciderant Pyrrhus inspiceret, omnia versa in hostem invenit[2] populabundusque ad urbem Romanam processit. C. Fabricius missus ad eum a senatu, ut de redimendis captivis ageret, frustra ut patriam desereret a rege temptatus est. Captivi sine pretio remissi sunt. Cineas legatus a Pyrrho ad senatum missus petit ut conponendae pacis causa rex in urbem reciperetur. De qua re cum ad frequentiorem senatum referri placuisset, Appius Claudius, qui propter valetudinem oculorum iam diu consiliis publicis se abstinuerat,

[1] Regium vulg. : regnum MSS.
[2] invenit vulg. : venit MSS.

[1] sc. Bruttii. [2] sc. Rhegium.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XII

Roman envoys having been put to death by the Senonian Gauls, war was for that reason declared against the Gauls, and Lucius Caecilius the praetor and his legions were cut to pieces by them. The Tarentines plundered a Roman fleet, slew the duumvir who commanded it, and maltreated the envoys whom the senate had dispatched to them to complain of these wrongs. On this account war was declared against them. The Samnites revolted. Several successful battles were fought with them and with the Lucanians and the Brittii[1] and the Etruscans, under a number of generals. Pyrrhus, king of the Epirots, came to Italy to help the Tarentines. A Campanian legion, commanded by Decius Vibellius, being sent to protect the people of Regium,[2] put the inhabitants to death and seized the city.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XIII

The consul Valerius Laevinus fought a losing engagement with Pyrrhus, the soldiers being greatly terrified by the strange sight of the elephants. After this battle, when Pyrrhus was looking at the bodies of the Romans who had fallen, he found that they all faced their enemies, and laying waste the country, advanced towards the city of Rome. Gaius Fabricius, being sent to him by the senate to treat for the ransom of the prisoners, was in vain solicited by the King to forsake his country. The prisoners were released without a price. Cineas, having been dispatched by Pyrrhus as an envoy to the senate, asked that the King might be received into the City for the purpose of arranging terms of peace. On its having been resolved to refer this proposal to a fuller meeting of the senate, Appius Claudius, who by reason of a weakness of the eyes had long abstained from public venit in curiam et sententia sua tenuit ut id Pyrrho negaretur. Cn. Domitius censor primus ex plebe lustrum condidit. Censa sunt civium capita CCXXXXVII CCXXII. Iterum adversus Pyrrhum dubio eventu pugnatum est. Cum Carthaginiensibus quarto foedus renovatum est. Cum C. Fabricio consuli is qui ad eum a Pyrrho transfugerat polliceretur venenum se regi daturum, cum indicio ad regem remissus est. Res praeterea contra Lucanos et Bruttios, Samnites et Etruscos[1] prospere gestas continet.

LIBRI XIIII PERIOCHA

Pyrrhus in Siciliam traiecit. Cum inter alia prodigia fulmine deiectum esset in Capitolio Iovis signum, caput eius per haruspices inventum est. Curius Dentatus cos. cum[2] dilectum haberet, eius qui citatus non responderat bona primus vendidit; iterum Pyrrhum ex Sicilia in Italiam reversum vicit et Italia expulit. Fabricius censor P. Cornelium Rufinum consularem senatu movit, quod is x pondo argenti facti haberet. Lustro a censoribus condito censa sunt civium capita CCLXXI CCXXIIII. Cum Ptolemaeo, Aegypti rege, societas iuncta est. Sextilia, virgo Vestalis, damnata incesti viva defossa est. Coloniae deductae sunt Posidonia et Cosa. Carthaginiensium classis auxilio Tarentinis venit. quo facto ab his foedus violatum est. Res praeterea contra Lucanos et Bruttios et Samnites feliciter gestas et Pyrrhi regis mortem continet.

[1] et Etruscos vulg. : etruscos MSS.
[2] cos. cum Rossbach : ·is· cum MSS.

business, entered the Curia and by his speech prevailed on the senators to deny Pyrrhus his request. Gnaeus Domitius was the first plebeian censor to close the lustrum. The number of the citizens was returned as 287,222. There was a second battle with Pyrrhus, of an indecisive nature. The treaty with the Carthaginians was renewed for the fourth time. When a deserter from Pyrrhus promised Gaius Fabricius the consul that he would poison the King, Fabricius sent him back to the King with the story of his guilt. The book contains also successful campaigns against the Lucanians and the Bruttians, the Samnites and the Etruscans.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XIV

Pyrrhus crossed into Sicily. When, amongst other prodigies, the statue of Jupiter in the Capitol had been thrown down by a thunderbolt, its head was discovered by haruspices. The consul Curius Dentatus, on holding a levy, was the first to sell the goods of any man who did not answer the summons; he likewise defeated Pyrrhus, who had returned from Sicily into Italy, and drove him out of Italy. The censor Fabricius removed Publius Cornelius Rufinus, an ex-consul, from the senate, because he had in his possession ten pounds of wrought silver. When the censors had closed the lustrum, there were found to be 271,224 citizens. An alliance was made with Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Sextilia, a Vestal Virgin, was found guilty of unchastity and was buried alive. The colonies of Posidonia and Cosa were established. A fleet of the Carthaginians came to the assistance of the Tarentines, an act which constituted a violation of the treaty. The book also contains successful wars with the Lucanians, the Bruttians, and the Samnites, and the death of King Pyrrhus.

LIBRI XV PERIOCHA

Victis Tarentinis pax et libertas data est.[1] Legio Campana quae Regium occupaverat obsessa deditione facta securi percussa est. Cum legatos Apolloniatium ad senatum missos quidam iuvenes pulsassent, dediti sunt Apolloniatibus. Picentibus victis pax data est. Coloniae deductae Ariminum in Piceno, Beneventum in Samnio.[2] Tunc primum populus R.[3] argento uti coepit. Umbri et Sallentini[4] victi in deditionem accepti sunt. Quaestorum numerus ampliatus est, ut essent octo.[5]

LIBRI XVI PERIOCHA

Origo Carthaginiensium et primordia urbis eorum referuntur. Contra quos et Hieronem, regem Syracusanorum, auxilium Mamertinis ferendum senatus censuit, cum de ea re inter suadentes ut id fieret dissuadentesque contentio fuisset; transgressisque tunc primum mare equitibus[6] Romanis adversus Hieronem saepius bene pugnatum. Petenti pax data est. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita CCCLXXXII CCXXXIIII. Decimus Iunius Brutus munus gladiatorium in honorem defuncti patris primus edidit. Colonia Aesernia deducta est. Res praeterea contra Poenos et Vulsinios[7] prospere gestas continet.

[1] data est vulg.: nata est MSS.
[2] Beneventum in Samnio editio princeps: Beneventum MSS.
[3] populus R. vulg.: populus MSS.
[4] Sallentini vulg.: salleni (or saleni or salerni) MSS.
[5] ut essent octo Sigonius: ut essent MSS.
[6] equitibus MSS: exercitibus Weissenborn.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XV

The Tarentines, having been vanquished, were granted peace and liberty. The Campanian legion which had seized Regium[1] was besieged and forced to surrender and its members were beheaded. Envoys from Apollonium to the senate were beaten by certain youths, who were given up to the people of Apollonium. The Picentes were defeated and granted peace. Colonies were sent out to Ariminum in the Picentian district and to Beneventum in Samnium. Then for the first time the Roman People began to use silver.[2] The Umbrians and the Sallentines were conquered and their submission was received. The number of quaestors was enlarged, so that there were eight.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XVI

The origin of the Carthaginians and the beginnings of their city are described. Against them and against Hiero, king of the Syracusans, the senate determined to assist the Mamertines, after a bitter debate about the proposal between its advocates and its opponents. Then for the first time Roman cavalry[3] crossed the sea, and fought a number of victorious engagements against Hiero. On his suing for peace, it was granted him. The lustrum was closed by the censors. There were enumerated 382,234 citizens. Decimus Junius Brutus was the first to give a gladiatorial exhibition, in honour of his dead father. The colony of Aesernia was planted. The book contains also successful operations carried on against the Carthaginians and the Vulsinii.

[1] sc. Rhegium. [2] i.e. silver coinage.
[3] Or "armies," if we accept Weissenborn's emendation.

Vulsinios vulg. : uulsinos MSS.

LIBRI XVII PERIOCHA

Cn. Cornelius consul a classe Punica circumventus et per fraudem, veluti in conloquium evocatus, captus est. C. Duillius consul adversus classem Poenorum prospere pugnavit, primusque omnium Romanorum ducum navalis victoriae duxit triumphum. Ob quam causam ei perpetuus quoque honos habitus est, ut revertenti a cena tibicine canente funale praeferretur. L. Cornelius consul in Sardinia et Corsica contra Sardos et Corsos et Hannonem, Poenorum ducem, feliciter pugnavit. Atilius Calatinus[1] cos. cum in locum a Poenis circumsessum temere exercitum duxisset, M. Calpurni, tribuni militum, virtute et opera evasit, qui cum CCC militibus eruptione facta hostes in se converterat. Hannibal, dux Poenorum, victa classe cui praefuerat, a militibus suis in crucem sublatus est. Atilius Regulus cos. victis navali proelio Poenis in Africam traiecit.

LIBRI XVIII PERIOCHA

Atilius Regulus in Africa serpentem portentosae magnitudinis cum magna clade militum occidit, et cum aliquot proeliis bene adversus Carthaginienses pugnasset, successorque ei a senatu prospere bellum gerenti non mitteretur, id ipsum per litteras ad senatum scriptas questus est, in quibus inter causas petendi successoris erat[2] quod agellus eius a mercennariis desertus esset. Quaerente deinde Fortuna ut magnum utriusque casus exemplum in Regulo

[1] Calatinus vulg.: calasinus MSS.
[2] successoris erat vulg.: successoris MSS.

[1] cf. Cic. Cato Maior, § 44.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XVII

The consul Gnaeus Cornelius was surrounded by a Carthaginian fleet and was made prisoner by fraud, having been lured out as to a colloquy. The consul Gaius Duillius fought a successful engagement with the fleet of the Carthaginians and was first of all Roman leaders to triumph for a naval victory. For this reason he was granted a perpetual honour—that a waxen torch should be borne before him and a flautist should make music when he returned from dining out.[1] The consul Lucius Cornelius fought successfully in Sardinia and Corsica against the Sardinians and Corsicans and against Hanno, the Carthaginian general. The consul Atilius Calatinus having rashly led his army into a place surrounded by the Carthaginians, escaped through the valiant services of Marcus Calpurnius, a tribune of the soldiers, who with three hundred men broke through the enemy and drew their attack upon himself. Hannibal, a Carthaginian general, on the defeat of the fleet which he commanded, was crucified by his own soldiers. Atilius Regulus the consul, having beaten the Carthaginians in a naval battle, crossed into Africa.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XVIII

Atilius Regulus in Africa slew a serpent of portentous size with the loss of many of his soldiers. Having fought several successful battles with the Carthaginians, and finding that owing to his good fortune in the prosecution of the war the senate was not disposed to send anyone to succeed him, he wrote to the senate and complained of this very thing, alleging, amongst other reasons for desiring a successor, that his little farm had been deserted by the labourers hired to work it. Afterwards, on Fortune's seeking to exhibit in the case of Regulus an proderetur, arcessito a Carthaginiensibus Xanthippo, Lacedaemoniorum duce, victus proelio et captus est. Res deinde a ducibus Romanis omnibus terra marique prospere gestas deformaverunt naufragia classium. Tib. Coruncanius primus ex plebe pontifex maximus creatus est. M'. Valerius Maximus P. Sempronius Sophus[1] censores cum senatum legerent, XVI senatu moverunt. Lustrum condiderunt, quo censa sunt civium capita CCXCVII DCCXCVII. Regulus missus a Carthaginiensibus ad senatum ut de pace, et si eam non posset impetrare, de commutandis captivis ageret, et iureiurando adstrictus rediturum se Carthaginem, si commutari captivos non placuisset, utrumque negandi auctor senatui[2] fuit, et cum fide custodita reversus esset, supplicio a Carthaginiensibus de eo sumpto perit.

LIBRI XVIIII PERIOCHA

Caecilius Metellus rebus adversus Poenos prospere gestis speciosum egit triumphum, XIII ducibus hostium et CXX elephantis in eo ductis. Claudius Pulcher cos. contra auspicia profectus—iussit mergi pullos, qui cibari nolebant—infeliciter adversus Carthaginienses classe pugnavit, et revocatus a senatu iussusque dictatorem dicere Claudium Gliciam dixit, sortis ultimae hominem, qui coactus abdicare se magistratu postea ludos praetextatus spectavit. A. Atilius Calatinus[3] primus dictator extra Italiam exercitum

[1] The censors' names, variously corrupted in the MSS., are corrected from the Fasti Capitolini, C.I.L. I², p. 24.
[2] senatui vulg. : senatus MSS.
[3] calatinus vulg : calanus MSS.

[1] The Regulus story inspired Horace to write his finest ode (Carm. III. 5).

example of both extremes, the Carthaginians sent for Xanthippus, a general of the Lacedaemonians, who defeated Regulus in battle and made him prisoner. After that all the Roman generals gained victories on land and sea; but these were marred by the wreck of fleets. Tiberius Coruncanius was the first to be chosen pontifex maximus from the plebs. Manius Valerius Maximus and Publius Sempronius Sophus, when as censors they were passing on the senate, removed sixteen from that order. They closed the lustrum and the number of citizens returned was 297,797. Regulus being sent by the Carthaginians to the senate to treat for peace, or, failing that, for an exchange of prisoners, and being bound by an oath to return to Carthage, if the Romans would not exchange, advised the senate to grant neither request, and having loyally returned, was tortured to death by the Carthaginians.[1]

SUMMARY OF BOOK XIX

Caecilius Metellus, after a prosperous campaign against the Carthaginians, triumphed brilliantly, having thirteen of the enemy's generals and a hundred and twenty elephants in his procession. The consul Claudius Pulcher having set out in opposition to the auspices—he ordered the chickens to be drowned, when they would not feed[2]—fought an unsuccessful naval engagement with the Carthaginians, and on being recalled by the senate and directed to name a dictator, named Claudius Glicia, a man of the basest sort, who afterwards, when he had been forced to abdicate the office, witnessed the games in his purple-bordered toga. Aulus Atilius Calatinus was the first dictator to lead an army out of Italy. An duxit. Commutatio captivorum cum Poenis facta est. Coloniae deductae sunt Fregenae, in agro Sallentino Brundisium. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita CCXII CCXII. Claudia, soror P. Claudi, qui contemptis auspiciis male pugnaverat, a ludis revertens cum turba premeretur, dixit: Utinam frater meus viveret; iterum classem duceret. Ob eam causam multa ei dicta est. Duo praetores tunc primum creati sunt. Caecilius Metellus, pontifex maximus, A. Postumium[1] consulem, quoniam idem et flamen Martialis erat, cum is ad bellum gerendum proficisci vellet, in urbe tenuit nec passus est a sacris recedere. Rebus adversus Poenos a pluribus ducibus prospere gestis, summam victoriae[2] C. Lutatius cos. victa ad Aegates insulas classe Poenorum imposuit. Petentibus Carthaginiensibus pax data est. Cum templum Vestae arderet, Caecilius Metellus, pontifex maximus, ex incendio sacra rapuit. Duae tribus adiectae sunt, Velina et Quirina.

[2] According to Cicero, De Natura Deorum, II. 7, Claudius had the fowls thrown into water, "that they might drink, since they would not eat."

LIBRI XX PERIOCHA

Falisci cum rebellassent, sexto die perdomiti in deditionem venerunt. Spoletium colonia deducta est. Adversus Ligures tunc primum exercitus promotus est. Sardi et Corsi cum rebellassent, subacti sunt. Tuccia,[3] virgo Vestalis, incesti damnata est. Bellum Illyriis propter unum ex legatis qui ad eos missi erant occisum indictum est, subactique in deditionem venerunt. Praetorum numerus ampliatus est, ut essent IIII. Galli transalpini qui in Italiam inruperant caesi sunt. Eo bello populum exchange of prisoners with the Carthaginians was effected. Colonies were founded at Fregenae[1] and in the Sallentine country at Brundisium. The lustrum was closed by the censors. 241,212 citizens were registered. Claudia, the sister of Publius Claudius, who had been defeated after making light of the auspices, being jostled by the crowd while returning from the games, exclaimed, "O that my brother were alive to command another fleet!" For this she was fined. Then for the first time two praetors were elected. Caecilius Metellus, the pontifex maximus, kept Aulus Postumius, the consul, in the City, since he was also the flamen of Mars, when he desired to go forth to war, nor would he suffer him to forsake his sacred functions. After a number of generals had gained successes against the Carthaginians, Gaius Lutatius crowned the victory by defeating the Carthaginian fleet off the Aegatian Islands. The Carthaginians sued for peace and it was granted them. When the temple of Vesta was burning, Caecilius Metellus, the pontifex maximus, rescued the sacred objects from the flames. Two tribes were added, the Velina and the Quirina.

[1] A. Postumium vulg.: aurelium postumium MSS.
[2] victoriae vulg.: victoriam MSS.
[3] Tuccia Sigonius ex vet. lib.: lucia (or Luccia) MSS. Tucia ed. prin.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XX

The Faliscans, having revolted, were on the sixth day subdued and permitted to surrender. A colony was planted at Spoletium. Then for the first time an army marched against the Ligurians. The Sardinians and Corsicans having revolted were reduced to subjection. Tuccia, a Vestal Virgin, was convicted of unchastity. War was declared against the Illyrians on account of the murder of one of the envoys who had been dispatched to them, and they were subdued and received in surrender. The number of praetors was enlarged to four. Transalpine Gauls who had made an incursion into Italy were cut to pieces. The author states that in that war the [1] Near the coast about due W. of Rome.

R. sui Latinique nominis $\overline{\text{DCCC}}$ armatorum [1] habuisse dicit Exercitibus Romanis tunc primum trans Padum ductis Galli Insubres aliquot proeliis fusi in deditionem venerunt. M. Claudius Marcellus cos. occiso Gallorum Insubrium duce, Vertomaro,[2] opima spolia rettulit. Histri subacti sunt. Iterum Illyri cum rebellassent, domiti in deditionem venerunt. Lustrum a censoribus ter [3] conditum est. Primo lustro censa sunt civium capita CCLXX CCXII. Libertini in quattuor tribus redacti sunt, cum antea dispersi per omnes fuissent, Esquilinam Palatinam Suburanam Collinam. C. Flaminius censor viam Flaminiam muniit [4] et circum Flaminium exstruxit. Coloniae deductae sunt in agro de Gallis [5] capto Placentia et Cremona.

[1] $\overline{\text{DCCC}}$ armatorum Mommsen: ACCC MSS.

[2] Vertomaro MSS.: Virtomane Propertius IV. x. 41 (codex N): Viridomaro ed. prin. (cf. Serv. Verg. Aen. VI. 855).

[3] ter Madvig: per MSS.

[4] C. Flaminius censor viam Flaminiam muniit Sigonius muniit MSS.

[5] de gallis Frobenius: gallis MSS.

Roman People had under arms 800,000 men, of their own and of the Latin name. Then for the first time Roman armies crossed the Po, and defeating the Insubrian Gauls in several battles, received their submission. The consul Marcus Claudius Marcellus having slain the chief of the Insubrian Gauls, Vertomarus, brought back the spoils of honour.[1] The Histrians were subjugated. The Illyrians having gone to war a second time were defeated and their submission was received. The census was thrice taken by the censors. In the first census there were registered 270,212 citizens. . . . The freedmen were assigned to four tribes, whereas before they had been dispersed through them all—the four being the Esquilina, the Palatina, the Suburana, the Collina. The censor Gaius Flaminius built the Flaminian Way and the Flaminian Circus. Colonies were established in the territory taken from the Gauls, at Placentia and Cremona.

[1] The "spoils of honour" were those taken by the general in personal combat with the general of the enemy. See I. x. 6.

870.8
L55
Vol.64
copy 2

LIVY

IN FOURTEEN VOLUMES

V

BOOKS XXI—XXII

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION BY

B. O. FOSTER, PH.D.
OF STANFORD UNIVERSITY

LONDON
WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD
CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS
HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
MCMLXIX

LW 11-26-90

CONTENTS

PAGE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE vii

BIBLIOGRAPHY xiii

THE MANUSCRIPTS xx

BOOK XXI 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXI 195

BOOK XXII 197

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXII 411

INDEX OF NAMES 415

MAPS AND PLANS—

1. HANNIBAL'S ROUTE OVER THE ALPS . . . . At end
2. OPERATIONS ON THE PO . . . . . ,,
3. BATTLE OF THE TREBIA . . . . . ,,
4. HANNIBAL'S MARCH FROM PLACENTIA TO PICENUM . . . . . ,,
5. BATTLE OF LAKE TRASUMENNUS . . . . . ,,
6. CALLICULA AND GERUNIUM . . . . . ,,
7. BATTLE OF CANNAE . . . . . ,,

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXI

A.U.C. 536-553

I. In parte operis mei licet mihi praefari quod in principio summae totius professi plerique sunt rerum scriptores, bellum maxime omnium memorabile quae unquam gesta sint me scripturum, quod Hannibale duce Carthaginienses cum populo Romano gessere. 2 Nam neque validiores opibus ullae inter se civitates gentesque contulerunt arma, neque his ipsis tantum unquam virium aut roboris fuit, et haud ignotas belli artes inter sese[1] sed expertas primo Punico conferebant[2] bello, et adeo varia fortuna belli ancepsque Mars fuit ut propius periculum fuerint qui vicerunt. 3 Odiis etiam prope maioribus certarunt quam viribus, Romanis indignantibus quod victoribus victi ultro inferrent arma, Poenis quod superbe avareque crederent imperitatum victis esse.

[1] sese C: se (by erasure from sese) M.
[2] conferebant ς: conserebant CM.

---

[1] Thucydides began his history as follows: "Thucydides, an Athenian, wrote the history of the war which the Peloponnesians and Athenians waged against one another, beginning at its very outset, in the expectation that it

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXI

I. In this preface to a part of my history I may properly assert what many an historian has declared at the outset of his entire work,[1] to wit, that the war which I am going to describe was the most memorable of all wars ever waged—the war, that is, which, under the leadership of Hannibal, the Carthaginians waged with the Roman People. For neither have states or nations met in arms possessed of ampler resources, nor was their own might and power ever so great. Nor yet were they strangers to one another's modes of fighting, which the First Punic War had made them understand. And so variable were the fortunes of the war and so uncertain was its outcome that those who ultimately conquered had been nearer ruin. The animosity, too, with which they fought was almost greater than their strength: the Romans were enraged that the conquered should be actually drawing sword upon their conquerors; the Phoenicians, because they believed that the conquered had been treated with domineering arrogance and greed. B.C. 218–201 would be a great war and more worthy of relation than any that had preceded it."

A.U.C. 536–553

4 Fama est etiam Hannibalem annorum ferme novem pueriliter blandientem patri Hamilcari ut duceretur in Hispaniam, cum perfecto Africo bello exercitum eo traiecturus sacrificaret, altaribus admotum tactis sacris iure iurando adactum se cum primum posset 5 hostem fore populo Romano. Angebant ingentis A.U.C. 513 spiritus virum Sicilia Sardiniaque amissae; nam et Siciliam nimis celeri desperatione rerum concessam et Sardiniam inter motum Africae fraude Romanorum stipendio etiam insuper imposito interceptam.

A.U.C. 517–525

II. His anxius curis ita se Africo bello, quod fuit sub recentem Romanam pacem, per quinque annos, ita deinde novem annis in Hispania augendo Punico 2 imperio gessit ut appareret maius eum quam quod gereret agitare in animo bellum, et si diutius vixisset, Hamilcare duce Poenos arma Italiae inlaturos fuisse, quae[1] Hannibalis ductu intulerunt.

A.U.C. 525–532

3 Mors Hamilcaris peropportuna et pueritia Hannibalis distulerunt bellum. Medius Hasdrubal inter patrem ac filium octo ferme annos imperium obtinuit, flore aetatis, uti ferunt, primo Hamilcari conciliatus, 4 gener inde ob aliam indolem profecto animi adscitus, et quia gener erat, factionis Barcinae[2] opibus, quae

[1] quae ς: qui CM: cui Heerwagen.
[2] Barcinae edd.: barchinae CM.

---

[1] i.e. the western part of the island, which had been in the possession of the Carthaginians at the beginning of the First Punic War.

It is said moreover that when Hannibal, then about nine years old, was childishly teasing his father Hamilcar to take him with him into Spain, his father, who had finished the African war and was sacrificing, before crossing over with his army, led the boy up to the altar and made him touch the offerings and bind himself with an oath that so soon as he should be able he would be the declared enemy of the Roman People. The loss of Sicily and Sardinia was a continual torture to the proud spirit of Hamilcar. For he maintained that they had surrendered Sicily[1] in premature despair, and that the Romans had wrongfully appropriated Sardinia — and even imposed an indemnity on them besides —in the midst of their African disturbances. B.C. 218–201 B.C. 241

II. Tormented by these thoughts, he so bore himself in the African War, which followed hard upon the Roman peace and lasted for five years, and likewise afterwards, during the nine years he spent in Spain in extending the Punic empire, that it was plain to see that he meditated a more important war than the one he was engaged in, and that if his life had been prolonged, the Phoenicians would have invaded Italy under the leadership of Hamilcar, as they did in fact under that of Hannibal. B.C. 237–2–9

Hamilcar's very timely death and the boyhood of Hannibal delayed the war. In the interval betwixt father and son, the supreme command devolved, for about eight years, on Hasdrubal. It was his youthful beauty, they say, that won for him in the first instance the favour of Hamilcar, who subsequently selected him, no doubt for other, that is mental, qualifications, to be his son-in-law. As such—through the influence of the Barcine B.C. 229–222

A.U.C. 525–532

apud milites plebemque plus quam modicae erant, haud sane voluntate principum in imperio positus. 5 Is plura consilio quam vi gerens hospitiis magis regulorum conciliandisque per amicitiam principum novis gentibus quam bello aut armis rem Carthaginiensem auxit. 6 Ceterum nihilo ei pax tutior fuit; barbarus eum quidam[1] palam ob iram interfecti[2] ab eo domini obtruncavit[3]; comprensusque ab circumstantibus haud alio quam si evasisset vultu tormentis quoque cum laceraretur, eo fuit habitu oris ut superante laetitia dolores ridentis etiam speciem praebuerit. 7 Cum hoc Hasdrubale, quia mirae artis in sollicitandis gentibus imperioque suo iungendis fuerat, foedus renovaverat populus Romanus, ut finis utriusque imperii esset amnis Hiberus Saguntinisque mediis inter imperia duorum populorum libertas servaretur.

A.U.C. 528

A.U.C. 533

III. In Hasdrubalis locum haud dubia res fuit quin praerogativa militaris, qua extemplo iuvenis Hannibal in praetorium delatus imperatorque ingenti omnium clamore atque adsensu appellatus erat, a senatu comprobaretur. Favor[4] plebis sequebatur.

[1] quidam C^2M^3: quidam quidam C^1: quidam qui M^1.
[2] interfecti M^3: interfecit CM.
[3] obtruncavit ς: obtruncati CM^1: obtruncat M^3.
[4] erat, a senatu comprobaretur. Favor Rossbach: erat favor CM.

---

[1] This was the war-party in Carthage, named for its leader Hamilcar Barca, which opposed the peace-at-any-price policy of the merchant-aristocracy.

[2] i.e. the treaty of 241 B.C. (Per. XX. and Chap. xix. §§ 1–5).

[3] Saguntum (Murviedro) lay about midway between the Ebro and New Carthage (Cartagena). Livy does not mean faction,[1] which was very strong with the soldiers and the common people—he was given the command, though the leading citizens had no liking for this step. Relying more often on policy than force, Hasdrubal enlarged the sway of Carthage rather by setting up friendly relations with the petty kings and winning over new tribes through the goodwill of their leaders than by war and arms. But he was not a whit more safe for being at peace. A certain barbarian slew him openly, to avenge his master, whom Hasdrubal had put to death. On being seized by the bystanders he expressed in his countenance the cheerfulness of one who had escaped, and even as he was being tortured, joy so got the upper hand of agony that he seemed actually to smile. With this Hasdrubal, because of the marvellous skill which he had shown in tempting the native tribes to join his empire, the Roman People had renewed their covenant,[2] with the stipulation that neither side should extend its dominion beyond the Ebro, while the Saguntines, situated between the empires of the two peoples,[3] should be preserved in independence.

B.C. 229–222

B.C. 226

III. For Hasdrubal's successor there could be no question but that the choice originating with the soldiers—who immediately bore young Hannibal into the praetorium and with loud and universal acclamation hailed him general—would obtain the ratification of the senate. The approval of the

B.C. 221

that it lay between the two "spheres of influence"—for it must, in that case, have occupied an island in the Ebro—but, vaguely, that the Carthaginians were still far to the south of it and the Romans had not yet approached it from the north.

A.U.C. 533

2 Hunc vixdum puberem Hasdrubal litteris ad se accersierat; actaque res etiam in senatu fuerat. Barcinis[1] nitentibus ut adsuesceret militae Hannibal 3 atque in paternas succederet opes, Hanno, alterius factionis princeps, "Et aequum postulare videtur" inquit "Hasdrubal, et ego tamen non censeo quod 4 petit tribuendum." Cum admiratione tam ancipitis sententiae in se omnes convertisset, "Florem aetatis" inquit "Hasdrubal, quem ipse patri Hannibalis fruendum praebuit, iusto iure eum a filio repeti[2] censet; nos tamen minime decet iuventutem nostram pro militari rudimento adsuefacere libidini 5 praetorum. An hoc timemus, ne Hamilcaris filius nimis sero imperia immodica et regni paterni speciem[3] videat, et cuius regis genero hereditarii sint relicti exercitus nostri, eius filio parum mature serviamus? 6 Ego istum iuvenem domi tenendum, sub legibus sub magistratibus docendum vivere aequo iure cum ceteris censeo, ne quandoque parvus hic ignis incendium ingens exsuscitet."

IV. Pauci ac ferme optimus quisque Hannoni adsentiebantur; sed, ut plerumque fit, maior pars meliorem vicit. Missus Hannibal in Hispaniam primo statim adventu omnem exercitum in se con- 2 vertit; Hamilcarem iuvenem redditum sibi veteres commons followed. The new commander had been B.C. 221 summoned to Spain by Hasdrubal when a mere lad, and the matter had even been debated in the senate. The Barcine party were urging that Hannibal should become inured to warfare and succeed to the resources of his father, when Hanno, the leader of the other faction, addressed the House. "There is reason," said he, "in Hasdrubal's request, nevertheless I am opposed to granting it." When astonishment at a speech so inconsistent had attracted everybody's attention, he continued: "The youthful charms which Hasdrubal himself permitted Hannibal's father to enjoy he considers that he has the right to require again at the hands of the son. But that we should accustom our young men, by way of military training, to gratify the concupiscence of our generals is most unseemly. Or do we fear lest Hamilcar's son may too late behold the inordinate powers and the regal pomp which his father has set up? that the son of the king who left our armies as a legacy to his son-in-law may find us too slow in accepting him for our master? For my part, I think that the young man should be kept at home and taught to live in submission to the laws and the magistrates, upon an equal footing with the others, lest one day this small fire kindle a great conflagration."

[1] Barcinis edd.; barchinis CM (also at chap. ix. § 4, chap. x. § 4 and elsewhere).
[2] repeti C^1M^1: repetit CM.
[3] speciem ς: spem CM.

IV. A few, and these included nearly all the best men, supported Hanno, but, as often happens, the larger party prevailed over the better. Hannibal was sent to Spain, where he was no sooner come than he won the favour of the entire army. The old soldiers thought that Hamilcar was restored to them as he had been in his youth; they beheld milites credere; eundem vigorem in voltu vimque in oculis, habitum oris lineamentaque intueri. Dein brevi effecit ut pater in se minimum momentum[1] ad 3 favorem conciliandum esset; nunquam ingenium idem ad res diversissimas, parendum atque imperandum, habilius fuit. Itaque haud facile discerneres 4 utrum imperatori an exercitui carior esset; neque Hasdrubal alium quemquam praeficere malle, ubi quid fortiter ac strenue agendum esset, neque 5 milites alio duce plus confidere aut audere. Plurimum audaciae ad pericula capessenda, plurimum consilii inter ipsa pericula erat; nullo labore aut 6 corpus fatigari aut animus vinci poterat; caloris ac frigoris patientia par; cibi potionisque desiderio naturali non voluptate[2] modus finitus; vigiliarum somnique nec die nec nocte discriminata tempora; 7 id quod gerendis rebus superesset quieti datum; ea neque molli strato neque silentio accersita; multi saepe militari sagulo opertum humi iacentem inter 8 custodias stationesque militum conspexerunt. Vestitus nihil inter aequales excellens; arma atque equi conspiciebantur. Equitum peditumque idem longe primus erat; princeps in proelium ibat, ultimus 9 conserto proelio excedebat. Has tantas viri virtutes ingentia vitia aequabant: inhumana crudelitas perfidia plus quam Punica, nihil veri nihil sancti, nullus deum metus nullum ius iurandum nulla 10 religio. Cum hac indole virtutum atque vitiorum

A.U.C. 533

[1] momentum ς: monumentum CM.

[2] non voluptate ς: non uoluntate CM: voluntate H. Sauppe.

the same lively expression and piercing eye, the B.C. 221 same cast of countenance and features. But he soon brought it to pass that his likeness to his father was the least consideration in gaining him support. Never was the same nature more adaptable to things the most diverse—obedience and command. And so one could not readily have told whether he were dearer to the general or the army. When any bold or difficult deed was to be done, there was no one whom Hasdrubal liked better to entrust with it, nor did any other leader inspire his men with greater confidence or daring. To reckless courage in incurring dangers he united the greatest judgment when in the midst of them. No toil could exhaust his body or overcome his spirit. Of heat and cold he was equally tolerant. His consumption of meat and drink was determined by natural desire, not by pleasure. His times of waking and sleeping were not marked off by day or night: what time remained when his work was done he gave to sleep, which he did not court with a soft bed or stillness, but was seen repeatedly by many lying on the ground wrapped in a common soldier's cloak amongst the sentinels and outguards. His dress was in no way superior to that of his fellows, but his arms and horses were conspicuous. Both of horsemen and of foot-soldiers he was undoubtedly the first—foremost to enter battle, and last to leave it when the fighting had begun. These admirable qualities of the man were equalled by his monstrous vices: his cruelty was inhuman, his perfidy worse than Punic; he had no regard for truth, and none for sanctity, no fear of the gods, no reverence for an oath, no religious scruple. With this endowment of

A a.u.c. 533 triennio sub Hasdrubale imperatore meruit nulla re quae agenda videndaque magno futuro duci esset praetermissa.

V. Ceterum ex quo die dux est declaratus,[1] velut Italia ei provincia decreta bellumque Romanum 2 mandatum esset, nihil prolatandum ratus, ne se quoque, ut patrem Hamilcarem deinde Hasdrubalem, cunctantem casus aliquis opprimeret, Sagun- 3 tinis inferre bellum statuit. Quibus oppugnandis quia haud dubie Romana arma movebantur, in Olcadum prius fines—ultra Hiberum ea gens in parte magis quam in dicione Carthaginiensium erat —induxit exercitum, ut non petisse Saguntinos sed rerum serie finitimis domitis gentibus iungendoque 4 tractus ad id bellum videri posset. Cartalam urbem opulentam, caput gentis eius, expugnat diripitque; quo metu perculsae minores civitates stipendio imposito imperium accepere. Victor exercitus opulentusque praeda Carthaginem Novam in hiberna 5 est deductus. Ibi large partiendo praedam stipendioque praeterito cum fide exsolvendo cunctis civium sociorumque animis in se firmatis vere primo 6 in Vaccaeos promotum bellum. Hermandica et

[1] declaratus C^2M^4: declaraturus C^1: declaratis M^1.

---

[1] Up to this point it is probable that Livy has been drawing his material chiefly from Coelius Antipater. He now turns to Polybius (or an account based on Polybius), and somewhat awkwardly effects the transition by means of the sentence following, in which he tries to smooth over the contradiction between nihil prolatandum ratus and the two years that Hannibal now spent in wars that had nothing to do with the Saguntines. (De Sanctis, p. 182.)

[2] This place—unknown except for its mention in this good and evil traits he served for the space of three B.C. 221 years under Hasdrubal, omitting nothing that should be done or seen by one who was to become a great commander.

V. For the rest, from the day on which he was proclaimed commander-in-chief, as though Italy had been assigned to him for his field of operations and he had been instructed to make war on Rome, he felt that no postponement was permissible, lest he too, like his father Hamilcar, and afterwards Hasdrubal, should be overtaken, while delaying, by some accident, and resolved upon attacking the Saguntines.[1] But since an attack on them must certainly provoke the Romans to hostile action, he marched first into the territory of the Olcades—a tribe living south of the Ebro, within the limits of the Carthaginians but not under their dominion—that he might appear not to have aimed at the Saguntines but to have been drawn into that war by a chain of events, as he conquered the neighbouring nations and annexed their territories. Cartala,[2] a wealthy town, the capital of that tribe, he stormed and sacked; and this so terrified the lesser towns that they submitted and agreed to an indemnity. The victorious army, enriched with spoil, was led back to New Carthage for the winter. There, by a generous partition of the booty and the faithful discharge of all arrears of pay, he confirmed them all, both citizens and allies, in their allegiance to himself; and early in the spring pushed forward into the land of the Vaccaei. Their cities, Hermandica[3] and Arboconnexion—is called Althaea by Polybius (III. xiii. 5) The name is perhaps preserved in the modern Melkart.

[3] Supposed to have stood on the site of Salamanca.

A.U.C. 533

Arbocala, eorum[1] urbes, vi captae. Arbocala et 7 virtute et multitudine oppidanorum diu defensa; ab Hermandica profugi exsulibus Olcadum, priore aestate domitae gentis, cum se iunxissent, concitant
8 Carpetanos adortique Hannibalem regressum ex
Vaccaeis haud procul Tago flumine agmen grave 9 praeda turbavere. Hannibal proelio abstinuit cas-trisque super ripam positis, cum prima quies silentiumque ab hostibus fuit, amnem vado traiecit valloque ita producto ut locum ad transgrediendum hostes 10 haberent invadere eos transeuntes statuit. Equitibus praecepit ut cum ingressos aquam viderent, adorirentur peditum agmen; in ripa elephantos—quad-11 raginta autem erant—disponit. Carpetanorum[2] cum adpendicibus Olcadum Vaccaeorumque centum milia fuere, invicta acies si aequo dimicaretur campo.
12 Itaque et ingenio feroces et multitudine freti, et quod metu cessisse credebant hostem, id morari victoriam rati quod interesset amnis, clamore sublato passim sine ullius imperio qua cuique proximum est 13 in amnem ruunt. Et ex parte altera ripae vis ingens equitum in flumen immissa, medioque alveo haud-14 quaquam pari certamine concursum, quippe ubi pedes instabilis ac vix vado fidens vel ab inermi equite equo temere acto perverti posset, eques corpore

[1] eorum Sanctius: cartaeorum or castaeorum C: cartorum (from cartoerum) M: vaccaeorum Sigonius.
[2] Carpetanorum edd.: carpentanorum CM.

cala, were taken by assault. Arbocala, thanks to the B.C. 221 bravery and numbers of its inhabitants, held out for a long time. The fugitives from Hermandica, uniting with the exiles of the Olcades—the tribe which had been subdued in the previous summer—roused up the Carpetani, and falling upon Hannibal as he was returning from the Vaccaei, not far from the river Tagus, threw his column, encumbered as it was with booty, into some disorder. Hannibal refrained from battle and encamped on the bank of the river. As soon as the enemy were settled for the night and silent, he crossed the river by a ford, and so laid out his rampart as to allow them room for crossing, resolving to attack them as they were passing over. He ordered his cavalry to charge their column of foot when they saw that it had entered the stream, and posted the elephants, of which he had forty, along the bank. The Carpetani, together with the contingents of the Olcades and Vaccaei, numbered a hundred thousand—an invincible array, had they been going to fight in a fair field. And so, inspired by a native intrepidity, confiding in their multitude, and believing—since they supposed that their enemies had retreated out of fear—that victory was delayed but till they should have passed the river, they broke into a cheer, and, staying for no man's orders, rushed into the stream wherever it happened to be nearest. From the other side a great body of cavalry was sent in against them. The meeting in mid-channel was no equal conflict, for there the footmen were unsteady, and, scarce trusting to the ford, might even have been overthrown by unarmed riders, urging their horses forward at haphazard; while the horsemen, having

A.U.C. armisque liber, equo vel per medios gurgites stabili, 533 15 comminus eminusque rem gereret. Pars magna flumine absumpta; quidam verticoso amni delati in 16 hostes ab elephantis obtriti sunt. Postremi, quibus regressus in suam ripam tutior fuit, ex varia trepidatione cum in unum colligerentur, priusquam a tanto[1] pavore reciperent animos, Hannibal agmine quadrato amnem ingressus fugam ex ripa fecit vastatisque agris intra paucos dies Carpetanos quo-17 que in deditionem accepit. Et iam omnia trans Hiberum praeter Saguntinos Carthaginiensium erant.

A.U.C. VI. Cum Saguntinis bellum nondum erat, ceterum
535 iam belli causa certamina cum finitimis serebantur, 2 maxime Turdetanis. Quibus cum adesset idem qui litis erat sator nec certamen iuris sed vim quaeri appareret, legati a Saguntinis Romam missi auxilium 3 ad bellum iam haud dubie imminens orantes. Consules[2] tunc Romae erant P. Cornelius Scipio et Ti.
Sempronius Longus.[3] Qui cum legatis in senatum introductis de re publica rettulissent placuissetque mitti legatos in Hispaniam ad res sociorum in-

[1] a tanto M^4: tanto CM^1.
[2] consules M^4: $\overline{\text{cos}}$ $'M^2$: caios (?) M^1.
[3] Ti. Sempronius Longus edd. (chap. xv. § 4): titus sempronius longus CM.

---

[1] Not the important tribe in the S.W. part of the peninsula, but a lesser one, again mentioned as neighbour to the Saguntines at XXIV. lii. 11, and—there called Turduli—at XXVIII. xxxix. 8.

[2] These were the consuls of 218 B.C., but the siege of Saguntum took place in 219. Livy now returns to—and follows until he has finished the story of the siege in chap. xv. § 1—the source he had used for the opening chapters of this book. Coelius—if he it was—so telescoped events as to their bodies and weapons free and horses that were steady even in the deep pools, could fight either at close quarters or long range. A great part of them perished in the stream; some the eddying current carried over to their enemies, where they were trampled down by the elephants. The rearmost, who could retreat to their own bank more safely, were gathering from the various directions in which they had fled, when, before they could recover from so great a panic, Hannibal entered the stream in a fighting column, and driving them in confusion from the bank, laid waste their fields, and in a few days' time received the surrender of the Carpetani also. And now everything south of the Ebro, except Saguntum, was in the hands of the Carthaginians. B.C. 221

VI. With the Saguntines there was as yet no war, but quarrels that might be a pretext for it were already being sown betwixt them and their neighbours, especially the Turdetani.[1] Now when the side of the Turdetani was espoused by the same man who had sowed the quarrel, and it was clearly seen that he was aiming not at arbitration but force, the Saguntines sent ambassadors to Rome, imploring help for a war that was now indubitably imminent. The Roman consuls at that time were Publius Cornelius Scipio and Tiberius Sempronius Longus.[2] After introducing the ambassadors into the senate, they had brought up the question of public policy, and the senators had voted to dispatch envoys to Spain, B.C. 219 make the attack on Saguntum follow immediately on the appointment of Hannibal, and the war with Rome begin in that same year. In chap. xv. Livy becomes aware of the discrepancy and endeavours to dispose of it.

A.U.C. 535

4 spiciendas, quibus si videretur digna causa, et Hannibali denuntiarent ut ab Saguntinis, sociis populi Romani, abstineret, et Carthaginem in Africam traicerent ac sociorum populi Romani querimonias 5 deferrent,—hac legatione[1] decreta necdum missa omnium spe celerius Saguntum oppugnari allatum 6 est. Tunc relata de integro res ad senatum; et alii provincias consulibus Hispaniam atque Africam decernentes terra marique rem gerendam censebant, alii totum in Hispaniam Hannibalemque intenderant 7 bellum; erant qui non temere movendam rem tantam exspectandosque ex Hispania legatos cen- 8 serent. Haec sententia, quae tutissima videbatur, vicit;[2] legatique eo maturius missi, P. Valerius Flaccus et Q. Baebius Tamphilus,[3] Saguntum ad Hannibalem atque inde Carthaginem, si non absisteretur bello, ad ducem ipsum in poenam foederis rupti deposcendum.

VII. Dum ea Romani parant consultantque, iam 2 Saguntum summa vi oppugnabatur. Civitas ea longe opulentissima ultra Hiberum fuit, sita passus mille ferme a mari. Oriundi a Zacyntho insula dicuntur, mixtique etiam ab Ardea Rutulorum 3 quidam generis; ceterum in tantas brevi creverant opes seu maritimis seu terrestribus fructibus seu

[1] legatione M^2: le gecione C: legatio M^1.

[2] videbatur, vicit M^2C (by erasure from uidebantur uicit): uicit uidebatur M^1.

[3] Baebius Tamphilus Sigonius: fabius pamphilus CM.

---

[1] Saguntum is only a Latinized form of Ζάκυνθος, the name of a small island (now Zante) off the coast of Elis.

[2] Ardea (the seat of King Turnus, according to Virgil, Aen. VII. 409 ff.) was the chief city of the Rutuli and had been a Roman colony since 442 B.C.

to examine into the affairs of their allies, to the end that, if there appeared to be just cause, they might formally warn Hannibal to keep aloof from the Saguntines, the allies of the Roman People; after which they were to cross over into Africa, to Carthage, and present the complaint of Rome's allies. This embassy had been voted but not yet sent off, when, sooner than all expectation, came the news that Saguntum was besieged. The case was then referred anew to the senate. Some were for sending the consuls into Spain and Africa respectively and waging war by land and sea; others wanted to direct their whole force against Spain and Hannibal; some there were who argued that so grave a quarrel should not be lightly entered on, and proposed to await the return of the envoys out of Spain. This last opinion, which seemed the safest, carried the day, and the envoys, Publius Valerius Flaccus and Quintus Baebius Tamphilus, were sent off with the more dispatch. They were to go to Saguntum first, to Hannibal, and thence, if he would not cease hostilities, to Carthage, to demand the surrender of the general himself in satisfaction of the broken treaty. B.C. 219

VII. While the Romans were thus planning and deliberating, the siege of Saguntum was already being pressed with the greatest vigour. This city was much the wealthiest of those beyond the Ebro and was situated about a mile from the sea. Its inhabitants are said to have come originally from the island of Zacynthus,[1] and to have included also a strain from the Ardeate Rutulians.[2] Be this as it may, they had attained quickly to their great prosperity, whether owing to the produce of the sea or the multitudinis incremento seu disciplinae sanctitate, qua fidem socialem usque ad perniciem suam coluerunt. Hannibal infesto exercitu ingressus fines pervastatis passim agris urbem tripertito adgreditur. Angulus muri erat in planiorem patentioremque quam cetera circa vallem vergens. Adversus eum vineas agere instituit, per quas aries moenibus admoveri posset. Sed ut locus procul muro[1] satis aequus agendis vineis fuit, ita haudquaquam prospere, postquam ad effectum operis ventum est, coeptis succedebat. Et turris ingens imminebat, et murus, ut in suspecto loco, supra ceterae modum altitudinis emunitus erat, et iuventus delecta ubi plurimum periculi ac timoris ostendebatur ibi vi maiore obsistebant. Ac primo missilibus submovere hostem nec quicquam satis tutum munientibus pati; deinde iam non pro moenibus modo atque turri tela micare, sed ad erumpendum etiam in stationes operaque hostium animus erat; quibus tumultuariis certaminibus haud ferme plures Saguntini cadebant quam Poeni. Ut vero Hannibal ipse, dum murum incautius subit, adversum femur tragula graviter ictus cecidit, tanta circa fuga ac trepidatio fuit ut non multum abesset quin opera ac vineae desererentur.

A.U.C. 535

VIII. Obsidio deinde per paucos dies magis quam

[1] muro edd. : muros CM.

[1] Polybius, III. xviii. 3, speaks of the great fertility of their territory, and under the empire Saguntum was famous for its export of earthenware.

land,[1] to the growth of their population, or to the B.C. 219 integrity of their discipline, which caused them to keep faith with their allies even to their own undoing. Crossing their borders with a hostile army Hannibal laid waste their country far and wide and advanced in three divisions against their city. There was an angle of the wall that gave on a valley more open and more level than the other ground about the town. Against this he determined to bring up pent-houses, that under their cover the battering-rams might be brought into contact with the walls. But though the ground at some distance from the wall was smooth enough for moving the pent-houses, the attempt succeeded very ill when it came to the final execution of it. There was a great overhanging tower, and the wall—as was natural in a suspected place—had been carried up to a greater height than elsewhere, and the pick of the fighting men having been stationed there, where the greatest danger threatened, offered a more strenuous resistance. At first they drove the assailants off with missiles and left no spot safe for their pioneers; afterwards not only did their javelins dart from wall and tower, but they even had the hardihood to sally out against the pickets and earthworks of their enemies, and in these rough and-tumble fights hardly more Saguntines fell than Phoenicians. But when Hannibal himself, who had somewhat incautiously ventured up under the wall, was severely wounded in the front of his thigh with a heavy javelin and sank to the ground, those about him fell into such confusion and dismay as almost to abandon their works and pent-houses.

VIII. For the next few days, while the general's

A.U.C. 535 oppugnatio fuit, dum volnus ducis curaretur. Per quod tempus ut quies certaminum erat ita ab apparatu operum ac munitionum nihil cessatum. 2 Itaque acrius de integro coortum est bellum, pluribusque partibus, vix accipientibus quibusdam opera 3 locis, vineae coeptae agi admoverique aries. Abundabat multitudine hominum Poenus; ad centum quinquaginta milia habuisse in armis satis creditur; 4 oppidani ad omnia tuenda atque obeunda multi- 5 fariam distineri coepti,[1] non sufficiebant. Itaque iam feriebantur arietibus muri, quassataeque multae partes erant; una continentibus ruinis nudaverat urbem: tres deinceps turres quantumque inter eas 6 muri erat cum fragore ingenti prociderunt.[2] Captum oppidum ea ruina crediderant Poeni, qua, velut si pariter utrosque murus[3] texisset, ita 7 utrimque in pugnam procursum est. Nihil tumultuariae pugnae simile erat, quales in oppugnationibus urbium per occasionem partis alterius conseri[4] solent, sed iustae acies velut patenti campo inter ruinas muri tectaque urbis modico distantia inter- 8 vallo constiterant. Hinc spes, hinc desperatio animos inritat, Poeno cepisse iam se urbem, si paulum adnitatur, credente, Saguntinis pro nudata moenibus patria corpora opponentibus nec ullo pedem referente, ne in relictum a se locum hostem 9 immitteret. Itaque quo acrius et confertim magis

[1] coepti Weissenborn: coepti sunt CM.
[2] prociderunt CM: prociderant ς.
[3] murus edd.: muros CM. [4] conseri ς: consciri CM.

hurt was healing, there was rather a blockade than B.C. 219 an assault; but though during this interval there was rest from combat, yet was there no slackening in the preparation of engines and defences. Accordingly the fighting broke out afresh more fiercely than before, and pent-houses began to be pushed forward and rams brought up at many points, though in some places the ground would hardly admit of them. The Phoenician was lavishly equipped with men—he is credibly supposed to have had a hundred and fifty thousand under arms—but the townsmen, who, in order to guard and defend every quarter, had been divided into numerous companies, found their strength inadequate. And so now the walls were being battered with rams and in many places had been severely shaken. One section, giving way continuously for some distance, had exposed the town: three towers in a row, together with the wall connecting them, had come down with a loud crash. The Phoenicians believed that the town was taken with that breach, through which from either side men rushed to attack, as though the wall had protected both parties alike. It was not at all like the mellays that commonly occur in sieges, where one side gets an opportunity, but regular battle lines had formed, as in an open field, between the ruins of the wall and the buildings of the city, which stood at some distance off. On this side hope, on that despair inspired courage. The Phoenicians believed the city to be theirs, if they put forth a little effort. The Saguntines opposed their bodies to defend their city, denuded of its walls, nor would one of them draw back his foot lest he admit an enemy to the spot which he had vacated. And the harder both sides fought and utrimque pugnabant,[1] eo plures volnerabantur nullo

A.U.C. 535

10 inter arma corporaque vano intercidente telo. Phalarica[2] erat Saguntinis missile telum hastili abiegno[3] et cetera[4] tereti praeterquam ad extremum unde ferrum exstabat; id, sicut in pilo, quadratum stuppa circumligabant linebantque[5] pice;
11 ferrum autem tres longum habebat pedes, ut cum armis transfigere corpus posset. Sed id maxime, etiam si haesisset in scuto nec penetrasset in corpus,
12 pavorem faciebat, quod cum medium accensum mitteretur conceptumque ipso motu multo maiorem ignem ferret, arma omitti cogebat nudumque militem ad insequentes ictus praebebat.

IX. Cum diu anceps fuisset certamen et Saguntinis, quia praeter spem resisterent, crevissent animi,
2 Poenus, quia non vicisset, pro victo esset, clamorem repente oppidani tollunt hostemque in ruinas muri expellunt, inde impeditum trepidantemque exturbant, postremo fusum fugatumque in castra redigunt.
3 Interim ab Roma legatos venisse nuntiatum est. Quibus obviam ad mare missi ab Hannibale qui dicerent nec tuto eos adituros inter tot tam effrenatarum gentium arma nec Hannibali in tanto discrimine rerum operae esse legationes audire.
4 Apparebat non admissos protinus Carthaginem ituros.

[1] pugnabant (by erasure from oppugnabant) M: pugnabantur C^1: pugnabatur C^2.
[2] phalarica C^2M^2: pharica C: phalaeri M^1.
[3] abiegno ς: ab ligneo CM.
[4] cetera Ascensius (1513 : cetero CM.
[5] timebantque ς: linebanturque (or other corruptions) CM.

the more they crowded in together, the greater was B.C. 219
the number of those wounded, for no missile fell without taking effect on shield or body. The Saguntines had a javelin, called a phalarica, with a shaft of fir, which was round except at the end whence the iron projected; this part, four-sided as in the pilum, they wrapped with tow and smeared with pitch. Now the iron was three feet long, that it might be able to go through both shield and body. But what chiefly made it terrible, even if it stuck fast in the shield and did not penetrate the body, was this, that when it had been lighted at the middle and so hurled, the flames were fanned to a fiercer heat by its very motion, and it forced the soldier to let go his shield, and left him unprotected against the blows that followed.

IX. When the outcome of the struggle had long been doubtful, and the Saguntines, because they were holding out beyond their hopes, had gained new courage, while the Phoenician, because he had not conquered, was as good as beaten; suddenly the townspeople set up a shout and thrust forth their enemies amongst the ruins of the wall, and routing them out from thence, confused and frightened, drove them back at last in full flight to their camp.

In the meantime it was announced that ambassadors had come from Rome. Hannibal sent men to the shore to meet them and say that it would not be safe for them to come to him through the armed bands of so many unruly tribes, and that he had no time for listening to embassies at so critical a juncture. It was clear that, if they were denied a hearing, they would at once proceed to

A.U.C. 535

Litteras igitur nuntiosque ad principes factionis Barcinae praemittit, ut praepararent suorum animos, ne quid pars altera gratificari populo Romano[1] posset.

X. Itaque, praeterquam quod admissi auditique sunt,[2] ea quoque vana atque irrita legatio fuit. 2 Hanno unus adversus senatum[3] causam foederis 3 magno silentio propter auctoritatem suam, non cum[4] adsensu audientium egit, per deos[5] foederum arbitros ac testes senatum[6] obtestans, ne Romanum cum Saguntino suscitarent bellum: monuisse, praedixisse se ne Hamilcaris progeniem ad exercitum mitterent; non manes, non stirpem eius conquiescere viri, nec unquam, donec sanguinis nominisque Barcini quisquam supersit, quietura Romana foedera. 4 "Iuvenem flagrantem cupidine regni viamque unam ad id cernentem si ex bellis bella serendo succinctus armis legionibusque vivat, velut materiam igni praebentes ad exercitus misistis. Aluistis ergo hoc 5 incendium quo nunc ardetis. Saguntum vestri circumsedent[7] exercitus, unde arcentur foedere; mox Carthaginem[8] circumsedebunt Romanae legiones ducibus isdem dis per quos priore bello rupta 6 foedera sunt ulti. Utrum hostem an vos an fortunam utriusque populi ignoratis? Legatos ab sociis

[1] populo Romano A. Perizonius: pro romanis CM.

[2] sunt M^2: non sunt CM^1.

[3] adversus senatum Alschefski: aduersum senatum C: aduersu senatum M^1: aduerso senatu M^2.

[4] suam, non cum Eichhof: suam cum CM: quam cum Madvig (reading magis for magno).

[5] per deos ς: per eos CM?: per reos M^1 (or M).

[6] senatum C^3: hannonis suadentis senatum C^1: annonis suadentis senatum (these three words were later erased) M.

[7] circumsedent M^2: circumsedunt M^1: circumsident C.

Carthage. He therefore dispatched couriers before B.C. 219 them, with a letter for the leaders of the Barcine faction, so that they might prepare the minds of their adherents to prevent the opposing party from affording any satisfaction to the Roman People.

X. Accordingly, save for being admitted and allowed a hearing, this mission also was idle and of no effect. Hanno stood alone in pleading for the treaty against the views of the senate. There was a deep hush while he spoke, by reason of his personal authority, but he was listened to without approval. He adjured the senators in the name of the gods, vouchers for treaties and their witnesses, to provoke not a Roman along with the Saguntine war. He had advised them and forewarned them not to send the offspring of Hamilcar to the army; neither the man's ghost nor his progeny was at rest, nor ever, so long as any of the lineage and name of Barca should survive, would the treaty with the Romans rest untroubled. "You have sent to your armies," he went on, "as though heaping fuel on a fire, a youth who burns with lust for sovereign power and sees but one way to obtain it—if, by sowing seeds of war, he can raise up other wars and live girt round with arms and legions. You have therefore fed these flames with which you are now ablaze. Your armies now invest Saguntum, which the treaty forbids them to approach: ere long the Roman legions will be investing Carthage, led by those very gods who helped them in the former war to avenge the broken treaty. Is it your enemy you know not, or yourselves, or the fortunes of both peoples? When [8] Carthaginem C^3M^2 : carthagine C^1M^1.

A.U.C. 535

et pro sociis venientes bonus imperator vester in castra non admisit, ius gentium[1] sustulit; hi tamen, unde ne hostium quidem legati arcentur pulsi, ad vos venerunt; res ex foedere repetunt; ut[2] publica fraus absit, auctorem culpae et reum criminis de-7 poscunt. Quo lenius agunt segnius incipiunt, eo, cum coeperint, vereor ne perseverantius saeviant. Aegates insulas Erycemque[3] ante oculos proponite, quae terra marique per quattuor et viginti annos
8 passi sitis. Nec puer hic dux erat, sed pater ipse Hamilcar, Mars alter, ut isti volunt. Sed Tarento, id est Italia, non abstinueramus ex foedere, sicut
9 nunc Sagunto[4] non abstinemus. Vicerunt ergo di homines,[5] et id de quo verbis ambigebatur, uter populus foedus rupisset, eventus belli velut aequus
10 iudex unde ius stabat ei victoriam dedit. Carthagini nunc Hannibal vineas turresque admovet; Carthaginis moenia quatit ariete; Sagunti ruinae—falsus utinam vates sim!—nostris capitibus incident, susceptumque cum Saguntinis bellum habendum 11 cum Romanis est. 'Dedemus ergo Hannibalem?' dicet aliquis. Scio meam levem esse in eo auctori-

[1] gentium M^2C^2 (over erasure): centium M^1.
[2] repetunt; ut A. Perizonius: repetuntur C: repetuntur de re repetuntur M.
[3] insulas Erycemque edd.: insulam sericemque C: insulam seriemque M^1: insulas eriemque M^2.
[4] Sagunto M^2: sagunti CM.
[5] homines Madvig: hominesque CM.

[1] Off these islands C. Lutatius Catulus won in 241 B.C. the naval victory which decided the First Punic War (Per. XIX.).

ambassadors came from allies on behalf of allies, B.C. 219 your worthy general would not admit them to his camp, but thrust aside the law of nations; nevertheless these men, being driven from a place where even an enemy's envoys are admitted, have come to you. They seek amends in accordance with a treaty. That the state may be void of offence, they demand the author of the wrong, the man on whom they charge the guilt. The more mildly they proceed, the more slowly they begin, the more obstinate, I fear, when they have begun, will be their rage. Set Eryx and the Aegatian islands[1] before your eyes, and all that you suffered by land and sea for four and twenty years. Nor was this boy your leader, but Hamilcar himself, the father, a second Mars, as his partisans will have it.[2] But we could not keep our hands from Tarentum, that is, from Italy, as by treaty bound, even as now we cannot keep them from Saguntum. Gods therefore vanquished men, and that which had been verbally disputed—which people of the twain had broken the treaty—the outcome of the war, like an impartial judge, decided, and to those who had the right granted the victory. It is Carthage against which Hannibal is now bringing up his pent-houses and towers; it is the walls of Carthage he is battering with his rams. Saguntum's walls—may my prophecy prove false!—will fall upon our heads, and the war we have entered upon with the Saguntines we must carry on against the Romans. 'Shall we then surrender Hannibal?' someone will ask. I know that my

[2] Hanno knows that most of his hearers are against him, and isti (literally "those men of yours") means "those who guide your opinion," i.e. the friends of Hannibal.

A.U.C. 535

tatem propter paternas inimicitias; sed et Hamilcarem eo perisse laetatus sum, quod si ille viveret, bellum iam haberemus cum Romanis, et hunc iuvenem tamquam furiam facemque huius belli odi
12 ac detestor; nec dedendum solum arbitror[1] ad piaculum rupti foederis, sed si nemo deposceret,[2] devehendum in ultimas maris terrarumque oras, ablegandum eo unde nec ad nos nomen famaque eius accidere[3] neque ille sollicitare quietae civitatis
13 statum posset.[4] Ego ita censeo, legatos extemplo Romam mittendos qui senatui satisfaciant, alios qui Hannibali nuntient ut exercitum ab Sagunto abducat, ipsumque Hannibalem ex foedere Romanis dedant; tertiam legationem ad res Saguntinis reddendas decerno."

XI. Cum Hanno perorasset, nemini omnium certare oratione cum eo necesse fuit, adeo prope omnis senatus Hannibalis erat; infestiusque locutum arguebant Hannonem quam Flaccum Valerium, legatum
2 Romanum. Responsum inde legatis Romanis est bellum ortum ab Saguntinis non ab Hannibale esse; populum Romanum iniuste facere si Saguntinos vetustissimae Carthaginiensium societati praeponat.
3 Dum Romani tempus terunt legationibus mittendis, Hannibal, quia fessum militem proeliis operibusque habebat, paucorum iis[5] dierum quietem dedit, stationibus ad custodiam vinearum aliorumque

[1] nec dedendum solum arbitror Luchs: nec dedendum solum CM.
[2] deposceret Luchs: deposcat ς: deposcit CM.
[3] accidere Gronovius: accedere CM.
[4] posset Luchs: possit CM. [5] iis edd.: his CM influence is slight, because of my quarrel with his father; but I rejoiced when Hamilcar perished, for this reason, that were he living, we should now be at war with Rome; and this young man, who, like a fury, now brandishes the torch of war, I loathe and abominate, and I hold, not only that he ought to be surrendered in expiation of the broken treaty, but that, if none demanded him, he ought to be deported to the farthest limits of land and sea—to be banished to a place whence neither name nor fame of his could reach us, nor he be able to vex the quiet of our state. My opinion is this: we should send ambassadors at once to Rome, to give satisfaction to the senate; and others to announce to Hannibal that he must withdraw his army from Saguntum, and to hand over Hannibal himself to the Romans as the treaty requires; a third embassy I would send to make restitution to the Saguntines." B.C. 219

XI. When Hanno had concluded, not a single person found it necessary to oppose his arguments, so nearly unanimous was the senate in supporting Hannibal. They declared that Hanno had spoken more bitterly than Valerius Flaccus, the Roman envoy. They then gave their answer to the envoys, to the effect that the war had been begun by the Saguntines, not by Hannibal, and that the Roman People would be doing wrong if they preferred the Saguntines to their very ancient alliance with the Carthaginians.

While the Romans were wasting time in dispatching embassies, Hannibal had allowed his soldiers, exhausted as they were with fighting and constructing works, to rest for a few days, after posting outguards to look to the pent-houses and other engines.

A.U.C. 535

operum dispositis. Interim animos eorum nunc ira in hostes stimulando, nunc spe praemiorum accendit. 4 Ut vero pro contione praedam captae urbis edixit militum fore, adeo accensi omnes sunt ut, si extemplo signum datum esset, nulla vi resisti videretur 5 posse. Saguntini, ut a proeliis quietem habuerant nec lacessentes nec lacessiti per aliquot dies, ita non nocte non die unquam cessaverant ab opere, ut novum murum ab ea parte qua patefactum oppidum ruinis erat reficerent.

6 Inde oppugnatio eos aliquanto atrocior quam ante adorta est, nec qua primum aut potissimum parte ferrent opem, cum omnia variis clamoribus stre- 7 perent, satis scire poterant. Ipse Hannibal qua turris mobilis omnia munimenta urbis superans altitudine agebatur hortator aderat. Quae cum admota catapultis ballistisque per omnia tabulata dispositis 8 muros defensoribus nudasset, tum Hannibal occasionem ratus quingentos ferme Afros cum dolabris ad subruendum ab imo murum mittit. Nec erat difficile opus, quod caementa non calce durata erant 9 sed interlita luto structurae antiquo[1] genere. Itaque latius quam qua[2] caederetur ruebat, perque patentia 10 ruinis agmina armatorum in urbem vadebant. Locum quoque editum capiunt collatisque eo catapultis ballistisque, ut castellum in ipsa urbe velut arcem imminentem haberent, muro circumdant; et Sagun-

[1] antiquo ς: antiquae CM.
[2] quam qua Weissenborn: qua qua C: quam qua M: quam ς.

---

[1] Engines for hurling darts and stones.

Meanwhile he kindled their ardour, now by inciting them to rage against their enemies, again by holding out hopes of rewards. But when he made a speech proclaiming that the spoils of the captured city should go to the soldiers, they were so excited, one and all, that if the signal had been given instantly, it seemed as if no force could have withstood them. The Saguntines, though they had had a rest from fighting, neither attacking nor being attacked for several days, had laboured incessantly, both day and night, to replace the wall where its collapse had exposed the town. B.C. 219

The assault was now resumed, with far greater fury than before, and it was hard for the inhabitants to know, when shouts and cries were resounding on every hand, to what point they should first, or preferably, bring up supports. Hannibal was present in person to urge on his men, where they were pushing up a movable tower that surpassed in height all the defences of the city. As soon as it had been brought up, and the catapults and ballistae[1] distributed through all its platforms had stripped the ramparts of defenders, Hannibal, believing that he now had his opportunity, sent about five hundred Africans with pickaxes to undermine the wall. This was no hard task, for the rubble had not been solidified with mortar, but filled in with mud, after an ancient mode of building. It therefore fell for wider stretches than were actually hacked away, and through the breaches bands of armed men passed into the city. They even seized an elevation, and setting up catapults and ballistae there, built a wall around it, so as to have within the town itself a stronghold that commanded it like a citadel. The tini murum interiorem ab nondum capta parte urbis

A.U.C. 535

11 ducunt. Utrimque summa vi et muniunt et pugnant; sed interiora tuendo minorem in dies[1] urbem Saguntini faciunt. Simul crescit inopia omnium longa obsidione et minuitur exspectatio externae opis, cum tam[2] procul Romani, unica spes, circa omnia hostium essent.
13 Paulisper tamen adfectos animos recreavit repentina profectio Hannibalis in Oretanos Carpetanosque, qui duo populi, dilectus acerbitate consternati, retentis conquisitoribus metum defectionis cum praebuissent, oppressi celeritate Hannibalis omiserunt mota arma.

XII. Nec Sagunti oppugnatio segnior erat Maharbale,[3] Himilconis[4] filio—eum praefecerat Hannibal —ita impigre rem agente ut ducem abesse nec cives
2 nec hostes sentirent. Is et proelia aliquot secunda fecit et tribus arietibus aliquantum muri discussit strataque omnia recentibus ruinis advenienti Hanni-
3 bali ostendit. Itaque ad ipsam arcem extemplo ductus exercitus, atroxque proelium cum multorum utrimque caede initum et pars arcis capta est.

Temptata deinde per duos est exigua pacis spes,
4 Alconem Saguntinum et Alorcum Hispanum. Alco[5]

[1] dies ς Valla : diem CM.
[2] tam ς : iam CM.
[3] Maharbale edd. : mahermale C^2M : m hermale C^1.
[4] Himilconis M^2: hamilconis CM^1.
[5] Alco edd. : alcon M : alconus C.

Saguntines too built a wall within the old one, to protect that part of the city that was not yet taken. On both sides the soldiers worked and fought with the utmost energy; but the Saguntines, contracting their defences, were bringing their city day by day within a smaller compass. At the same time there was an increasing scarcity of everything, on account of the long blockade; and the prospect of help from without was growing less, since the Romans, their only hope, were so far away, and all the country round about was in the possession of their enemies. Yet their drooping spirits were revived for a little while by the sudden departure of Hannibal for the territories of the Oretani and the Carpetani. These two nations, exasperated by a rigorous conscription, had seized the recruiting officers and thereby given rise to fears of a revolt, but were caught unprepared by Hannibal's celerity, and laid down the arms they had taken up. B.C. 219

XII. But the siege of Saguntum did not flag. Maharbal, the son of Himilco, whom Hannibal had left in charge, so bestirred himself that the absence of the general was felt neither by his countrymen nor by the enemy. He fought a number of successful skirmishes, and with three battering-rams laid low a considerable portion of the wall, and on Hannibal's return, showed him the place all covered with the newly fallen ruins. And so the troops were led at once against the citadel itself, and a fierce battle began, in which many on both sides were killed and a part of the citadel was taken.

An all but hopeless attempt to arrange a peace was then made by two men, Alco, a Saguntine, and a Spaniard named Alorcus. Alco, thinking that some-insciis[1] Saguntinis precibus aliquid moturum ratus, cum ad Hannibalem noctu transisset, postquam nihil lacrimae movebant condicionesque tristes ut ab irato victore[2] ferebantur, transfuga ex oratore factus apud hostem mansit, moriturum adfirmans

A.U.C. 535

5 qui sub condicionibus iis de pace ageret. Postulabatur autem, redderent res Turdetanis[3] traditoque omni auro atque argento egressi urbe cum singulis vestimentis ibi habitarent ubi Poenus iussisset.
6 Has pacis leges abnuente Alcone accepturos Saguntinos, Alorcus, vinci animos ubi alia vincantur adfirmans, se pacis eius interpretem fore pollicetur; erat autem tum miles Hannibalis, ceterum publice
7 Saguntinis amicus atque hospes. Tradito palam telo custodibus hostium transgressus munimenta ad praetorem Saguntinum – et ipse ita iubebat est
8 deductus. Quo cum extemplo concursus omnis generis hominum esset factus, submota cetera multitudine senatus Alorco[4] datus est, cuius talis oratio fuit:

XIII. "Si civis vester Alco, sicut ad pacem petendam ad Hannibalem venit ita pacis condiciones[5] ab Hannibale ad vos rettulisset, supervacaneum hoc

[1] insciis ς : inconsciis CM.
[2] victore ς : auctore CM.
[3] Turdetanis edd. : turditanis CM.
[4] Alorco C. : alorci C^1M.
[5] condiciones C^3 : condicionis C^1M.

[1] The stranger in an ancient city had no commercial or legal status but had to depend on the good offices of some citizen. Guest-friendship (hospitium) was a species of permanent (and even hereditary) alliance entered into by two citizens of different states for purposes of mutual comfort and protection in commercial and other intercourse.

thing might be effected by entreaties, went over to B.C. 219
Hannibal in the night, without the knowledge of the Sanguntines. But finding that tears were of no avail and that the terms obtainable were such as a wrathful conqueror would impose, he changed from pleader to deserter, and remained with the enemy, declaring that anybody who should treat for peace on those conditions would be put to death. The conditions were as follows: they must make restitution to the Turdetani, and, delivering up all their gold and silver, quit their city with a single garment each and take up their abode where the Phoenician should direct them. When Alco asserted that the Saguntines would not accept such terms, Alorcus, affirming that where all else is conquered the heart is conquered too, undertook the negotiation of a peace. He was at that time a soldier in the service of Hannibal, but was officially recognized by the Saguntines as their friend and guest.[1] Openly surrendering his weapon to the sentries, he passed the enemy's lines, and was conducted—by his own command—before the Saguntine general. A crowd of all descriptions immediately flocked together there; but all save the senators were sent away, and Alorcus, being permitted to address them, spoke as follows:

XIII. "If Alco, your own fellow citizen, after going to Hannibal to sue for peace, had brought back to you the terms of peace which Hannibal offers, this journey of mine would have been superfluous,

[1] When a city honoured a member of another state by formally conferring upon him the title of hospes publicus, it gave him the right to entertainment at the public cost, and to buy and sell and bring actions in the courts.

A.U.C. 535

mihi fuisset iter, quo nec orator Hannibalis nec
2 transfuga ad vos venissem;[1] cum ille aut vestra aut sua culpa manserit apud hostem—sua,[2] si metum simulavit, vestra, si periculum est apud vos vera referentibus—ego, ne ignoraretis esse aliquas et salutis et pacis vobis condiciones, pro vetusto hos-
3 pitio quod mihi vobiscum est ad vos veni. Vestra autem causa me nec ullius alterius loqui quae loquor apud vos vel ea fides sit quod neque dum vestris viribus restitistis neque dum auxilia ab Romanis sperastis, pacis unquam apud vos mentionem feci.
4 Postquam nec ab Romanis vobis ulla est spes nec vestra vos iam aut arma aut moenia satis defendunt, pacem adfero ad vos magis necessariam quam aequam.
5 Cuius ita aliqua spes est, si eam quem ad modum ut victor fert Hannibal sic vos ut victi audietis[3] et[4] non id quod amittitur in damno, cum omnia victoris sint, sed quidquid relinquitur pro munere habituri
6 estis. Urbem vobis, quam ex magna parte dirutam, captam fere totam habet, adimit, agros relinquit, locum adsignaturus in quo novum oppidum aedificetis. Aurum et argentum omne, publicum priva-
7 tumque, ad se iubet deferri; corpora vestra coniugum ac liberorum vestrorum servat inviolata, si inermes cum binis vestimentis velitis ab Sagunto exire.

[1] venissem CM: veni sed Madvig: venissem nunc Woelfflin.
[2] sua C^3M^2: omitted by C^1M^1.
[3] audietis Gronovius: audiatis CM.
[4] et Weissenborn: et si ς: sed CM.

---

[1] Livy is not implying that Alorcus was in this detail exaggerating Hannibal's offer. The "single garment" of for I should have come to you neither as Hannibal's B.C. 219 spokesman nor yet as a deserter. But seeing that, whether through your fault or his own, he has stopped behind with your enemy—his own if his fears were feigned, yours if it is unsafe to bring you a true report—that you might not be ignorant that terms there are upon which you may enjoy both life and peace, I have come to you myself, having regard to the long-standing friendship which subsists between us. Moreover, that I say what I say for your sake and no other's, you may take this as proof: so long as you held your ground with your own forces, and expected to receive help from the Romans, I never mentioned peace to you; but now that you have no longer any hope from Rome, and neither your arms nor your fortifications are adequate to defend you, I bring you a peace more necessary than equitable. That this peace may be realized there is some ground for hoping only if, even as Hannibal proposes it in the spirit of a conqueror, so you shall hearken to it in the spirit of the conquered, and shall not consider as lost what is taken from you, since all things are the victor's, but consider whatever is left you as a gift. Your city, which he has in great part overthrown, and almost wholly captured, he takes from you: your lands he leaves you, and intends to designate a site whereon you may erect a new town. All your gold and silver, both public and private, he orders to be brought to him: your persons, with those of your wives and children, he preserves inviolate, if you are willing to go forth unarmed from Saguntum with two garments each.[1] These chap. xii. § 5 was loosely put for "a single suit of clothes," i.e. the inner and outer tunic which everybody wore.

A.U.C. 535

8 Haec victor hostis imperat; haec, quamquam sunt gravia atque acerba, fortuna vestra vobis suadet. Equidem haud despero, cum omnium potestas ei
9 facta sit, aliquid ex his[1] remissurum; sed vel haec patienda censeo potius quam trucidari corpora vestra, rapi trahique ante ora vestra coniuges ac liberos belli iure sinatis."

XIV. Ad haec audienda cum circumfusa paulatim multitudine permixtum senatui esset populi concilium, repente primores secessione facta priusquam responsum daretur, argentum aurumque omne ex publico privatoque in forum conlatum in ignem ad id raptim[2] factum conicientes eodem plerique
2 semet ipsi praecipitaverunt. Cum ex eo pavor ac trepidatio totam urbem pervasisset, alius insuper tumultus ex arce auditur. Turris diu quassata prociderat, perque ruinam eius cohors Poenorum impetu facto cum signum imperatori[3] dedisset nudatam stationibus custodiisque solitis hostium esse urbem,
3 non cunctandum in tali occasione ratus Hannibal, totis viribus adgressus urbem momento cepit, signo dato ut omnes puberes interficerentur. Quod imperium crudele ceterum prope necessarium cognitum
4 ipso eventu est: cui enim parci potuit ex iis qui aut inclusi cum coniugibus ac liberis domos super se

[1] his Woelfflin: his (hiis C) rebus CM.
[2] raptim C^3M^2: raptum C^1M^1.
[3] imperatori ς Valla: imperator CM.

terms a victorious enemy imposes on you; these B.C. 219 terms, albeit harsh and cruel, your fortune counsels you to accept. Indeed I am not without hope that when full control of everything shall have been granted him, he may remit somewhat of this severity; but even this you ought, I think, rather to endure than to suffer yourselves to be massacred and your wives and children to be forcibly dragged away into captivity before your eyes, in accordance with the laws of war."

XIV. To hear this speech the populace had little by little crowded round, and the people's council had mingled with the senate, when on a sudden the leading men, withdrawing from the throng before an answer could be given, fetched all the gold and silver, both of state and private ownership, into the market-place, and casting it into a fire which they had hurriedly made up for this purpose, many threw themselves headlong into the same flames. The resulting panic and dismay had no sooner spread to all the city, than another loud noise and outcry were heard from the citadel. A tower that had long been battered had collapsed, and through the breach a cohort of Phoenicians had rushed in and signalled to the general that the city was denuded of its customary guards and sentinels. Hannibal, deeming it no time to hesitate, when such an opportunity offered, attacked with all his strength and captured the city out of hand. He had given orders that all the grown inhabitants be put to the sword—a cruel command, but found in the upshot to have been well-nigh inevitable; for who could be spared of those who either shut themselves up with their wives and children and burned the houses over

A.U.C. 535 ipsos concremaverunt aut armati nullum ante finem pugnae quam morientes fecerunt?

XV. Captum oppidum est cum ingenti praeda. Quamquam pleraque ab dominis de industria corrupta erant et in caedibus vix ullum discrimen aetatis ira
2 fecerat et captivi militum praeda fuerant, tamen et ex pretio rerum venditarum aliquantum pecuniae redactam esse constat et multam pretiosam supellectilem[1] vestemque missam Carthaginem.
3 Octavo mense quam coeptum oppugnari captum Saguntum quidam scripsere; inde Carthaginem novam in hiberna Hannibalem concessisse; quinto deinde mense quam ab Carthagine profectus sit in 4 Italiam pervenisse. Quae si ita sunt, fieri non potuit ut P. Cornelius Ti. Sempronius consules fuerint ad quos et principio oppugnationis legati Saguntini missi sint et qui in suo magistratu cum Hannibale, alter ad Ticinum amnem, ambo aliquanto
5 post ad Trebiam, pugnaverint. Aut omnia breviora aliquanto fuere, aut Saguntum principio anni quo P. Cornelius Ti. Sempronius[2] consules fuerunt non 6 coeptum oppugnari est sed captum. Nam excessisse pugna ad Trebiam in annum Cn. Servili et C. Flamini non potest, quia C. Flaminius Arimini consulatum iniit, creatus a Ti. Sempronio consule, qui post pugnam ad Trebiam ad creandos consules Romam their own heads, or took arms and never gave over B.C. 219 fighting till they died?

XV. The captured town yielded enormous spoils. For although much property had been destroyed on purpose by its owners, and in the carnage rage had scarce made any distinction of years, and the captives had been given as booty to the soldiers, nevertheless it is agreed that a large sum was realized from the sale of goods, and much valuable furniture and apparel sent to Carthage.

Some have recorded that Saguntum was taken in the eighth month from the beginning of the siege; that Hannibal then retired to New Carthage, into winter quarters; and then, after leaving New Carthage, arrived in the fifth month in Italy. If this is so, it cannot have been the case that Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius were the consuls to whom the Saguntine envoys were dispatched in the beginning of the siege, and who, in their own year of office, fought with Hannibal, the one at the river Ticinus, and both—a little later—at the Trebia. Either all these things took up somewhat less time, or Saguntum was not first besieged but finally captured in the outset of the year which had Cornelius and Sempronius as consuls. For the battle at the Trebia cannot have been fought as late as the consulship of Gnaeus Servilius and Gaius Flaminius; for Gaius Flaminius began his consulship at Ariminum, having been elected under the presidency of Tiberius Sempronius who was then consul, and had, after the battle at the Trebia, come to [1] supellectilem M^2: superlectilem CM^1.

---

[2] Ti. Sempronius ς: t. sempronius CM.

A.U.C. 535 cum venisset, comitiis perfectis ad exercitum in hiberna rediit.

XVI. Sub idem fere tempus et legati qui redierant ab Carthagine Romam rettulerunt omnia hostilia 2 esse et Sagunti excidium nuntiatum est; tantusque simul maeror patres misericordiaque sociorum peremptorum indigne et pudor non lati auxilii et ira in Carthaginienses metusque de summa rerum cepit, velut si iam ad portas hostis esset, ut tot uno tempore motibus animi turbati trepidarent magis 3 quam consulerent: nam neque hostem acriorem bellicosioremque secum congressum, nec rem Romanam tam desidem unquam fuisse atque imbellem. 4 Sardos Corsosque et Histros atque Illyrios lacessisse magis quam exercuisse Romana arma et cum Gallis 5 tumultuatum verius quam belligeratum: Poenum hostem veteranum, trium et viginti annorum militia durissima[1] inter Hispanas gentes semper victorem, duci acerrimo adsuetum, recentem ab excidio opu- 6 lentissimae urbis, Hiberum transire, trahere secum tot excitos Hispanorum populos, conciturum avidas

[1] durissima CM: durissimum Ruehl.

---

[1] This paragraph is a footnote, in which Livy attempts to clear up the chronological muddle which he has got himself into by disregarding the clear statements of Polybius and following an inferior authority. According to Polybius, Hannibal was made general and attacked the Olcades in 221 B.C. In 220 came the war with the Vaccaei and Carpetani. In 219 (consulship of M. Livius Salinator and L. Aemilius Paulus) came the siege of Saguntum, after which Hannibal put his army in winter quarters in New Carthage,

Rome to hold the consular elections, and then B.C.219 returned to the winter quarters of the army.[1]

XVI. At almost the same time the ambassadors who had returned from Carthage brought back word to Rome that all was hostile in that quarter, and the fall of Saguntum was announced. And so great was the grief of the senators, and their pity at the unmerited doom of their allies, and their shame at having failed to help them, and their wrath against the Carthaginians and fear for the safety of the commonwealth—as though the enemy were already at their gates—that, confounded with so many simultaneous emotions, they rather trembled than deliberated. For they felt that they had never encountered a fiercer or more warlike foe, and that Rome had never been so torpid and unwarlike. The Sardinians and Corsicans, the Histrians and Illyrians, had provoked but had hardly exercised the Roman arms; while against the Gauls there had been desultory fighting rather than real war.[2] But the Phoenician was an old and experienced enemy, who in the hardest kind of service amongst the Spanish tribes had for three and twenty years[3] invariably got the victory; he was accustomed to the keenest of commanders, was flushed with the conquest of a very wealthy city, and crossing the Ebro and drawing after him the many Spanish peoples which he and in 218 set forth on the march to Italy (Polybius, III. xiii, xvii, xxxiii).

[2] The wars mentioned (and also a war with the Ligurians) occurred in the interval between the First and Second Punic Wars and were described in Book XX (see Summary).

[3] i.e. the interval between the First and Second Punic Wars, though the Carthaginian conquest of Spain had not actually begun so early as 241 B.C.

A.U.C. 535

semper armorum Gallicas gentes; cum orbe terrarum bellum gerendum in Italia ac pro moenibus Romanis esse.

XVII. Nominatae iam antea consulibus provinciae erant; tum sortiri iussi. Cornelio Hispania, Sem-
2 pronio Africa cum Sicilia evenit. Sex in eum annum decretae legiones et socium quantum ipsis videretur
3 et classis quanta parari posset. Quattuor et viginti peditum Romanorum milia scripta et mille octingenti equites, sociorum quadraginta milia peditum, quattuor milia et quadringenti equites; naves ducentae viginti
4 quinqueremes, celoces viginti[1] deducti. Latum inde ad populum, vellent iuberent populo Carthaginiensi bellum indici; eiusque belli causa supplicatio per urbem habita atque adorati di ut bene ac feliciter eveniret quod bellum populus Romanus iussisset.
5 Inter consules ita copiae divisae: Sempronio datae legiones duae—ea quaterna milia erant peditum et treceni[2] equites—et sociorum sedecim milia peditum, equites mille octingenti, naves longae centum sexa-
6 ginta, celoces duodecim. Cum his terrestribus maritimisque copiis Ti. Sempronius[3] missus in Siciliam, ita in Africam transmissurus si ad arcendum Italia
7 Poenum consul alter satis esset. Cornelio minus copiarum datum, quia L. Manlius praetor et ipse

[1] ducentae viginti quinqueremes, celoces viginti edd.: ccxxv remes (riemes C) quinque celoces xx CM.
[2] treceni Crévier: ccc CM: trecenti ς.
[3] Ti. Sempronius ς: t. sempronius CM.

had enlisted, would be rousing up the Gallic tribes— B.C. 219 always eager to unsheathe the sword—and the Romans would have to contend in war with all the world, in Italy and under the walls of Rome.

XVII. The fields of operation of the consuls had already been named: they were now commanded to draw lots for them. Cornelius obtained Spain, Sempronius Africa with Sicily. Six legions were voted for that year, with such allied contingents as the consuls themselves should approve and as large a fleet as could be got ready. There were enrolled four and twenty thousand Roman foot-soldiers and eighteen hundred horsemen, and of the allies forty thousand foot-soldiers and four thousand four hundred horsemen. Of ships there were launched two hundred and twenty quinqueremes, and twenty swift cruisers. The question was then laid before the people whether it were their will and pleasure that war be declared against the people of Carthage; and on their voting in the affirmative a supplication was held throughout the City and the gods were besought to grant a fair and prosperous outcome to the war which the Roman People had decreed.

The forces were divided between the consuls as follows: Sempronius received two legions—each numbering four thousand foot and three hundred horse—sixteen thousand foot of the allies, and eighteen hundred horse, together with a hundred and sixty warships and twelve swift cruisers. With these forces for land and sea Tiberius Sempronius was dispatched to Sicily, that he might cross by that way into Africa, if the other consul were able to keep the Phoenicians out of Italy. Cornelius was given fewer troops, since Lucius Manlius, the praetor,

A.U.C. 535 cum haud invalido praesidio in Galliam mittebatur;
8 navium maxime Cornelio numerus deminutus: sexaginta quinqueremes datae [1]—neque enim mari venturum aut ea parte belli dimicaturum hostem credebant—et duae Romanae legiones cum suo iusto equitatu et quattuordecim milibus sociorum peditum,
9 equitibus mille sescentis. Duas legiones Romanas et decem milia [2] sociorum peditum, mille equites socios, sescentos Romanos Gallia provincia eodem versa in Punicum bellum habuit.

A.U.C. 536 XVIII. His ita comparatis, ut omnia iusta ante bellum fierent, legatos maiores natu, Q. Fabium M. Livium L. Aemilium C. Licinium Q. Baebium in Africam mittunt ad percunctandos Carthaginienses publicone consilio Hannibal Saguntum oppugnasset;
2 et si, id quod facturi videbantur, faterentur ac defenderent publico consilio factum, ut indicerent
3 populo Carthaginiensi bellum. Romani postquam Carthaginem venerunt, cum senatus datus esset et Q. Fabius nihil ultra quam unum quod mandatum erat percunctatus esset, tum ex Carthaginiensibus
4 unus: "Praeceps vestra, Romani, et prior legatio fuit, cum Hannibalem tamquam suo consilio Saguntum oppugnantem deposcebatis; ceterum haec

[1] quinqueremes datae CM: quinqueremes datae celoces octo Linsmayer.

[2] decem milia Gronovius: cclcc C^1M: CCL (with X Δ IIII above) C^3.

[1] M. Livius and L. Aemilius were consuls in 219 B.C., and since they were now available to serve on an embassy, it is a was also being sent into Gaul with a not inconsider- B.C. 219 able army; and of ships, in particular, he received a smaller number, namely, sixty quinqueremes, for they did not suppose that the enemy would come by sea or use that kind of warfare. He had two Roman legions with their proper complement of horse, and fourteen thousand infantry of the allies, with sixteen hundred horse. The province of Gaul received two Roman legions and ten thousand foot of the allies, with a thousand allied and six hundred Roman horse. These troops were designed for the same service—the Punic War.

XVIII. When these arrangements had been made, B.C. 218 in order that, before going to war, they might observe all the formalities, they dispatched into Africa an embassy consisting of certain older men, to wit, Quintus Fabius, Marcus Livius, Lucius Aemilius,[1] Gaius Licinius, and Quintus Baebius, to demand of the Carthaginians whether Hannibal had attacked Saguntum with the sanction of the state; and if, as seemed likely to be the case, they should avow the act and stand to it as their public policy, to declare war on the Carthaginian People. As soon as the Romans had come to Carthage and the senate had granted them an audience, Quintus Fabius asked only the one question contained in his instructions. Then one of the Carthaginians replied: "There was something headlong, Romans, even in your former embassy, when you demanded that we surrender Hannibal on the ground that he was laying siege to Saguntum on his own responsibility; fair inference that the embassy had not set out before the middle of March—then the beginning of the consular year—of 218 (De Sanctis, p. 1[1]).

A.U.C. 536

5 legatio verbis adhuc lenior est, re asperior. Tunc enim Hannibal et insimulabatur et deposcebatur; nunc ab nobis et confessio culpae exprimitur, et, 6 ut a confessis, res extemplo repetuntur. Ego autem non privato publicone consilio Saguntum oppugnatum sit quaerendum censeam, sed utrum iure an 7 iniuria; nostra enim haec quaestio atque animadversio in civem nostrum est, quid nostro aut suo fecerit arbitrio; vobiscum una disceptatio est, licue- 8 ritne per foedus fieri. Itaque quoniam discerni placet quid publico consilio quid sua sponte imperatores faciant, nobis vobiscum foedus est a C. Lutatio[1] consule ictum, in quo cum caveretur utrorumque sociis, nihil de Saguntinis—necdum enim erant socii 9 vestri—cautum est. At enim eo foedere quod cum Hasdrubale ictum est Saguntini excipiuntur. Adversus quod ego nihil dicturus sum nisi quod a vobis 10 didici. Vos enim quod C. Lutatius[2] consul primo nobiscum foedus icit,[3] quia neque auctoritate patrum nec populi iussu ictum erat, negastis vos eo teneri; itaque aliud de integro foedus publico consilio ictum 11 est. Si vos non tenent foedera vestra nisi ex auctoritate aut iussu vestro icta, ne nos quidem Hasdru-

[1] a C. Lutatio edd. : ac lutatio C: aclutacio M.
[2] Lutatius edd. : luctacius C: luctacios M.
[3] icit ς: iecit CM; fecit Alschefski.

but your present embassy, though expressed thus far more mildly, is in reality more harsh. For on that occasion Hannibal was both accused and his surrender called for; at present you are trying to wring a confession from us, and, as though we had pleaded guilty, demand instant satisfaction. But to me it would seem that you ought to ask, not whether Saguntum was besieged as the result of private or of public policy, but whether justly or unjustly. For it belongs to us to enquire what our fellow citizen has done on our authority or his own, and to punish him; with you the only question we have to discuss is this, whether what he did was permissible under the treaty. Well then, since you wish that a distinction should be drawn between the things that generals do by direction of the state and the acts for which they are themselves responsible, let me remind you that we have a treaty with you, which Gaius Lutatius, your consul, made, wherein, although the allies of both sides were protected, there was no provision made regarding the Saguntines, for as yet they were not your allies. 'But,' you will say, 'in that treaty which was made with Hasdrubal, the Saguntines are expressly cared for.' To this I shall make no other answer than the one that I have learnt from you. For you denied that you were bound by the treaty which Gaius Lutatius, the consul, originally entered into with us, because it had been made without the senate's sanction or the people's command; accordingly a new treaty, having the approval of the state, was entered into. Now, if you are not bound by your treaties, unless they are concluded at your own instance or command, no more could the B.C. 218

A.U.C. 536 balis foedus, quod nobis insciis icit, obligare potuit.
12 Proinde omittite Sagunti atque Hiberi mentionem facere et quod diu parturit animus vester aliquando
13 pariat!" Tum Romanus sinu ex toga facto "Hic" inquit "vobis bellum et pacem portamus: utrum placet sumite!" Sub hanc vocem haud minus fero-
14 citer, daret utrum vellet, succlamatum est; et cum is iterum sinu effuso bellum dare dixisset, accipere se omnes responderunt et quibus acciperent animis iisdem se gesturos.

XIX. Haec derecta[1] percunctatio ac denuntiatio belli magis ex dignitate populi Romani visa est quam de foederum iure verbis disceptare, cum ante tum
2 maxime Sagunto excisa. Nam si verborum disceptationis res esset, quid foedus Hasdrubalis cum Lutati priore foedere, quod mutatum est, comparandum
3 erat? Cum in Lutati foedere diserte additum esset ita id ratum fore si populus censuisset, in Hasdrubalis foedere nec exceptum tale quicquam fuerit et tot annorum silentio ita vivo eo comprobatum sit foedus ut ne mortuo auctore quicquam mutaretur.
4 Quamquam, etsi priore foedere staretur, satis cautum erat Saguntinis, sociis utrorumque exceptis; nam neque additum erat "iis qui tunc essent" nec "ne

[1] derecta Alschefski: directa ς: decreta CM.

treaty of Hasdrubal, which he made without our knowledge, be binding upon us. Cease then to prate of Saguntum and the Ebro, and bring forth at last the thought with which your mind has long been in travail!" Then the Roman, gathering up his toga into a fold, said, "We bring you here both war and peace; choose which you will!" When he had said these words, they cried out with no less truculence that he might give them whichever he liked; and on his shaking out the fold again, and announcing that he gave them war, they all replied that they accepted it, and in that same spirit in which they accepted it were resolved to wage it. B.C. 218

XIX. This straightforward demand and declaration of war seemed more in keeping with the dignity of the Roman People than to bandy words regarding the rights involved in treaties, especially at that moment, when Saguntum had been destroyed. Though for that matter, had it been proper to debate the question, what comparison could there be between Hasdrubal's treaty and the earlier treaty of Lutatius, which was altered? For in the treaty of Lutatius it had been expressly added that it should be valid only if the people ratified it; but in Hasdrubal's treaty no such proviso had been made, and by the silence of so many years the treaty had during his lifetime been so sanctioned that even on its author's death no slightest change was made in it. And yet, even if the earlier treaty were adhered to, the Saguntines had been sufficiently protected by the provision made concerning the allies of both the parties; for there had been no specification of "those who were then allies," nor exception of "such as might after-5 qui postea adsumerentur." Et cum adsumere novos liceret socios, quis aequum[1] censeret aut ob nulla quemquam merita in amicitiam recipi, aut receptos in fidem non defendi? Tantum ne Carthaginiensium socii aut sollicitarentur ad defectionem aut sua sponte desciscentes reciperentur.

A.U.C. 536

6 Legati Romani ab Carthagine, sicut iis Romae imperatum erat, in Hispaniam, ut adirent civitates et[2] in societatem perlicerent aut averterent a
7 Poenis, traiecerunt. Ad Bargusios primum venerunt; a quibus benigne excepti, quia taedebat imperii Punici, multos trans Hiberum populos ad
8 cupidinem novae fortunae erexerunt. Ad Volcianos inde est ventum, quorum celebre per Hispaniam responsum ceteros populos ab societate Romana avertit. Ita enim maximus natu ex iis in concilio
9 respondit: "Quae verecundia est, Romani, postulare vos uti vestram Carthaginiensium amicitiae praeponamus, cum qui id fecerunt[3] crudelius quam
10 Poenus hostis perdidit[4] vos socii prodideritis? Ibi quaeratis socios, censeo, ubi Saguntina clades ignota est; Hispanis populis sicut lugubre ita insigne documentum Sagunti ruinae erunt, ne quis fidei
11 Romanae aut societati confidat." Inde extemplo abire finibus Volcianorum iussi ab nullo deinde

[1] quis aequum edd.: quis equum C^4M^3: qui secum C^1: quis secum M^1.
[2] et ς: ut CM: et aut Gronovius.
[3] fecerunt Madvig: fecerunt Saguntini CM.
[4] perdidit edd.: prodidit CM.

[1] The Bargusii, N. of the Ebro, were not as yet in the power of the Carthaginians, but were growing uneasy at the prospect of annexation (cf. chap. xxiii. § 2).

wards be received." And since they were permitted B.C. 218 to take new allies, who would think it fair either that they should admit no one, however deserving, to their friendship, or that, having once taken people under their protection, they should not defend them—provided only that allies of the Carthaginians should not be tempted to desert them nor be made welcome if they left them voluntarily?

The ambassadors, conformably to the instructions given them in Rome, crossed over from Carthage into Spain for the purpose of approaching the different states and winning them to an alliance, or at least detaching them from the Phoenicians. The Bargusii were the first they visited, and being warmly welcomed by them, for men were wearying of the Punic sway,[1] they aroused in many nations south of the Ebro a desire to revolt. From there they came to the Volciani, who gave them an answer that was carried all over Spain and turned all the other states against an alliance with the Romans. For the eldest of them replied as follows in their council: "With what face, Romans, can you ask us to prefer your friendship to the Carthaginian, when those who did so have been more cruelly betrayed by you, their allies, than destroyed by their enemy, the Phoenician? You must seek allies, in my opinion, only where the disaster of Saguntum is unknown. To the Spanish peoples the ruins of Saguntum will constitute a warning, no less emphatic than deplorable, that none should trust to the honour or alliance of the Romans." Being then bidden straightway to depart out of the borders of the Volciani, they received from that day forth concilio Hispaniae benigniora verba tulere. Ita nequiquam peragrata Hispania in Galliam transeunt.

A.U.C. 536

XX. Ibi iis[1] nova terribilisque species visa est, quod armati—ita mos gentis erat—in concilium venerunt. Cum verbis extollentes gloriam virtutemque populi Romani ac magnitudinem imperii petissent ne Poeno bellum Italiae inferenti per agros urbesque suas transitum darent, tantus cum fremitu risus dicitur ortus ut vix a magistratibus maioribusque natu iuventus sedaretur; adeo stolida impudensque postulatio visa est censere[2] ne in Italiam transmittant Galli bellum, ipsos id avertere[3] in se, agrosque suos pro alienis populandos obicere. Sedato tandem fremitu responsum legatis est neque Romanorum in se meritum esse neque Carthaginiensium iniuriam ob quae aut pro Romanis aut adversus Poenos sumant arma; contra ea audire sese gentis suae homines agro finibusque Italiae pelli a populo Romano stipendiumque pendere[4] et cetera indigna pati. Eadem ferme in ceteris Galliae conciliis dicta auditaque; nec hospitale quicquam pacatumve satis prius auditum quam Massiliam venere. Ibi omnia ab sociis inquisita cum cura ac fide cognita: prae-

[1] Ibi iis C. Heraeus: in iis CM.
[2] visa est censere ne CM : visa est ne Gronovius.
[3] avertere ς: aduertere CM.
[4] pendere ς: pendi CM.

---

[1] At an earlier date the Romans, too, had come armed to their assembly—the centuriate comitia (I. xliv. 1).

[2] Massilia (Marseilles), founded by Phocaeans about 600 B.C., had been, from the period of the Kings, a faithful ally of Rome.

no kinder response from any Spanish council. B.C. 218
Accordingly, having traversed that country to no purpose, they passed over into Gaul.

XX. There they beheld a strange and terrifying spectacle, for the Gauls, as was customary with the race, came armed to their assembly.[1] When the envoys, boasting of the renown and valour of the Roman People and the extent of their dominion, requested the Gauls to deny the Phoenician a passage through their lands and cities, if he should attempt to carry the war into Italy, it is said that they burst out into such peals of laughter that the magistrates and elders could scarce reduce the younger men to order—so stupid and impudent a thing it seemed, to propose that the Gauls should not suffer the invaders to pass into Italy, but bring down the war on their own heads, and offer their own fields to be pillaged in place of other men's. When at last the uproar had been quelled, the Gauls made answer to the envoys that they owed the Romans no kindness nor the Carthaginians any grudge, to induce them to draw the sword in behalf of the former or against the latter; on the contrary, they heard that men of their own race were being driven from the land and even out of the borders of Italy by the Roman People, and were paying tribute and suffering every other humiliation. In the rest of the Gallic councils their proposals and the replies they got were to substantially the same effect, nor did they hear a single word of a truly friendly or peaceable tenor until they reached Massilia.[2] Here they learned of all that had happened from their allies, who had made enquiries with faithful diligence. They reported that

A.U.C. 536

occupatos iam ante ab Hannibale Gallorum animos esse; sed ne illi quidem ipsi satis mitem gentem fore—adeo ferocia atque indomita ingenia esse—ni subinde auro, cuius avidissima gens est, principum 9 animi concilientur. Ita peragratis Hispaniae Galliaeque populis[1] legati Romam redeunt haud ita multo post quam consules in provincias profecti erant. Civitatem omnem exspectatione[2] belli erectam[3] invenerunt satis constante fama iam Hiberum Poenos tramisisse.

A.U.C. 535-536

XXI. Hannibal Sagunto capto Carthaginem novam in hiberna concesserat, ibique auditis quae Romae quaeque Carthagine acta decretaque forent seque non ducem solum sed etiam causam esse belli, 2 partitis divenditisque[4] reliquiis[5] praedae nihil ultra differendum ratus Hispani generis milites convocat.
3 "Credo ego vos," inquit "socii, et ipsos cernere[6] pacatis omnibus Hispaniae populis aut finiendam nobis militiam exercitusque dimittendos esse aut in 4 alias terras transferendum bellum; ita enim hae gentes non pacis solum sed etiam victoriae bonis florebunt, si ex aliis gentibus praedam et gloriam
5 quaeremus. Itaque cum longinqua a domo instet

[1] Hispaniae Galliaeque populis Luchs: hispania galliaque populisque P^2: hispaniae et galliae populis P^1.
[2] exspectatione Heerwagen: in expectatione P.
[3] erectam P^2: ereptam P^1.
[4] divenditisque ς: diuidentitisque (from diuidenditis) P^1: diuidendisque P^2
[5] reliquiis edd.: reliquis P.
[6] cernere P^2: gernere (from genere) P^1.

---

[1] Livy makes Hannibal speak with rhetorical exaggeration. The Spanish troops whom he is addressing have not conquered 'every tribe in Spain,' for they came themselves

Hannibal had been beforehand with the Romans in gaining the good-will of the Gauls, but that even he would find them hardly tractable—so fierce and untamed was their nature—unless from time to time he should make use of gold, of which the race is very covetous, to secure the favour of their principal men. So the envoys, having travelled through the nations of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome, not long after the consuls had set out for their respective commands. They found the citizens all on tip-toe with expectation of the war, for the rumour persisted that the Phoenicians had already crossed the Ebro. B.C. 218

XXI. Hannibal, after the capture of Saguntum, had withdrawn his army into winter quarters at New Carthage. There he learned what had been done in Rome and Carthage and what had been decreed, and that he was not only commander in the war, but the cause of it as well. So, having divided or sold off what was left of the plunder, he thought best to defer his plans no longer, and, calling together the soldiers of Spanish blood, thus addressed them: "My allies, I doubt not that you yourselves perceive how, having conquered every tribe in Spain, we must either bring our campaigning to a close and disband our armies, or shift the seat of war to other countries.[1] For these nations here will enjoy the blessings not merely of peace, but also of victory, only if we look to other nations for spoils and glory. Since, therefore, you are on the eve of an expedition that will carry B.C. 219–218 from tribes which had been for some years friendly and subject to the Carthaginians. He had not indeed conquered all the hostile tribes, but only those lying south of the Ebro.

A.U.C. 535–536

militia incertumque sit quando domos vestras et quae cuique ibi cara sunt visuri sitis, si quis vestrum suos 6 invisere volt, commeatum do. Primo vere[1] edico adsitis, ut dis bene iuvantibus bellum ingentis gloriae 7 praedaeque futurum incipiamus." Omnibus fere visendi domos oblata ultro potestas grata erat et iam desiderantibus suos et longius in futurum providen- 8 tibus desiderium. Per totum tempus hiemis quies inter labores aut iam[2] exhaustos aut mox exhauriendos renovavit corpora animosque ad omnia de integro patienda. Vere primo ad edictum convenere.

A.U.C. 536

9 Hannibal, cum recensuisset omnium gentium auxilia, Gades profectus Herculi vota exsolvit novisque se obligat votis, si cetera prospera evenis- 10 sent. Inde partiens curas simul in inferendum[3] atque arcendum bellum, ne, dum ipse terrestri per Hispaniam Galliasque itinere Italiam peteret, nuda apertaque Romanis Africa ab Sicilia esset, valido 11 praesidio firmare eam statuit. Pro eo supplementum ipse ex Africa maxime iaculatorum, levium armis, petit, ut Afri in Hispania Hispani in Africa,[4] melior procul ab domo futurus uterque miles, velut mutuis 12 pigneribus obligati stipendia facerent. Tredecim milia octingentos quinquaginta pedites caetratos

[1] primo vere P^2: promoueri P^1.
[2] iam ς: etiam P.
[3] in inferendum Gronovius: inferendum P.
[4] Hispani in Africa ς: in africa P^1: in africa hispani P^2.

---

[1] Gades (Cadiz) was a Tyrian colony and possessed a famous temple of Melkarth (whom the Romans identified with Hercules), the tutelary god of the mother city.

[2] Like the Greek πελτασταί, these were light infantry

you far afield, and it is uncertain when you will see again your homes and what there is dear to each of you, if any of you desires to visit his friends, I grant him furlough. Be at hand, I charge you, with the first signs of spring, that with Heaven's good help we may begin a war that shall bring us vast renown and booty." There were very few who did not welcome the opportunity thus freely proffered of visiting their homes, for they were already homesick and looked forward to an even longer separation from their friends. The full winter's rest between the labours already undergone and those that were presently to come gave them new strength and courage for a fresh encounter with every hardship. Early in the spring they assembled in obedience to their orders. B.C. 219–218

When Hannibal had reviewed the contingents sent in by all the nations, he went to Gades[1] and discharged his vows to Hercules, binding himself with fresh ones, in case he should be successful in the remainder of his undertaking. Then, with equal concern for attack and defence, lest while he should be himself advancing upon Italy by an overland march through Spain and Gaul, Africa might lie exposed and open to a Roman invasion on the side of Sicily, he resolved to garrison that country with a powerful force. To supply its place he requisitioned troops for himself from Africa—light-armed slingers chiefly—so that Africans might serve in Spain and Spaniards in Africa, and both be the better soldiers for being far from home, as though mutually pledged to loyalty. Thirteen thousand eight hundred and fifty targeteers[2] and eight B.C. 218

[1] whose defensive armour consisted of a small round shield covered with oxhide.

A.U.C. 536 misit in Africam et funditores Baliares octingentos septuaginta, equites mixtos ex multis gentibus mille 13 ducentos. Has copias partim Carthagini praesidio esse, partim distribui per Africam iubet. Simul conquisitoribus in civitates missis quattuor milia conscripta delectae iuventutis, praesidium eosdem et obsides, duci Carthaginem iubet.

XXII. Neque Hispaniam neglegendam ratus, atque id eo minus quod haud ignarus erat circumitam ab Romanis eam legatis ad sollicitandos prin-
2 cipum animos, Hasdrubali fratri, viro impigro, eam provinciam destinat firmatque [1] Africis maxime praesidiis, peditum Afrorum undecim milibus octingentis quinquaginta, Liguribus trecentis, Baliaribus
3 quingentis.[2] Ad haec peditum auxilia additi equites Libyphoenices, mixtum Punicum Afris genus, quadringenti quinquaginta et [3] Numidae Maurique, accolae Oceani, ad mille octingenti et parva Ilergetum manus ex Hispania, trecenti [4] equites, et ne quod [5] terrestris deesset auxilii genus, elephanti
4 viginti unus.[6] Classis praeterea data tuendae maritimae orae,[7] quia qua parte belli vicerant ea tum

[1] firmatque Woelfflin: firmatque eum CM^2: firmatque cum M^1: firmatque eam Linsmayer.

[2] quingentis added by Glareanus (from Polyb. III. xxxiii. 16).

[3] quinquaginta et added by Alschefski (from Polyb. III. xxxiii. 15).

[4] trecenti Ruperti (Polyb. III. xxxiii. 16): cc CM.

[5] quod ς: quid CM.

[6] viginti unus Sigonius (Polyb. ibid.): xiiii milia (and other corruptions) CM.

[7] tuendae maritimae orae ς: ad tuende maritume ore C^1: ad tuendae maritumae orae M (changed by original hand to ad tuenda maritumae ora).

---

[1] The Baliares (Majorca and Minorca) furnished the most skilful slingers in the world. Livy says (XXVIII. xxxvii. 6)

hundred and seventy Baliaric slingers,[1] with twelve B.C. 218 hundred horsemen drawn from many nations, he sent to Africa. A part of these troops were to be a garrison for Carthage, a part to be distributed through the country. At the same time he directed that recruiting officers be sent out into the states,[2] and that four thousand picked men be brought to Carthage, to serve at once as defenders and as hostages.

XXII. And considering that neither must Spain be neglected, and so much the less since he was not unaware that Roman ambassadors had journeyed through it to seek the support of its leading men, he appointed it to be the charge of his brother Hasdrubal—an active, energetic man—and secured it with troops, for the most part African. Of infantry there were eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty Africans, three hundred Ligurians, and five hundred Baliares. To these infantry forces he added the following units of cavalry: four hundred and fifty Libyphoenicians—a race of mixed Punic and African blood—and some eight hundred Numidians and Moors, who dwell near the ocean,[3] and a little company of three hundred Spanish Ilergetes. Finally, that no sort of land force might be lacking, there were twenty-one elephants. He also assigned a fleet to Spain, for the protection of its seaboard, since it might be expected that the Romans would that no single individual of any other people was so superior in this art to his fellows as were all the Baliares to the rest of mankind. The ancients derived Baliares from βάλλειν, "throw."

[2] sc. of Africa.

[3] Mauretania corresponded to the present Fez and Morocco.

A.U.C. 536

quoque rem gesturos Romanos credi poterat, quinquaginta quinqueremes, quadriremes duae, triremes quinque; sed aptae instructaeque remigio triginta et duae quinqueremes erant et triremes quinque.

5 Ab Gadibus Carthaginem ad hiberna exercitus redit; atque inde profectus praeter Onusam[1] urbem 6 ad Hiberum per maritimam oram[2] ducit. Ibi fama est in quiete visum ab eo iuvenem divina specie, qui se ab Iove diceret ducem in Italiam Hannibali missum: proinde sequeretur neque usquam a se deflec- 7 teret oculos. Pavidum primo nusquam circumspicientem aut respicientem secutum; deinde cura ingenii humani, cum quidnam id esset quod respicere[3] vetitus esset agitaret animo, temperare oculis nequi- 8 visse; tum[4] vidisse post sese serpentem mira magnitudine cum ingenti arborum ac virgultorum strage ferri ac post insequi cum fragore caeli nimbum. 9 Tum quae moles ea quidve prodigii esset quaerentem audisse vastitatem Italiae esse: pergeret porro ire nec ultra inquireret sineretque fata in occulto esse.

XXIII. Hoc visu laetus tripertito Hiberum copias traiecit praemissis qui Gallorum animos, qua traducendus exercitus erat, donis conciliarent Alpiumque transitus specularentur. Nonaginta milia peditum,

[1] Onusam M. Mueller: omissam CM.
[2] per maritimam oram Weissenborn: mariti(-tu- C)mam oram CM.
[3] respicere ς: respiceret CM. [4] tum ς: eum CM.

[1] In this enumeration of forces Livy follows Polybius (III. xxxiii. 9), who says that he found the numbers recorded again on this occasion employ that mode of warfare B.C. 218 in which they had been victorious. There were fifty quinqueremes, two quadriremes, and five triremes. But only thirty-two quinqueremes and the five triremes were equipped and manned with rowers.[1]

From Gades Hannibal returned to New Carthage, to the winter quarters of his army. Setting out from thence, he marched along the coast, past the city of Onusa, to the Ebro. It was there, as they tell, that he saw in his sleep a youth of godlike aspect, who declared that he was sent by Jupiter to lead him into Italy: let him follow, therefore, nor anywhere turn his eyes away from his guide. At first he was afraid and followed, neither looking to the right nor to the left, nor yet behind him; but presently wondering, with that curiosity to which all of us are prone, what it could be that he had been forbidden to look back upon, he was unable to command his eyes; then he saw behind him a serpent of monstrous size, that moved along with vast destruction of trees and underbrush, and a storm-cloud coming after, with loud claps of thunder; and, on his asking what this prodigious portent was, he was told that it was the devastation of Italy: he was therefore to go on, nor enquire further, but suffer destiny to be wrapped in darkness.

XXIII. Rejoicing at this vision, he led his troops across the Ebro in three columns, after sending agents ahead, to win over with presents the Gauls who dwelt in the region which the army had to cross, and to explore the passes of the Alps. He had ninety thousand foot and twelve thousand horse by Hannibal himself on a bronze tablet which was set up on the Lacinian Promontory (near Crotona).

A.U.C. 536

2 duodecim milia equitum Hiberum traduxit. Ilergetes inde Bargusiosque[1] et Ausetanos et Lacetaniam,[2] quae subiecta Pyrenaeis montibus est, subegit, oraeque huic omni praefecit Hannonem, ut fauces quae Hispanias Galliis iungunt in potestate essent. 3 Decem milia peditum Hannoni ad praesidium obtinendae regionis data et mille equites.

4 Postquam per Pyrenaeum saltum traduci exercitus est coeptus rumorque per barbaros manavit certior de bello Romano, tria milia inde Carpetanorum peditum iter averterunt. Constabat non tam bello motos quam longinquitate viae insuperabilique Alpium tran- 5 situ. Hannibal, quia revocare aut vi retinere eos anceps erat, ne ceterorum etiam feroces animi inritarentur, 6 supra septem milia hominum domos remisit, quos et ipsos[3] gravari militia senserat, Carpetanos quoque ab se dimissos simulans.

XXIV. Inde, ne mora atque otium animos sollicitaret, cum reliquis copiis Pyrenaeum transgreditur 2 et ad oppidum Iliberri castra locat. Galli, quamquam Italiae bellum inferri audiebant, tamen, quia vi subactos trans Pyrenaeum Hispanos fama erat praesidiaque valida imposita, metu servitutis ad arma consternati Ruscinonem aliquot[4] populi conveniunt. 3 Quod ubi Hannibali nuntiatum est, moram magis

[1] Bargusiosque ς: bargutosque C^3M: barguntosque C^1.
[2] Lacetaniam Sigonius: aquitaniā C^3M: aquitanos C^1.
[3] ipsos Muretus: ipse CM: ipsa Unger.
[4] aliquot C^3: aliquod C^1M.

---

[1] Polybius (III. xxxv. 7) says that Hannibal now had fifty thousand foot and about nine thousand horse.
[2] The modern Elne is near the site.

when he crossed the Ebro. He now subdued the Ilergetes, and the Bargusii and Ausetani, and also Lacetania, which lies at the foot of the Pyrenees. All this coast he put in charge of Hanno, that the passes connecting Spain and Gaul might be under his control. To garrison this district, he gave Hanno ten thousand foot and a thousand horse. B.C. 218

When the army had entered the defiles which lead over the Pyrenees, and more definite rumours had spread amongst the barbarians that the war was to be with Rome, three thousand of the Carpetanian foot turned back. It was understood that they were influenced not so much by the war as by the long march and the impossibility of crossing the Alps. To recall them or to detain them forcibly would have been hazardous, for it might have roused resentment in the savage bosoms of the others. And so Hannibal sent back to their homes above seven thousand more, whom he had perceived to be chafing at the service, pretending that he had also dismissed the Carpetani.

XXIV. Then, in order that his troops might not become demoralized by delay and inaction, he crossed the Pyrenees with the remainder of his forces[1] and pitched his camp by the town of Iliberri.[2] The Gauls, though they heard that the war was aimed at Italy, nevertheless, because it was said that the Spaniards beyond the Pyrenees had been forcibly subjugated and strong garrisons imposed upon them, were driven by the fear of servitude to arm themselves, and several tribes assembled at Ruscino.[3] When Hannibal was apprised of this, he was more

[3] The name is reflected in the French Tour de Roussillon, near Perpignan.

A.U.C. 536

quam bellum metuens oratores ad regulos eorum misit: conloqui semet ipsum cum iis velle; et vel illi propius Iliberrim [1] accederent, vel se Ruscinonem processurum, ut ex propinquo congressus facilior esset; nam et accepturum eos in castra sua se laetum nec cunctanter se ipsum ad eos venturum. Hospitem enim se Galliae non hostem advenisse, nec stricturum ante gladium, si per Gallos liceat, quam in Italiam venisset. Et per nuntios quidem haec; ut vero reguli Gallorum castris ad Iliberrim extemplo motis haud gravate [2] ad Poenum venerunt, capti donis cum bona pace exercitum per fines suos praeter Ruscinonem oppidum transmiserunt.

XXV. In Italiam interim nihil ultra quam Hiberum transisse Hannibalem a Massiliensium legatis Romam perlatum erat, cum perinde ac si Alpes iam transisset, Boi sollicitatis Insubribus defecerunt nec tam ob veteres in populum Romanum iras quam quod nuper circa Padum Placentiam Cremonamque colonias in agrum [3] Gallicum deductas aegre patiebantur. Itaque armis repente arreptis in eum ipsum agrum impetu facto tantum terroris ac tumultus fecerunt ut non agrestis modo multitudo sed ipsi triumviri Romani, qui ad agrum venerant adsignandum, diffisi

[1] Iliberrim edd.: inliberrim C: inliberarim M^1: illiberri M^3.
[2] gravate ς: grauanter CM.
[3] agrum C^3M^3: agrorum C^1?M^1.

---

[1] Livy has said nothing of any negotiations between Hannibal and the Boi, preferring, in his love of dramatic effect, to let us see this Gallic outbreak as it appeared to the Romans—like a bolt from the blue. See chap. xxix. § 6.

afraid of delay than of fighting, and dispatched am- B.C. 218 bassadors to their chieftains to inform them that he wished to confer with them in person, and suggested that either they come nearer to Iliberri or that he would go forward to Ruscino, so that being close to one another they might meet more easily. He would be glad, he said, to receive them in his camp, nor would he hesitate to go to them. He had come into Gaul as a friend, not as an enemy, and would keep his sword sheathed, if the Gauls would let him, till he had entered Italy. Thus far his emissaries. But when the Gallic chieftains, moving up their camp at once near Iliberri, came, nothing loath, to the Phoenician, they were captivated by his gifts, and permitted the army to march unmolested through their borders and past the town of Ruscino.

XXV. In Italy meanwhile nothing more was known than that Hannibal had crossed the Ebro—which was the news that Massiliot envoys brought to Rome—when, as though he had already crossed the Alps, the Boi, after rousing up the Insubres, revolted.[1] To this they were incited not so much by their old animosity against the Roman People as by vexation at the recent establishment of colonies in Gallic territory, near the Po, at Placentia and Cremona.[2] Flying to arms they made an incursion into that very district, and spread such terror and confusion that not only the rural population, but the Roman commissioners themselves, who had come for the purpose of assigning lands, not trusting to the [2] These were of the type called Latin colonies. To each of them six thousand colonists had been assigned. They had hardly got settled when the Gauls broke out (Polybius, III. xl. 3–6).

A.U.C. 536

Placentiae moenibus Mutinam confugerint, C. Lutatius C. Servilius[1] M. Annius.[2] Lutati nomen haud dubium est; pro Annio Servilioque M'. Acilium[3] et C. Herennium habent quidam annales, alii P. Cornelium Asinam et C. Papirium Masonem.[4] Id quoque dubium est, legati ad expostulandum missi ad Boios violati sint,[5] an in triumviros agrum metantes impetus sit factus. Mutinae cum obsiderentur et gens ad oppugnandarum urbium artes rudis, pigerrima eadem ad militaria opera, segnis intactis adsideret muris, simulari coeptum de pace agi, evocatique ab Gallorum principibus legati ad conloquium, non contra ius modo gentium sed violata etiam quae data in id tempus erat fide, comprehenduntur, negantibus Gallis nisi obsides sibi redderentur eos dimissuros. Cum haec de legatis nuntiata essent et Mutina praesidiumque in periculo esset, L. Manlius praetor ira accensus effusum agmen ad Mutinam ducit. Silvae tunc circa viam erant plerisque incultis. Ibi inexplorato profectus in insidias praecipitatur[6] multaque cum caede suorum aegre in apertos campos emersit. Ibi castra com-

[1] C. Servilius Sigonius: ā seruilius CM.
[2] Annius ς: annilius CM.
[3] Annio Servilioque M'. Acilium Weissenborn: aulo seruilio quem acilium C^1: aulo seruilio m̄ acilium C^3: aulo seruilio quem̄ acilio (aciliū M^3)M.
[4] Masonem ς: nasonem C: nassonem M.
[5] sint ς: sint incertum CM.
[6] praecipitatur Gronovius: praecipitatus CM.

[1] Apparently the Gauls left hostages with the Romans when they arranged for the Romans to send representatives to talk things over with them in the Gallic camp.
[2] Neither Polybius nor Livy tells us where Manlius was when the news reached him. Weissenborn-Mueller think he walls of Placentia, fled to Mutina. (Their names B.C. 218 were Gaius Lutatius, Gaius Servilius, and Marcus Annius. There is no question about Lutatius: for Annius and Servilius, some annals have Manius Acilius and Gaius Herennius, others Publius Cornelius Asina and Gaius Papirius Maso. This, too, is uncertain, whether envoys sent to expostulate with the Boi were maltreated, or an attack was made upon the three commissioners as they were measuring off the land.) Whilst they lay shut up in Mutina, the Gauls—who know nothing of the art of assaulting cities, and, besides, are very indolent in regard to siege-works, and were now sitting idly down before the walls without attempting them—feigned a readiness to treat for peace; and their leaders having invited the Romans to send out spokesmen to confer with them, they seized these envoys, in violation not only of the law of nations, but also of a pledge which they had given for this time, and declared that they would not let them go unless their own hostages were restored to them.[1] When word arrived of this affair of the envoys, and Mutina and its garrison were in danger, Lucius Manlius, the praetor, blazing with resentment, set out for Mutina with his army in loose marching order.[2] In those days the road led through a forest, as the country was not, for the most part, under cultivation, and Manlius, advancing without reconnaissance, plunged into an ambush, and after sustaining heavy losses, managed with difficulty to get through into the open fields. There he entrenched was at Placentia, engaged in strengthening the new fortifications.

A.U.C. 536 munita, et quia Gallis ad temptanda ea defuit spes, refecti sunt militum animi, quamquam ad quin-
11 gentos[1] cecidisse satis constabat. Iter deinde de integro coeptum nec, dum per patentia[2] loca
12 ducebatur agmen, apparuit[3] hostis; ubi rursus silvae intratae, tum postremos adorti cum magna trepidatione ac pavore omnium septingentos milites occide-
13 runt, sex signa ademere. Finis et Gallis territandi et pavendi fuit Romanis ut e saltu[4] invio atque impedito evasere. Inde apertis locis facile tutantes agmen Romani Tannetum, vicum propinquum Pado, 14 contendere. Ibi se munimento ad tempus commeatibusque fluminis et Brixianorum etiam Gallorum auxilio adversus crescentem in dies multitudinem hostium tutabantur.

XXVI. Qui tumultus repens postquam est Romam perlatus et Punicum insuper Gallico bellum auctum
2 patres acceperunt, C. Atilium praetorem cum una legione Romana et quinque milibus sociorum dilectu novo a consule conscriptis auxilium ferre Manlio[5] iubent, qui sine ullo certamine—abscesserant enim metu hostes—Tannetum pervenit.

[1] quingentos (D) added by Gronovius.
[2] patentia M^2: inpacientia C: inpactentia M^1.
[3] apparuit Glareanus: cum apparuit CM.
[4] e saltu M^2: e saltus M^1: exaltu C^1: ex saltu C^3.
[5] Manlio edd.: manilio CM.

[1] This second attack—Polybius records but the one—is suspiciously like the first. Livy, or Livy's immediate source, may unconsciously have made two episodes out of slightly different accounts of the same affair.

[2] Tannetum (now Tanneto) was really about ten miles south of the Po, on the Via Aemilia Lepida. If commeatibus fluminis is correctly translated, we may suppose (1) that Livy thought Tannetum was much nearer the Po, or (2) that a camp, and since the Gauls lacked heart to assail it, B.C. 218

the soldiers recovered their spirits, though it was no secret that as many as five hundred men had fallen. Then they began their march again, nor, so long as the column advanced through open country, was the enemy to be seen; but when they had once more got into the woods, the Gauls attacked their rear, and throwing the whole column into terror and confusion, slew seven hundred soldiers and carried off six ensigns.[1] The alarming onsets of the Gauls and the panic of the Romans ended when they got clear of the trackless woods and thickets. Thereafter, marching across open ground, the Romans had no difficulty in protecting their column, and hastened to Tannetum, a village lying near the Po, where by means of temporary fortifications and supplies got in by the river, and with the help also of the Brixian Gauls, they defended themselves against the enemy, whose numbers were increasing daily.[2]

XXVI. When the news of this sudden insurrection was brought to Rome, and the Fathers learnt that the Punic War was augmented by a war with the Gauls, they commanded Gaius Atilius, the praetor, to take one Roman legion and five thousand of the allies—a force which the consul[3] had just levied—and proceed to the relief of Manlius. Atilius reached Tannetum without any fighting, for the enemy had retired in alarm.

he has confused Brixia (Brescia) with Brixellum (Bresciello), which is nearly north of Tanneto and close to the Po, and might have served as an entrepôt for supplies sent down from Placentia. The statement in chap. lv. § 4 that the Cenomani (whose capital was Brixia) were the only Gallic tribe that was loyal to Rome favours (1).

[3] P. Cornelius Scipio.

A.U.C. 536

3 Et P. Cornelius in locum eius quae missa cum praetore erat scripta[1] legione nova profectus ab urbe sexaginta longis navibus praeter oram Etruriae Ligurumque et inde Saluum[2] montes pervenit Mas-
4 siliam et ad proximum ostium Rhodani—pluribus enim divisus amnis in mare decurrit—castra locat vixdum satis credens Hannibalem superasse Pyre-
5 naeos montes. Quem ut de Rhodani quoque transitu agitare animadvertit, incertus quonam ei loco occurreret, necdum satis refectis ab iactatione maritima militibus, trecentos interim delectos equites ducibus Massiliensibus et auxiliaribus Gallis ad exploranda omnia visendosque ex tuto hostes praemittit.
6 Hannibal ceteris metu aut pretio pacatis iam in Volcarum[3] pervenerat agrum, gentis validae. Colunt autem circa utramque ripam Rhodani; sed diffisi citeriore agro arceri Poenum posse, ut flumen pro munimento haberent omnibus ferme suis trans Rhodanum traiectis ulteriorem ripam armis[4] obtinebant.
7 Ceteros accolas fluminis Hannibal et eorum ipsorum quos sedes suae tenuerant simul perlicit donis ad naves undique contrahendas fabricandasque, simul

[1] erat scripta Weissenborn: trascripta C: transcripta M.
[2] Saluum M^2 (cf. V. xxxiv. 7): saluium C (before erasure) M^1: saluii C (after erasure).
[3] Volcarum edd.: uolgarum C: uulgarum M.
[4] armis Hearne: amnis C: amnis armis M.

---

[1] Polybius (XXXIV. x. 5) says two, Pliny (N.H. III. iv. 33) three, and Strabo (IV. i. 8) cites Timaeus as authority for the number five.

[2] Polybius says that Scipio "sent out three hundred of his bravest cavalry, giving them as guides and supports certain Celts who were in the service of the Massiliots as mercenaries" (Paton's translation).

[3] It is usually held—with Napoleon—that Hannibal

Publius Cornelius, too, after enrolling a new legion B.C. 218
in place of that which had been sent with the praetor, set out from the City with sixty ships of war, and coasting Etruria and the mountainous country of Liguria and the Salui, arrived at Massilia, and went into camp at the nearest mouth of the Rhone—for the river discharges itself into the sea by several[1]—hardly believing, even then, that Hannibal could have crossed the Pyrenees. But when he found that Hannibal was actually planning how to cross the Rhone, being uncertain where he should encounter him, and his soldiers not having as yet fully recovered from the tossing of the sea, he sent out a chosen band of three hundred cavalry, with Massiliot guides and Gallic auxiliaries,[2] to make, while he was waiting, a thorough reconnaissance, and have a look at the enemy from a safe distance.

Hannibal, having pacified the others through fear or bribery, had now reached the territory of a powerful nation called the Volcae.[3] They inhabit both banks of the Rhone, but doubting their ability to keep the Phoenician from the western bank, they had brought nearly all their people over the Rhone, so as to have the river for a bulwark, and were holding the eastern bank with arms. The rest of the dwellers by the river, and such of the Volcae themselves as had clung to their homes, were enticed by Hannibal's gifts to assemble large boats from every quarter and to fashion new ones; and indeed crossed the Rhone above the confluence with the Durance. The arguments of those who think that the crossing was just above the Delta have been recently restated by Spencer Wilkinson, Hannibal's March Through the Alps, pp. 14–17.

A.U.C. 536

et ipsi traici exercitum levarique quam primum regionem suam tanta[1] hominum[2] urgente turba 8 cupiebant. Itaque ingens coacta vis navium est lintriumque temere ad vicinalem usum paratarum; novasque alias primum Galli inchoantes cavabant 9 ex singulis arboribus, deinde et ipsi milites simul copia materiae simul facilitate operis inducti alveos informes, nihil, dummodo innare aquae et capere onera possent, curantes, raptim quibus se suaque transveherent, faciebant.

XXVII. Iamque omnibus satis comparatis ad traiciendum terrebant[3] ex adverso hostes omnem 2 ripam equites virique obtinentes. Quos ut averteret, Hannonem,[4] Bomilcaris[5] filium, vigilia prima noctis cum parte copiarum, maxime Hispanis, adverso 3 flumine ire iter unius diei iubet, et ubi primum possit, quam occultissime traiecto amni circumducere agmen, ut, cum opus facto sit, adoriatur ab tergo 4 hostes. Ad id dati duces Galli edocent[6] inde milia quinque et viginti ferme supra parvae insulae circumfusum amnem latiore,[7] ubi dividebatur, eoque 5 minus alto alveo transitum ostendere. Ibi raptim caesa materia ratesque fabricatae in quibus equi virique et alia onera traicerentur. Hispani sine

[1] tanta C^2M (by erasure from tantā): tantam C^1.
[2] hominum C^3: omnium C^1M.
[3] terrebant C^3: terrebat C^1M.
[4] Hannonem M^2: annonem C^3M^1: amonem C^1.
[5] Bomilcaris M^2: miuomilcaris CM^1.
[6] Galli edocent M^2: galliae docent CM^1.
[7] latiore Bauer: latiorem CM.

[1] The Spaniards were preferred for this duty because of their skill in swimming rivers, as we see at § 5 (cf. chap.

they themselves were eager to have the army set B.C. 218 across as soon as possible and to relieve their district of the burden of so huge a horde of men. So they brought together a vast number of boats, and of canoes roughly fashioned for local traffic, and made new ones by hollowing out single trees. The Gauls took the lead in this, but the soldiers presently fell to work themselves, when they found the timber plentiful and the labour light. They were unshapely troughs, but the men could make them quickly, and their one concern was to get something that would float and hold a cargo, in which they might ferry themselves and their belongings over.

XXVII. Everything was now in readiness for the crossing, which, however, was menaced by the enemy on the other side, who covered the whole bank with their horse and foot. In order to draw them off, Hannibal ordered Hanno, the son of Bomilcar, to set out in the first watch of the night with a part of the troops, chiefly Spaniards,[1] and, making a march of one day up the stream, to take the first opportunity of crossing it, with the greatest secrecy, and fetch a compass with his column, so that, when the time came, he might assail the enemy in the rear. The Gauls who had been appointed to be his guides informed him that some five-and-twenty miles upstream the river flowed round a little island, and being wider where it divided, and therefore shallower, afforded a passage. There they quickly felled some trees and constructed rafts to transport the men and horses and other burdens. The Spaniards without xlvii. § 5). The method here employed was still in vogue amongst them in Caesar's time (Bell. Civ. I. xlviii. 7).

A.U.C. 536

ulla mole in utres vestimentis coniectis ipsi caetris
6 superpositis incubantes flumen tranavere. Et alius exercitus ratibus iunctis traiectus, castris prope flumen positis, nocturno itinere atque operis labore fessus quiete unius diei reficitur intento duce ad
7 consilium opportune exsequendum. Postero die profecti ex loco edito[1] fumo significant transisse et haud procul abesse. Quod ubi accepit Hannibal, ne tempori deesset, dat signum ad traiciendum.
8 Iam paratas aptatasque habebat pedes lintres, eques fere propter equos naves.[2] Navium agmen ad excipiendum adversi impetum fluminis parte superiore transmittens tranquillitatem infra traicientibus lin-
9 tribus praebebat. Equorum pars magna nantes loris a puppibus trahebantur, praeter eos quos instratos frenatosque, ut extemplo egresso in ripam equiti usui essent, imposuerant in naves.

XXVIII. Galli occursant in ripa[3] cum variis ululatibus cantuque moris sui quatientes scuta super
2 capita vibrantesque dextris tela, quamquam ex adverso[4] terrebat tanta vis navium cum ingenti sono fluminis et clamore vario nautarum, militum, et qui[5] nitebantur perrumpere impetum fluminis, et qui ex

[1] edito Clericus: prodito CM: praedicto Walch: ex praedicto (omitting loco) Weissenborn.
[2] naves Heerwagen: nantes CM.
[3] ripa Gronovius: ripam CM.
[4] ex adverso Crévier: et ex aduerso CM.
[5] et qui M^4: equi CM.

---

[1] The skins of sheep and goats, such as are still used to hold wine. They could either be inflated and used merely as a kind of life-belt, or could be made to serve at the same time as kit bags.

more ado stuffed their clothes into skins,[1] and placing B.C. 218 their bucklers on top of these and supporting themselves by means of them, swam across. The rest of the force, too, got over, by means of the rafts which they had made, and went into camp near the river. They were tired by the night march and their strenuous exertions, but their commander allowed them but one day to rest, being intent on carrying out the stratagem at the proper time. Resuming their march on the following day they sent up a smoke-signal from an elevated place, to show that they had got over the river and were not far off. When Hannibal saw this, he gave the order to cross, so as not to miss the favourable moment. The infantry had their skiffs all ready and equipped, while the cavalry had large boats, for the most part, on account of their horses. The large boats were sent across higher up the stream, to take the force of the current, and provided smooth water for the skiffs that crossed below them. A good part of the horses swam and were towed by their halters from the sterns of the boats, except those which they had saddled and bridled and put on board, that their riders might have them ready for instant use on landing.

XXVIII. The Gauls rushed to meet them on the bank, with all sorts of yells and their customary songs, clashing their shields together above their heads and brandishing darts in their right hands, despite the menace of so great a multitude of vessels coming against them and the loud roaring of the river and the confused hallooing of the boatmen and the sailors, as they strove to force their way athwart the current or shouted encouragement to their fellows

a.u.c. 536

3 altera ripa traicientes suos hortabantur. Iam satis paventes adverso tumultu terribilior ab tergo adortus clamor castris ab Hannone captis. Mox et ipse aderat, ancepsque terror circumstabat et e navibus[1] tanta vi armatorum in terram[2] evadente[3] et ab tergo 4 improvisa premente acie. Galli postquam utroque[4] vim facere conati pellebantur, qua patere[5] visum maxime iter perrumpunt trepidique in vicos passim suos diffugiunt. Hannibal ceteris copiis per otium traiectis spernens iam Gallicos tumultus castra locat. 5 Elephantorum traiciendorum varia consilia fuisse credo, certe variat[6] memoria actae rei. Quidam congregatis ad ripam elephantis tradunt ferocissimum ex iis inritatum ab rectore suo, cum refugientem in aquam nantem[7] sequeretur, traxisse gregem, ut quemque timentem altitudinem destitueret vadum,[8] impetu ipso fluminis in alteram ripam rapiente. 6 Ceterum magis constat ratibus traiectos; id ut tutius consilium ante rem foret, ita acta re ad fidem 7 pronius est. Ratem unam ducentos longam pedes, quinquaginta latam a terra in amnem porrexerunt, quam, ne secunda aqua deferretur, pluribus validis retinaculis parte superiore ripae religatam pontis in

[1] e navibus M^2: nauibus CM^1.
[2] terram edd.: terra CM.
[3] evadente M^2: euadentem CM^1.
[4] utroque ς: ultroque C (before erasure) M^1: ultro C (after erasure) M^2.
[5] patere ς: parte (from parte re) C: pate (from parte) M.
[6] variat Mehler: uariata CM.
[7] inde nantem Weissenborn: nantem CM.
[8] vadum edd.: uado CM.

from the further bank. But the tribesmen were already B.C. 218 somewhat daunted by the tumult which confronted them, when a still more appalling clamour arose in the rear, where Hanno had captured their camp. He was soon on the scene himself, and a twofold terror hemmed them in, as that mighty force of armed men came out upon the shore and the unlooked-for line of battle closed in from behind. When the Gauls had attempted charges in both directions and found themselves repulsed, they broke through where the way seemed least beset, and fled in confusion to their several villages. Hannibal brought over at leisure the rest of his forces, and giving himself no more concern over Gallic outbreaks, pitched his camp.

I believe that there were various plans for transporting the elephants; at all events the tradition varies as to how it was accomplished. Some say that the elephants were first assembled on the bank, and then the keeper of the fiercest of them provoked the beast and fled into the water; as he swam off, the elephant pursued him and drew the herd in his train; and though they were afraid of the deep water, yet as soon as each of them got out of his depth, the current itself swept him over to the other bank. It is, however, more generally believed that they were carried across on rafts; this method, as it would be the safer, if the thing were to be done, so, in view of its accomplishment, is more probably the one employed. A raft, two hundred feet long and fifty feet wide, was thrust out from the shore into the stream, and, after being moored to the bank above by a number of stout hawsers, so as not to be carried down the current, was covered with earth,

A.U.C. 536 modum humo iniecta constraverunt, ut beluae au-
8 dacter velut per solum ingrederentur. Altera ratis aeque lata, longa pedes centum, ad traiciendum flumen apta, huic copulata est; tum[1] elephanti per stabilem ratem tamquam viam praegredientibus feminis acti; ubi in minorem applicatam transgressi
9 sunt, extemplo resolutis quibus leviter adnexa erat vinculis, ab actuariis aliquot navibus ad alteram ripam pertrahitur. Ita primis expositis alii deinde
10 repetiti ac traiecti sunt. Nihil sane trepidabant, donec continenti velut ponte agerentur; primus erat pavor cum soluta ab ceteris rate in altum
11 raperentur. Ibi urgentes inter se cedentibus extremis ab aqua trepidationis[2] aliquantum edebant, donec quietem ipse timor circumspectantibus aquam 12 fecisset. Excidere[3] etiam saevientes quidam in flumen; sed pondere ipso stabiles deiectis rectoribus quaerendis pedetemptim vadis in terram evasere.

XXIX. Dum elephanti traiciuntur, interim Hannibal Numidas equites quingentos ad castra Romana miserat speculatum ubi et quantae copiae essent et 2 quid pararent. Huic alae equitum missi, ut ante dictum est, ab ostio Rhodani trecenti Romanorum equites occurrunt. Proelium atrocius quam pro
3 numero pugnantium editur; nam praeter multa

[1] tum Madvig: vi tum Harant: ut cum CM.
[2] trepidationis edd.: trepidationi CM.
[3] excidere M^2: excindere C^1: extendere C^3: exindere M^1.

[1] Polybius, who perhaps believed, as did Pliny (N. H. VIII. 28), that elephants could not swim, says that those that went overboard were saved by the length of their trunks, which they kept above the surface, and, breathing so, passed through the water, for the most part on their feet (III. xlvii. 12). Livy seems to have thought of them as swimming.

like a bridge, in order that the beasts might boldly venture upon it, as on solid ground. A second raft, of equal width and a hundred feet long, and fit for crossing the river, was coupled to the first. Then the elephants, with the females leading, were driven out over the stationary raft, as over a road; and after they had passed on to the smaller raft adjoining it, the ropes by which this had been loosely attached were cast off and it was towed across by some row-boats to the eastern bank. After landing the first contingent in this fashion, they returned and fetched the others over. The elephants exhibited no signs of fear so long as they were being driven along as though on a connected bridge; they first became frightened when the raft was cast loose from the other and was carried out into mid-channel. The crowding together which resulted, as those on the outside shrank back from the water, gave rise to a slight panic, till terror itself, as they looked at the water all about them, made them quiet. Some, in their frenzy, even fell overboard; but, steadied by their very weight, threw off their riders, and feeling their way to the shallow places, got out upon the land.[1] B.C. 218

XXIX. Whilst the elephants were being got across, Hannibal had dispatched five hundred Numidian horsemen in the direction of the Roman camp, to find out where the enemy were and in what force, and what they meant to do. This body fell in with the three hundred Roman horsemen, sent out, as was mentioned before, from the mouth of the Rhone. The battle that followed was more hotly fought than the size of the contending forces would suggest, for besides the many who were volnera caedes etiam prope par utrimque fuit, fugaque et pavor Numidarum Romanis iam admodum fessis victoriam dedit. Victores ad centum quadraginta[1] nec omnes Romani sed pars Gallorum, victi amplius

A.U.C. 536

4 ducenti ceciderunt. Hoc principium simul omenque[2] belli ut summae rerum prosperum eventum ita haud sane incruentam ancipitisque certaminis victoriam Romanis portendit.

5 Ut re ita gesta ad utrumque ducem sui redierunt, nec Scipioni stare sententia poterat, nisi ut ex con-
6 siliis coeptisque hostis[3] et ipse conatus caperet, et Hannibalem incertum utrum coeptum in Italiam intenderet iter an cum eo qui primus se optulisset Romanus exercitus manus consereret, avertit a praesenti certamine Boiorum legatorum regulique Magali adventus, qui se duces itinerum socios periculi fore adfirmantes integro bello nusquam ante libatis viri-
7 bus Italiam adgrediendam censent. Multitudo timebat quidem hostem nondum oblitterata memoria superioris belli, sed magis iter immensum Alpesque, rem fama utique inexpertis horrendam, metuebat.

XXX. Itaque Hannibal, postquam ipsi sententia stetit pergere ire atque[4] Italiam petere, advocata[5] contione varie militum versat animos castigando
2 adhortandoque: mirari se quinam pectora semper

[1] centum quadraginta Gronovius (Polyb. III. xlv. 2): clx CM.
[2] omenque C^3M^2: omnemque C^1M^1.
[3] hostis ς: hospiciis C^1: auspiciis C^3: hospitis M.
[4] atque edd.: adque P.
[5] advocata edd.: aduocatum P.

wounded, the numbers of the slain were about equal B.C. 218 on both sides, and only the dismay and panic of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, who were by that time fairly exhausted. The victors lost about a hundred and forty, not all Romans but some of them Gauls; the vanquished about two hundred. This was at once the beginning of the war and an omen that promised the Romans success in the final outcome, though their victory would be by no means without bloodshed and would only come after a doubtful struggle.

When the participants in this affair had returned to their respective generals, it was impossible for Scipio to adopt any settled plan, except to frame his own measures to meet the strategy and movements of the enemy; while Hannibal, uncertain whether to march on, as he had begun, to Italy, or give battle to the first Roman army that had come in his way, was diverted from an immediate trial of strength by the arrival of Boian envoys, with their chief Magalus. These assured him that they would guide his march and share its perils, and urged him to avoid a battle and to keep his forces whole and unimpaired for the invasion of Italy. The rank and file were fearful of the enemy—for their memory of the former war was not yet erased—but more fearful of the interminable march over the Alps, an undertaking which rumour made appalling, at any rate to the inexperienced.

XXX. Accordingly Hannibal, having settled in his own mind to go forward and advance on Italy, called the soldiers together and worked on their feelings with alternate chiding and encouragement. He marvelled, he said, what sudden terror had in-impavida repens terror invaserit. Per tot annos vincentes eos stipendia facere neque ante Hispania excessisse quam omnes gentesque et terrae [1] quas duo diversa maria amplectantur Carthaginiensium

A.U.C. 536

3 essent. Indignatos deinde quod quicumque Saguntum obsedissent velut ob noxam sibi dedi postularet populus Romanus, Hiberum traiecisse [2] ad delendum nomen Romanorum liberandumque orbem
4 terrarum. Tum nemini visum id longum, cum ab
5 occasu solis ad exortus intenderent iter; nunc, postquam multo maiorem partem itineris [3] emensam cernant, Pyrenaeum saltum inter ferocissimas gentes superatum, Rhodanum, tantum amnem, tot milibus Gallorum prohibentibus, domita etiam ipsius fluminis vi traiectum, in conspectu Alpes habeant, quarum
6 alterum latus Italiae sit, in ipsis portis hostium fatigatos subsistere—quid Alpes aliud esse credentes
7 quam montium altitudines? Fingerent altiores Pyrenaei iugis: nullas profecto terras caelum contingere nec inexsuperabiles [4] humano generi esse. Alpes quidem habitari coli gignere atque alere animantes;
8 pervias fauces [5] esse exercitibus. Eos ipsos quos cernant legatos non pinnis sublime elatos Alpes transgressos. Ne maiores quidem eorum indigenas sed advenas Italiae cultores has ipsas Alpes in-

[1] terrae ς: terrase P: terras eas P^2.
[2] traiecisse edd.: traiecisset P.
[3] partem itineris edd.: partem in itineris P.
[4] inexsuperabiles edd.: exuperabilis P.
[5] fauces (faucis) Heerwagen: paucis P.

[1] Polybius (III. xxxix) estimates the distance covered by Hannibal as follows: New Carthage to the Ebro 2600 stades (the stade is roughly a furlong); the Ebro to Emporium 1600; Emporium to Narbo 600; Narbo to the passage of the Rhone 1600; the passage of the Rhone to the foot of the vaded breasts that had ever been dauntless. For B.C. 218 these many years they had been victorious in war, nor had they quitted Spain until all the tribes and territories which lay between two distant seas were in the power of the Carthaginians. Then, indignant that the Roman People should demand that whoever had laid siege to Saguntum be surrendered up to them, as though to expiate a felony, they had crossed the Ebro, in order to wipe out the Roman name and liberate the world. The march had not then seemed long to any of them, though they meant to advance from the setting to the rising sun; but now, when they could see that they had measured off the greater part of it;[1] when they had made their way, through the fiercest tribes, over the Pyrenees; when they had crossed the Rhone—that mighty river—in the teeth of so many thousand Gauls, overcoming, too, the violence of the stream itself; when the Alps, the other side of which was in Italy, were in full sight;—were they halting now, as though exhausted, at the very gates of their enemies? What else did they think that the Alps were but high mountains? They might fancy them higher than the ranges of the Pyrenees; but surely no lands touched the skies or were impassable to man. The Alps indeed were inhabited, were tilled, produced and supported living beings; their defiles were practicable for armies. Those very ambassadors whom they beheld had not crossed the Alps in the air on wings. Even the ancestors of these men had not been natives of Italy, but had lived there as foreign settlers, and had often crossed these very Alps in pass over the Alps 1400; the foot of the pass to the valley of the Po 1200.

A.U.C. 536

gentibus saepe agminibus cum liberis ac coniugibus
9 migrantium modo tuto transmisisse. Militi quidem armato nihil secum praeter instrumenta belli portanti quid invium aut inexsuperabile esse? Saguntum ut caperetur, quid per octo menses periculi,
10 quid laboris exhaustum esse? Romam, caput orbis terrarum, petentibus quicquam adeo asperum atque
11 arduum videri, quod inceptum moretur? Cepisse quondam Gallos ea quae adiri posse Poenus desperet? Proinde aut cederent animo atque virtute genti per eos dies totiens ab se victae, aut itineris finem sperent campum interiacentem Tiberi ac moenibus Romanis.

XXXI. His adhortationibus incitatos corpora curare
2 atque ad iter se parare iubet. Postero die profectus adversa ripa Rhodani mediterranea Galliae petit, non quia rectior ad Alpes via esset, sed quantum a mari recessisset minus obvium fore Romanum credens, 3 cum quo, priusquam in Italiam ventum[1] foret, non 4 erat in animo manus conserere. Quartis castris ad Insulam pervenit. Ibi Isara[2] Rhodanusque amnes[3] diversis ex Alpibus decurrentes agri aliquantum amplexi confluunt in unum; mediis[4] campis Insulae
5 nomen inditum. Incolunt prope Allobroges, gens

[1] italiam ventum C^3: italia euentum C^1: italiae uentum M^1: italia uentum M^2.
[2] ibi Isara Cluverius: ibi arar CM (corrected from ibisarar).
[3] amnes edd.: amnis CM.
[4] mediis ς: in mediis CM.

---

[1] See v. xxxiv–xxxv. Livy places the earliest Gallic immigration in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus.

[2] This expression is a strange anachronism in the mouth of Hannibal; but Livy thinks of Hannibal as realizing—and so perhaps he may have done—that the struggle now be-great companies, with their children and their wives, B.C. 218 in the manner of emigrants.[1] For armed soldiers, taking nothing with them but the instruments of war, what could be impassable or insurmountable? To capture Saguntum, what dangers or what hardships had they not endured for eight long months? Now that Rome, the capital of the world,[2] was their objective, could anything seem so painful or so difficult as to delay their enterprise? Had Gauls once captured that which the Phoenician despaired of approaching? Then let them yield in spirit and manhood to a race which they had so often vanquished in the course of the last few days, or look to end their march in the field[3] that lay between the Tiber and the walls of Rome.

XXXI. After encouraging them with this exhortation, he bade them refresh themselves and make ready for the march. Setting out the following day he advanced up the Rhone towards the interior of Gaul, not that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but believing that the farther he retired from the sea, the less likely he was to fall in with the Romans, with whom he had no mind to fight a battle until he should arrive in Italy. The fourth day's march brought him to the Island. There the rivers Isara and Rhone, rushing down from different Alps, unite their waters, after enclosing a considerable territory, and the Island is the name which has been given to the plains lying between them. Near by is the country of the Allobroges, a tribe, even at ginning would determine whether Rome or Carthage should rule the world.

[3] The Campus Martius lay outside the Servian wall, between the Capitoline, Quirinal, and Pincian Hills and the Tiber.

A.U.C. 536

iam inde nulla Gallica gente opibus aut fama inferior.
6 Tum discors erat. Regni certamine ambigebant fratres. Maior et qui prius imperitarat, Braneus nomine, a minore fratre [1] et coetu iuniorum, qui iure
7 minus vi [2] plus poterat, pellebatur. Huius seditionis peropportuna disceptatio cum ad Hannibalem reiecta esset,[3] arbiter regni factus, quod ea senatus principumque sententia fuerat,[4] imperium maiori restituit.
8 Ob id meritum [5] commeatu copiaque rerum omnium, maxime vestis, est adiutus,[6] quam infames frigoribus Alpes praeparari cogebant.
9 Sedatis Hannibal certaminibus Allobrogum cum iam Alpes peteret, non recta regione iter instituit sed ad laevam in Tricastinos flexit; inde per extremam oram Vocontiorum agri tendit in Tricorios,[7] haud usquam impedita via priusquam ad Druentiam [8]
10 flumen pervenit. Is et ipse Alpinus amnis longe omnium Galliae fluminum difficillimus transitu est;

[1] a minore fratre ς: minor erat fratre CM.
[2] vi ς: qui CM.
[3] reiecta esset ς: delecta esset C^1M^2: delectasset M^1: delata esset C^3M^3.
[4] fuerat M^2: futurum CM^1.
[5] id meritum M^2: id emeritum M^1: ide meritum C^1: idē meritum C^3.
[6] adiutus M^2: aditus CM^1.
[7] Tricorios edd.: trigorios CM.
[8] ad Druentiam M^4: adruentiam CM^1.

---

[1] The tribe in question was not the Allobroges, according to Polybius, III. xlix., but afforded the Carthaginians protection against the Allobroges.

[2] A turn to the left is unintelligible at this point in the march, and must be explained as due to a duplication of the march up the Rhone mentioned in § 2.

[3] Neither the Durance nor any of these tribes is mentioned by Polybius. But Polybius disliked to encumber his narra-that early day, inferior to no Gallic tribe in wealth B.C. 218 or reputation. Just then it was a prey to discord.[1] Two brothers were disputing the sovereignty. The elder, Braneus by name, who had held sway before, was being driven out by a faction of juniors headed by the younger brother, whose right was less but his might greater. This quarrel having very opportunely been referred to Hannibal for settlement, who thus became arbiter of the kingdom, he espoused the sentiments of the senate and the leading men and restored the sovereign power to the elder. In requital of this service he was assisted with provisions and supplies of every sort, particularly clothing, which the notorious cold of the Alps made it necessary to provide.

Having settled the contentions of the Allobroges, Hannibal was now ready for the Alps; but instead of marching directly towards them, he turned to the left,[2] to the country of the Tricastini, and thence proceeded through the outer borders of the territory of the Vocontii to the Tricorii, by a road which nowhere presented any difficulties, until he came to the Druentia.[3] This, too, is an Alpine river and by far the most difficult of all the rivers of Gaul to tive with outlandish geographical names that would mean nothing to his readers, and they are less likely to be arbitrary embellishments—on the part either of Livy or his source—than authentic details drawn from a source or sources common to Livy and Polybius and omitted by Polybius for the reason given. (The same may be said of the name of the Gallic prince in § 6.) If we assume that Hannibal ascended the Isère-Drac to the Druentia and thence crossed the Genèvre, he would have touched the territories of these tribes, and there would be no great difficulty in reconciling the account in Livy with that in Polybius (see De Sanctis, p. 69).

A.U.C. 536

nam cum aquae vim vehat ingentem, non tamen
11 navium patiens est, quia nullis coercitus ripis, pluribus simul neque iisdem alveis fluens, nova semper vada novosque gurgites gignit[1]—et ob eadem pediti quoque incerta via est—ad hoc saxa glareosa[2] volvens
12 nihil stabile nec tutum ingredienti praebet. Et tum forte imbribus auctus ingentem transgredientibus tumultum fecit, cum super cetera trepidatione ipsi sua atque incertis clamoribus turbarentur.

XXXII. P. Cornelius consul triduo fere post quam Hannibal a ripa Rhodani movit, quadrato agmine ad castra hostium venerat, nullam dimicandi
2 moram facturus. Ceterum ubi deserta munimenta nec facile se tantum praegressos[3] adsecuturum videt, ad mare ac naves rediit, tutius faciliusque ita
3 descendenti ab Alpibus Hannibali occursurus. Ne tamen nuda auxiliis Romanis Hispania esset, quam provinciam sortitus erat, Cn. Scipionem fratrem cum maxima parte copiarum adversus Hasdrubalem misit,
4 non ad tuendos tantummodo veteres socios conciliandosque novos, sed etiam ad pellendum Hispania
5 Hasdrubalem. Ipse cum admodum exiguis copiis Genuam repetit, eo qui[4] circa Padum erat exercitus Italiam defensurus.
6 Hannibal ab Druentia[5] campestri maxime itinere

[1] gurgites gignit Kiderlin: gurgites CM.
[2] glareosa edd.: gloriosa CM.: globosa ς: glareasve (or glareasque) Gronovius.
[3] praegressos ς: progressos CM^2: progressus M^1.
[4] eo qui M^4: eo CM^1.
[5] ab Druentia edd.: ab ruentia (by erasure from adruentia) C: abadruentia M.

[1] At chap. xxxix. § 3 Livy agrees with Polybius in naming Pisa as Scipio's port of debarkation, forgetting that he has here named Genoa.

cross; for, though it brings down a vast volume of water, it does not admit of navigation, since, not being confined within any banks, but flowing at once in several channels, not always the same, it is ever forming new shallows and new pools—a fact which makes it dangerous for foot-passengers as well—besides which it rolls down jagged stones and affords no sure or stable footing to one who enters it. And at that time, as it happened, it was swollen with rains, and the crossing took place amidst the wildest tumult, for the men—besides their other difficulties—were confused by their own excitement and bewildered outcries. B.C. 218

XXXII. Publius Cornelius the consul, some three days after Hannibal had left the bank of the Rhone, marched in fighting order to the enemy's camp, intending to offer battle without delay. But finding the works deserted, and perceiving that he could not readily overtake the enemy, who had got so long a start of him, he returned to the sea, where he had left his ships, thinking that he would thus be more safely and easily enabled to confront Hannibal as he descended from the Alps. Still, that he might not leave Spain stripped of Roman defenders—for the lot had assigned it to him as his province—he sent Gnaeus Scipio, his brother, with the chief part of his troops, to deal with Hasdrubal, with the object not merely of protecting the allies and of winning over new ones, but also of driving Hasdrubal out of Spain. He himself, with extremely scanty forces, sailed back to Genoa,[1] proposing to safeguard Italy with the army which lay in the valley of the Po.

Hannibal, leaving the Druentia, and advancing for the most part through a champaign country,

A.U.C. 536

ad Alpes cum bona pace incolentium ea loca
7 Gallorum pervenit. Tum, quamquam fama prius, qua[1] incerta in maius vero ferri solent, praecepta res erat, tamen ex propinquo visa montium altitudo nivesque caelo prope immixtae, tecta informia imposita rupibus, pecora iumentaque torrida frigore, homines intonsi et inculti, animalia inanimaque[2] omnia rigentia gelu, cetera visu quam dictu foediora,
8 terrorem renovarunt. Erigentibus in primos agmen clivos apparuerunt imminentes tumulos insidentes montani, qui si valles occultiores insedissent, coorti ad pugnam repente ingentem fugam stragemque
9 dedissent. Hannibal consistere signa iussit; Gallisque ad visenda loca praemissis postquam comperit transitum ea non esse, castra inter confragosa omnia praeruptaque quam extentissima potest valle locat.
10 Tum per eosdem Gallos haud sane multum lingua moribusque abhorrentes, cum se immiscuissent conloquiis montanorum, edoctus interdiu tantum obsideri saltum, nocte in sua quemque dilabi tecta, luce prima subiit tumulos, ut ex aperto atque interdiu
11 vim per angustias facturus. Die deinde simulando aliud quam quod parabatur consumpto cum eodem
12 quo constiterant loco castra communissent, ubi primum digressos[3] tumulis montanos laxatasque sensit custodias, pluribus ignibus quam pro numero

[1] qua ς: quam CM[1].
[2] inanimaque Valla: inanimaliaque CM.
[3] digressos CM: degressos Gruter.

reached the Alps without being molested by the B.C. 218
Gauls who inhabited those regions. Then, though report, which is wont to exaggerate uncertain dangers, had already taught them what to expect, still, the near view of the lofty mountains, with their snows almost merging in the sky; the shapeless hovels perched on crags; the frost-bitten flocks and beasts of burden; the shaggy, unkempt men; animals and inanimate objects alike stiff with cold, and all more dreadful to look upon than words can tell, renewed their consternation. As their column began to mount the first slopes, mountaineers were discovered posted on the heights above, who, had they lain concealed in hidden valleys, might have sprung out suddenly and attacked them with great rout and slaughter. Hannibal gave the command to halt, and sent forward some Gauls to reconnoitre. When informed by them that there was no getting by that way, he encamped in the most extensive valley to be found in a wilderness of rocks and precipices. He then employed these same Gauls, whose speech and customs did not differ greatly from those of the mountaineers, to mingle in their councils, and in this way learned that his enemies guarded the pass only by day, and at night dispersed, every man to his own home. As soon as it was light, he advanced up the hills, as though he hoped to rush the defile by an open attack in the daytime. Then having spent the day in feigning a purpose other than his real one, he entrenched a camp on the spot where he had halted. But no sooner did he perceive that the mountaineers had dispersed from the heights and relaxed their vigilance, than, leaving for show more fires than the

A.U.C. 536 manentium in speciem factis impedimentisque cum 13 equite relictis et maxima parte peditum, ipse cum expeditis, acerrimo quoque viro, raptim angustias evadit iisque ipsis tumulis quos hostes tenuerant consedit.

XXXIII. Prima deinde luce castra mota et agmen
2 reliquum incedere coepit. Iam montani signo dato ex castellis ad stationem solitam conveniebant, cum repente conspiciunt alios arce occupata sua super
3 caput imminentes, alios via transire hostes. Utraque simul obiecta res oculis animisque immobiles parumper eos defixit; deinde, ut trepidationem in angustiis suoque ipsum tumultu misceri agmen
4 videre, equis maxime consternatis, quidquid adiecissent ipsi terroris satis ad perniciem fore rati, diversis rupibus iuxta per vias[1] ac devia adsueti decurrunt.
5 Tum vero simul ab hostibus simul ab iniquitate locorum Poeni oppugnabantur, plusque inter ipsos, sibi quoque tendente[2] ut periculo prius evaderet,
6 quam cum hostibus certaminis erat. Equi maxime infestum agmen faciebant, qui et clamoribus dissonis, quos nemora etiam repercussaeque valles augebant,

[1] per vias Widmann: inuia CM.
[2] sibi quoque tendente Freinsheim: sibi cuique tendenti CM.

numbers of those who remained in camp demanded; B.C. 218 leaving, too, the baggage and the cavalry and a great part of the infantry, he put himself at the head of some light-armed soldiers—all his bravest men—and, marching swiftly to the head of the defile, occupied those very heights which the enemy had held.

XXXIII. With the ensuing dawn the Carthaginians broke camp and the remainder of their army began to move. The natives, on a signal being given, were already coming in from their fastnesses to occupy their customary post, when they suddenly perceived that some of their enemies were in possession of the heights and threatened them from above, and that others were marching through the pass. Both facts presenting themselves at the same time to their eyes and minds kept them for a moment rooted to the spot. Then, when they saw the helter-skelter in the pass and the column becoming embarrassed by its own confusion, the horses especially being frightened and unmanageable, they thought that whatever they could add themselves to the consternation of the troops would be sufficient to destroy them, and rushed down from the cliffs on either side, over trails and trackless ground alike, with all the ease of habit. Then indeed the Phoenicians had to contend at one and the same time against their foes and the difficulties of the ground, and the struggle amongst themselves, as each endeavoured to outstrip the rest in escaping from the danger, was greater than the struggle with the enemy. The horses occasioned the greatest peril to the column. Terrified by the discordant yells, which the woods and ravines redoubled with their echoes, they quaked territi trepidabant et icti forte aut volnerati adeo consternabantur ut stragem ingentem simul hominum ac sarcinarum omnis generis facerent; 7 multosque turba, cum praecipites deruptaeque utrimque angustiae essent, in immensum [1] altitudinis deiecit, quosdam et armatos; sed ruinae maxime 8 modo iumenta cum oneribus devolvebantur. Quae quamquam foeda visu erant, stetit parumper tamen Hannibal ac suos continuit, ne tumultum ac trepida- 9 tionem augeret. Deinde, postquam interrumpi agmen vidit periculumque esse ne exutum impedimentis exercitum nequiquam incolumem traduxisset, decurrit ex superiore loco et cum impetu ipso 10 fudisset hostem, suis quoque tumultum auxit. Sed is tumultus momento temporis, postquam liberata itinera fuga montanorum erant, sedatur; nec per otium modo, sed prope silentio mox omnes traducti. 11 Castellum inde quod caput eius regionis erat viculosque circumiectos capit et captivo cibo [2] ac pecoribus per triduum exercitum aluit; et quia nec a montanis [3] primo perculsis nec loco magno opere impediebantur aliquantum eo triduo viae confecit.

A.U.C. 536

XXXIV. Perventum inde ad frequentem cultoribus alium ut inter montanos populum. Ibi non bello aperto sed suis artibus, fraude et insidiis, est prope

[1] in immensum ζ: immensum CM.
[2] captivo cibo Heusinger: captiuo CM.
[3] a montanis C. L. Bauer: montanis CM.

with fear; and if they happened to be hit or wounded, were so maddened that they made enormous havoc not only of men but of every sort of baggage. Indeed the crowding in the pass, which was steep and precipitous on both sides, caused many—some of them armed men—to be flung down to a great depth; but when beasts of burden with their packs went hurtling down, it was just like the crash of falling walls. Dreadful as these sights were, still Hannibal halted for a little while and held back his men, so as not to augment the terror and confusion. Then, when he saw that the column was being broken in two, and there was danger lest he might have got his army over to no avail, if it were stripped of its baggage, he charged down from the higher ground and routed the enemy by the very impetus of the attack, though he added to the disorder amongst his own troops. But the flurry thus occasioned quickly subsided, as soon as the roads were cleared by the flight of the mountaineers; and the whole army was presently brought over the pass, not only without molestation but almost in silence. Hannibal then seized a stronghold which was the chief place in that region, together with the outlying hamlets, and with the captured food and flocks supported his troops for three days. And in those three days, being hindered neither by the natives, who had been utterly cowed at the outset, nor very greatly by the nature of the country, he covered a good deal of ground. B.C. 218

XXXIV. They came next to another canton, thickly settled for a mountain district. There, not by open fighting, but by his own devices, trickery and deception, Hannibal was all but circumvented.

A.U.C. 536

2 circumventus. Magno natu principes castellorum oratores ad Poenum veniunt, alienis malis, utili exemplo, doctos memorantes amicitiam malle quam 3 vim experiri Poenorum; itaque oboedienter imperata facturos; commeatum itinerisque duces et 4 ad fidem promissorum obsides acciperet. Hannibal nec temere credendo nec aspernando,[1] ne repudiati aperte hostes fierent, benigne cum respondisset, obsidibus quos dabant acceptis et commeatu quem in viam ipsi detulerant usus, nequaquam ut inter pacatos composito agmine duces eorum sequitur. 5 Primum agmen elephanti et equites erant; ipse post cum robore peditum circumspectans sollicitus- 6 que ad omnia[2] incedebat. Ubi in angustiorem viam et parte altera subiectam iugo insuper imminenti ventum est, undique ex insidiis barbari a fronte ab tergo coorti comminus eminus petunt, 7 saxa ingentia in agmen devolvunt. Maxima ab tergo vis hominum urgebat. In eos versa peditum acies haud dubium fecit quin, nisi firmata extrema agminis fuissent, ingens in eo saltu accipienda clades 8 fuerit. Tunc quoque ad extremum periculi ac prope perniciem ventum est. Nam dum cunctatur Hannibal demittere agmen in angustias, quia non, ut ipse equitibus praesidio erat, ita peditibus quicquam

[1] credendo nec aspernando Valla: credendum nec aspernandos (asperandos M^1) M^2: credendum nec aspernandum C: credendum nec aspernandum ratus ς Rossbach.

[2] sollicitusque ad omnia Luchs: sollicitusque omnia CM.

The elder headmen of the strongholds waited on B.C. 218 him, as a deputation, and said that, taught by other men's misfortunes—a useful warning—they preferred to experience the friendship of the Phoenicians rather than their might; they were ready, therefore, to carry out his orders, and they requested him to accept provisions and guides and also hostages as a guarantee of good faith. Hannibal, neither blindly trusting nor yet repulsing them, lest, being spurned, they might become openly hostile, returned a friendly answer, accepted the proffered hostages, and used the supplies, which they had brought down, themselves, to the road. But he drew up his column, before following their guides, by no means as though for a march through a friendly country. The van was made up of elephants and cavalry; he himself, with the main strength of the infantry, came next, looking warily about him and watching everything. When they had got to a narrow place, which was overhung on one side by a ridge, the tribesmen rose up on every quarter from their ambush and assailed them, front and rear, fighting hand to hand and at long range, and rolling down huge boulders on the marching troops. The rear-guard bore the brunt of the attack, and as the infantry faced about to meet it, it was very evident that if the column had not been strengthened at that point, it must have suffered a great disaster in this pass. Even so, they were in the utmost peril and came near destruction. For while Hannibal was hesitating to send his division [1] down into the defile, since he had no troops left to secure the rear of the infantry, as he himself

[1] By agmen Livy here means the second (and larger) part of the column, under Hannibal's immediate command.

A.U.C. 536

9 ab tergo auxilii reliqui erat,[1] occursantes per obliqua montani interrupto[2] medio agmine viam insedere; noxque una Hannibali sine equitibus atque impedimentis acta est.

XXXV. Postero die iam segnius intercursantibus barbaris iunctae copiae, saltusque haud sine clade, maiore tamen iumentorum quam hominum pernicie 2 superatus. Inde montani pauciores iam et latrocinii magis quam belli more concursabant modo in primum modo in novissimum agmen, utcumque aut locus opportunitatem daret aut progressi morative aliquam 3 occasionem fecissent. Elephanti sicut per artas praecipitesque[3] vias magna mora agebantur, ita tutum ab hostibus, quacumque incederent, quia insuetis adeundi propius metus erat, agmen praebebant.[4]

4 Nono die in iugum Alpium perventum est per invia pleraque et errores, quos aut ducentium fraus aut, ubi fides iis non esset, temere initae valles a 5 coniectantibus iter faciebant. Biduum in iugo stativa habita, fessisque labore ac pugnando quies data militibus; iumentaque aliquot, quae prolapsa in rupibus erant, sequendo vestigia agminis in castra 6 pervenere. Fessis taedio tot malorum nivis etiam casus occidente iam sidere Vergiliarum ingentem

[1] reliqui erat Luchs: reliquum erat Lipsius: reliquerat CM.

[2] montani interrupto Glareanus: montani erupto CM^2: montaniae rapto M^1.

[3] praecipitesque C^3: praecipites C^1M.

[4] praebebant ed. Moguntina, 1518: praecedebant (— bat C^1) C^3M.

[1] The morning setting of the Pleiades occurred on October 26.

secured that of the horse, the mountaineers rushed B.C. 21 in on his flank, and breaking through the column, established themselves in the road, so that Hannibal spent one night without cavalry or baggage.

XXXV. On the following day, since by now the barbarians were attacking with less vigour, his forces were re-united and surmounted the pass; and though they suffered some casualties, still they lost more baggage animals than men. From this point on the mountaineers appeared in smaller numbers, and, more in the manner of brigandage than warfare, attacked sometimes the van, sometimes the rear, whenever the ground afforded an advantage, or the invaders, pushing on too far ahead or lagging behind, gave opportunity. The elephants could be induced to move but very slowly along the steep and narrow trails; but wherever they went they made the column safe from its enemies, who were unaccustomed to the beasts and afraid of venturing too near them.

On the ninth day they arrived at the summit of the Alps, having come for the most part over trackless wastes and by roundabout routes, owing either to the dishonesty of their guides, or—when they would not trust the guides—to their blindly entering some valley, guessing at the way. For two days they lay encamped on the summit. The soldiers, worn with toil and fighting, were permitted to rest; and a number of baggage animals which had fallen among the rocks made their way to the camp by following the tracks of the army. Exhausted and discouraged as the soldiers were by many hardships, a snow-storm—for the constellation of the Pleiades was now setting[1]—threw them into a great fear.

A.U.C. 536

7 terrorem adiecit. Per omnia nive oppleta cum signis prima luce motis segniter agmen incederet pigritia-
8 que et desperatio in omnium voltu emineret, praegressus signa Hannibal in promunturio quodam, unde longe ac late prospectus erat, consistere iussis militibus Italiam ostentat subiectosque Alpinis
9 montibus circumpadanos campos, moeniaque eos tum transcendere non Italiae modo sed etiam urbis Romanae; cetera plana, proclivia fore; uno aut summum [1] altero proelio arcem et caput Italiae in manu ac potestate habituros.

10 Procedere inde agmen coepit iam nihil ne hostibus quidem praeter parva furta per occasionem temptan-
11 tibus. Ceterum iter multo quam in ascensu fuerat, ut pleraque Alpium ab Italia sicut breviora ita 12 arrectiora sunt, difficilius fuit. Omnis enim ferme via praeceps angusta lubrica erat, ut neque sustinere se ab lapsu possent nec qui paulum titubassent haerere adfixi vestigio suo, aliique super alios et iumenta in homines occiderent.

XXXVI. Ventum deinde ad multo angustiorem rupem atque ita rectis saxis ut aegre expeditus miles temptabundus manibusque retinens virgulta ac stirpes circa eminentes demittere sese posset.
2 Natura locus iam ante praeceps recenti lapsu terrae in pedum mille [2] admodum altitudinem abruptus erat.

[1] summum Gronovius: summo CM: ad summum ς.
[2] in pedum mille Valla: impeditus dum ille C^1? M^1: impeditus in mirandam ille M^4.

---

[1] In Polybius (III. liv. 7) the landslip carries away a stretch of road more than a stade and a half (about a thousand feet) long. Livy got the idea that the thousand feet represented the distance from the top to the bottom of the slip.

The ground was everywhere covered deep with snow when at dawn they began to march, and as the column moved slowly on, dejection and despair were to be read in every countenance. Then Hannibal, who had gone on before the standards, made the army halt on a certain promontory which commanded an extensive prospect, and pointing out Italy to them, and just under the Alps the plains about the Po, he told them that they were now scaling the ramparts not only of Italy, but of Rome itself; the rest of the way would be level or downhill; and after one, or, at the most, two battles, they would have in their hands and in their power the citadel and capital of Italy. B.C. 218

The column now began to make some progress, and even the enemy had ceased to annoy them, except to make a stealthy raid, as occasion offered. But the way was much more difficult than the ascent had been, as indeed the slope of the Alps on the Italian side is in general more precipitous in proportion as it is shorter. For practically every road was steep, narrow, and treacherous, so that neither could they keep from slipping, nor could those who had been thrown a little off their balance retain their footing, but came down, one on top of the other, and the beasts on top of the men.

XXXVI. They then came to a much narrower cliff, and with rocks so perpendicular that it was difficult for an unencumbered soldier to manage the descent, though he felt his way and clung with his hands to the bushes and roots that projected here and there. The place had been precipitous before, and a recent landslip had carried it away to the depth of a good thousand feet.[1] There the cavalry

A.U.C. 536

3 Ibi cum velut ad finem viae equites constitissent, miranti Hannibali quae res moraretur agmen nun-
4 tiatur rupem inviam esse. Digressus deinde ipse ad locum visendum. Haud dubia res visa quin per invia circa nec trita antea quamvis longo ambitu
5 circumduceret agmen. Ea vero via insuperabilis fuit; nam cum super veterem nivem intactam nova modicae altitudinis esset, molli nec praealtae facile
6 pedes ingredientium insistebant; ut vero tot hominum iumentorumque incessu dilapsa est, per nudam infra glaciem fluentemque tabem liquescentis nivis
7 ingrediebantur. Taetra ibi luctatio erat via [1] lubrica non recipiente [2] vestigium et in prono citius pedes fallente, ut seu manibus in adsurgendo seu genu se adiuvissent, ipsis adminiculis prolapsis iterum corruerent; nec stirpes circa radicesve, ad quas pede aut manu quisquam eniti posset, erant; ita in levi
8 tantum glacie tabidaque nive volutabantur. Iumenta tamen etiam [3] secabant interdum infimam ingredientia nivem, et prolapsa iactandis gravius in conitendo [4] ungulis penitus perfringebant, ut pleraque velut pedica capta haererent in dura et alte concreta glacie.

XXXVII. Tandem nequiquam iumentis atque hominibus fatigatis castra in iugo posita, aegerrime

[1] via H. Sauppe: ut a CM: ita Heerwagen: illa Harant: del. Madvig.

[2] non recipiente H. J. Mueller: glacie non recipiente CM.

[3] tamen etiam Rossbach: eciam tamen C: etiam tam (by erasure from etiam tamen) M.

[4] conitendo Lipsius: continendo CM.

came to a halt, as though they had reached the end of the road, and as Hannibal was wondering what it could be that held the column back, word was brought to him that the cliff was impassable. Going then to inspect the place himself, he thought that there was nothing for it but to lead the army round, over trackless and untrodden steeps, however circuitous the detour might be. But that way proved to be insuperable; for above the old, untouched snow lay a fresh deposit of moderate depth, through which, as it was soft and not very deep, the men in front found it easy to advance; but when it had been trampled down by the feet of so many men and beasts, the rest had to make their way over the bare ice beneath and the slush of the melting snow. Then came a terrible struggle on the slippery surface, for it afforded them no foothold, while the downward slope made their feet the more quickly slide from under them; so that whether they tried to pull themselves up with their hands, or used their knees, these supports themselves would slip, and down they would come again! Neither were there any stems or roots about, by which a man could pull himself up with foot or hand—only smooth ice and thawing snow, on which they were continually rolling. But the baggage animals, as they went over the snow, would sometimes even cut into the lowest crust, and pitching forward and striking out with their hoofs, as they struggled to rise, would break clean through it, so that numbers of them were caught fast, as if entrapped, in the hard, deep-frozen snow. B.C. 218

XXXVII. At last, when men and beasts had been worn out to no avail, they encamped upon the ridge,

A.U.C. 536

ad id ipsum loco purgato—tantum nivis fodiendum
2 atque egerendum fuit. Inde ad rupem muniendam, per quam unam via esse poterat, milites ducti, cum caedendum esset saxum, arboribus circa immanibus deiectis detruncatisque struem ingentem lignorum faciunt eamque, cum et vis venti apta [1] faciendo igni coorta esset, succendunt ardentiaque saxa infuso
3 aceto putrefaciunt. Ita torridam incendio rupem ferro pandunt molliuntque anfractibus modicis clivos ut non iumenta solum, sed elephanti etiam deduci
4 possent. Quadriduum circa rupem consumptum iumentis prope fame absumptis; nuda enim fere cacumina sunt, et si quid est pabuli obruunt nives.
5 Inferiora valles et apricos quosdam [2] colles habent rivosque et [3] prope silvas et iam humano cultu
6 digniora loca. Ibi iumenta in pabulum missa, et quies muniendo fessis hominibus data. Triduo inde

[1] apta edd.: saepe (by erasure from saepte) C: saepta M^1: se apta M^2.

[2] et apricos quosdam ς: apricos quosdam M: apricos quosqam C^1: apricosque etiam Madvig.

[3] rivosque et Madvig: riuosque CM.

---

[1] This famous story has provoked much ridicule, but in Livy's defence may be noted, (1) the well-known disintegrating effect on certain kinds of stone of heat followed by a douche of cold water; (2) the belief entertained in ancient times, and as late as the sixteenth century, that vinegar helped to make stones friable; (3) the likelihood that Hannibal had at least a few skins of sour wine in his baggage-train (some have held that a vast quantity would have been required, but it must be remembered that Livy may have conceived of the width of the landslip as only a few rods; see last note). In any case those who regard the vinegar story as fiction must not fasten the fiction on Livy, if, as I think, we may discern an allusion to it in Varro's Menippean Satires (Sesculixes, frag. 25, p. 237, of the

after having, with the utmost difficulty, cleared B.C. 218 enough ground even for this purpose, so much snow were they obliged to dig out and remove. The soldiers were then set to work to construct a road across the cliff—their only possible way. Since they had to cut through the rock, they felled some huge trees that grew near at hand, and lopping off their branches, made an enormous pile of logs. This they set on fire, as soon as the wind blew fresh enough to make it burn, and pouring vinegar over the glowing rocks, caused them to crumble. After thus heating the crag with fire, they opened a way in it with iron tools, and relieved the steepness of the slope with zigzags of an easy gradient, so that not only the baggage animals but even the elephants could be led down.[1] Four days were consumed at the cliff, and the animals nearly perished of starvation; for the mountain tops are all practically bare, and such grass as does grow is buried under snow.[2] Lower down one comes to valleys and sunny slopes and rivulets, and near them woods, and places that begin to be fitter for man's habitation. There the beasts were turned out to graze, and the men, exhausted with toiling at the road, were allowed to rest. Thence they descended in three days' time Buecheler-Heraeus edition: alteram viam deformasse Carneaden virtutis e cupis acris aceti), and it was probably an old and popular tradition long before the time of Varro, who died in 27 B.C. For recent discussion of the story see the article by Evan T. Sage in C. W. 16 (1922–1923) 73–76, and notes of modern instances by other contributors to the same volume.

[2] Polybius (III. lv. 7) says that the pack-animals and horses were sent over the road after one day's work had been done, and turned out to pasture, but that three days were employed in making it sufficiently wide for the elephants.

A.U.C. 536

ad planum descensum iam et[1] locis mollioribus et accolarum ingeniis.

XXXVIII. Hoc maxime modo in Italiam perventum est, quinto mense a Carthagine nova, ut quidam auctores sunt, quinto decimo die Alpibus superatis. 2 Quantae copiae transgresso in Italiam Hannibali fuerint nequaquam inter auctores constat. Qui plurimum, centum milia peditum viginti equitum fuisse scribunt; qui minimum, viginti milia peditum 3 sex equitum. L. Cincius Alimentus, qui captum se ab Hannibale scribit, maxime auctor moveret, nisi confunderet numerum Gallis Liguribusque additis: cum his octoginta milia peditum, decem equitum 4 adducta—in Italia magis adfluxisse veri simile est, et 5 ita quidam auctores sunt;—ex ipso autem audisse Hannibale, postquam Rhodanum transierit, triginta sex milia hominum ingentemque numerum equorum et aliorum iumentorum amisisse. Taurini Galli[2] proxima 6 gens erat in Italiam degresso. Id cum inter omnes constet, eo magis miror ambigi, quanam Alpes transierit, et volgo credere Poenino—atque inde nomen ei iugo Alpium inditum—transgressum, 7 Coelium per Cremonis iugum dicere transisse; qui

[1] iam et Crévier: eciam C: et iam M.

[2] Taurini Galli ς: taurinis ne galli C^1M^1: taurinis gallie C^3: taurinis quae gallis M^2.

---

[1] So Polybius (III. lvi. 4), who says that these numbers were given by Hannibal himself in an inscription at Lacinium.

[2] Praetor in Sicily, 210 B.C. He and Fabius Pictor were contemporaries and were Livy's oldest sources.

[3] Polybius (III. lv. 5) says that Hannibal left the Rhone with thirty-eight thousand infantry and eight thousand cavalry, and lost more than half his troops crossing the passes.

into the plain, through a region now that was less forbidding, as was the character of its inhabitants. B.C. 218

XXXVIII. Such were the chief features of the march to Italy, which they accomplished five months after leaving New Carthage—as certain authorities state—having crossed the Alps in fifteen days. The strength of Hannibal's forces on his entering Italy is a point on which historians are by no means agreed. Those who put the figures highest give him a hundred thousand foot and twenty thousand horse; the lowest estimate is twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse.[1] Lucius Cincius Alimentus,[2] who says that he was taken prisoner by Hannibal, would be our weightiest authority, did he not confuse the reckoning by adding in Gauls and Ligurians: including these, he says that Hannibal brought eighty thousand foot and ten thousand horse—but it is more probable, and certain historians so hold, that these people joined his standard in Italy; he says, moreover, that he had learned from Hannibal's own lips that after crossing the Rhone he lost thirty-six thousand men and a vast number of horses and other animals.[3] The Taurine Gauls were the first people he encountered on descending into Italy. Since all are agreed on this point,[4] I am the more astonished at the difference of opinion in regard to his route over the Alps, and that it should be commonly held that he crossed by the Poenine Pass[5] and that from this circumstance that ridge of the Alps derived its name—and that Coelius should state that he crossed by the ridge of Cremo;[6] for [4] It is a moot question whether Polybius shared this view.

[5] The Great St. Bernard.
[6] Perhaps the Little St. Bernard.

A.U.C. 536

ambo saltus eum non in Taurinos sed per Salassos[1] 8 Montanos ad Libuos Gallos deduxissent.[2] Nec veri simile est ea tum ad Galliam patuisse itinera; utique quae ad Poeninum ferunt obsaepta gentibus Semi-9 germanis fuissent. Neque hercule montibus his, si quem forte id movet, ab transitu Poenorum ullo Seduni Veragri,[3] incolae iugi eius, nomen norint[4] inditum, sed ab eo quem in summo sacratum vertice Poeninum montani appellant.

XXXIX. Peropportune ad principia rerum Taurinis, proximae genti, adversus Insubres motum bellum erat. Sed armare exercitum Hannibal, ut parti alteri auxilio esset, in reficiendo maxime sentientem
2 contracta ante mala, non poterat; otium enim[5] ex labore, copia ex inopia, cultus ex inluvie tabeque squalida et prope efferata corpora varie movebat.
3 Ea P. Cornelio consuli causa fuit, cum Pisas navibus venisset, exercitu a Manlio Atilioque accepto tirone et in novis ignominiis trepido ad Padum festinandi, ut cum hoste nondum refecto manus consereret.
4 Sed cum Placentiam consul venit, iam ex stativis

[1] Salassos (or Salyas) Lipsius: saltus C^1M^2: saltus alios (but alios is erased) C^2: saltos M^1.

[2] deduxissent ς: si duxerit (before erasure) C^1: duxerit (after erasure) C^3: deduxerint M.

[3] Seduni Veragri (or Sedunoveragri) Gronovius: seduno uelacri CM: Seduni vel Veragri Lipsius

[4] nomen norint Frigell: norint nomen ς: norint CM: nomen ferunt Madvig.

[5] enim ς: erat enim CM.

[1] Livy means Cisalpine Gaul; he is writing from Hannibal's standpoint.

both these passes would have brought him down, B.C. 218 not amongst the Taurini but through the Salassi Montani to the Libuan Gauls. Neither is it probable that these routes to Gaul[1] were open at that time; those leading to the Poenine Pass, at any rate, would have been blocked by tribes of half-German stock. Nor for that matter—if anyone happens to consider this point of consequence—do the Seduni Veragri, who inhabit those mountains, know of their having been named from any passage of the Phoenicians (or Poeni) but from that deity whose sanctuary is established on their very summit and whom the mountaineers call Poeninus.[2]

XXXIX. Quite opportunely for the opening of the campaign, the Taurini, the nearest tribe, had begun a war against the Insubres. But Hannibal was unable to put an army in the field to aid the Insubres, as the soldiers while convalescing felt more keenly than ever the distress arising from the hardships they had undergone; for rest coming after toil, plenty after want, comfort after filth and wet, produced all manner of disorders in their squalid and well-nigh brutalized bodies. This was the reason why the consul Publius Cornelius, who had come by sea to Pisa, though the army which he received from Manlius and Atilius was made up of raw recruits, still quaking from their recent defeats, yet marched in all haste towards the Po, that he might join battle with an enemy not yet restored to vigour. But when the consul reached Placentia, Hannibal

[2] Coins and votive offerings have been discovered there, and the remains of the little temple of the god, who was apparently the Juppiter Poeninus of certain extant inscriptions.

A.U.C. 536 moverat Hannibal Taurinorumque unam urbem, caput gentis eius, quia volentes in amicitiam non veniebant,[1] vi expugnarat; at iunxisset[2] sibi non metu solum, sed etiam voluntate Gallos accolas Padi, ni eos circumspectantes defectionis tempus subito adventu consul oppressisset. Et Hannibal movit ex Taurinis, incertos quae pars sequenda esset Gallos praesentem secuturos esse ratus.

Iam prope in conspectu erant exercitus, convenerantque duces, sicuti inter se nondum satis noti ita iam imbutus uterque quadam admiratione alterius. Nam et Hannibalis[3] apud Romanos iam ante Sangunti excidium celeberrimum nomen erat, et Scipionem Hannibal eo ipso quod adversus se dux potissimum lectus esset praestantem virum credebat; et auxerant inter se opinionem, Scipio, quod relictus in Gallia obvius fuerat in Italiam transgresso Hannibali, Hannibal[4] et conatu tam audaci traiciendarum Alpium et effectu.

Occupavit tamen Scipio Padum traicere, et ad Ticinum amnem motis castris, priusquam educeret in aciem, adhortandorum militum causa talem orationem est exorsus:

XL. "Si eum exercitum, milites, educerem in aciem quem in Gallia mecum habui, supersedissem

[1] volentes . . . veniebant ς: uolentis ueniebat CM

[2] at iunxisset Foster: ac iunxisset Weissenborn: et iunxisset Alschefski: iunxisset CM.

[3] et Hannibalis Madvig: Hannibalis et CM.

[4] Hannibali, Hannibal Gronovius: Hannibali (-i erased in C) CM.

had already broken camp and taken the capital city of the Taurini by assault, because they would not freely come into his friendship. On the other hand, he would have brought the Gauls who dwell along the Po to join him, not alone from fear but even of their own free choice, had not the consul taken them by surprise, appearing unexpectedly whilst they were looking about them for a pretext to revolt. Hannibal, too, moved forward from the Taurini, being persuaded that the Gauls, uncertain which side they had best adhere to, would attach themselves to those who were on the spot. B.C. 218

The armies were now almost within sight of each other, and the opposing generals, though as yet they did not know one another well, had yet each been imbued with a kind of admiration for his antagonist. For Hannibal's name had been very renowned amongst the Romans, even before the destruction of Saguntum, and Scipio was a man of mark in the eyes of Hannibal, from the mere fact of his having been selected, in preference to any other, to command against himself. Each had increased the other's good opinion—Scipio, because, though left behind in Gaul, he had confronted Hannibal at his crossing over into Italy; Hannibal by the audacity with which he had conceived and executed his passage of the Alps.

Scipio, however, was the first to cross the Po. He brought his army up to the river Ticinus, and in order to put heart into the men before leading them out to fight, harangued them after the following fashion:

XL. "Soldiers, if I were leading into battle the army that I had under me in Gaul, I should have

A.U.C. 536

2 loqui apud vos; quid enim adhortari referret aut eos equites, qui equitatum hostium ad Rhodanum flumen egregie vicissent,[1] aut eas legiones cum quibus fugientem hunc ipsum hostem secutus confessionem cedentis ac detractantis certamen pro
3 victoria habui? Nunc, quia ille exercitus, Hispaniae provinciae scriptus, ibi cum fratre Cn. Scipione meis auspiciis rem gerit, ubi eum gerere senatus populus-
4 que Romanus voluit, ego, ut consulem ducem adversus Hannibalem ac Poenos haberetis, ipse me huic voluntario certamini obtuli, novo imperatori apud novos milites pauca verba facienda sunt.

5 "Ne genus belli neve hostem ignoretis, cum iis est vobis, milites, pugnandum quos terra marique priore bello vicistis, a quibus stipendium per viginti annos exegistis, a quibus capta[2] belli praemia Siciliam ac
6 Sardiniam habetis. Erit igitur in hoc certamine is vobis illisque animus qui victoribus et victis esse solet. Nec nunc illi quia audent sed quia necesse
7 est pugnaturi sunt; nisi creditis qui exercitu incolumi pugnam detractavere, eos duabus partibus peditum equitumque in transitu Alpium amissis[3]
8 plus spei nactos esse. At enim pauci quidem sunt, sed vigentes animis corporibusque, quorum robora
9 ac vires vix sustinere vis ulla possit. Effigies immo,

[1] egregie vicissent edd. : aegre evicissent CM.
[2] a quibus capta edd. : quibus capta CM.
[3] amissis Gruter : amissis qui plures paene perierint quam supersunt CM.

deemed it unnecessary to address you. For what B.C. 218 point would there have been in exhorting either those horsemen who at the river Rhone had signally defeated the horsemen of the enemy, or those legions with which I pursued this very enemy in his flight, and by the confession implied in his withdrawal and avoidance of a battle, gained a virtual victory? As it is, since that army, enrolled for service in Spain, is campaigning there under my auspices with my brother Gnaeus Scipio, where the senate and the Roman People desired that it should serve, and I myself, that you might have a consul for your leader against Hannibal and the Phoenicians, have of my own choice undertaken the present conflict, it is right that your new commander should say a word or two to his new soldiers.

"That you may not be ignorant what manner of war it is, or what your enemies are, you are to fight, my men, with those whom you defeated in the former war, on land and sea; with those from whom you exacted tribute for twenty years; with those from whom you wrested Sicily and Sardinia, which you now hold as the spoils of war. You and they will therefore enter the present struggle with such spirits as usually attend the victors and the vanquished. Nor are they now going to fight because they dare, but because they must; unless you think that those who avoided battle when their strength was unimpaired would, now that they have lost two-thirds of their infantry and cavalry in the passage of the Alps, have become more hopeful! But, you will say, their numbers indeed are small, but their courage and vigour are so great that scarce any force could withstand their might and power. Nay, not so! They

A.U.C. 536

umbrae hominum, fame frigore, inluvie squalore enecti, contusi ac debilitati inter saxa rupesque; ad hoc praeusti artus, nive rigentes nervi, membra torpida[1] gelu, quassata fractaque arma, claudi ac
10 debiles equi. Cum hoc equite, cum hoc pedite pugnaturi estis; reliquias extremas hostis, non hostem habetis. Ac nihil magis vereor quam ne, cum vos[2] pugnaveritis, Alpes vicisse Hannibalem 11 videantur. Sed ita forsitan decuit, cum foederum ruptore duce ac populo deos ipsos sine ulla humana ope committere ac profligare bellum, nos, qui secundum deos violati sumus, commissum ac profligatum conficere.

XLI. "Non vereor ne quis me haec vestri adhortandi causa magnifice loqui existimet, ipsum aliter
2 animo adfectum esse. Licuit in Hispaniam, provinciam meam, quo iam profectus eram, cum exercitu ire meo, ubi et fratrem consilii participem ac periculi socium haberem et Hasdrubalem potius quam Hannibalem hostem et minorem haud dubie molem
3 belli; tamen, cum praeterveherer navibus Galliae oram, ad famam huius hostis in terram egressus praemisso equitatu ad Rhodanum movi castra.
4 Equestri proelio, qua parte copiarum conserendi manum fortuna data est, hostem fudi: peditum agmen, quod in modum fugientium raptim agebatur, quia adsequi terra non poteram, regressus ad naves,[3] quanta maxime potui celeritate tanto maris terra-

[1] torpida Lipsius: torrida CM.

[2] quam ne, cum vos Madvig: nec umquam uos cum CM.

[3] regressus ad naves (navis) Luchs (ς): neque regressus ad navis erat CM.

are but the semblance, the shadows of men, wasted away with hunger and cold, with filth and squalor; bruised and crippled amongst the rocks and cliffs; moreover, their limbs are frost-bitten, their muscles stiffened by the snow, their bodies numb with cold, their arms shattered and broken, their horses lame and feeble. That is the cavalry, that the infantry with which you are to fight; you have no enemy—only the last relics of an enemy! And I fear nothing more than this, that when you have fought, it may seem to have been the Alps that conquered Hannibal. But perhaps it was right that the gods themselves, without any human aid, should begin and decide a war with a general and a people who break their treaties; and that we, whose injury was second to that of the gods, should add the finishing stroke to a war already so begun and so decided. B.C. 218

XLI. "I am not afraid that anyone may suppose that I am using these brave words to encourage you, but that in my heart I think otherwise. It was open to me to proceed with my army to my own province, Spain, for which I had already started; I might there have had a brother to share my counsels and my dangers, and Hasdrubal instead of Hannibal for my enemy, and a war undoubtedly less difficult to conduct; nevertheless, when rumours of this enemy reached me, as I sailed along by the coast of Gaul, I landed, and sending my cavalry ahead, moved my camp up to the Rhone. In a cavalry engagement—for this was the arm with which I was given the opportunity of fighting—I put the enemy to rout: his infantry column, marching hastily off as if in flight, I could not overtake by land; returning therefore to my ships I accomplished with all

A.U.C. 536

rumque circuitu, in radicibus prope Alpium huic 5 timendo hosti obvius fui. Utrum, cum declinarem certamen, improvidus [1] incidisse videor an occurrere in vestigiis eius, lacessere ac trahere ad decernen-6 dum? Experiri iuvat utrum alios repente Carthagi-nienses per viginti annos terra ediderit, an idem sint qui ad Aegates pugnaverunt insulas et quos ab 7 Eryce duodevicenis denariis aestimatos emisistis, et utrum Hannibal hic sit aemulus itinerum Herculis, ut ipse fert, an vectigalis stipendiariusque et servus 8 populi Romani a patre relictus. Quem nisi Saguntinum scelus agitaret, respiceret profecto si non patriam victam domum certe patremque et 9 foedera Hamilcaris scripta manu, qui iussus ab consule nostro praesidium deduxit ab Eryce, qui graves impositas victis Carthaginiensibus leges fremens maerensque accepit, qui decedens Sicilia 10 stipendium populo Romano dare pactus est. Itaque vos ego, milites, non eo solum animo quo adversus alios hostes soletis pugnare velim, sed cum indigna-tione quadam atque ira, velut si servos videatis 11 vestros arma repente contra vos ferentes. Licuit ad Erycem clausos ultimo supplicio humanorum,[2] fame interficere; licuit victricem classem in Africam traicere

[1] improvidus Thomann: inprouisus CM.
[2] humanorum CM: humano (or suppliciorum humanorum) Gustafsson.

---

[1] The First Punic War had ended in 241 B.C.
[2] Hercules was fabled to have crossed the Alps on his return from the island Erythea with the cattle of Geryon. Livy has alluded to this story before (I. vii. 3 and v. xxxiv. 6).

possible expedition so circuitous a voyage and march, B.C. 218 and am come to confront this redoubtable enemy almost at the very foot of the Alps. Does it look as though I were avoiding battle and had blundered upon him unawares? or, rather, as though I were in hot haste to encounter him and to provoke and bait him into fighting? I would willingly make trial whether the earth has suddenly produced in the last twenty years[1] another breed of Carthaginians, or whether they are the same who fought at the Aegatian islands and whom you suffered to depart from Eryx at a rating of eighteen denarii a head; and whether our friend Hannibal is a rival, as he himself would have it, of the wandering Hercules,[2] or has been left to the Roman People by his father to be their tributary, tax-payer, and slave. Were he not maddened by the crime he committed at Saguntum, he would surely have regard, if not for his conquered country, yet at least for his house and his father and the treaties written by the hand of Hamilcar, who, under the orders of our consul, withdrew his garrison from Eryx; who submitted with rage and anguish to the heavy terms imposed upon the beaten Carthaginians; who agreed, on withdrawing from Sicily, to pay tribute to the Roman People. And so I could wish you, soldiers, to fight not only with that courage with which you are wont to fight against other enemies, but with a kind of resentful rage, as if you saw your slaves all at once take up arms against you. When we had shut them up at Eryx, we might have killed them by starvation, the worst torment that man can know; we might have dispatched our victorious fleet to Africa, and in a few days' time, without

A.U.C. 536 atque intra paucos dies sine ullo certamine Carthagi-12 nem delere :—veniam dedimus precantibus, emisimus ex obsidione, pacem cum victis fecimus, tutelae deinde nostrae duximus, cum Africo bello urgerentur.
13 Pro his impertitis furiosum iuvenem sequentes oppugnatum patriam nostram veniunt ! Atque utinam pro decore tantum hoc vobis et non pro salute esset
14 certamen : non de possessione Siciliae ac Sardiniae, de quibus quondam agebatur, sed pro Italia vobis
15 est pugnandum. Nec est alius ab tergo exercitus, qui nisi nos vincimus hosti obsistat, nec Alpes aliae sunt, quas dum superant comparari nova possint praesidia. Hic est obstandum, milites, velut si ante
16 Romana moenia pugnemus. Unus quisque se non corpus suum, sed coniugem ac liberos parvos armis protegere putet ; nec domesticas solum agitet curas, sed identidem hoc animo reputet, nostras nunc intueri manus senatum populumque Romanum ;
17 qualis nostra vis virtusque fuerit, talem deinde fortunam illius urbis[1] ac Romani imperii fore." Haec apud Romanos consul.

XLII. Hannibal rebus prius quam verbis adhortandos milites ratus, circumdato ad spectaculum exercitu captivos montanos vinctos in medio statuit armisque Gallicis ante pedes eorum proiectis interrogare interpretem iussit, ecquis, si vinculis levaretur

[1] illius verbis CM : ipsius urbis Gronovius : urbis T. Faber.

the slightest struggle, have annihilated Carthage. B.C. 218
But we gave them the quarter they besought of us; we lifted the siege and let them go; we made peace with them when we had conquered them; and thereafter, when they were hard pressed by the war in Africa, we regarded them as under our protection. In requital of these benefits they are coming in the train of a crazy youth to assail our country! And I would that your honour only and not your very existence were in jeopardy: you have got to fight not for the ownership of Sicily and Sardinia, which were formerly in dispute, but for Italy. There is no second army at our back to stop the enemy, in case we fail to beat him, nor are there other Alps to obstruct his advance while we make ready new defences. Here, soldiers, is the spot where we must make our stand, as though we were fighting before the walls of Rome. Let each and every one of you consider that his arms protect, not his own person, but his wife and little children; nor let him be concerned for his family alone, but remember that ours are the hands to which the senate and the Roman People are now looking, and that even as our might and valour shall prove to be, such henceforward will be the fortune of that City and the Roman empire." So spoke the consul to the Romans.

XLII. Hannibal thought it well to encourage his soldiers by an object lesson before haranguing them. He therefore caused the army to gather in a circle for the spectacle, and setting in the midst some captive mountaineers with fetters on them, gave the order to throw some Gallic weapons down at their feet, and bade an interpreter enquire if any were willing to fight for life or death, on condition of

A.U.C. 536

armaque et equum victor acciperet, decertare ferro
2 vellet. Cum ad unum omnes ferrum pugnamque poscerent et deiecta in id sors esset, se quisque eum
3 optabat quem fortuna in id certamen legeret; cuiusque sors exciderat alacer inter gratulantes gaudio exsultans cum sui moris tripudiis arma raptim capie-
4 bat. Ubi vero dimicarent, is habitus animorum non inter eiusdem modo condicionis homines erat, sed etiam inter spectantes volgo, ut non vincentium magis quam bene morientium fortuna laudaretur.

XLIII. Cum sic aliquot spectatis paribus adfectos dimisisset, contione inde advocata ita apud eos
2 locutus fertur: "Si, quem animum in alienae sortis exemplo paulo ante habuistis, eundem mox in aestimanda fortuna vestra habueritis, vicimus, milites; neque enim spectaculum modo illud sed quaedam
3 veluti imago vestrae condicionis erat. Ac nescio an maiora vincula maioresque necessitates vobis quam
4 captivis vestris Fortuna circumdederit: dextra laevaque duo maria claudunt nullam ne ad effugium quidem navem habentes;[1] circa Padus amnis—maior Padus ac violentior Rhodano; ab tergo Alpes urgent,
5 vix integris vobis ac vigentibus transitae. Hic vincendum aut moriendum, milites, est, ubi primum hosti occurristis. Et eadem Fortuna quae necessita-

[1] habentes Doujat: habentibus P.

---

[1] Polybius gives substantially the same account of the episode (III. lv. 2), except that he speaks of only one pair of combatants.

being granted freedom, if victorious, and presented B.C. 218 with a horse and arms. When the captives, to the last man, called for sword and combat, and lots were being cast to decide amongst them, each hoped that he should be the one whom fortune selected for that contest; and he who had drawn the lot would leap for joy, and dancing about—as their custom is—while the others showered congratulations on him, would eagerly snatch up his weapons. But when they fought, the feeling, not only in the bosoms of the other captives but even amongst the onlookers in general, was such that the fortune of those who conquered was not more praised than that of those who met an honourable death.[1]

XLIII. Having thus, by the exhibition of several pairs, worked on the passions of his troops, he dismissed them. Then, convening an assembly, he addressed them—so it is said—in the following strain: "If that spirit which but now was roused in you by the example of the plight of others shall presently be yours, when you consider your own prospects, then, soldiers, the victory is ours. For that was no mere spectacle, but a kind of picture, as it were, of your own condition. And I incline to think that Fortune has laid you under stronger bonds and heavier necessities than your captives. On the right and on the left two seas encompass you, and you have not a single ship, even to flee in; round you is the river Po—the Po, a greater and more turbulent river than the Rhone; behind you tower the Alps, which you hardly scaled when you were fresh and vigorous. Here, soldiers, you must conquer or die, where for the first time you have faced the enemy. And the same Fortune which has laid upon you the

A.U.C. 536 tem pugnandi imposuit praemia vobis ea victoribus proponit, quibus ampliora homines ne ab dis quidem
6 immortalibus optare solent. Si Siciliam tantum ac Sardiniam parentibus nostris ereptas nostra virtute reciperaturi essemus, satis tamen ampla pretia essent; nunc quidquid[1] Romani tot triumphis partum congestumque possident, id omne vestrum cum ipsis
7 dominis futurum est. In hanc tam opimam mercedem
8 agitedum,[2] dis bene iuvantibus arma capite! Satis adhuc in vastis Lusitaniae Celtiberiaeque montibus pecora consectando nullum emolumentum tot
9 laborum periculorumque vestrorum vidistis; tempus est iam opulenta vos ac ditia stipendia facere et magna operae pretia mereri tantum itineris per tot montes fluminaque et tot armatas gentes emensos.
10 Hic vobis terminum laborum Fortuna dedit; hic dignam mercedem emeritis stipendiis dabit.
11 "Nec quam magni nominis bellum est tam difficilem existimaritis victoriam fore: saepe et contemptus hostis cruentum certamen edidit et incliti populi
12 regesque perlevi momento victi sunt. Nam dempto hoc uno[3] fulgore nominis Romani quid est cur illi 13 vobis comparandi sint? Ut viginti annorum militiam vestram cum illa virtute cum illa fortuna taceam, ab Herculis columnis ab Oceano terminisque ultimis terrarum per tot ferocissimos Hispaniae et Galliae populos vincentes huc pervenistis; pugnabitis cum

[1] nunc quidquid Woelfflin: quidquid P.
[2] agitedum Koch: agite cū P.
[3] uno P: vano Luchs.

necessity of fighting holds forth the promise of such B.C. 218 prizes, in the event of victory, that men are wont to ask not even the immortal gods for greater. If it were only Sicily and Sardinia, wrested from our fathers, that we were going to recover by our valour, these would still be great enough rewards. As it is, whatever the Romans have won and heaped up in the course of all their triumphs, whatever they possess, is all destined—and its owners with it—to be yours. Come then! Arm yourselves, with Heaven helping you, to earn this splendid wage! Long enough have you been chasing flocks on the barren mountains of Lusitania and Celtiberia, without seeing any recompense for all your toil and dangers. It is now time for you to make rich and lucrative campaigns, and reap the large rewards of so long a march over so many mountains and rivers and through so many warlike tribes. Here Fortune has fixed the final goal of your labours; here, when your wars are ended, she will worthily requite you.

"Nor must you think that in proportion to the great name of the war will be the difficulty you will have in winning it. It has often happened that even an enemy held cheap has caused a bloody battle, and that nations and princes of renown have been very lightly overcome. Take from your enemies this one glory of the Roman name, and in what particular can they bear comparison with you? To say nothing of your twenty years of service and your far-famed courage and good fortune, you have come from the Pillars of Hercules, from the Ocean and the uttermost limits of the world, and through so many of the fiercest tribes of Spain and Gaul have fought your way victoriously to this field. You will be

A.U.C. 536
14 exercitu tirone, hac ipsa aestate caeso victo circumsesso a Gallis, ignoto adhuc duci suo ignorantique
15 ducem. An me in praetorio patris, clarissimi imperatoris, prope natum,[1] certe eductum, domitorem Hispaniae Galliaeque, victorem eundem non Alpinarum modo gentium, sed ipsarum, quod multo maius est, Alpium, cum semenstri hoc conferam
16 duce, desertore exercitus sui? Cui si quis demptis signis Poenos Romanosque hodie ostendat, ignoraturum certum habeo utrius exercitus sit consul.
17 Non ego illud parvi aestimo, milites, quod nemo est vestrum cuius non ante oculos ipse saepe militare aliquod ediderim facinus, cui non idem ego virtutis spectator ac testis notata temporibus locisque referre
18 sua possim decora. Cum laudatis a me[2] miliens donatisque, alumnus prius omnium vestrum quam imperator, procedam in aciem adversus ignotos inter se ignorantesque.

XLIV. "Quocumque circumtuli oculos, plena omnia video animorum ac roboris, veteranum peditem, generosissimarum gentium equites frenatos
2 infrenatosque, vos socios fidelissimos fortissimosque, vos, Carthaginienses, cum pro patria[3] tum ob iram
3 iustissimam pugnaturos. Inferimus bellum infestisque signis descendimus in Italiam tanto audacius

[1] natum Valla: notum P.
[2] cum laudatis a me ς: tum laudatis me P.
[3] pro patria Weissenborn: patriam P: ob patriam ς.

[1] The Numidians used no bridles: the cavalry using them were Spaniards.

pitted against an army of recruits, who have been B.C. 218 this very summer cut to pieces, routed, and besieged by Gauls—an army as yet unknown to its general and one that knows not him. Or am I, who if not actually born in the headquarters of my father—most illustrious of commanders—was at least brought up there, am I, the subjugator of Spain and Gaul and conqueror not only of the Alpine tribes, but—what is much more—of the Alps themselves, am I, I ask you, to compare myself to this six-months general, who has deserted his own army? Why, if one were to show him to-day the Phoenicians and Romans without their standards, I am certain he would not know which army he was consul of. For my part, soldiers, I regard it as no slight advantage that there is not one of you in whose sight I have not often myself performed some soldierly feat; not one of whose courage I have not in my turn been a spectator and eye-witness—whose deeds of prowess, noted, together with their times and circumstances, I am not able to rehearse. I shall enter the battle in company with men whom I have praised and decorated a thousand times, and to all of whom I was a foster-son before I was their general. Opposed to me will be men who do not even know each other.

XLIV. "Wherever I turn my eyes I see nothing but eagerness and strength, a veteran infantry, cavalry from the noblest tribes, riding with bridles or without,[1] here the trustiest and most valiant of allies, there Carthaginians, prepared to fight not only in defence of their native land, but in satisfaction of a most righteous indignation. We are the assailants, and are descending with hostile standards into Italy, fortiusque pugnaturi quam hostis quanto maior spes, maior est animus inferentis vim quam arcentis. 4 Accendit praeterea et stimulat animos dolor iniuria indignitas. Ad supplicium depoposcerunt me ducem primum, deinde vos omnes qui Saguntum oppugnassetis; deditos ultimis cruciatibus adfecturi fuerunt. 5 Crudelissima ac superbissima gens sua omnia suique arbitrii facit. Cum quibus bellum, cum[1] quibus pacem habeamus, se modum imponere aequum censet. Circumscribit includitque nos terminis montium fluminumque quos non excedamus; neque eos quos 6 statuit terminos observat. 'Ne transieris Hiberum! Ne quid rei tibi sit cum Saguntinis!' At liberum est Saguntum.[2] 'Nusquam te vestigio moveris!' 7 Parum est quod veterrimas provincias meas Siciliam ac Sardiniam ademisti?[3] Adimis etiam Hispanias? Et inde si decessero,[4] in Africam transcendes? Transcendes dico?[5] Duos consules huius anni, unum in Africam, alterum in Hispaniam miserunt. Nihil usquam[6] nobis relictum est, nisi quod armis 8 vindicarimus. Illis timidis et ignavis esse licet qui respectum habent, quos sua terra suus ager per tuta ac pacata itinera fugientes accipient: vobis necesse est fortibus viris esse et omnibus inter victoriam mortemve[7] certa desperatione abruptis aut

A.U.C. 536

[1] bellum, cum ς: bellum P.

[2] at liberum est Saguntum Krauss (chap. ii. § 7): ad Hiberum est Saguntum P.

[3] Sardiniam ademisti? Heerwagen: Sardiniam P.

[4] Et inde si decessero H. J. Mueller: et si inde cessero ς: inde cessero P.

[5] Transcendes dico? Luchs: transcendisse autem dico P.

[6] usquam edd.: umquam P.

where we shall fight with more boldness and courage B.C. 218 than our foes in proportion as our hopes are higher and the gallantry of the assailant greater than his who but defends himself. Moreover, our hearts are kindled and pricked by rancour, wrongs, and insults. They called for the punishment of myself first, as your leader, then of all of you who had borne a part in the assault upon Saguntum; had we been given up, they meant to have inflicted upon us the worst of tortures. Most inhuman and most arrogant of nations, they reckon the world as theirs and subject to their pleasure. With whom we are to be at war, with whom at peace, they think it right that they should determine. They circumscribe and hem us in with boundaries of mountains and rivers which we may not cross; yet they do not observe those boundaries which they have set. 'Do not cross the Ebro! Have naught to do with the Saguntines!' But Saguntum is free. 'Do not budge from where you are in any direction!' Is it not enough that you have taken away my ancient provinces of Sicily and Sardinia? Are you taking away Spain as well? If I withdraw from these, shall you cross over into Africa? Shall, do I say? They have dispatched the two consuls of this year, the one into Africa, and the other into Spain! Nothing is left us anywhere, except what we shall defend by force of arms. They can afford to be timid and unenterprising who have something to fall back upon; whom their own country and their own fields will receive as they flee over safe and peaceful roads. As for you, you must be stout-hearted men, and discarding, without vain regrets, all hopes of anything but

[7] mortemve Wesenberg (Madvig): mortemque P.

A.U.C. 536 vincere aut, si Fortuna dubitabit, in proelio potius 9 quam in fuga mortem oppetere. Si hoc bene fixum omnibus, si destinatum[1] animo est, iterum dicam, vicistis; nullum contemptu mortis telum[2] ad vincendum homini ab dis immortalibus acrius datum est."

XLV. His adhortationibus cum utrimque ad certamen accensi militum animi essent, Romani ponte Ticinum iungunt tutandique pontis causa castellum
2 insuper imponunt; Poenus hostibus opere occupatis Maharbalem cum ala Numidarum, equitibus quingentis, ad depopulandos sociorum populi Romani
3 agros mittit; Gallis parci quam maxime iubet principumque animos ad defectionem sollicitari. Ponte perfecto traductus Romanus exercitus in agrum Insubrium quinque milia passuum a Victumulis con-
4 sedit. Ibi Hannibal castra habebat; revocatoque propere Maharbale atque equitibus, cum instare certamen cerneret, nihil unquam satis dictum praemonitumque ad cohortandos milites ratus, vocatis ad contionem certa praemia pronuntiat in quorum spem
5 pugnarent: agrum sese daturum esse in Italia Africa Hispania, ubi quisque velit,[3] immunem ipsi qui accepisset liberisque; qui pecuniam quam agrum maluisset,
6 ei se argento satis facturum; qui sociorum cives Carthaginienses fieri vellent, potestatem facturum; qui domos redire mallent, daturum se operam ne cuius suorum popularium mutatam secum fortunam

[1] si destinatum animo Heerwagen: destinatum in animo P.
[2] contemptu mortis telum Stroth.: contemptum P.
[3] velit P: vellet Wesenberg (Madvig).

victory or death, either conquer or, if Fortune falters, B.C. 218 sooner perish in battle than in flight. If this idea has been firmly fixed and implanted in your hearts, let me say once more: the victory is already yours. The immortal gods have bestowed on man no sharper weapon for winning victories than contempt of death."

XLV. When the spirits of the soldiers on both sides had been whetted for the struggle by these speeches, the Romans threw a bridge over the Ticinus and erected a fort besides for its protection; and the Phoenician, whilst his enemies were engaged in fortification, sent Maharbal with a squadron of Numidians, numbering five hundred horse, to ravage the fields belonging to the allies of the Roman People, with orders to spare the Gauls as much as possible and tempt their leaders to desert. On the completion of the bridge, the Roman army marched over into the country of the Insubres, and took up a position five miles from Victumulae. It was there that Hannibal had his camp, who, quickly recalling Maharbal and his cavalry, when he saw that a battle was imminent, called his troops together—for he never felt that he had done enough in the way of preparing and cheering the men—and held out definite rewards to them to fight for; he would give them land, he said, in Italy, Africa, or Spain, as each might choose, tax-free to the recipient and to his children; those who had rather have money than land he would content with silver; if any of the allies desired to become citizens of Carthage, he would give them the opportunity; as for such as preferred to go back to their homes, he would see to it that they should feel no inclination to change

A.U.C. 536

7 esse vellent; servis quoque dominos prosecutis libertatem proponit binaque pro iis mancipia dominis
8 se redditurum. Eaque ut rata scirent fore, agnum laeva manu dextra silicem retinens, si falleret, Iovem ceterosque precatus deos, ita se mactarent quem ad modum ipse agnum mactasset,[1] secundum pre-9 cationem caput pecudis saxo elisit. Tum vero omnes, velut dis auctoribus in spem suam quisque acceptis, id morae quod nondum pugnarent ad potienda sperata rati proelium uno animo et voce una poscunt.

XLVI. Apud Romanos haudquaquam tanta alacritas erat super cetera recentibus etiam territos
2 prodigiis; nam et lupus intraverat castra laniatisque obviis ipse intactus evaserat, et examen[2] apum in
3 arbore praetorio imminente consederat. Quibus procuratis Scipio cum equitatu iaculatoribusque expeditis profectus ad castra hostium ex propinquo copiasque,[3] quantae et cuius generis essent, speculandas, obvius fit Hannibali, et ipsi cum equitibus ad
4 exploranda circa loca progresso. Neutri alteros primo cernebant; densior deinde incessu tot hominum equorum oriens pulvis signum propinquantium hostium fuit. Consistit utrumque agmen et ad proelium[4]

[1] mactasset ed. Frob. 1531: mactasset et P.
[2] et examen ς: examen P.
[3] ex propinquo copiasque Gronovius: ex quo propinquo copias P.
[4] ad proelium ς: proelium P.

---

[1] In this ceremony the flint symbolizes the thunderbolt of Jupiter. The rite was characteristic of the Roman fetials (I. xxiv. 9), and Livy here ascribes it to Hannibal, to add to the dramatic effect of the scene.

places with any of their countrymen; besides this he promised freedom to the slaves who had come with their masters, and declared that he would make restitution to the latter, at the rate of two for one. And that they might know that these promises would be kept, he held a lamb with his left hand, and with his right a flint, and praying that if he should deceive them, then Jupiter and the other gods might slay him, even as he had slain the lamb, he thereupon smote the lamb's head with the stone.[1] Then indeed they all, as though each had received the blessing of the gods on his own particular hopes, and thought that their fulfilment was being delayed only because they were not yet fighting, cried out with one accord and one voice for battle. B.C. 218

XLVI. On the Roman side there was far less alacrity, for, besides other things, they were also frightened by some recent portents: a wolf had entered the camp and after rending those whom it met, had itself escaped unharmed; and a swarm of bees had settled in a tree that hung over the consul's tent. After averting these omens,[2] Scipio set out with his cavalry and light-armed darters to reconnoitre at close hand the enemy's camp and the size and character of his forces, and encountered Hannibal, who had likewise come out with his cavalry to explore the surrounding country. Neither party descried the other at first; afterwards an increasingly thick cloud of dust, that rose with the advance of so many men and horses, gave them notice that their enemies were approaching. Both bodies halted and began to make ready for battle.

[2] i.e. having by sacrifice to the gods averted the evil portended by these omens.

A.U.C. 536

5 sese expediebant. Scipio iaculatores et Gallos equites in fronte locat, Romanos sociorumque quod roboris fuit in subsidiis; Hannibal frenatos equites
6 in medium accipit, cornua Numidis firmat. Vixdum clamore sublato iaculatores fugerunt inter subsidia ad secundam aciem. Inde equitum certamen erat aliquamdiu anceps, dein quia turbabant equos pedites intermixti, multis labentibus ex equis aut desilientibus, ubi suos premi circumventos vidissent, iam magna ex parte ad pedes pugna venerat,[1] donec
7 Numidae, qui in cornibus erant, circumvecti paulum ab tergo se ostenderunt. Is pavor perculit Romanos auxitque pavorem consulis volnus periculumque intercursu tum primum pubescentis filii propulsa-
8 tum.[2] Hic erit iuvenis penes quem perfecti huiusce belli laus est, Africanus ob egregiam victoriam de
9 Hannibale Poenisque appellatus. Fuga tamen effusa iaculatorum maxime fuit, quos primos Numidae invaserunt; alius confertus equitatus consulem in medium acceptum non armis modo sed etiam corporibus suis protegens in castra nusquam trepide
10 neque effuse cedendo reduxit. Servati consulis decus Coelius ad servum natione Ligurem delegat. Malim equidem de filio verum esse, quod et plures tradidere auctores et fama obtinuit.

[1] ad pedes pugna venerat Gronovius: ad | despugnavierat P^1: anceps pugna erat P^2.

[2] propulsatum ς: pulsatum P.

---

[1] Polybius, who had the story from Laelius, the bosom friend of the younger Africanus, is among those who make Scipio the hero of this anecdote (x. iii. 2). Coelius dedicated his work to L. Aelius (Peter, Rell. I. ccxv.), not, as formerly thought, to Laelius, which would have made his rejection of the version honouring Scipio strange.

Scipio stationed his darters and Gallic horse in front, B.C. 218 holding in reserve the Romans and the best of the allies; Hannibal put the cavalry who rode with bridles in the centre, and made his wings strong with Numidians. Hardly had the battle-cry been raised, when the darters fled through their supports to the second line. Then followed a cavalry fight of which the issue was for a time in doubt; but by and by the horses became excited by the presence of the foot-soldiers who were mingled with them, and many riders lost their seats or dismounted on seeing their fellows in distress, and the battle was now fought chiefly on foot; until the Numidians, who were posted on the flanks, rode round in a little circuit and showed themselves on the rear. So alarming a sight filled the Romans with dismay, and, to add to their fear, the consul was wounded and was only saved from danger by the intervention of his son, who was just reaching manhood. This is the youth who will have the glory of finishing this war, and be surnamed Africanus, from his famous victory over Hannibal and the Phoenicians. However, the rout was chiefly amongst the darters, the first to be charged by the Numidians: the cavalry rallied, and receiving the consul into their midst, and shielding him not only with their arms but with their persons also, brought him back to camp without panic or confusion at any point in their retreat. (The credit for saving the consul's life is given by Coelius to a Ligurian slave. I should prefer, for my own part, that the story about his son were the true one, and this is the version which most authorities have handed down and tradition has established.[1])

A.U.C. 536

XLVII. Hoc primum cum Hannibale proelium fuit, quo facile apparuit et equitatu meliorem Poenum esse et ob id campos patentes, quales sunt inter Padum Alpesque, bello gerendo Romanis aptos non 2 esse. Itaque proxima nocte iussis militibus vasa silentio colligere castra ab Ticino mota festinatumque ad Padum est, ut ratibus quibus iunxerat flumen nondum resolutis sine tumultu atque insectatione
3 hostis copias traiceret. Prius Placentiam pervenere quam satis sciret Hannibal ab Ticino profectos; tamen ad sescentos[1] moratorum in citeriore ripa Padi segniter ratem solventes cepit. Transire pontem[2] non potuit, ut extrema resoluta erant tota rate in secundam aquam labente.

4 Coelius auctor est Magonem cum equitatu et Hispanis peditibus flumen extemplo tranasse, ipsum Hannibalem per superiora Padi vada exercitum traduxisse elephantis in ordinem ad sustinendum
5 impetum fluminis oppositis. Ea peritis amnis eius vix fidem fecerint; nam neque[3] equites armis equisque salvis tantam vim fluminis superasse veri simile est, ut iam Hispanos omnes inflati travexerint utres, et multorum dierum circuitu Padi vada petenda fuerunt, qua exercitus gravis impedimentis traduci posset.

[1] ad sescentos Gronovius (Polyb. III. lxvi. 4): ad haec P.
[2] pontem P: ponte H. J. Mueller.
[3] nam neque ς: namque P.

---

[1] Polybius (III. lxvi) makes Hannibal pursue Scipio only as far as the Ticinus (where Polybius places the episode of the six hundred), then turn back and march W. along the Po two days, till he found a place where he could bridge it. See Map 2, Operations on the Po.

[2] One of the very few places where Livy implies a first-hand acquaintance with the scene of events described.

XLVII. Such was the first battle fought with Hannibal, in which it was clearly seen that the Phoenician was superior in cavalry and that consequently open plains, like those between the Po and the Alps, were ill-suited to the Romans for campaigning. Accordingly, the next night Scipio gave his men the order to pack up without making any noise, and quitting his camp on the Ticinus, marched swiftly to the Po, intending to use the bridge of boats which he had thrown across the river and had not yet broken up, in order to set his army over without confusion or interruption by the enemy. They were at Placentia before Hannibal was well aware that they were gone from the Ticinus; nevertheless some six hundred men, who were lingering on the northern bank and taking their time about casting off the raft, fell into Hannibal's hands. He was not able to cross the bridge, for when the end was cast off, the whole raft swung down stream with the current.[1] B.C. 218

Coelius states that Mago with the cavalry and the Spanish foot immediately swam the river, and that Hannibal himself led his army across the Po by an upper ford, after placing the elephants in a line to break the current of the river. Those who are acquainted with the Po will hardly credit this account;[2] for, in the first place, it is unlikely that the horsemen could have breasted so strong a current without the loss of arms or horses, even if all the Spaniards had swum over on inflated skins, and in the second place it would have needed a circuitous march of many days to reach fords on the Po by which an army encumbered with baggage could get across.

A.U.C. 536

6 Potiores apud me auctores sunt qui biduo vix locum rate iungendo flumini inventum tradunt; ea cum Magone equites et Hispanorum[1] expeditos 7 praemissos. Dum Hannibal citra[2] flumen legationibus Gallorum audiendis moratus traicit gravius peditum agmen, interim Mago equitesque ab transitu fluminis diei unius itinere Placentiam ad hostes 8 contendunt. Hannibal paucis post diebus sex milia a Placentia castra communivit et postero die in conspectu hostium acie derecta potestatem pugnae fecit.

XLVIII. Insequenti nocte caedes in castris Romanis, tumultu tamen quam re maior, ab auxiliari- 2 bus Gallis facta est. Ad duo milia peditum et ducenti equites vigilibus ad portas trucidatis ad Hannibalem transfugiunt, quos Poenus benigne adlocutus et spe ingentium donorum accensos in civitates quemque suas ad sollicitandos popularium 3 animos dimisit. Scipio caedem eam signum defectionis omnium Gallorum esse ratus contactosque 4 eo scelere velut iniecta rabie ad arma ituros, quamquam gravis adhuc volnere erat, tamen quarta vigilia noctis insequentis tacito agmine profectus ad Trebiam fluvium iam in[3] loca altiora collesque 5 impeditiores equiti[4] castra movet. Minus quam ad Ticinum fefellit; missisque Hannibal primum Nu-

[1] et Hispanorum Weissenborn: hispanorum P.
[2] citra ς (Madvig, cf. § 3; chap. xlviii. § 6; chap. liv. § 4): circa P.
[3] iam in ς: iam P. [4] equiti ς (Valla): equites P.

Those writers seem to me more worthy of belief B.C. 218 who relate that in two days' search a place was scarcely found where the river could be spanned by a bridge of boats; by this the cavalry and light Spanish infantry were sent forward under Mago. While Hannibal, who had lingered on the northern bank to give a hearing to some Gallic embassies, was bringing over the heavy infantry, Mago and his horsemen advanced a day's march from the crossing of the river towards Placentia and the enemy. A few days later, Hannibal went into camp behind entrenchments, six miles from the town, and on the following day drew up his troops in sight of the enemy and offered battle.

XLVIII. The next night there was a bloody affray in the Roman camp, occasioned by some Gallic auxiliaries, though the confusion was greater than the loss of life. Some two thousand foot-soldiers and two hundred horsemen cut down the guards doing duty at the gates and fled to Hannibal, who received them with fair words, and after encouraging them to hope for great rewards, sent them off to their several states to solicit the support of their countrymen. Scipio apprehended that this bloodshed would prove to be a signal for the defection of all the Gauls, and that they would fly to arms, as if maddened by the contagion of this crime. Accordingly, though still troubled with his wound, he marched silently away in the fourth watch of the next night to the river Trebia, and encamped on higher ground, where hills made it more difficult for cavalry to operate. He was less successful than he had been on the Ticinus in eluding the observation of Hannibal, who sent after him first the Numidians and then all his

A.U.C. 526 midis deinde omni equitatu turbasset utique novissimum agmen, ni aviditate praedae in vacua Romana
6 castra Numidae devertissent. Ibi dum perscrutantes loca omnia castrorum nullo satis digno morae pretio tempus terunt, emissus hostis est de manibus et cum iam transgressos Trebiam Romanos metantesque castra conspexissent, paucos moratorum occiderunt
7 citra flumen interceptos. Scipio nec vexationem volneris in via iactati[1] ultra patiens et collegam—iam enim et revocatum ex Sicilia audierat—ratus exspectandum, locum qui prope flumen tutissimus stativis est visus delectum communiit.

8 Nec procul inde Hannibal cum consedisset, quantum victoria equestri elatus, tantum anxius inopia, quae per hostium agros euntem nusquam praeparatis
9 commeatibus maior in dies excipiebat, ad Clastidium vicum, quo magnum frumenti numerum congesserant Romani, mittit. Ibi cum vim pararent, spes facta proditionis; nec sane magno pretio, nummis aureis quadringentis, Dasio[2] Brundisino, praefecto praesidii, corrupto traditur Hannibali Clastidium. Id horreum

[1] iactati Doujat: iactanti P.
[2] Dasio Gronovius: dasiro P^1: dati pro P^2.

cavalry, and would have thrown the rearguard at B.C. 218 least into disorder, had not the Numidians, in their greed for booty, turned aside to plunder the camp which the Romans had abandoned. Whilst they frittered away the time there, rummaging in every nook and cranny without finding anything that really repaid them for the loss of time, they let their enemies slip through their fingers. The Romans had already passed the Trebia and were marking out their camp, when the Numidians caught sight of them and cut down a few loiterers whom they intercepted on the hither side of the stream. Scipio could no longer bear the pain occasioned by the jolting of his wound in travelling, and besides he judged it best to wait for the arrival of his colleague, who was already recalled—so he had heard—from Sicily. He therefore chose what seemed to be the safest place near the river for a permanent camp, and proceeded to entrench it.

Hannibal, too, went into camp not far away. Elated as he was at the victory of his horse, he was no less worried by the dearth of food, which increased from day to day, as he advanced through hostile territory without having anywhere arranged beforehand for supplies. In the village of Clastidium the Romans had got together a great quantity of corn. Thither Hannibal dispatched some soldiers, who were making preparations to assault the place, when hopes were held out of its betrayal. The price was not a large one: Dasius of Brundisium, who was in command of the garrison, accepted a bribe of four hundred gold pieces, and turned Clastidium over to Hannibal. This served the Phoenicians as a granary, while they lay encamped on 10 fuit Poenis sedentibus ad Trebiam. In captivos ex tradito praesidio, ut fama clementiae in principio rerum colligeretur, nihil saevitum est.

A.U.C. 536

XLIX. Cum ad Trebiam terrestre constitisset bellum, interim circa Siciliam insulasque Italiae imminentes et a Sempronio consule et ante adven-
2 tum eius terra marique res gestae. Viginti quinqueremes cum mille armatis ad depopulandam oram Italiae a Carthaginiensibus missae, novem Liparas, octo ad insulam Volcani tenuerunt, tres in fretum
3 avertit[1] aestus. Ad eas conspectas Messana duodecim naves ab Hierone rege Syracusanorum missae, qui tum forte Messanae erat consulem Romanum opperiens, nullo repugnante captas naves Messanam
4 in portum deduxerunt. Cognitum ex captivis praeter viginti naves cuius ipsi classis essent in Italiam missas quinque et triginta alias quinqueremes
5 Siciliam petere ad sollicitandos veteres socios; Lilybaei occupandi praecipuam curam esse; credere eadem tempestate qua ipsi disiecti forent eam
6 quoque classem ad Aegates insulas deiectam. Haec, sicut audita erant, rex M. Aemilio praetori cuius Sicilia provincia erat perscribit[2] monetque[3] Lily-
7 baeum firmo teneret praesidio. Extemplo et a praetore circa civitates[4] missi legati tribunique suos ad curam custodiae intendere, et[5] ante omnia Lily-

[1] avertit ς: aduertit P. [2] perscribit ς: praescribit P.
[3] monetque ς: (Woelfflin): monetque ut ς: monetque et P.
[4] et a praetore circa civitates Madvig: et circa praetore a ciuitate P: et circa civitates a praetore Frigell.
[5] intendere, et Madvig: intenderent P.

[1] This island, south of Lipara, and known also as Thermissa, Ἡφαίστου νῆσος, and Hiera, is now called Volcano.

the Trebia. The surrendered garrison were spared, B.C 218 as Hannibal wished to gain at the very outset a reputation for clemency.

XLIX. Though the war on land had come to a standstill at the Trebia, engagements had in the meantime been fought by land and sea off Sicily and the islands near the Italian coast, not only by Sempronius the consul, but even before his coming thither. Twenty quinqueremes with a thousand men at arms had been sent by the Carthaginians to lay waste the coast of Italy; nine of them reached Liparae and eight the Isle of Vulcan;[1] three the current diverted from their course into the Straits. These last were sighted by the people of Messana, and Hiero, king of the Syracusans, who happened to be in Messana at the time, waiting for the Roman consul, dispatched twelve ships, which captured the enemy's ships without a struggle and brought them into the harbour of Messana. It was learned from the prisoners that, besides the fleet of twenty galleys to which they themselves belonged—which had sailed for Italy—five and thirty other quinqueremes were on the way to Sicily to rouse up the old allies; the seizure of Lilybaeum was their prime object; but they supposed that the same storm by which they had themselves been scattered had struck this fleet as well and had driven it out of its course to the Aegatian Islands. The king wrote a full account of these rumours, just as they had come to him, to Marcus Aemilius, the praetor, who was in command in Sicily, and warned him to garrison Lilybaeum strongly. The praetor at once sent out his lieutenants and tribunes to the cities round about, and urged his people to be on their guard. Above all, Lilybaeum

A.U.C. 536

baeum teneri apparatu instructum [1] belli, edicto proposito ut socii navales decem dierum cocta 8 cibaria ad naves deferrent, ut [2] ubi signum datum esset ne quid [3] moram conscendendi faceret, perque omnem oram qui ex speculis prospicerent adventan-
9 tem hostium classem missi.[4] Itaque, quamquam de industria morati cursum navium erant Carthaginienses ut ante lucem accederent Lilybaeum, praesensum tamen est, quia et luna pernox erat et
10 sublatis armamentis veniebant; extemplo datum signum [5] ex speculis et in oppido ad arma conclamatum est et in naves conscensum; pars militum in muris portarumque stationibus,[6] pars in navibus
11 erant. Et Carthaginienses, quia rem fore haud cum imparatis cernebant, usque ad lucem portu se abstinuerunt demendis armamentis eo tempore
12 aptandaque ad pugnam classe absumpto. Ubi inluxit, recepere classem in altum ut spatium pugnae esset exitumque liberum e portu naves hostium 13 haberent. Nec Romani detrectavere pugnam et memoria circa ea ipsa loca gestarum rerum freti et militum multitudine ac virtute. (L.) Ubi in altum evecti sunt, Romanus conserere pugnam et ex pro-
2 pinquo vires conferre velle; contra eludere Poenus et arte non vi rem gerere naviumque quam virorum

[1] teneri apparatu instructum Foster: teneri instructum apparatu Weissenborn: instructum teneri apparatu Riemann: teneri apparatum P.

[2] deferrent, ut Heerwagen: deferrent et P.

[3] quid ς: quis P.

[4] missi Weissenborn: simi P^1: simili P^2.

was kept in a state of readiness for war, an edict B.C. 218 having been published directing the naval allies to bring to their ships cooked rations for ten days, so that, on the signal being given, there might be nothing to delay their embarkation. All along the coast men were sent to keep a look-out from the watch-towers for the coming of the enemy's fleet. And so, notwithstanding that the Carthaginians had delayed their sailing on purpose that they might come up to Lilybaeum in the dark, they were nevertheless perceived, because there was a moon all night and they bore down under a spread of canvas. The signal was at once displayed from the watch-towers, and in the town the call to arms was sounded and the ships were manned; some of the troops were at once on the walls or guarding the gates, some on the ships. And the Carthaginians, seeing that they should have to do with men who were not unprepared, stood off from the harbour until dawn and employed the time in taking down their masts and sails and putting the fleet in fighting trim. When the day broke, they withdrew into the open sea, to give room for the battle and to allow their enemy's ships a ready egress from the harbour. Nor did the Romans shun the encounter. They remembered the victories that had been won in that same vicinity, and relied on the numbers and the bravery of their men. (L.) Once at sea, the Romans wanted to join battle and match their strength against the enemy's at close quarters. The Phoenicians, on the contrary, preferred to manœuvre; to conduct the affair by strategy, not by force, and to make it a contest

[5] datum signum ς: datum P.
[6] stationibus ς: in stationibus P.

A.U.C. 536

3 aut armorum malle certamen facere. Nam ut sociis navalibus adfatim[1] instructam classem, ita inopem milite habebant; et sicubi concerta navis esset, haudquaquam par numerus armatorum ex ea pug-
4 nabat. Quod ubi animadversum est, et Romanis multitudo sua auxit animum et paucitas illis minuit.
5 Extemplo septem naves Punicae circumventae; fugam ceterae ceperunt. Mille et septingenti fuere in navibus captis milites nautaeque, in his tres
6 nobiles Carthaginiensium. Classis Romana incolumis, una tantum perforata navi sed ea quoque ipsa reduce, in portum rediit.
7 Secundum hanc pugnam, nondum gnaris eius qui Messanae erant, Ti. Sempronius consul Messanam venit. Ei fretum intranti rex Hiero classem ornatam
8 armatamque[2] obviam duxit transgressusque ex regia in praetoriam navem, gratulatus sospitem cum exercitu et navibus advenisse precatusque prosperum
9 ac felicem in Siciliam transitum, statum deinde insulae et Carthaginiensium conata exposuit pollicitusque est, quo animo priore bello populum Romanum iuvenis adiuvisset, eo senem adiuturum;
10 frumentum vestimentaque sese legionibus consulis sociisque navalibus gratis praebiturum; grande periculum Lilybaeo maritimisque civitatibus esse, et 11 quibusdam volentibus novas res fore. Ob haec consuli nihil cunctandum visum quin Lilybaeum

[1] adfatim ς : adfatim minus P.

[2] ornatam armatamque Hertz: armatam ornatamque Alschefski: ornatamque P.

---

[1] So the flagship was called, from the old use of praetor in the sense of "commander"; cf. praetorian camp, praetorian guard. The consuls were at first called praetors (III. lv. 12).

rather of ships than of men or arms. For although B.C. 218 their fleet was well equipped with rowers, they were short of fighting men; and when a ship was grappled, the men-at-arms in her were greatly outnumbered by their enemies. Perceiving this, the Romans derived a fresh access of courage from their numbers, and the other side were correspondingly disheartened by their fewness. Seven Punic ships were instantly cut out and captured, and the rest took to flight. There were seventeen hundred soldiers and sailors on the captured ships, including three Carthaginian nobles. The Roman fleet returned intact into the harbour: one ship only had been rammed, and even this was brought safely in.

After this engagement, but before the people in Messana had got wind of it, the consul Tiberius Sempronius came to that city. As he was entering the straits, King Hiero put out to meet him, with his fleet in fighting order, and passing over from the royal galley to the praetorian,[1] congratulated Sempronius on having arrived in safety with his army and his ships, and prayed that he might have a safe and successful passage to Sicily. He then described conditions in the island and the attempts made by the Carthaginians, and promised that with the same spirit with which, in his youth, he had helped the Roman People in the former war he would help them now, as an old man, and would furnish corn and clothing gratis to the legions of the consul and the naval allies. He added that Lilybaeum and the cities of the coast were in great danger, and that some of them would welcome a revolution. In view of these things, the consul saw fit to sail without delay for Lilybaeum, and the king attended him with

A.U.C. 536 classe peteret. Et rex regiaque classis una profecti. Navigantes inde pugnatum ad Lilybaeum fusasque et captas hostium naves accepere.

LI. A Lilybaeo consul Hierone cum classe regia dimisso relictoque praetore ad tuendam Siciliae oram ipse in insulam Melitam, quae a Carthaginiensibus 2 tenebatur, traiecit. Advenienti Hamilcar, Gisgonis filius, praefectus praesidii, cum paulo minus duobus [1] milibus militum oppidumque cum insula traditur. Inde post paucos dies reditum Lilybaeum, captivique et a consule et a praetore praeter insignes nobilitate 3 viros sub corona venierunt. Postquam ab ea parte satis tutam Siciliam censebat consul, ad insulas Volcani, quia fama erat stare ibi Punicam classem, traiecit; nec quisquam hostium circa eas insulas 4 inventus. Iam forte transmiserant ad vastandam Italiae oram depopulatoque Viboniensi agro urbem 5 etiam terrebant. Repetenti Siciliam consuli escensio hostium in agrum Viboniensem facta nuntiatur, litteraeque ab senatu de transitu in Italiam Hannibalis, et ut primo quoque tempore collegae ferret auxilium, 6 missae traduntur. Multis simul anxius curis exercitum extemplo in naves impositum Ariminum mari supero misit, Sex. Pomponio legato cum viginti quinque longis navibus Viboniensem agrum maritimamque oram Italiae tuendam adtribuit, M. Aemilio 7 praetori quinquaginta navium classem explevit. Ipse

[1] duobus milibus ς: duo millibus P.

---

[1] Malta.

[2] i.e. Africa. Livy has omitted to mention the fact, recorded by Coelius (quoted by the grammarian Charisius, II. p. 203 K), that Sempronius even sent a swift galley to spy out a good landing-place for a Roman army on the coast of Africa.

the royal fleet. On the voyage they learned of the action that had been fought near that city, and the defeat and capture of the enemy's ships. B.C. 218

LI. From Lilybaeum the consul dismissed King Hiero and his fleet, and leaving the praetor to protect the coast of Sicily, set sail for the island of Melita,[1] which was held by the Carthaginians. On his arrival, Hamilcar, Gisgo's son, the commandant of the garrison, surrendered himself and nearly two thousand soldiers, together with the town and island. From Melita Sempronius returned in a few days to Lilybaeum, and consul and praetor sold into slavery the prisoners they had made, with the exception of those who were distinguished by noble birth. When the consul judged that Sicily was in no danger from that quarter,[2] he crossed over to the Isles of Vulcan, where it was rumoured that a Punic fleet was lying; but no single enemy was discovered near those islands. They had already, as it happened, sailed across to ravage the Italian coast, and after pillaging the country about Vibo, were even threatening the town. The consul was returning again to Sicily when tidings reached him of the enemy's raid on the lands of Vibo, and a letter was delivered to him from the senate, apprising him of Hannibal's descent into Italy and bidding him go to the assistance of his colleague at the earliest possible moment. Beset with many cares at once, he immediately embarked his army and dispatched it through the Adriatic to Ariminum; to Sextus Pomponius, his lieutenant, he assigned five and twenty ships of war, with the task of defending the territory of Vibo and the coast of Italy; the fleet under Marcus Aemilius the praetor he increased to fifty sail. He himself, compositis Siciliae rebus decem navibus oram Italiae legens Ariminum pervenit. Inde cum exercitu suo profectus ad Trebiam flumen conlegae coniungitur.

A.U.C. 536

LII. Iam ambo consules et quidquid Romanarum virium erat Hannibali oppositum aut illis copiis defendi posse Romanum imperium aut spem nullam
2 aliam esse satis declarabat. Tamen consul alter, equestri proelio uno et volnere suo aeger et minutus,[1] trahi rem malebat: recentis animi alter eoque ferocior nullam dilationem patiebatur.
3 Quod inter Trebiam Padumque agri est Galli tum incolebant, in duorum praepotentium populorum certamine per ambiguum favorem haud dubie gratiam
4 victoris[2] spectantes. Id Romani, modo ne quid moverent, aequo satis, Poenus periniquo animo ferebat, ab Gallis accitum se venisse ad liberandos
5 eos dictitans. Ob eam iram, simul ut praeda militem aleret, duo milia peditum et mille equites, Numidas plerosque, mixtos quosdam et Gallos, populari omnem
6 deinceps agrum usque ad Padi ripas iussit. Egentes ope Galli, cum ad id dubios servassent animos, coacti ab auctoribus iniuriae ad vindices futuros

[1] aeger et minutus Heerwagen: et minutus P^1: eminutus P^2.

[2] victoris edd.: uictor P.

---

[1] This important sketch of affairs in Sicily (chapters xlix–li) is drawn from a source which cannot be identified. De Sanctis (p 186) thinks that the condensed and unrhetorical character of the style excludes its attribution to Coelius; neither Fabius nor Cincius is likely to have been so impartial in giving credit to the allies, like Hiero, and we know of no Greek writer who would have treated minor incidents with such particularity. He conjectures that the unknown writer may have been Eumachus of Naples (who wrote in Greek of

after settling the affairs of Sicily, took ten ships, and B.C. 218 skirting the Italian coast, arrived at Ariminum. Thence he marched with his army to the Trebia and effected a junction with his colleague.[1]

LII. Now that both the consuls and all the forces which the Romans could muster were opposing Hannibal, it was obvious enough either that the troops there under arms were able to defend Rome's empire or that her case was hopeless. Nevertheless one of the consuls, disheartened by a single cavalry engagement and weak from his wound, preferred to postpone the decision. The other, unwearied and therefore the more impetuous, would put up with no delay.

The country between the Trebia and the Po was in those days inhabited by Gauls, who in this struggle of two mighty peoples maintained a neutral attitude and plainly intended to court the good-will of the victor. This policy was agreeable enough to the Romans, if only the Gauls made no disturbance, but was far from acceptable to Hannibal, who declared repeatedly that he had come on the invitation of the Gauls, to set them free. In his resentment at this state of affairs, and in order at the same time to sustain his troops with plunder, he ordered two thousand foot and a thousand horse—chiefly Numidians but with a sprinkling of Gauls—to waste the entire country-side, field after field, right up to the banks of the Po. The helpless Gauls, who had been undecided until then, were compelled to turn from the authors of their wrongs to those who might avenge them; and, sending envoys the war with Hannibal) or some other Italian or Sicilian historian.

A.U.C. 536 declinant legatisque ad consules missis auxilium Romanorum terrae ob nimiam cultorum fidem in 7 Romanos laboranti orant. Cornelio nec causa nec tempus agendae rei placebat, suspectaque ei gens erat cum ob infida multa facinora tum, ut illa[1] vetustate obsolevissent, ob recentem Boiorum per- 8 fidiam; Sempronius contra continendis in fide sociis maximum vinculum esse primos qui eguissent[2] ope 9 defensos censebat. Is tum collega cunctante[3] equitatum suum mille peditum iaculatoribus ferme admixtis ad defendendum Gallicum agrum trans Tre- 10 biam mittit. Sparsos et incompositos, ad hoc graves praeda plerosque cum inopinato[4] invasissent, ingentem terrorem caedemque ac fugam usque ad castra stationesque hostium fecere; unde multitudine effusa pulsi rursus subsidio suorum proelium 11 restituere. Varia inde pugna sequentes inter cedentesque; cumque[5] ad extremum aequassent certamen, maior tamen hostium numerus cecidisset, penes Romanos[6] fama victoriae fuit.

LIII. Ceterum nemini omnium maior ea[7] iustiorque quam ipsi consuli videri; gaudio efferri, qua parte copiarum alter consul victus foret, ea se vi- 2 cisse, restitutos ac refectos militibus animos, nec quemquam esse praeter collegam qui dilatam dimi-

[1] ut illa Weissenborn: ut alia ζ: ob iutilia P^1: ob utilia P^2.
[2] primos qui eguissent Gronovius: primosque qui coissent P.
[3] Is tum collega cunctante Luchs: tum collega cunctante ζ: cum collegam cunctantem P.
[4] inopinato Madvig: inopinatos P.
[5] sequentes inter cedentesque; cumque Madvig: sequentes cumque P: sequentes cedentesque cum Heusinger.
[6] hostium numerus cecidisset, penes Romanos Rossbach: hostium Romanos P.
[7] maior ea Dederich: maiora P^1: maior P^2.

to the consuls, besought the Romans to come to the aid of a land that was suffering for its inhabitants' too great loyalty to Rome. Cornelius liked neither the occasion nor the time for fighting, and regarded the Gauls with suspicion, both because of many acts of perfidy, and especially—even though time had obliterated those ancient grievances—because of the recent treachery of the Boi. Sempronius, on the contrary, held that the strongest bond for keeping the allies to their obligations was the defence of those who should first stand in need of help. On the present occasion, while his colleague hesitated, Sempronius sent his cavalry, interspersed with about a thousand foot-soldiers, armed with darts, to protect the Gallic lands beyond the Trebia. Falling unexpectedly upon the enemy, who were scattered and disorganized—most of them laden too with spoils—they drove them with great slaughter in a terror-stricken rout to the very outposts of the Carthaginian camp. Thence the enemy poured out in numbers and repulsed the Romans, in their turn; but reserves came up and restored the day. Thereafter the fortune of the battle shifted, as pursuit was followed by retreat; and though in the end the opposing armies were on even terms, still the enemy had lost more men and the Romans got the credit of a victory. B.C. 218

LIII. But to no one did the victory seem greater or more unequivocal than to Sempronius the consul; he was beside himself with joy that with that arm of the service with which the other consul had been beaten, he himself had been successful. He declared that the spirits of the men were restored and renewed, and that no one but his colleague desired cationem vellet; eum animo magis quam corpore aegrum memoria volneris aciem ac tela horrere. Sed 3 non esse cum aegro senescendum. Quid enim ultra differri aut teri tempus? Quem tertium consulem, 4 quem alium exercitum exspectari? Castra Carthaginiensium in Italia ac prope in conspectu urbis esse. Non Siciliam ac Sardiniam victis ademptas nec cis Iberum Hispaniam peti, sed solo patrio terraque in qua 5 geniti forent pelli Romanos. "Quantum ingemescant" inquit "patres nostri circa moenia Carthaginis bellare soliti, si videant nos, progeniem suam, duos consules consularesque exercitus, in media Italia paventes intra castra, Poenum quod inter Alpes 6 Appenninumque agri sit suae dicionis fecisse." Haec adsidens aegro collegae, haec in praetorio prope contionabundus agere. Stimulabat et tempus propinquum comitiorum, ne in novos consules bellum differretur, et occasio in se unum vertendae gloriae, dum 7 aeger collega erat. Itaque nequiquam dissentiente Cornelio parari ad propinquum certamen milites iubet.

A.U.C. 536

Hannibal cum quid optimum foret hosti cerneret, vix ullam spem habebat temere atque improvide 8 quicquam consules acturos; cum alterius ingenium, fama prius deinde re cognitum, percitum ac ferox

[1] praetorium here means the open space in front of the general's tent. not (as often) the tent itself. Sempronius meant that the soldiers should know his sentiments, but did not quite go the length of declaring them in a formal harangue.

to put off the struggle; Cornelius, he said, was sick B.C. 218 in spirit rather than in body, and the recollection of his wound made him dread a battle and its missiles. But they must not droop and languish along with a sick man. Why indeed should they further postpone the conflict, or waste time? What third consul, what other army were they waiting for? The Carthaginians were encamped in Italy and almost within sight of Rome. Their object was, not to get back Sicily and Sardinia, taken from them after their defeat, nor to cross the Ebro and occupy northern Spain, but to expel the Romans from the land of their fathers and from their native soil. "How would our fathers groan," he cried, "that were wont to wage war about the walls of Carthage, could they see us, their offspring, two consuls and two consular armies, cowering within our camp in the heart of Italy; and the Phoenician in full sway over all the territory between the Alps and the Apennines!" Thus he ran on, as he sat by the bed of his sick colleague; thus he argued in the praetorium,[1] almost as if haranguing the troops. His impatience was increased, too, by the near approach of the elections, lest the war go over to the term of the new consuls and he lose the opportunity of gaining all the glory for himself, while his colleague was laid up. Accordingly, despite the unavailing protests of Cornelius, he commanded the soldiers to make ready for an early battle.

Hannibal, since he saw what was best for the enemy, hardly dared to hope that the consuls would take any rash or ill-considered step; but knowing, as he did—by hearsay first and afterwards by experience—that one of them was of a fiery and reck-

A.U.C. 536 sciret esse ferociusque factum prospero cum praedatoribus suis certamine crederet, adesse gerendae
9 rei fortunam haud diffidebat. Cuius ne quod praetermitteret tempus sollicitus intentusque erat, dum tiro hostium miles esset, dum meliorem ex ducibus inutilem volnus faceret, dum Gallorum animi vigerent,
10 quorum ingentem multitudinem sciebat segnius secu-
11 turam quanto longius ab domo traherentur. Cum ob haec taliaque speraret propinquum certamen et facere, si cessaretur, cuperet, speculatoresque Galli, ad ea exploranda quae vellet tutiores quia in utrisque castris militabant, paratos pugnae esse Romanos rettulissent, locum insidiis circumspectare Poenus coepit.

LIV. Erat in medio rivus praealtis utrimque clausus ripis et circa obsitus palustribus herbis, et quibus inculta ferme vestiuntur, virgultis vepribusque. Quem ubi equites[1] quoque tegendo satis latebrosum locum circumvectus ipse oculis perlustravit, "Hic erit locus" Magoni fratri ait, "quem teneas.
2 Delige centenos viros ex omni pedite atque equite, cum quibus ad me vigilia prima venias; nunc corpora
3 curare tempus est." Ita praetorium missum. Mox cum delectis Mago aderat. "Robora virorum cerno"

[1] equites P: equiti s (Madvig).

less disposition, and believing that the late successful B.C. 218 brush with the Carthaginian raiders would have made him still more headstrong, he was fairly confident that the good fortune of a general engagement was at hand. It was therefore his one concern to let slip no opportunity for bringing this about, while the soldiers of the enemy still lacked experience, while the abler of their generals was incapacitated by his wound, while the courage of the Gauls was up—since he knew that their vast multitude would follow the less willingly, the farther they were drawn from home. For these and similar reasons he hoped that a battle would soon be fought, and was eager, should there be any hesitation, to force it on. And so, when his Gallic scouts—who were safer for gathering the information that he wanted because there were men of that nation in both camps—had reported that the Romans were prepared to fight, the Phoenician began to look about for a place in which to lay an ambush.

LIV. Between the two camps was a water-course, shut in by very high banks on either side and overgrown all round with marsh-grass and the underbrush and brambles with which uncultivated land is usually clothed. When Hannibal, riding over the ground himself, saw that this place afforded sufficient cover even for cavalry, he said to his brother Mago, "This will be the place for you to hold. Choose out a hundred men from all the infantry and a hundred from the cavalry, and come with them to my quarters at the first watch. It is time now to sup and rest." With that he broke up the council. In a little while Mago presented himself with his picked men. "I see the stoutest of my men," said Hanni-inquit Hannibal; "sed uti numero etiam non animis modo valeatis, singuli[1] vobis novenos ex turmis manipulisque vestri similes eligite. Mago locum monstrabit quem insideatis; hostem caecum ad has belli artes habetis." Ita cum mille equitibus Magone, mille peditibus dimisso,[2] Hannibal prima luce Numidas equites transgressos Trebiam flumen obequitare iubet hostium portis iaculandoque in stationes[3] elicere ad pugnam hostem, iniecto deinde certamine cedendo sensim citra flumen pertrahere. Haec mandata Numidis. Ceteris ducibus peditum equitumque praeceptum ut prandere omnes iuberent, armatos deinde instratisque equis signum exspectare.

A.U.C. 536

Sempronius ad tumultum Numidarum primum omnem equitatum, ferox ea parte virium, deinde sex milia peditum, postremo omnes copias ad destinatum iam ante consilio avidus certaminis eduxit. Erat forte brumae tempus et nivalis dies in locis Alpibus Appenninoque interiectis, propinquitate etiam fluminum ac paludum praegelidis. Ad hoc raptim eductis hominibus atque equis, non capto ante cibo, non ope ulla ad arcendum frigus adhibita, nihil caloris inerat, et quidquid aurae fluminis adpropinquabant, adflabat acrior frigoris vis. Ut vero refugientes Numidas insequentes aquam ingressi sunt—et erat pectoribus tenus aucta nocturno bal, "but that your numbers too may be strong to match your bravery, choose, each of you, from the squadrons and the maniples, nine others like yourselves. Mago will point out to you the spot where you are to lie in ambush; you have an enemy who is blind to these stratagems." Mago and his thousand horse and thousand foot being thus dispatched, Hannibal ordered the Numidian cavalry to cross the Trebia at dawn, and riding up to the enemy's gates and discharging missiles against his outposts, to lure him into battle; and then, when the fight was on, to give ground insensibly and draw him across the river. Such were the orders of the Numidians. The other officers, both of cavalry and of infantry, were instructed to make their men have breakfast, and then, armed and with horses saddled, to await the signal. B.C. 218

[1] singuli Forchhammer: singulis P.

[2] ita cum mille equitibus Magone . . . dimisso Madvig: ita mille equitibus magoni . . . dimissis P.

[3] in stationes ς: stationes P.

On the flurry caused by the Numidians, Sempronius, confident where cavalry was concerned, first led out all of this part of his forces; then six thousand of the infantry; and finally all the rest of his troops. He had fully made up his mind beforehand and was eager for the battle. It chanced to be the time of year when the days are shortest, and it was snowing in the region between the Alps and the Apennines, and the proximity of rivers and marshes intensified the bitter cold. Moreover, men and horses had been turned out in haste, without stopping for food or doing anything to guard against becoming chilled; there was no warmth in them, and the nearer they approached the atmosphere of the river the sharper grew the cold wind in their faces. But when, in pursuit of the fleeing Numidians, they entered the water—swollen breast-high with the imbri,—tum utique egressis rigere omnibus corpora, ut vix armorum tenendorum potentia essent,[1] et simul lassitudine[2] et procedente iam die fame etiam deficere.

A.U.C. 536

LV. Hannibalis interim miles ignibus ante tentoria factis oleoque per manipulos, ut mollirent artus, misso et cibo per otium capto, ubi transgressos flumen hostes nuntiatum est, alacer animis corpori-
2 busque arma capit atque in aciem procedit. Baliares locat ante signa, levem armaturam, octo ferme milia hominum, dein graviorem armis peditem, quod virium quod roboris erat; in cornibus circumfudit decem milia equitum et ab cornibus in utramque partem
3 divisos elephantos statuit. Consul effuse sequentes equites, cum ab resistentibus[3] subito Numidis incauti exciperentur, signo receptui dato revocatos
4 circumdedit peditibus. Duodeviginti milia Romana erant, socium nominis Latini viginti, auxilia praeterea Cenomanorum; ea sola in fide manserat Gallica gens. Iis copiis concursum est.

5 Proelium a Baliaribus ortum est; quibus cum maiore robore legiones obsisterent, diducta propere in cornua levis armatura est,[4] quae res effecit ut
6 equitatus Romanus extemplo urgeretur; nam cum vix iam per se resisterent decem milibus equitum

[1] essent ς: esset P.
[2] simul lassitudine ς: similitudine P.
[3] ab resistentibus P: ab refugientibus et resistentibus Weissenborn.
[4] diducta . . . armatura est Madvig: deductae . . . armaturae sunt P.

rain that had fallen in the night—or at any rate B.C. 218 when they got out upon the further bank, then indeed their bodies were all so benumbed that they could hardly hold their weapons; and at the same time they were fainting with fatigue, and, as the day wore on, with hunger as well.

LV. Hannibal's soldiers had in the meantime made fires before their tents; in each company they had been served with oil to supple their joints, and had breakfasted at leisure. When, therefore, they were told that the enemy had crossed the river, they were eager both in mind and body, as they armed and went out to battle. In front of the standards Hannibal placed the Baliares, light-armed troops numbering about eight thousand, and behind these his heavy infantry, the strength and flower of his army; the wings he formed of ten thousand horse, and, dividing the elephants, stationed them outside the wings. The consul's troopers were scattered in pursuit of the Numidians, when suddenly the latter made a stand and took them unawares; whereupon he called them back and posted them on either flank of the infantry. There were eighteen thousand Romans and twenty thousand allies of the Latin name, besides the auxiliaries of the Cenomani, the only Gallic tribe that continued loyal. These were the contending forces.

The Baliares began the battle, but those light-armed troops, finding the legions too strong to cope with, were quickly withdrawn and sent to the wings. This manœuvre at once caused the Roman cavalry acute distress; for they numbered but four thousand, and, tired as they were, would scarce have been able to hold out any longer against the enemy's ten

A.U.C. 536 quattuor milia et fessi integris plerisque, obruti sunt insuper velut nube iaculorum a Baliaribus coniecta. 7 Ad hoc elephanti eminentes ab extremis cornibus, equis maxime non visu modo, sed odore insolito 8 territis, fugam late faciebant. Pedestris pugna par animis magis quam viribus erat, quas recentes Poenus paulo ante curatis corporibus in proelium attulerat; contra ieiuna fessaque corpora Romanis et rigentia gelu torpebant. Restitissent tamen animis, si cum 9 pedite solum foret pugnatum; sed et Baliares pulso equite iaculabantur in latera et elephanti iam in mediam peditum aciem sese tulerant et Mago Numidaeque, simul latebras eorum improvida praeterlata acies est, exorti ab tergo ingentem tumultum 10 ac terrorem fecere. Tamen in tot circumstantibus malis mansit aliquamdiu immota acies, maxime 11 praeter spem omnium adversus elephantos. Eos velites ad id ipsum locati verutis coniectis et avertere et insecuti aversos sub caudis, qua maxime molli cute volnera accipiunt, fodiebant.

LVI. Trepidantesque et prope[1] iam in suos consternatos e media[2] acie in extremam ad sinistrum cornu adversus Gallos auxiliares agi iussit Hannibal. Ibi[3] extemplo haud dubiam fecere fugam. Quo thousand cavalry alone, who were most of them fresh; and now they were overwhelmed, as it were with a cloud of missiles, by the Baliares. Besides this, the elephants, looming large on the outer extremities of the wings, gave rise to such a panic, particularly among the horses, not only by their strange appearance, but also by their unfamiliar smell, as to bring about a general flight. As for the infantry, they were fairly matched in courage, but not in strength, which was unimpaired in the case of the Phoenicians, who had refreshed themselves shortly before entering the battle, while the Romans were faint with fasting and fatigue, and were stiff and numb with cold. Yet their courage would have enabled them to resist, had they fought against infantry alone. But the Baliares, having put the cavalry to flight, were raining missiles on their flanks; the elephants had now charged the centre of the line; and Mago and his Numidians, as soon as the Roman army had passed their ambuscade without observing it, started up in their rear, and caused the wildest panic and confusion. Nevertheless, amidst all these evils, the line held for a time unshaken, and even—what no one had dared to hope for—against the elephants. Skirmishers, expressly posted to deal with the beasts, would throw darts at them and make them turn away, and then pursuing them would strike them under the tail, where the skin is softest and it is possible to wound them. B.C. 218

[1] et prope Rost: in prope P.
[2] e media Gronovius: media P.
[3] Hannibal. Ibi Weissenborn: hannibali P.

LVI. In their terror they were now on the point of charging their own people, when Hannibal gave orders to drive them from the centre to the extreme left wing, against the Gallic auxiliaries. Here they immediately caused a decided stampede, and the

A.U.C. 536

novus[1] terror additus Romanis, ut fusa auxilia sua
2 viderunt. Itaque cum iam in orbem pugnarent, decem milia ferme hominum, cum alibi[2] evadere nequissent, media Afrorum acie, qua Gallicis auxiliis firmata erat, cum ingenti caede hostium perrupere,
3 et cum neque in castra reditus esset flumine interclusis neque prae imbri satis discernere[3] possent, qua suis opem ferrent, Placentiam recto itinere
4 perrexere. Plures deinde in omnes partes eruptiones factae; et qui flumen petiere aut gurgitibus absumpti sunt aut inter cunctationem ingrediendi ab
5 hostibus oppressi; qui passim per agros fuga sparsi erant vestigia cedentis sequentes agminis Placentiam contendere; aliis timor hostium audaciam ingrediendi flumen fecit, transgressique in castra pervenerunt.
6 Imber nive mixtus et intoleranda vis frigoris et homines multos et iumenta et elephantos prope
7 omnes absumpsit. Finis insequendi hostes Poenis flumen Trebia fuit, et ita torpentes gelu in castra
8 rediere ut vix laetitiam victoriae sentirent. Itaque nocte insequenti, cum praesidium castrorum et quod reliquum ex fuga inermium[4] ex magna parte militum erat ratibus Trebiam traicerent, aut nihil sensere obstrepente pluvia aut, quia iam moveri nequibant prae lassitudine ac volneribus, sentire sese dissimu-

[1] quo novus Frigell: quoque nouus P.
[2] alibi Weissenborn: alii P.
[3] discernere ς: decernere P.
[4] reliquum ex fuga inermium Luchs: relicum P.

---

[1] Livy appears to have thought of Placentia as west of the Trebia, which the ten thousand were therefore not now obliged to cross, though Scipio and the garrison were (§ 8).

[2] At chap. lviii. § 11 Livy speaks of the loss of seven of the elephants which survived the Trebia. According to

Romans experienced a fresh alarm when they saw B.C. 218 their auxiliaries routed. And so, hemmed in as they now were on every side, about ten thousand men, when they found it impossible to escape at any other point, forced a passage, with great slaughter of their enemies, through the Carthaginian centre, which was composed of Gallic auxiliaries, and being cut off by the river from returning to their camp and so blinded by the rain that they could not well discern where to help their comrades, took the shortest way to Placentia.[1] After that sundry groups broke out at various points. Those who headed for the river were either drowned in its eddies, or, while they hesitated to enter it, were overtaken by the enemy; but those who scattered over the country-side in flight made their way by following the tracks of the retreating column, to Placentia; others, venturing, in their terror of the enemy, to attempt the river, got across, and reached the camp. The mingled rain and snow and the intolerable sharpness of the cold brought death to many men and beasts of burden and to almost all the elephants.[2] The Phoenicians pursued their enemies no further than to the river Trebia, and got back to camp so benumbed and chilled as hardly to feel the joy of victory. Consequently, when, in the night that followed, the garrison of the camp, and such soldiers—without arms for the most part—as had survived the rout, were crossing the Trebia on rafts, they either heard nothing, owing to the noise made by the rain, or being unable, for weariness and wounds, to bestir themselves, pretended not to hear; and unmolested

Polybius (III. lxxiv. 11), all but one perished from the effects of the rain and snow that followed the battle.

A.U.C. 536

larunt; quietisque Poenis tacito agmine ab Scipione consule exercitus Placentiam est perductus, inde Pado traiecto[1] Cremonam, ne duorum exercituum hibernis una colonia premeretur.

LVII. Romam tantus terror ex hac clade perlatus est ut iam ad urbem Romanam crederent infestis signis hostem venturum, nec quicquam spei aut auxilii esse quo a portis[2] moenibusque vim arcerent: 2 uno consule ad Ticinum victo alterum ex Sicilia revocatum[3]; duobus consulibus, duobus consularibus exercitibus victis quos alios duces, quas alias legiones 3 esse quae arcessantur? Ita territis Sempronius consul advenit, ingenti periculo per effusos passim ad praedandum hostium equites audacia magis quam consilio aut spe fallendi resistendive, si non 4 falleret, transgressus, id quod unum maxime in praesentia desiderabatur, comitiis consularibus habitis, in hiberna rediit. Creati consules Cn. Servilius et C. Flaminius iterum.[4]

5 Ceterum ne hiberna quidem Romanis quieta erant vagantibus passim Numidis equitibus et, ut quaeque[5] iis impeditiora erant, Celtiberis Lusitanisque. Omnes igitur undique clausi commeatus 6 erant, nisi quos Pado naves subveherent. Emporium prope Placentiam fuit et opere magno munitum et

[1] Pado traiecto ς: pado traiectus P.

[2] quo a portis Heerwagen: qua portis P.

[3] alterum ex Sicilia revocatum Madvig: altero ex Sicilia reuocato P.

[4] C. Flaminius iterum Glareanus: C. Flaminius P.

[5] ut quaeque Fabri: quaeque P.

[1] The descriptions of the terror occasioned in Rome by news of the defeat and of the journey of Sempronius are not found in Polybius and are very likely drawn from Coelius Antipater.

by the enemy Scipio led his army in silence to B.C. 218
Placentia, and thence—after crossing the Po—to Cremona, so that that one town might not be overburdened with furnishing winter quarters for two armies.

LVII. To Rome the news of this disaster brought such consternation that people looked for the immediate appearance of the hostile army before their very City, and knew not which way to turn for any hope or help in defending their gates and walls against its onset.[1] When one consul had been defeated on the Ticinus, the other had been summoned back from Sicily; but now that two consuls and two consular armies had been beaten, what other generals, what other legions had they to call upon? In the midst of this alarm the consul Sempronius arrived. He had made his way, taking tremendous risks, through the enemy's cavalry—which was widely dispersed in quest of booty—relying more on audacity than calculation or the prospect of eluding his enemies, or of resisting, should he be unable to elude them. The election of consuls was the one crying need of the hour. This Sempronius accomplished and returned forthwith to his winter quarters. The choice had fallen on Gnaeus Servilius and—for the second time—on Gaius Flaminius.

For the rest, the Romans were given no peace even in their winter quarters. The Numidian cavalry ranged far and wide, and any ground that was too rough for them was covered by the Celtiberians and Lusitani. The result was the cutting off of all supplies from every quarter, save such as were brought up the Po in ships. Their magazine, which was near Placentia, was elaborately fortified valido firmatum praesidio. Eius castelli expugnandi[1] spe cum equitibus ac levi armatura profectus Hannibal, cum plurimum in celando incepto ad effectum spei habuisset, nocte adortus non fefellit vigiles. 7 Tantus repente clamor est sublatus ut Placentiae quoque audiretur. Itaque sub lucem cum equitatu consul aderat iussis quadrato agmine legionibus 8 sequi. Equestre interim proelium commissum, in quo quia saucius Hannibal pugna excessit, pavore hostibus iniecto defensum egregie praesidium est. 9 Paucorum inde[2] dierum quiete sumpta et vixdum satis percurato volnere ad Victumulas[3] oppugnandas 10 ire pergit. Id emporium Romanis Gallico bello fuerat; munitum inde locum frequentaverant adcolae mixti undique ex finitimis populis, et tum terror populationum eo plerosque ex agris com- 11 pulerat. Huius generis multitudo, fama impigre defensi ad Placentiam praesidii accensa, armis 12 arreptis obviam Hannibali procedit. Magis agmina quam acies in via concurrerunt, et cum ex altera parte nihil praeter inconditam turbam esset, in altera et dux militi et miles duci[4] fidens, ad triginta 13 quinque milia hominum a paucis fusa. Postero die deditione facta praesidium intra moenia accepere; iussique arma tradere cum dicto paruissent, signum

A.U.C. 536

[1] expugnandi Perizonius: oppugnandi P.
[2] inde ς: in P.
[3] Victumulas Mommsen: uictumuias P.
[4] miles duci ς: duci miles P.

and strongly garrisoned. This place Hannibal hoped B.C. 218 to capture by assault, and set out thither with his cavalry and light infantry. He had counted mainly on the concealment of his movements for their effectiveness; but his night attack failed to catch the sentries off their guard, and the defenders at once set up so loud an outcry that it was heard even in Placentia. And so at break of day the consul was on the spot with his cavalry, having ordered the legions to follow him in fighting column. Meanwhile, a cavalry engagement took place, in which Hannibal was wounded and withdrew from the fight, and the enemy were so alarmed by this that the post was successfully defended. After this Hannibal, when he had rested only a few days and his wound was scarce healed over, set out to attack Victumulae. This had been a Roman magazine in the Gallic war, and having then been fortified had since attracted numerous settlers from the various peoples dwelling in the neighbourhood; and just then the fear of raids had caused large numbers to flock in from the countryside. Such was the character of the population, which, fired by the story of the stout defence of the fortress near Placentia, flew to arms and went out to meet Hannibal. More like marching columns than embattled armies they encountered each other in the road; and since on one side there was only an undisciplined rabble, and on the other a general who relied upon his soldiers, and soldiers who confided in their general, some thirty-five thousand men were routed by a very few. The next day they surrendered and received a garrison within their walls. Being commanded to give up their weapons they complied: whereupon a

A.U.C. 536 repente victoribus datur ut tamquam vi captam
14 urbem diriperent. Neque ulla quae in tali re memorabilis scribentibus videri solet praetermissa clades est: adeo omne[1] libidinis crudelitatisque et inhumanae superbiae editum in miseros exemplum est. Hae fuere hibernae expeditiones Hannibalis.

A.U.C. 537 LVIII. Haud longi inde temporis,[2] dum intolera-
2 bilia frigora erant, quies militi data est, et ad prima ac dubia signa veris profectus ex hibernis in Etruriam ducit, eam quoque gentem, sicut Gallos Liguresque,
3 aut vi aut voluntate adiuncturus. Transeuntem Appenninum adeo atrox adorta tempestas est ut Alpium prope foeditatem superaverit. Vento mixtus imber cum ferretur in ipsa ora, primo, quia aut arma omittenda erant, aut contra enitentes
4 vertice intorti adfligebantur, constitere ; dein, cum iam spiritum includeret nec reciprocare animam
5 sineret, aversi a vento parumper consedere. Tum vero ingenti sono caelum strepere et inter horrendos fragores micare ignes ; capti[3] auribus et oculis metu
6 omnes torpere ; tandem effuso imbre, cum eo magis accensa vis venti esset, ipso illo quo deprensi erant
7 loco castra ponere necessarium visum est. Id vero laboris velut de integro initium fuit: nam nec explicare quicquam nec statuere poterant, nec quod statutum esset manebat, omnia perscindente vento

[1] omne Luchs: omnes P: omnis ς.
[2] longi inde temporis Gronovius: longis inde temporibus P.
[3] capti ς: captis P.

signal was suddenly given to the victors to sack the B.C. 218 town, as if they had taken it by storm. Nor was any cruelty omitted which historians generally deem worth noting on such an occasion; but every species of lust and outrage and inhuman insolence was visited upon the wretched inhabitants. Such were Hannibal's winter expeditions.

LVIII. For no long time thereafter, while the cold B.C. 217 was still unbearable, he allowed his men to rest, and on the first doubtful signs of spring broke up his winter quarters and marched towards Etruria, with the object of drawing that nation also to his standards, either by force or with their own consent, as he had done with the Gauls and the Ligurians. In attempting to cross the Apennines he was assailed by a storm so terrible as almost to surpass the horrors of the Alps. With the wind and rain blowing full in their faces, at first—because they must either have dropped their arms or else, if they struggled against it, be caught by the hurricane and hurled to the ground—they halted; then, when it actually stopped their breath and would not allow them to respire, they turned their backs on the gale and for a time huddled together on the ground. And now the heavens resounded with a frightful tumult, and between the terrific crashes the lightning flashed. Deafened and blinded, they were all stunned with fear. At length the downpour ceased, but the wind only blew the more furiously, and there seemed to be nothing to do but to pitch camp on the very spot where they had been caught. This, however, was but a fresh beginning of their troubles, for they could neither spread nor set up a tent, nor, once set up, would it stay in place, for the wind rent

A.U.C. 537

8 et rapiente; et mox aqua levata vento cum super gelida montium iuga concreta esset, tantum nivosae grandinis deiecit ut omnibus omissis procumberent homines tegminibus suis magis obruti quam tecti;
9 tantaque vis frigoris insecuta est ut ex illa miserabili hominum iumentorumque strage cum se quisque attollere ac levare vellet, diu nequiret, quia torpentibus rigore nervis vix[1] flectere artus poterant.
10 Deinde, ut tandem agitando sese movere ac recepere[2] animos et raris locis ignis fieri est coeptus, ad alienam opem quisque inops tendere. Biduum eo
11 loco velut obsessi mansere. Multi homines, multa iumenta, elephanti quoque ex iis qui proelio ad Trebiam facto superfuerant septem absumpti.

LIX. Degressus[3] Appennino retro ad Placentiam castra movit et ad decem milia progressus consedit. Postero die duodecim milia peditum quinque equitum
2 adversus hostem ducit; nec Sempronius consul—iam enim redierat ab Roma—detrectavit certamen. Atque eo die tria milia passuum inter bina castra
3 fuere; postero die ingentibus animis vario eventu pugnatum est. Primo concursu adeo res Romana superior fuit ut non acie vincerent solum sed pulsos hostes in castra persequerentur, mox castra quoque
4 oppugnarent. Hannibal paucis propugnatoribus in

[1] vix ς: suis P. [2] recepere ς (Rossbach): recipere P. [3] degressus ς: digressus P.

everything to shreds and swept it away; and when B.C. 217 presently the moisture taken up by the wind had been congealed over the cold mountain ridges, it descended in such a storm of sleet that the men let go of everything and threw themselves on their faces on the ground, overwhelmed by their shelters rather than protected by them; and the cold that ensued was so severe that when anyone sought to rise and lift himself from out that pitiful heap of men and beasts, for a long time he would be unable, because his sinews were so stiff and tense that he could hardly bend his joints. Afterwards, when at last by exerting themselves they had recovered the power of motion and regained their courage, and had begun here and there to kindle fires, each, in his helplessness, applied to someone else for help. For two days they remained on that spot as if beleaguered. Many men and many horses perished, and seven of the elephants that had survived the battle on the Trebia.

LIX. Descending from the Apennines, Hannibal turned back once more towards Placentia, and after marching about ten miles went into camp. The next day he advanced against the enemy with twelve thousand foot and five thousand horse. Nor did the consul Sempronius, who had now returned from Rome, decline the combat. That day there were only three miles between the two encampments. On the following day they fought, with great spirit and with shifting fortunes. At the first encounter the Romans had so far the best of it that not only were they victorious in the battle, but they pursued the beaten enemy to his camp, and were soon attacking the camp itself. Hannibal stationed vallo portisque positis ceteros confertos in media castra recepit intentosque signum ad erumpendum exspectare iubet. Iam nona ferme diei hora erat, cum Romanus nequiquam fatigato milite, postquam nulla spes erat potiundi castris, signum receptui dedit. Quod ubi Hannibal accepit laxatamque pugnam et recessum a castris vidit, extemplo equitibus dextra laevaque emissis in hostem ipse cum peditum robore mediis [1] castris erupit. Pugna raro magis ulla saeva aut [2] utriusque partis pernicie clarior fuisset, si extendi eam dies in longum spatium sivisset; [3] nox accensum ingentibus animis proelium diremit. Itaque acrior concursus fuit quam caedes, et sicut aequata ferme pugna erat, ita clade pari discessum est. Ab neutra parte sescentis plus peditibus et dimidium eius equitum cecidit; sed maior Romanis quam pro numero iactura fuit, quia equestris ordinis aliquot et tribuni militum quinque et praefecti sociorum tres sunt interfecti. Secundum eam pugnam Hannibal in Ligures, Sempronius Lucam concessit. Venienti in Ligures Hannibali per insidias intercepti duo quaestores Romani, C. Fulvius et L. Lucretius, cum duobus tribunis militum et quinque equestris ordinis, senatorum

A.U.C. 537

[1] robore mediis Lipsius: roborē | diis P^1: roborē | de his P^2.

[2] saeva aut Hertz: aeaut P: saeva et Valla.

[3] sivisset ς: uisset P^1: quiuisset P^2: sisset Gronovius.

[1] Approximately three o'clock in the afternoon.

a few defenders on the rampart and at the gates B.C. 217 and received the rest in a crowded throng within the enclosure, where he bade them watch intently for the signal to sally forth. It was now about the ninth hour of the day,[1] when the Roman general, who had worn out his men to no avail and saw no prospect of capturing the camp, bade sound the recall. When Hannibal heard this and perceived that the fighting had grown lax and that the enemy had retired from his rampart, he suddenly sent his cavalry against them from the right and left and rushed out himself with the strength of his infantry from the centre of the camp. Seldom has there been a fiercer battle or one more notable for the losses on both sides than this would have been, had the light permitted it to be prolonged; but darkness put an end to a conflict which had been begun with the greatest ardour. The fury of the combatants was consequently greater than the carnage, and as the battle was practically a drawn one, so were the losses equal when the opposing forces separated. On neither side had more than six hundred of the infantry fallen or half as many of the cavalry; but the loss of the Romans was out of proportion to the number slain, for it included several knights, five tribunes of the soldiers, and three praefects of the allies. After this engagement Hannibal retired into Liguria and Sempronius to Luca. The Ligurians had ambushed and made prisoners of two Roman quaestors, Gaius Fulvius and Lucius Lucretius, with two tribunes of the soldiers and five members of the equestrian order—mostly sons of senators. These men they handed over to Hannibal on his coming among them, as a

A.U.C. 537 ferme liberis, quo magis ratam fore cum iis pacem societatemque crederet, traduntur.

A.U.C. 536 LX. Dum haec in Italia geruntur, Cn. Cornelius 2 Scipio in Hispaniam cum classe et exercitu missus cum ab ostio Rhodani profectus Pyrenaeosque montes circumvectus Emporias[1] adpulisset classem, 3 exposito ibi exercitu orsus a Laeetanis[2] omnem oram usque ad Hiberum flumen partim renovandis societatibus, partim novis instituendis, Romanae 4 dicionis fecit. Inde conciliata clementiae iustitiaeque[3] fama non ad maritimos modo populos sed in mediterraneis quoque ac montanis ad ferociores iam gentes valuit; nec pax modo apud eos sed societas etiam armorum parta[4] est, validaeque aliquot auxiliorum cohortes ex iis conscriptae sunt. 5 Hannonis cis Hiberum provincia erat; eum relinquerat Hannibal ad regionis eius praesidium. Itaque, priusquam alienarentur omnia, obviam eundum ratus castris in conspectu hostium positis in aciem 6 eduxit. Nec Romano differendum certamen visum, quippe qui sciret cum Hannone et Hasdrubale sibi dimicandum esse malletque adversus singulos separatim quam adversus duos simul rem gerere. 7 Nec magni certaminis ea dimicatio fuit. Sex milia

[1] Emporias Luchs: temporis P: emporiis ς.
[2] Laeetanis Huebner: lacetanis P.
[3] clementiae iustitiaeque Weissenborn: clementiaeque P: clementiae Madvig.
[4] parta ς: parata P.

[1] For the events recorded in this chapter Livy is thought to have drawn upon some late and worthless annalist. That the Romans should have been able, so soon after their discomfiture on the Trebia, to hold their own in open battle—and a battle too where cavalry cut so large a figure—is improbable, to say the least. Polybius says nothing of any further earnest of their peaceful and friendly disposition towards him.[1] B.C. 217

LX. Whilst these things were going on in Italy, Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio, who had been sent out to Spain with a fleet and an army, had set sail from the mouth of the Rhone and passing the Pyrenees had put into Emporiae. Landing his army there and beginning with the Laeetani, he had brought all that coast, as far as the river Ebro, under Roman sway, partly by renewing old alliances and partly by forming new ones. The reputation which he there acquired for clemency and justice availed not only with the maritime tribes, but also with the more warlike clans inhabiting the interior and the mountainous parts; so that he was able not only to establish peaceful relations but even to conclude a military alliance with them, and several strong cohorts of auxiliaries were raised there. B.C. 218

North of the Ebro Hanno was the Carthaginian commander, for Hannibal had left him there to defend that region. Feeling, therefore, that something ought to be done, before everything was lost to Carthage, he pitched his camp in sight of the enemy and offered battle. The Roman general saw no reason to put off the engagement; he knew that he must fight with Hanno and Hasdrubal, and chose rather to deal with them separately than both at once. Neither was the battle very difficult to win. Six thousand of the enemy were killed and such operations, nor of the march to Luca, which contradicts Livy's own statement, at chap. lxiii. § 1, that the army of Sempronius wintered at Placentia (see also chap. lxiii. § 15). The whole question is discussed by De Sanctis, pp. 186 f. Cf. too the notes in Weissenborn–Mueller–Rossbach.

A.U.C. 536

hostium caesa, duo capta cum praesidio castrorum; nam et castra expugnata sunt atque ipse dux cum 8 aliquot principibus capiuntur, et Cissis,[1] propinquum castris oppidum, expugnatur. Ceterum praeda oppidi parvi pretii rerum fuit, supellex barbarica
9 ac vilium mancipiorum; castra militem ditavere non eius modo exercitus qui victus erat sed et eius qui cum Hannibale in Italia militabat omnibus fere caris rebus, ne gravia impedimenta ferentibus essent, citra Pyrenaeum relictis.

LXI. Priusquam certa huius cladis fama accideret, transgressus Hiberum Hasdrubal cum octo milibus peditum, mille equitum, tamquam ad primum adventum Romanorum occursurus, postquam perditas res ad Cissim amissaque castra accepit, iter
2 ad mare convertit. Haud procul Tarracone classicos milites navalesque socios vagos palantesque per agros, quod ferme fit ut secundae res neglegentiam creent, equite passim dimisso cum magna caede,
3 maiore fuga ad naves compellit. Nec diutius circa ea loca morari ausus, ne ab Scipione opprimeretur,
4 trans Hiberum sese recepit. Et Scipio raptim ad famam novorum hostium agmine acto, cum in paucos praefectos navium[2] animadvertisset, praesidio Tarracone modico relicto Emporias cum classe rediit.

[1] Cissis Alschefski: scissis P.
[2] navium Gronovius: pauiu P^1: paulum P^2: palam Lipsius.

---

[1] Later (under Augustus) made the capital of the Roman province of Tarraconensis. There are still in existence remains of Iberian walls and of the Roman citadel, circus, amphitheatre, and water-system.

two thousand captured, together with the garrison of the camp—for this too was attacked and taken. The general himself and several chieftains were made prisoners, and Cissis, a town which stood near the camp, was carried by assault. The plunder of the town yielded objects of little worth—household belongings of barbarians and slaves of no great price—but the camp made the soldiers rich; for in it they found not only the valuables of the army that they had just defeated, but also those of the army that was now serving under Hannibal in Italy, for the men had left nearly all their treasures behind when they crossed the Pyrenees, so as not to burden themselves with heavy baggage on the march. B.C. 218

LXI. Hasdrubal had not yet received definite tidings of this disaster when he crossed the Ebro with eight thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry, as though to confront the Romans at their first arrival; but on learning of the catastrophe at Cissis and the loss of the camp, he turned and marched in the direction of the sea. Not far from Tarraco [1] he came upon the soldiers of the fleet and the naval allies, who were dispersed and wandering over the country-side, with the carelessness which usually attends success; and sending out his cavalry in all directions he drove them, with much slaughter and more confusion, to their ships. But not venturing to tarry longer in that region, lest Scipio should be down upon him, he retreated across the Ebro. Scipio, hearing of these new enemies, did indeed march thither with all speed; but after punishing a few of the ships' captains, he left a garrison of moderate size in Tarraco and returned with the

A.U.C. 536

5 Vixdum digresso eo Hasdrubal aderat et Ilergetum populo, qui obsides Scipioni dederat, ad defectionem impulso cum eorum ipsorum iuventute agros fidelium 6 Romanis sociorum vastat. Excito deinde Scipione hibernis toto cis[1] Hiberum rursus cedit agro. Scipio relictam ab auctore defectionis Ilergetum gentem cum infesto exercitu invasisset, compulsis omnibus Atanagrum urbem, quae caput eius populi erat, 7 circumsedit intraque dies paucos pluribus quam ante obsidibus imperatis Ilergetes pecunia etiam 8 multatos in ius dicionemque recepit. Inde in Ausetanos prope Hiberum, socios et ipsos Poenorum, procedit atque urbe eorum obsessa Lacetanos auxilium finitimis ferentes nocte haud procul iam 9 urbe, cum intrare vellent, excepit insidiis; caesa ad duodecim milia.[2] Exuti prope omnes armis domos passim palantes per agros diffugere. Nec obsessos alia ulla res quam iniqua oppugnantibus 10 hiems tutabatur. Triginta dies obsidio fuit, per quos raro unquam nix minus quattuor pedes alta iacuit; adeoque pluteos ac vineas Romanorum operuerat ut ea sola ignibus aliquotiens coniectis 11 ab hoste etiam tutamentum fuerit. Postremo, cum Amusicus princeps eorum ad Hasdrubalem pro-

[1] toto cis ς: stoi/cosis P: hostico cis Sabellicus and Stroth.

[2] ad duodecim milia ς: ad XII. P^1: anxii P^2.

---

[1] Site unknown: perhaps not far from Ilerda (Lerida) on the Sicoris.

fleet to Emporiae. No sooner was he gone than B.C. 218
Hasdrubal appeared, and inciting the Ilergetes, who had given Scipio hostages, to revolt, he used the young men of this very tribe to lay waste the fields of the allies who were faithful to the Romans. But this having roused Scipio from his winter quarters, he retreated again and abandoned all the territory north of the Ebro. Scipio invaded the country of the Ilergetes—left thus in the lurch by the instigator of their revolt—with fire and sword, and driving them all into the city of Atanagrus,[1] the capital of that nation, laid siege to them. Within a few days he had exacted more hostages of them than before, and mulcting them also in a sum of money, had received them under his authority and rule. Thence he marched against the Ausetani, near the Ebro, who were likewise allies of the Phoenicians; and besieging their city, laid an ambush for the Lacetani, as they were bringing assistance to their neighbours, and fell upon them in the night, not far from the city, when they would have entered it. The slain amounted to about twelve thousand; almost all the others lost their arms, and scattering over the fields in all directions, fled to their homes. As for the besieged, nothing could have saved them but a winter that was most unfavourable to the besiegers. The blockade lasted thirty days, during which time the snow rarely lay less than four feet deep, and so completely had it covered the mantlets and pent-houses of the Romans that this alone was sufficient to protect them from the firebrands that were several times discharged upon them by the enemy. Finally, when their chief Amusicus had fled and taken refuge with Hasdrubal,

A.U.C. 536 fugisset, viginti argenti talentis pacti deduntur. Tarraconem in hiberna reditum est.

LXII. Romae aut circa urbem multa ea hieme prodigia facta aut, quod evenire solet motis semel in religionem[1] animis, multa nuntiata et temere credita
2 sunt; in quis ingenuum infantem semestrem in
3 foro olitorio triumphum clamasse, et in foro[2] boario bovem in tertiam contignationem sua sponte escendisse atque inde tumultu habitatorum territum
4 sese deiecisse, et navium speciem de caelo adfulsisse, et aedem Spei, quae est in foro olitorio, fulmine ictam, et Lanuvi hostiam[3] se commovisse et corvum in aedem Iunonis devolasse atque in ipso pulvinario
5 consedisse, et in agro Amiternino multis locis hominum species procul candida veste visas nec cum ullo congressas,[4] et in Piceno lapidibus pluvisse, et Caere sortes extenuatas, et in Gallia lupum vigili
6 gladium ex vagina raptum abstulisse. Ob cetera prodigia libros adire decemviri iussi; quod autem

[1] religionem edd.: regionem P.

[2] in foro ς: e (ex H. J. Mueller) foro Luterbacher: foro P.

[3] hostiam P (Rossbach's note): hastam Sabellicus.

[4] species . . . visas nec cum ullo congressas Ruperti: species . . . uisas nec cum ullo congressos ς: specie . . . uisos nec cum illis congressos P.

---

[1] Polybius knows nothing of the events recounted in §§ 5–11, but makes Scipio retire for the winter to Emporiae and Hasdrubal to Tarraco, at the conclusion of the campaign described by Livy in §§ 1–4. The source which Livy used for the latter part of the chapter was perhaps a Greek writer whose account of Hasdrubal's offensive was so different from that of Polybius that Livy thought that they related to two distinct campaigns. It is possible that Livy's immediate source in §§ 5–11 was Coelius and that the dis-they made terms and surrendered, agreeing to pay B.C. 218 twenty talents of silver. The Romans returned to Tarraco and went into winter quarters.[1]

LXII. In Rome or near it many prodigies occurred that winter, or—as often happens when men's thoughts are once turned upon religion—many were reported and too easily credited. Some of these portents were: that a free-born infant of six months had cried "Triumph!" in the provision market; that in the cattle market an ox had climbed, of its own accord, to the third storey of a house and then, alarmed by the outcry of the occupants, had thrown itself down; that phantom ships had been seen gleaming in the sky; that the temple of Hope, in the provision market, had been struck by lightning; that in Lanuvium a slain victim had stirred, and a raven had flown down into Juno's temple and alighted on her very couch; that in the district of Amiternum, in many places, apparitions of men in shining raiment had appeared in the distance, but had not drawn near to anyone; that in the Picentian country there had been a shower of pebbles; that at Caere the lots had shrunk;[2] that in Gaul a wolf had snatched a sentry's sword from its scabbard and run off with it. For the other prodigies the decemviri were commanded to consult the Books,[3] but for comfiture of the Lacetani is an embellishment of the story due to the latter's patriotic inventiveness. See De Sanctis, pp. 184, 185.

[2] The lots were inscribed on little wooden or bronze tablets; they are also associated with Praeneste, Falerii, and Patavium.

[3] The Sibylline Books were wont to be consulted (but only on the express command of the senate) as to the meaning and proper expiation of portents.

A.U.C. 536 lapidibus pluvisset in Piceno, novemdiale sacrum edictum; et subinde aliis procurandis prope tota 7 civitas operata fuit. Iam primum omnium urbs lustrata est, hostiaeque maiores quibus editum est 8 dis caesae, et donum ex auri pondo quadraginta Lanuvium Iunoni[1] portatum est, et signum aeneum matronae Iunoni in Aventino dedicaverunt, et lectisternium Caere, ubi sortes adtenuatae erant, imperatum, et supplicatio Fortunae in Algido; 9 Romae quoque et lectisternium Iuventati[2] et supplicatio ad aedem Herculis nominatim, deinde universo populo circa omnia pulvinaria indicta, et 10 Genio maiores hostiae caesae quinque, et C. Atilius Serranus praetor vota suscipere iussus, si in decem 11 annos res publica eodem stetisset statu. Haec procurata votaque ex libris Sibyllinis magna ex parte levaverant religione animos.

A.U.C. 537 LXIII. Consulum designatorum alter Flaminius, cui eae legiones quae Placentiae hibernabant sorte evenerant, edictum et litteras ad consulem misit, ut is exercitus idibus Martiis Arimini adesset in castris. 2 Hic in provincia consulatum inire consilium erat memori veterum certaminum cum patribus, quae tribunus plebis et quae postea consul, prius de con-

[1] Iunoni ς: et iuononi P: ad Iunonis Gronovius.
[2] Iuventati P: iuuentuti ς (Madvig).

---

[1] A lectisternium (for the first one in 399 B.C. see I. xiii. 6) was a banquet tendered to the gods, at which their images were placed on couches (pulvinaria). Juventas is here associated with Hercules, as was Hebe in Greece.

[2] In the year 232 B.C. he had carried a law in the Comitia Tributa providing that certain Picentine and Gallic lands should be divided among the poorer citizens.

the shower of pebbles in the Picentian country a nine days' sacrifice was proclaimed. They then set about the expiation of the other portents, and in this virtually all the citizens bore a part. First of all, the city was purified, and major victims were offered up to the designated gods; a gift of gold weighing forty pounds was carried to Lanuvium for Juno, and a bronze statue was dedicated to Juno, by the matrons, on the Aventine; a lectisternium was ordered at Caere, where the lots had shrunk; and a supplication was ordered to be made to Fortune on Mount Algidus; in Rome, too, a lectisternium was specially appointed for Juventas, and a supplication at the temple of Hercules, and later the entire people was commanded to observe this rite at all the pulvinaria;[1] also five major victims were slain in honour of the Genius of the Roman People; and Gaius Atilius Serranus the praetor was ordered to make a vow, "if the commonwealth should abide for ten years in its present state." The making of these vows and expiations, as prescribed by the Sibylline Books, went far to alleviate men's anxiety concerning their relations with the gods. B.C. 218

LXIII. Of the consuls designate, Flaminius, to whom the legions wintering at Placentia had been assigned by lot, dispatched an edict and a letter to the consul, commanding that these troops should be ready in the camp at Ariminum on the Ides of March. It was here, in his province, that he designed to enter on the consulship, for he remembered his former controversies with the senators, which he had waged when a tribune of the plebs,[2] and later as consul—in the first place about his B.C. 217

A.U.C. 537 sulatu, qui abrogabatur, dein de triumpho habuerat. 3 Invisus etiam patribus[1] ob novam legem, quam Q. Claudius tribunus plebis adversus senatum[2] atque uno patrum adiuvante C. Flaminio tulerat, ne quis senator cuive senator pater fuisset maritimam navem quae plus quam trecentarum amphorarum esset 4 haberet—id satis habitum ad fructus ex agris vectandos, quaestus omnis patribus indecorus visus. Res per summam contentionem acta invidiam apud nobilitatem suasori legis Flaminio, favorem apud 5 plebem alterumque inde consulatum peperit. Ob haec ratus auspiciis ementiendis Latinarumque feriarum mora et consularibus aliis impedimentis retenturos se in urbe, simulato itinere privatus clam 6 in provinciam abiit. Ea res ubi palam facta est, novam insuper iram infestis iam ante patribus movit: non cum senatu modo, sed iam cum dis immortalibus 7 C. Flaminium bellum gerere. Consulem ante inauspicato factum revocantibus ex ipsa acie dis atque

[1] patribus P: patribus erat (or erat patribus) H. J. Mueller.

[2] adversus senatum P: aduerso senatu Gronovius.

---

[1] In 223 B.C. the senate commanded the consuls Furius and Flaminius, who had marched against the Insubrian Gauls, to return to Rome and resign their magistracies, on the ground that unfavourable auguries had been reported. But Flaminius refused to return, fought and won a battle, and triumphed in the face of senatorial opposition—by virtue of a decree of the people.

[2] The amphora—a wine-jar with two handles—was standardized as a liquid measure roughly equal to six gallons. In our terminology such a vessel would be described as of about seven tons burden.

[3] The new consuls were required to fix the date of the Feriae Latinae, at the first session of the senate after their consulship, which they tried to annul, and again B.C. 217 concerning his triumph.[1] He was also hated by the senators on account of an unprecedented law which Quintus Claudius the tribune of the plebs had introduced, despite the opposition of the senate, with the backing of Gaius Flaminius alone of all that body, providing that no senator or senator's son should own a sea-going ship of more than three hundred amphoras burden[2]—this was reckoned to be sufficient to transport the crops from one's fields, and all money-making was held unseemly in a senator. The measure, which was vehemently opposed, had been productive of great resentment on the part of the nobles against Flaminius, who had advocated its enactment; but had procured for him the favour of the plebs and afterwards a second consulship. Believing, therefore, that his enemies would falsify the auspices and make use of the Latin Festival[3] and other means of hindering a consul, to detain him in the City, he pretended that he had to take a journey, and departing, as a private citizen, slipped away secretly to his province. This behaviour, when the truth came out, aroused fresh indignation in the breasts of the already hostile senators: Gaius Flaminius, they said, was waging war not only with the senate, but this time with the immortal gods. He had formerly been made consul without the confirmation of the auspices, and, though both gods and men had sought to recall him from the very battle-line, he entering upon office, and they might not take the field for the summer's campaign before they had duly presided over the sacrifice to Jupiter Latiaris, which was the essential feature of the celebration.

A.U.C. 537

hominibus non paruisse; nunc conscientia spretorum et Capitolium et sollemnem votorum nuncupationem
8 fugisse, ne die initi magistratus Iovis optimi maximi templum adiret, ne senatum invisus ipse[1] et sibi uni invisum videret consuleretque, ne Latinas indiceret Iovique Latiari sollemne sacrum in monte faceret,
9 ne auspicato profectus in Capitolium ad vota nuncupanda paludatus[2] inde cum lictoribus in provinciam iret; lixae modo sine insignibus, sine lictoribus profectum clam, furtim, haud aliter quam si exsilii causa
10 solum vertisset; magis pro maiestate videlicet imperii Arimini quam Romae magistratum initurum et in deversorio hospitali quam apud penates suos
11 praetextam sumpturum. Revocandum universi retrahendumque censuerunt et cogendum omnibus prius praesentem in deos hominesque fungi officiis,
12 quam ad exercitum et in provinciam iret. In eam legationem—legatos enim mitti placuit—Q. Terentius et M. Antistius profecti nihilo magis eum moverunt quam priore consulatu litterae moverant 13 ab senatu missae. Paucos post dies magistratum iniit, immolantique ei vitulus iam ictus e manibus sacrificantium sese cum proripuisset, multos circum-
14 stantes cruore respersit; fuga procul etiam maior

[1] ipse ς: ipsi P.
[2] paludatus ς: paludatis P.

[1] The paludamentum, typifying military imperium, might be assumed by the consul on leaving the City, the toga praetexta, white with a purple border, was worn by the consul while in Rome.

had not obeyed; now, conscious of having spurned B.C. 217 them, he had fled the Capitol and the vows that were regularly undertaken, that he might not, on the day of entering upon his office, approach the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus; that he might not see and consult the senate, which hated him and which he alone of all men hated; that he might not proclaim the Latin Festival and offer the accustomed sacrifice to Jupiter Latiaris on the Alban Mount; that he might not, after receiving auspices, go up to the Capitol to make his vows, and thence proceed, in the general's cloak[1] and accompanied by lictors, to his province; like some camp-follower, without insignia and without lictors, he had set out in secret and by stealth, precisely as though going into exile; he thought, forsooth, that it was more in keeping with the dignity of his high command to begin his magistracy in Ariminum than in Rome—to assume the purple-bordered toga[1] in an inn than in the presence of his household gods! With one accord they voted to recall him and drag him back and compel him to discharge in person all his obligations to gods and men, before he went to his army and his province. On this commission—for commissioners they resolved to dispatch—Quintus Terentius and Marcus Antistius set forth, but moved Flaminius no more than the letter sent him by the senate had moved him in his former consulship. A few days later he entered on his magistracy, and as he was offering up a calf, it escaped—after being struck—out of the hands of those who would have sacrificed it, and spattered many of the bystanders with its blood. The dismay and confusion

A.U.C. 537 apud ignaros quid trepidaretur et concursatio fuit. Id a plerisque in omen magni terroris acceptum. Legionibus inde duabus a Sempronio, prioris anni consule, duabus a C. Atilio praetore acceptis in Etruriam per Appennini tramites exercitus duci est coeptus.

[1] This dreadful omen is not mentioned by Polybius and looks like an invention of the aristocratic opponents of Flaminius. Livy perhaps found the story in Coelius.

were even greater among those who stood farther off and knew not what was occasioning the panic. By most people it was regarded as an omen of great terror.[1] After this the army comprising the two legions received from Sempronius, the consul of the year before, and the two taken over from Gaius Atilius the praetor, began its march into Etruria through the passes of the Apennines. B.C. 217

LIBRI XXI PERIOCHA

Belli Punici secundi ortum[1] narrat et Hannibalis, ducis Poenorum, contra foedus per Hiberum flumen transitum. A quo Saguntini, sociorum populi Romani,[2] civitas obsessa, octavo mense capta est. De quibus iniuriis missi legati ad Carthaginienses, qui quererentur. Cum satisfacere nollent, bellum his indictum est. Hannibal superato Pyrenaeo saltu per Gallias fusis Volcis,[3] qui obsistere conati erant ei, ad Alpes venit et laborioso per eas transitu, cum montanos quoque Gallos obvios aliquot proeliis reppulisset, descendit in Italiam et ad Ticinum flumen Romanos equestri proelio fudit. In quo vulneratum P. Cornelium Scipionem protexit filius, qui Africani postea nomen accepit. Iterumque exercitu Romano ad flumen Trebiam fuso Hannibal Appenninum quoque permagna vexatione[4] militum propter vim tempestatium transiit. Cn. Cornelius Scipio[5] in Hispania contra Poenos prospere pugnavit duce hostium Magone capto.

[1] ortum ς : actum MSS.

[2] sociorum populi Romani ed. prin. (Liv. xxi. vi. 4) : populi Romani MSS.

[3] Volcis Sigonius : uulscis MSS.

[4] permagna vexatione O. Jahn : per magnam uexationem MSS.

[5] Cn. Cornelius Scipio ς : c. cornelius scipio MSS.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXI

In this book is described the beginning of the Second Punic War, and how Hannibal, the general of the Phoenicians, crossed the river Ebro in violation of the treaty. Besieging Saguntum, a city belonging to allies of the Roman People, he captured it in the eighth month. These injuries led to the dispatch of ambassadors to the Carthaginians, to complain. On their refusing satisfaction, war was declared against Carthage. Hannibal, after surmounting the passes of the Pyrenees, traversed Gaul—having routed the Volcae, who had attempted to stop him—and arrived at the Alps. After a troublesome passage of these mountains, in the course of which he also defeated in several battles the Gallic mountaineers, when they blocked his way, he descended into Italy and routed the Romans in a cavalry battle near the river Ticinus. In this battle Publius Cornelius Scipio was wounded and was saved by his son, who later received the name of Africanus. Again a Roman army was routed near the river Trebia. After this Hannibal crossed the Apennines, with great distress to his soldiers, because of violent storms. In Spain Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio fought successfully against the Phoenicians and captured the enemy's general, Mago.[1] [1] This name is a mistake (found also in Orosius, IV. xiv. 9) for Hanno (chap. lx. § 4).

BOOK XXII

LIBER XXII

A.U.C. 537

I. Iam ver adpetebat; itaque[1] Hannibal ex hibernis movit, et nequiquam[2] ante conatus transcendere Appenninum intolerandis frigoribus et cum
2 ingenti periculo moratus ac metu. Galli, quos praedae populationumque conciverat spes, postquam pro eo ut ipsi ex alieno agro raperent agerentque, suas terras sedem belli esse premique utriusque partis exercituum hibernis videre,[3] verterunt retro
3 in Hannibalem[4] ab Romanis odia; petitusque saepe principum insidiis, ipsorum inter se fraude eadem levitate qua consenserant consensum indicantium servatus erat, et mutando nunc vestem nunc tegumenta capitis errore etiam sese ab insidiis munierat.
4 Ceterum hic quoque ei timor causa fuit maturius movendi ex hibernis.

Per idem tempus Cn. Servilius consul Romae
5 idibus Martiis magistratum iniit. Ibi cum de re publica rettulisset, redintegrata in C. Flaminium

[1] adpetebat; itaque Woelfflin: adpetebatque P.
[2] nequiquam (nequicquam) Valla: neque eo qui iam P.
[3] videre Alschefski: uiderent P.
[4] in Hannibalem ς: hannibalem P.

[1] Polybius says that "he had a number of wigs made, dyed to suit the appearance of persons differing widely in age, and kept constantly changing them, and at the same time also dressing in a style suited to the wig, so that not only those who had seen him but for a moment, but even his familiars, found difficulty in recognizing him" (III.

BOOK XXII

I. Spring was now drawing on, and accordingly B.C. 217
Hannibal moved out of his winter encampment. He had tried before this to cross the Apennines, but had failed because of the intolerable cold. And the delay had been attended with the greatest danger and anxiety; for when the Gauls, whom the hope of spoil and pillage had excited to revolt, perceived that instead of harrying and plundering the fields of others, their own lands were the seat of war and were burdened with the winter quarters of both armies, they turned their hatred back again from the Romans upon Hannibal. But though their leaders laid many a plot against him, their treachery to one another saved him, for they gave him information of these conspiracies with the same inconstancy with which they had conspired. Moreover, changing now his dress and now his headgear,[1] he protected himself against their plots by the uncertainty which this gave rise to. Still, the fear of such plots was another reason for quitting his winter quarters early.

About the same time, on the Ides of March, Gnaeus Servilius entered on his consulship at Rome. On his then referring the state of the nation to the senate for discussion, their anger at Gaius Flaminius xxxviii, Paton's Trans.). Livy prefers ambiguity to the use of a technical or undignified word.

A.U.C. 537

invidia est: duos se consules creasse, unum habere; quod enim illi iustum imperium, quod auspicium
6 esse?[1] Magistratus id a domo, publicis privatisque penatibus, Latinis feriis actis, sacrificio in monte perfecto, votis rite in Capitolio nuncupatis secum
7 ferre; nec privatum auspicia sequi, nec sine auspiciis profectum in externo ea solo nova atque integra concipere posse.

8 Augebant metum prodigia ex pluribus simul locis nuntiata: in Sicilia militibus aliquot spicula, in Sardinia autem in muro circumeunti vigilias equiti scipionem quem manu tenuerat[2] arsisse, et litora crebris ignibus fulsisse, et scuta duo sanguine sudasse,
9 et milites quosdam ictos fulminibus, et solis orbem minui visum, et Praeneste ardentes lapides caelo cecidisse, et Arpis parmas in caelo visas pugnan-
10 temque cum luna solem, et Capenae duas interdiu lunas ortas, et aquas Caeretes sanguine mixtas fluxisse fontemque ipsum Herculis cruentis manasse respersum maculis, et Antii[3] metentibus cruentas
11 in corbem spicas cecidisse, et Faleriis caelum findi velut magno hiatu visum, quaque patuerit ingens lumen effulsisse; sortes adtenuatas unamque sua

[1] esse ς: esset P. [2] tenuerat P: tenuerit Ruperti.
[3] Antii ς: in Antii P: in Antiati (-te) Gronovius.

[1] The enemies of Flaminius argued that he was not, in fact, a consul, for, though elected to that office, he had not been duly inaugurated in Rome, but had left the City before taking the auspices. It would not be possible for him to repair the omission in camp, since even a consul who had set out after receiving the auspices was required, in case it was afterwards discovered that there had been some flaw in them, to return to Rome and renew them there, and it followed, a fortiori, that no one could take them in the first instance—nova atque integra—anywhere else.

was renewed. They had chosen two consuls, they said, B.C. 217 but had only one; for what proper authority or right of auspices did Flaminius possess? Magistrates, they urged, carried with them this prerogative when they set out from home—from their own and the nation's hearth—after celebrating the Latin Festival, sacrificing on the Alban Mount and duly offering up their vows on the Capitol; but a private citizen could neither take the auspices with him, nor, if he had left Rome without them, receive them new from the beginning on foreign soil.[1]

Men's fears were augmented by the prodigies reported simultaneously from many places: that in Sicily the javelins of several soldiers had taken fire, and that in Sardinia, as a horseman was making the round of the night-watch, the same thing had happened to the truncheon which he held in his hand; that many fires had blazed up on the shore; that two shields had sweated blood; that certain soldiers had been struck with lightning; that the sun's disk had seemed to be contracted; that glowing stones had fallen from the sky at Praeneste; that at Arpi bucklers had appeared in the sky and the sun had seemed to be fighting with the moon; that at Capena two moons had risen in the daytime; that the waters of Caere had flowed mixed with blood, and that bloodstains had appeared in the water that trickled from the spring of Hercules itself; that at Antium, when some men were reaping, bloody ears of corn had fallen into their basket; that at Falerii the sky had seemed to be rent as it were with a great fissure, and through the opening a bright light had shone; and that lots[2] had shrunk

[2] See note on p. 185.

A.U.C. 537 sponte excidisse[1] ita scriptam: "Mavors telum suum
12 concutit;" et per idem tempus Romae signum Martis Appia via ac simulacra luporum sudasse, et Capuae speciem caeli ardentis fuisse lunaeque[2] inter 13 imbrem cadentis. Inde minoribus etiam dictu prodigiis fides habita: capras lanatas quibusdam factas, et gallinam in marem, gallum in feminam sese vertisse.
14 His sicut erant nuntiata expositis auctoribusque in curiam introductis consul de religione patres con-
15 suluit. Decretum ut ea prodigia partim maioribus hostiis, partim lactentibus procurarentur, et uti supplicatio per triduum ad omnia pulvinaria haberetur;
16 cetera, cum decemviri libros inspexissent, ut ita fierent quem ad modum cordi esse divis[3] e car-
17 minibus[4] praefarentur. Decemvirorum monitu decretum est Iovi primum donum fulmen aureum pondo quinquaginta fieret et Iunoni[5] Minervaeque ex argento dona darentur et Iunoni reginae in Aventino Iunonique Sospitae Lanuvii maioribus
18 hostiis sacrificaretur matronaeque pecunia conlata, quantum conferre cuique commodum esset, donum Iunoni reginae in Aventinum ferrent lectisterniumque fieret,[6] et ut libertinae et ipsae, unde Feroniae

[1] sortes adtenuatas unamque sua sponte excidisse Fleckeisen: sortes sua sponte adtenuatas, etc., P.
[2] lunaeque P: lanaeque Drakenborch.
[3] esse divis ς: esset diuinis P.
[4] e carminibus Madvig: carminibus P.
[5] et Iunoni Woelfflin: iunoni P.
[6] fieret C^2: fieretque PC^1.

---

[1] The archaic form of Mars.
[2] i.e. the Greek hexameters of the Sibylline Books, of which the decemviri sacris faciundis were custodians and interpreters.
[3] See note on p. 186.

and that one had fallen out without being touched, B.C. 217 on which was written, "Mavors[1] brandishes his spear;" that in Rome, about the same time, the statue of Mars on the Appian Way and the images of the wolves had sweated; that at Capua there had been the appearance of a sky on fire and of a moon that fell in the midst of a shower of rain. Afterwards less memorable prodigies were also given credence: that certain folk had found their goats to have got woolly fleeces; that a hen had changed into a cock and a cock into a hen.

When the consul had laid these reports before the senate exactly as they had come to him and had introduced into the House the men who vouched for their truth, he consulted the Fathers regarding their religious import. It was voted that these prodigies should be expiated, in part with greater, in part with lesser victims, and that a supplication should be held for three days at all the couches of the gods; as for the rest, when the decemvirs should have inspected the Books, such rites were to be observed as they should declare, in accordance with the sacred verses,[2] to be pleasing to the gods. Being so admonished by the decemvirs, they decreed that the first gift should be made to Jupiter, a golden thunderbolt weighing fifty pounds; and that Juno and Minerva should be given offerings of silver; that Juno Regina on the Aventine and Juno Sospita at Lanuvium should receive a sacrifice of greater victims, and that the matrons, each contributing as much as she could afford, should make up a sum of money and carry it as a gift to Juno Regina on the Aventine and there celebrate a lectisternium[3]; and that even the very freed-women

A.U.C. 537 donum daretur, pecuniam pro facultatibus suis conferrent.

19 Haec ubi facta, decemviri Ardeae in foro maioribus hostiis sacrificarunt. Postremo Decembri iam mense ad aedem Saturni Romae immolatum est lectisterniumque imperatum—eum[1] lectum senatores 20 straverunt—et convivium publicum, ac per urbem Saturnalia diem ac noctem clamata,[2] populusque eum diem festum habere ac servare in perpetuum iussus.

II. Dum consul placandis Romae dis habendoque[3] dilectu dat operam, Hannibal profectus ex hibernis, quia iam Flaminium consulem Arretium pervenisse[4] 2 fama erat, cum aliud longius ceterum commodius ostenderetur iter, propiorem viam per paludes petit, qua fluvius Arnus per eos dies solito magis inun- 3 daverat. Hispanos[5] et Afros et omne veterani robur exercitus[6] admixtis ipsorum impedimentis, necubi consistere coactis necessaria ad usus deessent, primos ire iussit, sequi Gallos, ut id agminis medium esset, 4 novissimos ire equites, Magonem inde cum expeditis Numidis cogere agmen, maxime Gallos, si taedio

[1] eum Madvig: et eum P.
[2] clamata Gronovius: clamatam P.
[3] dis habendoque ς: distrahendoque P.
[4] pervenisse ς: praeuenisse P.
[5] Hispanos Drakenborch: at spanos P.
[6] robur exercitus C: exercitus robur M: erat robur exercitus P.

---

[1] Feronia was an old Etruscan deity, whose cult was brought to Rome from Capena. A goddess of springs and groves, she was also the traditional patroness of freedwomen.

[2] It was usually carried out by the decemvirs mentioned in § 7.

[3] The Saturnalia had been established as an annual should contribute money, in proportion to their B.C. 217 abilities, for an offering to Feronia.[1]

These measures being taken, the decemvirs sacrificed at Ardea in the market-place with the greater victims. Finally—the month was now December—victims were slain at the temple of Saturn in Rome and a lectisternium was ordered—this time senators administered the rite[2]—and a public feast, and throughout the City for a day and a night "Saturnalia" was cried, and the people were bidden to keep that day as a holiday and observe it in perpetuity.[3]

II. While the consul was occupied at Rome in appeasing the gods and levying troops, Hannibal, who had left his winter quarters, heard that Flaminius, the other consul, had already arrived at Arretium; and so, though another route, longer, to be sure, but less difficult, was pointed out to him, he took the shorter, through the marshes, which the river Arno had lately flooded to an unusual extent. He ordered the Spaniards and the Africans and all the flower of his veteran army, taking their own baggage with them so as not to want the necessities of life wherever they might be forced to halt, to march in the van; the Gauls to follow them and form the centre of the column; and the cavalry to fall in behind. Mago and the Numidian light horse were to bring up the rear, their principal duty being to keep the Gauls in order, in case they should weary of the long and festival in connexion with the dedication of the temple of Saturn on December 19th, 497 B.C. (I. xxi. 2). Now the public feast was added to the former rites, and in course of time the festival was prolonged for several days.

A.U.C. 537 laboris longaeque viae, ut est mollis ad talia gens, dilaberentur aut subsisterent, cohibentem.

5 Primi, qua modo praeirent duces, per praealtas fluvii ac profundas voragines, hausti paene limo 6 immergentesque se, tamen signa sequebantur. Galli neque sustinere se prolapsi neque adsurgere ex voraginibus poterant neque aut[1] corpora animis aut 7 animos spe sustinebant; alii fessa aegre trahentes membra, alii, ubi semel victis taedio animis procubuissent, inter iumenta et ipsa iacentia passim morientes; maximeque omnium vigiliae conficiebant 8 per quadriduum iam et tres noctes toleratae. Cum omnia obtinentibus aquis nihil ubi in sicco fessa sternerent corpora inveniri posset, cumulatis in aqua[2] 9 sarcinis insuper incumbebant, aut iumentorum[3] itinere toto prostratorum passim acervi, tantum quod exstaret aqua quaerentibus ad quietem parvi temporis, necessarium cubile dabant.

10 Ipse Hannibal, aeger oculis ex verna primum intemperie variante calores frigoraque, elephanto qui unus superfuerat quo altius ab aqua exstaret 11 vectus, vigiliis tamen et nocturno umore palustrique caelo gravante caput, et quia medendi nec locus nec tempus erat, altero oculo capitur.

[1] neque aut A. Perizonius: aut P.
[2] aqua s: aquas P.
[3] aut iumentorum Hertz: iumentorum P.

painful march—for the race is ill adapted to such hardships—and attempt to steal away or refuse to go forward. B.C. 217

Those in front only asked that their guides lead on before. Through deep and well-nigh bottomless quagmires left by the flood, almost engulfed in the mud into which they plunged, they nevertheless followed on after their standards. But the Gauls could neither keep from falling when they slipped, nor regain their footing, once they had plunged into a hole; the flesh was neither sustained by the spirit nor the spirit by hope. Some could hardly drag their tired limbs along; others, their courage yielding once for all to their weariness, dropped down and died amongst the baggage-animals, for these too were lying all about. What distressed them most of all was the want of sleep, which they had now endured for four days and three nights. And since everything was under water and they could find no dry spot on which to stretch their weary bodies, they would pile their packs in the flood and lie down on these; or the heaps of sumpter-animals that were everywhere strewn about along the line of march would afford a makeshift bed—for all they asked was a place that stood out above the water, where they could snatch a little sleep.

Hannibal himself, whose eyes were suffering in the first place from the trying spring weather, alternating betwixt hot and cold, rode upon the sole surviving elephant, that he might be higher above the water. But lack of sleep, damp nights, and the air of the marshes affected his head, and since he had neither place nor time for employing remedies, he lost the sight of one of his eyes.

A.U.C. 537

III. Multis hominibus iumentisque foede amissis cum tandem de paludibus emersisset, ubi primum in sicco potuit, castra locat; certumque per praemissos exploratores habuit exercitum Romanum
2 circa[1] Arreti moenia esse. Consulis deinde consilia atque animum et situm regionum itineraque et copias ad commeatus expediendos et cetera quae cognosse in rem erat summa omnia cum cura inquirendo exsequebatur.
3 Regio erat in primis Italiae fertilis, Etrusci campi, qui Faesulas inter Arretiumque iacent, frumenti ac
4 pecoris et omnium copia rerum opulenti; consul ferox ab consulatu priore et non modo legum aut patrum maiestatis sed ne deorum quidem satis metuens. Hanc insitam ingenio eius temeritatem fortuna prospero civilibus bellicisque rebus successu
5 aluerat. Itaque satis apparebat nec deos nec homines consulentem ferociter omnia ac praepropere acturum; quoque pronior esset in vitia sua, agitare eum atque
6 inritare Poenus parat, et laeva relicto hoste insidias[2] petens medio Etruriae agro praedatum profectus quantam maximam vastitatem potest caedibus incendiisque consuli procul ostendit.
7 Flaminius, qui ne quieto quidem hoste ipse

[1] circa ς: in circa P: in stativis circa Luchs.
[2] insidias Luterbacher: Faesulas P: a Faesulis petens medios Etruriae agros Voss.

---

[1] When, in defiance of the senate, he had refused to abdicate his command because of an alleged flaw in his election, and had conquered the Insubres and triumphed in virtue of a popular decree (223 B.C.). See Summary of Book XIX, and XXI. lxiii. 2.

[2] Livy has in mind the passage of an agrarian law in 232 B.C., the continuation of the Via Flaminia to Ariminum,

III. Many men and beasts had perished miserably, B.C. 217
when at last he got out from the marshes, and pitching his camp on the first dry ground available, ascertained from scouts whom he had sent on ahead that the Roman army lay around the walls of Arretium. He then went to work with all possible diligence to learn the plans and temper of the consul, the lie of the land and the roads, his resources for provisioning the army—everything, in short, which it was important to find out.

The district was one of the most fertile in Italy, for the Etruscan plains between Faesulae and Arretium abound in corn and flocks and all sorts of provisions. The consul had been proud and headstrong since his former consulship,[1] and lacked all proper reverence, not only for the laws and for the senate's majesty, but even for the gods. This native rashness had been nourished by the success which Fortune had bestowed on him in political and military enterprises.[2] It was therefore sufficiently apparent that, seeking no counsel, either divine or human, he would manage everything with recklessness and headlong haste; but to make him incline the more towards his characteristic faults, the Phoenician planned to provoke and exasperate him. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left,[3] and looking out for an opportunity to ambush him, he proceeded to lay waste the heart of Etruria and exhibited to the consul from afar all the havoc that fire and sword could possibly effect.

Flaminius, even had his enemy sat still, was not the erection of the Circus Flaminius, and the victory over the Insubres.

[3] See Map 4.

A.U.C. 537

quieturus erat, tum vero, postquam res sociorum ante oculos prope suos ferri agique vidit, suum id dedecus ratus, per mediam iam Italiam vagari Poenum atque obsistente nullo ad ipsa Romana
8 moenia ire oppugnanda, ceteris omnibus in consilio salutaria magis quam speciosa suadentibus—collegam exspectandum, ut coniunctis exercitibus communi
9 animo consilioque rem gererent, interim equitatu auxiliisque levium armorum ab effusa praedandi licentia hostem cohibendum—iratus se ex consilio proripuit signumque simul itineris pugnaeque cum
10 dedisset,[1] "Immo Arreti ante moenia sedeamus" inquit; "hic enim patria et penates sunt. Hannibal emissus e manibus perpopuletur Italiam vastandoque et urendo omnia ad Romana moenia perveniat, nec ante nos hinc moverimus quam, sicut olim Camillum a Veis,[2] C. Flaminium ab Arretio patres acciverint."
11 Haec simul increpans cum ocius signa convelli iuberet et ipse in equum insiluisset, equus repente corruit consulemque lapsum super caput effudit.
12 Territis omnibus qui circa erant velut foedo omine incipiendae rei insuper nuntiatur signum omni vi
13 moliente signifero convelli nequire. Conversus ad

[1] cum dedisset ς : cum P.
[2] a Veis (Veiis) Fuegner : abuelis P^1 : abueios P^2.

the man to have sat still himself; but now, when B.C. 217
he saw the farms of the allies being harried and pillaged almost under his own eyes, he felt it as a personal disgrace that the Phoenician should be roaming through the midst of Italy, and marching, with no one to dispute his passage, to assault the very walls of Rome. In the council of war the rest were all for safe in preference to showy measures: he should wait, they said, for his colleague to come up, in order that they might unite their forces and conduct the war with a common policy and resolution; meantime, he should employ his cavalry and skirmishers to check the enemy's widespread, unrestricted pillaging. Enraged by this advice, Flaminius flung out of the council, and having given the signal at once for marching and for fighting, exclaimed, "Ay, truly! Let us sit still under the walls of Arretium, for here are our native city and our household gods; let Hannibal slip through our fingers and ravage Italy, and, laying waste and burning everything, march clear to Rome; and let us not move from this spot, till the Fathers, as once they summoned Camillus from Veii, shall summon Gaius Flaminius from Arretium."

Uttering these scornful words he bade pluck up the standards quickly, and vaulted upon his horse, when suddenly the charger stumbled, and unseating the consul threw him over his head. The dismay which this occasioned in all who were present, as an evil omen for beginning the campaign, was intensified on its being reported that, although the standard-bearer was exerting all his might, the standard could not be pulled up. Rounding upon nuntium "Num litteras quoque" inquit "ab senatu adfers quae me rem gerere vetent?[1] Abi, nuntia effodiant signum, si ad convellendum manus prae metu obtorpuerunt."[2]

A.U.C. 537

14 Incedere inde agmen coepit primoribus, superquam quod dissenserant ab consilio, territis etiam duplici prodigio, milite in volgus laeto ferocia ducis, cum spem magis ipsam quam causam spei intueretur.

IV. Hannibal quod agri est inter Cortonam urbem Trasumennumque[3] lacum omni clade belli pervastat, quo magis iram hosti ad vindicandas sociorum iniurias
2 acuat. Et iam pervenerat[4] ad loca nata insidiis, ubi maxime montes Cortonenses Trasumennus subit. Via tantum interest perangusta, velut ad id[5] ipsum de industria relicto spatio; deinde paulo latior
3 patescit campus; inde colles insurgunt.[6] Ibi castra in aperto locat, ubi ipse cum Afris modo Hispanisque consideret; Baliares ceteramque levem armaturam post montes circumducit; equites ad ipsas fauces saltus tumulis apte tegentibus locat, ut ubi intrassent Romani obiecto equitatu clausa omnia lacu ac montibus essent.

4 Flaminius cum pridie solis occasu ad lacum pervenisset, inexplorato postero die vixdum satis certa

[1] vetent ς: uetant P.

[2] obtorpuerunt Madvig: obtorpuerit P: obtorpuerint ς.

[3] Here and elsewhere the word is printed with the spelling approved by Ritschl, Rhein. Mus. 22 (1867) 603: the MSS. display various corruptions.

[4] pervenerit Stroth: peruenerant P.

[5] velut ad id ς: uel ad P.

[6] insurgunt Madvig: adinsurgunt P: adsurgunt ς.

the messenger the consul cried, "Do you bring me B.C. 217 a dispatch too from the senate, forbidding me to fight? Go, tell them to dig the standard out, if their hands are too numb with fear to pull it up!"

The column then began to advance, though the higher officers, besides disapproving of the consul's plan, were terrified by the double prodigy. The soldiers, most of them, rejoiced in the temerity of their commander: their hopes ran high: the grounds for hoping they did not scrutinize.

IV. Hannibal laid waste the land between the city of Cortona and Lake Trasumennus with every circumstance of cruelty known to war, in order the more to whet his enemy's anger and prompt him to avenge the sufferings of his allies. And now he had reached a spot designed by nature for an ambuscade, where Trasumennus approaches closest to the mountains of Cortona. Between them is nothing but a very narrow track, as though room had been left expressly for this purpose; the ground then widens into a little plain; beyond this the hills rise steeply. At this point he laid out a camp in the open, for himself and his African and Spanish troops only; the Baliares and the rest of his light-armed forces he led round behind the mountains; the cavalry he stationed near the entrance to the defile, where some hillocks formed a convenient screen for them, so that when the Romans should have entered the pass, they might block the road, and trap the entire army between the lake and the mountains.

Flaminius had reached the lake at sunset; the next morning, without reconnoitring, and scarcely waiting for broad daylight, he passed through the luce angustiis superatis, postquam in patentiorem campum pandi agmen coepit, id tantum hostium quod ex adverso erat conspexit; ab tergo ac super caput non detectae[1] insidiae. Poenus ubi, id quod petierat, clausum lacu ac montibus et circumfusum suis copiis habuit hostem, signum omnibus dat simul invadendi. Qui ubi qua cuique[2] proximum fuit decucurrerunt, eo magis Romanis subita atque improvisa res fuit, quod orta ex lacu nebula campo quam montibus densior sederat agminaque hostium ex pluribus collibus[3] ipsa inter se satis conspecta eoque magis pariter decucurrerant. Romanus clamore prius undique orto quam satis cerneret, se circumventum esse sensit, et ante in frontem lateraque pugnari coeptum est quam satis instrueretur acies aut expediri arma stringique gladii possent.

A.U.C. 537

V. Consul perculsis omnibus ipse satis, ut in re trepida,[4] impavidus turbatos ordines vertente se quoque ad dissonos clamores instruit, ut tempus locusque patitur, et quacumque adire[5] audirique potest adhortatur ac stare ac pugnare iubet: nec enim inde votis aut imploratione deum, sed vi ac virtute evadendum esse; per medias acies ferro viam fieri, et quo timoris minus sit eo minus ferme periculi

[1] non detectae Novák: deceptae P.
[2] qua cuique Priscian x. xliii: quaque P.
[3] collibus Lipsius: uallibus P: callibus Rossbach (Praef. Per p xxvi.[1]).
[4] re trepida ς: trepida P.
[5] adire Gebhard: adiri P.

[1] Polybius (III. lxxxiv. 6) says that Flaminius was in "the utmost dismay and dejection" (δυσχρηστούμενον καὶ περικακοῦντα). Livy's description of the battle agrees in the main with that of Polybius; the praise of Flaminius may perhaps be derived from Coelius Antipater. See J. Janssen in Mnemosyne, 54 (1926), 189–194.

defile. As the column began to spread out on the more open ground, they caught sight of those enemies only who were right in front of them; the ambush in their rear and that above them they failed to perceive. The Phoenician had now gained his object, the Romans were hemmed in between the mountains and the lake and their escape cut off by his own troops, when he made the signal for all his forces to attack at once. As they charged down, each at the nearest point, their onset was all the more sudden and unforeseen inasmuch as the mist from the lake lay less thickly on the heights than on the plain, and the attacking columns had been clearly visible to one another from the various hills and had therefore delivered their charge at more nearly the same instant. From the shouting that arose on every side the Romans learned, before they could clearly see, that they were surrounded; and they were already engaged on their front and flank before they could properly form up or get out their arms and draw their swords. B.C. 217

V. Amidst the general consternation the consul himself displayed—if allowance be made for the terrifying circumstances—considerable coolness.[1] He brought such order as time and place permitted out of the confusion in the ranks, where the men were all turning different ways to face the various shouts; and wherever he could go and make himself heard, he tried to encourage them and bade them stand and fight. Their position, he said, was one from which vows and supplications to the gods could not extricate them, but only their own brave exertions: it was the sword that opened a way through embattled enemies, and the less men

A.U.C. 537

3 esse. Ceterum prae strepitu ac tumultu nec consilium nec imperium accipi poterat, tantumque aberat ut sua signa atque ordines et[1] locum noscerent[2] ut vix ad arma capienda aptandaque pugnae competeret animus opprimerenturque quidam onerati magis iis quam tecti. Et erat in tanta caligine maior
4 usus aurium quam oculorum. Ad gemitus volnerum[3] ictusque corporum aut armorum et mixtos terrentium paventiumque clamores circumferebant ora oculosque.
5 Alii fugientes pugnantium globo inlati haerebant, alios redeuntes in pugnam avertebat fugientium
6 agmen. Deinde, ubi in omnes partes nequiquam impetus capti et ab lateribus montes ac lacus, a fronte et ab tergo hostium acies claudebant, apparuitque nullam nisi in dextera ferroque salutis
7 spem esse, tum sibi quisque dux adhortatorque factus ad rem gerendam, et nova de integro exorta pugna est, non illa ordinata per principes hastatosque ac triarios, nec ut pro signis antesignani post signa alia pugnaret acies, nec ut in sua legione miles aut
8 cohorte aut manipulo esset: fors conglobabat,[4] et animus suus cuique ante aut post pugnandi ordinem dabat; tantusque fuit ardor animorum, adeo intentus pugnae animus,[5] ut eum motum terrae qui multarum

[1] ordines et Hertz: ordinemsed P.
[2] noscerent ς: nosceret P.
[3] vol(uul-)nerum P: vulneratorum Ruperti.
[4] conglobabat ς: conglobat P (Gronovius).
[5] adeo intentus pugnae animus P: adeoque intentus pugnae Riemann (but cf. Weissenborn-Mueller on IV. lxi. 8).

feared, the less, in general, was their danger. But B.C. 217 the din and confusion were so great that neither advice nor orders could be heard, and so far were the men from knowing their proper standards companies and places, that they had hardly enough spirit to arm and prepare themselves to fight, and some were borne down while more encumbered than protected by their armour. Indeed the fog was so thick that ears were of more use than eyes, and the groans of the wounded, the sound of blows on body or armour and the mingled shouts and screams of assailants and assailed made them turn and gaze, now this way and now that. Some, as they sought to escape, were swept into a crowd of combatants and held there; others, trying to get back into the fight, were turned aside by a throng of fugitives. When attempts to break through had resulted everywhere in failure and they found themselves shut in on the flanks by the mountains and the lake, and in front and rear by the enemy; when it became apparent that their only hope of safety lay in their right arms and their swords; then every man became his own commander and urged himself to action, and the battle began all over again. It was no ordered battle, with the troops marshalled in triple line, nor did the vanguard fight before the standards and the rest of the army behind them, neither did each soldier keep to his proper legion cohort and maniple: it was chance that grouped them, and every man's own valour assigned him his post in van or rear; and such was the frenzy of their eagerness and so absorbed were they in fighting, that an earthquake, violent enough to overthrow large portions of many of the towns of urbium Italiae magnas partes prostravit avertitque cursu rapidos amnes, mare fluminibus invexit, montes lapsu ingenti proruit, nemo pugnantium senserit.

A.U.C. 537

VI. Tres ferme horas pugnatum est et ubique atrociter; circa consulem tamen acrior infestiorque
2 pugna.[1] Eum et robora virorum sequebantur, et ipse, quacumque in parte premi ac laborare senserat
3 suos, impigre ferebat opem; insignemque armis et hostes summa vi petebant et tuebantur cives, donec Insuber eques—Ducario nomen erat—facie quoque noscitans consulem, "En" inquit "hic est,"[2] popularibus suis, "qui legiones nostras cecidit agrosque
4 et urbem est depopulatus; iam ego hanc victimam manibus peremptorum foede civium dabo;" subditisque calcaribus equo per confertissimam hostium turbam impetum facit obtruncatoque prius armigero, qui se infesto venienti obviam obiecerat, consulem lancea transfixit; spoliare cupientem triarii obiectis scutis arcuere.

5 Magnae partis fuga inde primum coepit; et iam nec lacus nec montes pavori obstabant; per omnia arta praeruptaque velut caeci evadunt, armaque et
6 viri super alios alii[3] praecipitantur. Pars magna, ubi locus fugae deest, per prima vada paludis in aquam progressi, quoad capitibus umerisque[4] exstare

[1] pugna H. J. Mueller: pugna est P: pugna erat ς.
[2] "En" inquit "hic est" Weissenborn: inquit hic est P.
[3] super alios alii H. J. Mueller: super alium alii P: super alium alius Riemann.
[4] umerisque (hu-) ς: umeris P: umerisve Weissenborn

[1] The triarii were, properly speaking, the soldiers of the third line. These would be veterans, and Livy uses the word in that general sense here. As he has told us

Italy, turn swift streams from their courses, carry B.C. 217 the sea up into rivers, and bring down mountains with great landslides, was not even felt by any of the combatants.

VI. The conflict lasted for about three hours, and was bitterly contested at every point; but nowhere did it rage so fiercely as about the consul. He was attended by the bravest of his soldiers and stoutly lent a hand himself, wherever he saw the Romans hard pressed and in dire straits. His arms made him conspicuous, and the enemy attacked and his own people defended him with the greatest fury, until an Insubrian horseman, named Ducarius, who recognized the consul also by his face, cried out to his countrymen, "Behold the man who massacred our legions and laid waste our fields and our city! Now will I offer him up as a sacrifice to the shades of our fellow citizens so foully slain!" Then clapping spurs to his horse, he dashed through the very thick of his enemies, and first cutting down the armour-bearer, who had thrown himself in the way of his onset, transfixed the consul with his spear, but could not despoil him, for the veterans[1] interposed their shields and kept him off.

A great part of the Romans now began to run; neither lake nor mountains could any longer check the panic; defiles and precipices were all alike to them, as they rushed blindly to escape, and arms and men came down pell-mell together. Many, having no room to flee, waded out into the shallow water at the margin of the lake, and kept on till only their heads and shoulders were above the (chap. v. § 7), the army had no time to form into the usual three lines (hastati, principes, triarii).

A.U.C. 537

possunt sese immergunt. Fuere quos inconsultus
7 pavor nando etiam capessere fugam impulerit, quae ubi immensa ac sine spe erat, aut deficientibus animis hauriebantur gurgitibus aut nequiquam fessi vada retro[1] aegerrime repetebant atque ibi ab ingressis aquam hostium equitibus passim trucidabantur.

8 Sex milia ferme primi agminis per adversos hostes eruptione impigre facta, ignari omnium quae post se agerentur, ex saltu evasere; et cum in tumulo quodam constitissent, clamorem modo ac sonum armorum audientes, quae fortuna pugnae esset neque
9 scire nec perspicere prae caligine poterant. Inclinata denique re cum incalescente sole dispulsa nebula aperuisset diem, tum liquida iam luce montes campique perditas res stratamque ostendere foede
10 Romanam aciem. Itaque, ne in conspectos procul immitteretur eques, sublatis raptim signis quam 11 citatissimo poterant agmine sese abripuerunt. Postero die cum super cetera extrema fames etiam instaret, fidem dante Maharbale, qui cum omnibus equestribus copiis nocte consecutus erat, si arma tradidissent, abire cum singulis vestimentis passurum, sese de-12 diderunt; quae Punica religione servata fides ab Hannibale est, atque in vincula omnes coniecti.

VII. Haec est nobilis ad Trasumennum pugna

[1] fessi vada retro Gronovius: festiua/darentro P^1: festinauerant retro P^2.

surface. Some were driven by their unreasoning panic even to attempt escape by swimming; but this was an endless, desperate undertaking, and either their hearts failed them and they sank in the deep water, or else, exhausted to no purpose, they struggled back with difficulty to the shoals, and were cut down on every hand by the horsemen, who rode into the water after them. B.C. 217

Some six thousand of those in the van made a valiant thrust through the enemy that barred their way, and got out of the defile without knowing anything of what was going on behind them. Taking up their stand on some rising ground, whence they could only hear the shouting and the clash of arms, they could neither know nor make out, for the murk, which way the victory was going. It was not until the battle was decided, that the mist dissolved with the growing heat of the sun and revealed the day, when the clear light on hill and plain showed that all was lost and the Roman army shamefully discomfited. And so, lest they should be seen afar and the enemy's cavalry be sent against them, they hurriedly pulled up their standards and marched off as fast as they could go. On the following day, when besides their other misfortunes they were threatened also with the extremity of hunger, Maharbal—who with all the cavalry had overtaken them in the night—pledged his word that if they delivered up their arms, he would let them go, with a single garment each, and they surrendered. This pledge Hannibal observed with true Punic reverence and threw them all into chains.

VII. Such was the famous battle of Trasumennus, atque inter paucas memorata populi Romani clades. 2 Quindecim milia Romanorum in acie caesa; decem milia sparsa fuga per omnem Etruriam diversis iti- 3 neribus urbem petiere; duo milia quingenti hostium in acie, multi postea[1] ex volneribus periere. Multi- 4 plex caedes utrimque facta traditur ab aliis; ego, praeterquam quod nihil auctum ex vano velim, quo nimis inclinant ferme scribentium animi, Fabium aequalem temporibus huiusce belli potissimum auc- 5 torem habui. Hannibal captivorum qui Latini nominis essent sine pretio dimissis, Romanis in vincula datis, segregata ex hostium coacervatorum cumulis corpora suorum cum sepeliri iussisset, Flamini quoque corpus funeris causa magna cum cura inquisitum non invenit.

A.U.C. 537

6 Romae ad primum nuntium cladis eius cum ingenti terrore ac tumultu concursus in forum populi est factus. 7 Matronae vagae per vias, quae repens clades adlata quaeve fortuna exercitus esset, obvios pecunctantur. Et cum frequentis contionis modo turba in comitium 8 et curiam versa magistratus vocaret, tandem haud multo ante solis occasum M. Pomponius praetor 9 "Pugna," inquit "magna victi sumus"; et quamquam nihil certius ex eo auditum est, tamen alius ab alio impleti rumoribus domos referunt consulem cum

[1] postea Perizonius: postea utrimque P.

---

[1] Fabius Pictor, who wrote annals in Greek, was used by Polybius, as well as by Livy.

a disaster memorable as few others have been in B.C. 217
Roman history. Fifteen thousand Romans were killed on the field; ten thousand, scattered in flight over all Etruria, made their way by different roads to the City. Two thousand five hundred of the enemy fell in the battle and many perished subsequently of their wounds. Some writers multiply the losses on both sides: I myself, besides that I would not idly exaggerate anything—a vice to which historians are in general all too prone—have taken Fabius,[1] who lived at the time of this war, as my authority, in preference to any other. Hannibal dismissed scot-free the prisoners of the Latin name and gave the Romans into captivity. Having issued orders that the bodies of his own dead should be sorted out from the heaps of their enemies and buried, he would have given the body of Flaminius burial also, but though he caused it to be searched for with great diligence, he could not find it.

At Rome the first tidings of this defeat brought the citizens into the Forum in a frightened and tumultuous throng, while the matrons wandered about the streets and demanded of all they met what sudden disaster had been reported and how it was going with the army. And when the crowd, like some vast public assembly, turned to the Comitium and the senate-house and called for the magistrates, at last, as the sun was almost going down, Marcus Pomponius, the praetor, said, "A great battle has been fought, and we were beaten." And although they learned nothing more definite from him, still they picked up a rumour here and a rumour there, and returning to their homes brought word that the

A.U.C. 537 magna parte copiarum caesum, superesse paucos aut fuga passim per Etruriam sparsos aut captos ab hoste.

10 Quot casus exercitus victi fuerant, tot in curas distracti[1] animi eorum erant quorum propinqui sub C. Flaminio consule meruerant, ignorantium quae cuiusque suorum fortuna esset; nec quisquam satis
11 certum habet, quid aut speret aut timeat. Postero ac deinceps aliquot diebus ad portas maior prope mulierum quam virorum multitudo stetit aut suorum aliquem aut nuntios de iis opperiens; circumfundebanturque obviis sciscitantes neque avelli, utique ab notis, priusquam ordine omnia inquisissent, poterant.
12 Inde varios voltus digredientium ab nuntiis cerneres, ut cuique laeta aut tristia nuntiabantur, gratulantesque aut consolantes redeuntibus domos circumfusos. Feminarum praecipue et gaudia insignia erant et 13 luctus. Unam in ipsa porta sospiti filio repente oblatam in complexu[2] eius exspirasse ferunt; alteram, cui mors filii falso nuntiata erat, maestam sedentem domi ad primum conspectum redeuntis[3] gaudio
14 nimio exanimatam. Senatum praetores per dies aliquot ab orto usque ad occidentem solem in curia retinent, consultantes quonam duce aut quibus copiis resisti victoribus Poenis posset.

[1] distracti Weissenborn: dispraeti P.
[2] com(con-)plexu Alschefski (cf. Val. Max. IX. xii. 2): conspexu P^1: conspectu P^2.
[3] redeuntis H. J. Mueller (Val. Max. l.l.): redeuntis fili P.

consul and a great part of his soldiers had been slain: that only a few survived, either dispersed as fugitives throughout Etruria or taken prisoners by the enemy. B.C. 217

The vicissitudes of the defeated army were no more various than the apprehensions which preyed upon the minds of those whose relatives had served under Gaius Flaminius, the consul. They were ignorant of how those dear to each of them were faring, nor did anyone really know what to hope or fear. On the next and on several succeeding days the City gates were thronged with a crowd in which the women almost outnumbered the men, waiting for some kinsman, or for news of him. Surrounding anybody who came along, they plied him with questions, nor could they tear themselves away—especially from those they were acquainted with—until they had enquired into every detail. Very different were the expressions you would have noted in their countenances, according as the tidings they received were glad or sorrowful, when they moved away from their informants and returned to their homes, surrounded by friends, congratulating or consoling them. The women especially exhibited extremes of joy and grief; one, on suddenly meeting her son safe and sound at the very gate, expired, they say, in his embrace; another, whose son had been falsely reported dead, sat sorrowing at home, and no sooner beheld him entering the house, than she died of excessive joy. For some days the praetors kept the senate in session in the Curia, from sunrise until sunset, deliberating with what possible commander or what forces they could withstand the victorious Phoenicians.

A.U.C. 537

VIII. Priusquam satis certa consilia essent, repens alia nuntiatur clades, quattuor milia equitum cum C. Centenio[1] propraetore missa ad collegam ab Servilio consule in Umbria, quo post pugnam ad Trasumennum auditam averterant iter, ab Hannibale circumventa. Eius rei fama varie homines adfecit: pars occupatis maiore aegritudine animis levem ex comparatione priorum ducere recentem equitum iacturam; pars non id quod acciderat per se aestimare, sed, ut in adfecto corpore quamvis levis causa magis quam in valido[2] gravior sentiretur, ita tum aegrae et adfectae civitati quodcumque adversi incideret non rerum magnitudine sed viribus extenuatis, quae nihil quod adgravaret pati possent, aestimandum esse. Itaque ad remedium iam diu neque desideratum nec adhibitum, dictatorem dicendum, civitas confugit. Et quia et consul aberat, a quo uno dici posse videbatur, nec per occupatam armis Punicis Italiam facile erat aut nuntium aut litteras mitti,[3] quod nunquam ante eam diem factum erat, dictatorem populus creavit Q. Fabium Maximum et magistrum equitum M. Minucium Rufum; iisque negotium ab senatu datum ut muros turresque urbis firmarent et praesidia disponerent, quibus locis

[1] Centenio Sigonius: centonio P.
[2] in valido Drakenborch: ualido P: ualitudo P^2.
[3] mitti Mommsen: mitti nec dictatorem populo creare poterat P: mitti, nec dictatorem praetor creare poterat Weissenborn.

VIII. They had not yet fully determined what to B.C. 217 do, when, lo! another disaster was reported, for which they were quite unprepared. Four thousand horse under the propraetor Gaius Centenius had been sent by the Consul Servilius to join his colleague; but on hearing of the battle at Trasumennus they had turned aside into Umbria, and had there fallen into the hands of Hannibal. The news of this affair affected people variously: some, whose thoughts were taken up with a greater sorrow, regarded this fresh loss of the cavalry as trivial in comparison with their former losses; others refused to judge of the misfortune as an isolated fact, but held that, just as when a man was sick, any disorder, however slight, was felt more than a worse one would be by a healthy man, so now, when the state was sick and suffering, any untoward occurrence should be gauged not by its intrinsic importance but by the enfeebled condition of the commonwealth, which could endure no aggravation. And so the citizens had recourse to a remedy that had now for a long time neither been employed nor needed—the creation of a dictator. And because the consul, who alone was supposed to possess the power to nominate one, was absent, and because it was no easy matter, when Italy was beset with Punic arms, to get a courier or a letter through to him, they did what had never been done until that day, and created a dictator by popular election. Their choice fell on Quintus Fabius Maximus, and Marcus Minucius Rufus they made master of the horse. To them the senate entrusted the task of strengthening the walls and towers of the City, of disposing its defences as to them seemed good, and

A.U.C. 537 videretur, pontesque rescinderent fluminum: pro urbe ac penatibus dimicandum esse, quando Italiam tueri nequissent.

IX. Hannibal recto itinere per Umbriam usque 2 ad Spoletium venit. Inde cum perpopulato agro urbem oppugnare adortus esset, cum magna caede suorum repulsus, coniectans ex unius coloniae haud[1] prospere temptatae viribus quanta moles Romanae 3 urbis esset, in agrum Picenum avertit iter non copia solum omnis generis frugum abundantem, sed refertum praeda, quam effuse avidi atque egentes rapie- 4 bant. Ibi per dies aliquot stativa habita refectusque miles hibernis itineribus ac palustri via proelioque magis ad eventum secundo quam levi aut facili 5 adfectus. Ubi satis quietis datum praeda ac populationibus magis quam otio aut requie gaudentibus, profectus Praetutianum Hadrianumque agrum, Marsos inde Marrucinosque et Paelignos devastat circaque Arpos et Luceriam proximam Apuliae regionem.

6 Cn. Servilius consul levibus proeliis cum Gallis factis[2] et uno oppido ignobili expugnato postquam de collegae exercitusque caede audivit, iam moenibus patriae metuens, ne abesset in discrimine extremo, ad urbem iter intendit.

7 Q. Fabius Maximus dictator iterum quo die magis-

[1] haud ς: haud minue P: haud maximae minime Madvig.
[2] factis Gronovius: actis P.

---

[1] The Anio and the Tiber.

[2] Servilius, on marching south with his consular army, left in northern Italy the forces originally destined to hold the Gauls in check.

of breaking down the bridges over the rivers:[1] they would have to fight for their City and their homes, since they had not been able to save Italy. B.C. 217

IX. Hannibal marched straight on through Umbria as far as Spoletium. But when, after systematically ravaging the country, he attempted to storm the town, he was repulsed with heavy losses; and conjecturing from the strength of a single colony which he had unsuccessfully attacked how vast an undertaking the City of Rome would be, he turned aside into the Picentine territory, a land not only abounding in all kinds of produce, but filled with livestock, which his greedy and impoverished men gathered in from far and wide. He remained in camp there for some days, while his soldiers recovered from the marches they had made in wintry weather and through swamps, and from the battle, which, however successful its outcome, had been no light or easy adventure. After allowing sufficient rest to his soldiers, who delighted more in booty and rapine than in quiet and repose, he resumed his march and laid waste the Praetutian and Hadrian fields, and after these the lands of the Marsi, Marrucini and Paeligni, and the nearest part of Apulia, in the vicinity of Arpi and Luceria.

Gnaeus Servilius, the consul, had engaged in skirmishes with the Gauls and had taken one insignificant town by assault, when he learned of the destruction of his colleague and the army, and being now alarmed for the safety of the capital, lest he should be absent in the very crisis of its peril, set out for Rome.[2]

Quintus Fabius Maximus, dictator now for the

A.U.C. 537

tratum iniit vocato senatu, ab dis orsus cum edocuisset patres plus neglegentia caerimoniarum auspiciorumque quam[1] temeritate atque inscitia peccatum a C. Flaminio consule esse, quaeque piacula irae deum
8 essent ipsos deos consulendos esse, pervicit ut, quod non ferme decernitur, nisi cum taetra prodigia nuntiata sunt, decemviri libros Sibyllinos adire
9 iuberentur. Qui inspectis fatalibus libris rettulerunt patribus, quod eius belli causa votum Marti foret, id non rite factum de integro atque amplius
10 faciundum esse, et Iovi ludos magnos et aedes Veneri Erycinae ac Menti vovendas esse et supplicationem lectisterniumque habendum et ver sacrum vovendum, si bellatum prospere esset resque publica in eodem quo ante bellum fuisset statu permansis-11 set. Senatus, quoniam Fabium belli cura occupatura esset, M. Aemilium praetorem, ex collegii pontificum sententia, omnia ea ut mature fiant curare iubet.

X. His senatus consultis perfectis L. Cornelius Lentulus pontifex maximus consulente collegium praetore[2] omnium primum populum consulendum de

[1] auspiciorumque quam ς (Sigonius): auspiciorum P.
[2] collegium praetore Lipsius: collegio praetorum P.

---

[1] Fabius had been named dictator (probably in one of the years 221 to 219), to preside over the elections, but there had been no military dictator since Aulus Atilius Calatinus in 249.

[2] This vow is not mentioned at XXI. xvii. 4 or lxii. 10.

[3] The Romans prayed to Mens (or Mens Bona) for good sense and modesty (σωφροσύνη), qualities which had been conspicuously lacking in the conduct of Flaminius. The context here (Venus of Eryx, Sibylline books), together with coins of Paestum representing a goddess shown by the legend to be Bona Mens, and many inscriptions from Magna Graecia attesting the existence of priestly officials called magistri Mentis Bonae, points clearly to a Greek origin for the cult, which is several times alluded to by Roman authors second time,[1] convened the senate on the day he entered upon his office. Taking up first the question of religion, he convinced the Fathers that the consul Flaminius had erred more through his neglect of the ceremonies and the auspices than through his recklessness and ignorance; and asserting that they ought to enquire of the gods themselves how the displeasure of the gods might be appeased, prevailed with them to do what is rarely done except when dreadful prodigies have been announced, and order the decemvirs to consult the Sibylline books. When the decemvirs had inspected the Books of Fate, they reported to the Fathers that the vow which had been made to Mars on account of this war[2] had not been duly performed, and must be performed afresh and on an ampler scale; that great games must be vowed to Jupiter, and temples to Venus Erycina and to Mens[3]; and finally that a supplication and lectisternium must be celebrated in honour of the gods, and a Sacred Spring be vowed, if they proved victorious and the state remained as it had been before the outbreak of hostilities. The senate, seeing that Fabius would be occupied with the conduct of the war, commanded Marcus Aemilius the praetor, as the college of pontifices had recommended, to see that all these measures were promptly put into effect. B.C. 217

X. When the senate had passed these resolutions, the praetor consulted the college, and Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, the Pontifex Maximus, gave his opinion that first of all a popular vote must (Cicero, Propertius, Ovid, Persius). The two shrines stood close together on the Capitol (XXX. xxx. 16). See Wissowa, p. 313 f.

A.U.C. 537

vere sacro censet: iniussu populi voveri non posse.
2 Rogatus in haec verba populus: "Velitis iubeatisne haec sic fieri? Si res publica populi Romani Quiritium ad quinquennium proximum, sicut[1] velim eam[2] salvam, servata erit[3] hisce duellis, quod duellum populo Romano cum Carthaginiensi est, quaeque
3 duella cum Gallis sunt qui cis Alpes sunt, ratum[4] donum duit populus Romanus Quiritium,[5] quod ver attulerit ex suillo ovillo caprino bovillo grege, quaeque profana erunt, Iovi fieri, ex qua die senatus
4 populusque iusserit. Qui faciet, quando volet quaque lege volet facito; quo modo faxit, probe factum esto.
5 Si id moritur quod fieri oportebit, profanum esto neque scelus esto; si quis rumpet occidetve insciens, ne fraus esto; si quis clepsit,[6] ne populo scelus esto
6 neve cui cleptum erit; si atro die faxit insciens, probe factum esto; si nocte sive luce, si servus sive liber faxit, probe factum esto; si antidea quam[7]

[1] sicut Ursinus: sic P.

[2] eam Ursinus: eamque P: eam esse Haupt: voveamque Madvig: olim Hasenmueller.

[3] servata erit Ursinus: seruaverit P.

[4] ratum Rossbach: datum P: tum Madvig.

[5] The words datum donum duit populus Romanus Quiritium stand in P before quod duellum populo. Lipsius transposed them.

[6] clepsit vulg.: clepset P (and below cleptum vulg.: coeptum PM: ceptum C).

[7] antidea quam Luchs: antidea ac Stroth: anteidea P.

---

[1] The ver sacrum was not actually celebrated until 195 B.C., and a flaw in the ceremonies necessitated a repetition in the following year (XXXIV. lxiv. 1–3).

[2] The period appointed was March 1st to April 30th (ibid.).

be taken about the Sacred Spring; for it could B.C. 217 not be vowed without the authorization of the people. The question was put to them in this form: "Do you will and so order that these things be done in the manner following? If the Republic of the Roman People, the Quirites, shall be preserved for the next five years[1]—as I would wish it preserved—in these wars, to wit, the war of the Roman People with the People of Carthage and the wars with the Gauls on this side of the Alps, let the Roman People, the Quirites, offer up in indefeasible sacrifice to Jupiter what the spring shall have produced of swine, sheep, goats and cattle—which shall not have been consecrated to some other deity—beginning with the day which the senate and the People shall have designated.[2] Let him who shall make a sacrifice do so at such time and by such rite as shall seem good to him; in what manner soever he does it, let it be accounted duly done. If the animal which he ought to sacrifice dies, let it be deemed unconsecrate and let no guilt attach to him; if any shall hurt it or slay it unawares, let it be no sin; if any shall steal it, let no guilt attach to the People nor to him from whom it shall have been stolen; if he shall sacrifice unwittingly on a black day,[3] let the sacrifice be deemed to have been duly made; by night or by day, if slave or freeman perform the sacrifice, let it be deemed to have been duly made; if sacrifice shall be performed before the senate and the People

[3] Dies atri—called also nefasti and religiosi—were the days following the Calends, Nones and Ides, and the anniversaries of certain national disasters, like the defeat on the Allia. On such days no public business might be transacted.

A.U.C. 537 senatus populusque iusserit fieri[1] faxitur, eo populus solutus liber esto."

7 Eiusdem rei causa ludi magni voti aeris trecentis[2] tringinta tribus milibus trecentis triginta tribus[3] triente, praeterea bubus Iovi trecentis, multis aliis divis 8 bubus albis atque ceteris hostiis. Votis rite nuncupatis supplicatio edicta; supplicatumque iere cum[4] coniugibus ac liberis non urbana multitudo tantum sed agrestium etiam quos in aliqua sua fortuna 9 publica quoque contingebat cura. Tum lectisternium per triduum habitum[5] decemviris sacrorum curantibus. Sex pulvinaria in conspectu fuerunt: Iovi ac Iunoni unum, alterum Neptuno ac Minervae, tertium Marti ac Veneri, quartum Apollini ac Dianae, quintum Volcano ac Vestae, sextum Mercurio et Cereri. 10 Tum aedes votae: Veneri Erycinae aedem Q. Fabius Maximus dictator vovit, quia ita ex fatalibus libris editum[6] erat, ut is voveret cuius maximum imperium in civitate esset; Menti aedem T. Otacilius praetor vovit.

XI. Ita rebus divinis peractis tum de bello deque

[1] fieri Stroth: fieri ac P.
[2] trecentis triginta tribus Budaeus (Plut., Fab. 4): CCXXXIII P.
[3] trecentis triginta tribus inserted by Budaeus (Plut., ibid.).
[4] supplicatumque iere cum Gronovius: supplicatumquiregum P.
[5] habitum s: habitum per P.
[6] editum s: edictum P.

---

[1] These were probably libral asses (of a pound each) and not the reduced asses of one uncia (ounce) each which Pliny says were coined this year (Q. Fabio Maximo dictatore) and were reckoned at sixteen to the denarius (Nat. Hist., XXXIII, xlv.). With this use of the number three editors cp. Aen. I, 265ff., where Jupiter foretells that Aeneas shall reign three shall have ordered it to be performed, let the People B.C. 217 be absolved therefrom and free of obligation."

For the same cause great games were vowed, to cost three hundred and thirty-three thousand, three hundred and thirty-three and a third bronze asses,[1] and, besides, a sacrifice to Jupiter of three hundred oxen, and of white oxen and the other customary victims to many other gods. When the vows had been duly pronounced, a supplication was decreed, and was performed not only by the urban population, with their wives and children, but by such country folk besides, as, having some fortune of their own, were beginning to feel concern for the Commonwealth. A lectisternium was then celebrated during three days under the supervision of the decemvirs who had charge of sacrifices. Six couches were displayed: one for Jupiter and Juno, a second for Neptune and Minerva, a third for Mars and Venus, a fourth for Apollo and Diana, a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta, a sixth for Mercury and Ceres.[2] The temples were then vowed—that to Venus Erycina by Quintus Fabius Maximus the dictator, because the Books of Fate had given out that he whose authority in the state was paramount should make the vow; and the temple to Mens by the praetor Titus Otacilius.

XI. Religious duties being thus acquitted, the years, Ascanius thirty, and the Alban kings three hundred. H. Usener, Dreiheit (Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 58 (1903) pp. 1ff., 161ff, 321ff.), discusses with a wealth of illustration, the significance in ancient folk-lore and religion of the number three.

[2] The twelve great Olympian gods, arranged in pairs as with the Greeks, here make their appearance together for the first time in Roman history.

A.U.C. 537

re publica[1] dictator rettulit, quibus quotve legionibus victori hosti obviam eundum esse patres censerent. Decretum ut ab Cn. Servilio consule exercitum acciperet; scriberet praeterea ex civibus sociisque quantum equitum ac peditum videretur; cetera omnia ageret faceretque ut e re publica duceret. Fabius duas legiones se adiecturum ad Servilianum exercitum dixit. Iis per magistrum equitum scriptis Tibur diem ad conveniendum edixit. Edictoque proposito ut quibus oppida castellaque immunita essent, uti commigrarent in loca tuta, ex agris quoque demigrarent omnes regionis eius qua iturus Hannibal esset, tectis prius incensis ac frugibus corruptis, ne cuius rei copia esset, ipse via Flaminia profectus obviam consuli exercituque, cum ad Tiberim circa Ocriculum prospexissit agmen consulemque cum equitibus ad se progredientem, viatorem misit[2] qui consuli nuntiaret ut sine lictoribus ad dictatorem veniret. Qui cum dicto paruisset congressusque eorum ingentem speciem dictaturae apud cives sociosque vetustate iam prope oblitos eius imperii fecisset, litterae ab urbe allatae sunt naves onerarias commeatum ab Ostia in Hispaniam ad exercitum portantes a classe Punica circa portum

[1] deque re publica ς: reque de publica PM: reque publica C.

[2] viatorem misit ς: uiatore misso P: substitit viatore misso Weissenborn.

dictator turned to affairs of war and state, and B.C. 217 called upon the senate to decide with what and how many legions the victorious enemy should be faced. It was voted that he should take over the army of Gnaeus Servilius, the consul; that he should enroll, besides, from the citizens and the allies, as many horsemen and foot-soldiers as seemed good to him; and with regard to all other questions should act as he deemed conducive to the welfare of the state. Fabius announced that he should add two legions to the army that Servilius had commanded. These legions he enlisted, through his master of the horse, and commanded them to assemble at Tibur on a given day. He also issued an edict that those who dwelt in unfortified towns and hamlets should remove to places of safety; and that all the inhabitants of that district where Hannibal was likely to be marching should abandon their farms, first burning the buildings and destroying the crops, that there might be no supplies for him of any kind. He himself went out by the Flaminian way to meet the consul and his army, and when, close to the Tiber near Ocriculum, he came in sight of the column and saw the consul riding towards him at the head of his cavalry, he dispatched an orderly to bid the consul appear before the dictator without lictors. The consul obeyed, and their meeting vividly impressed the greatness of the dictatorship on citizens and allies, who had now, with the lapse of years, almost forgotten that supreme authority. Just then a dispatch was delivered from the City, announcing that ships of burden with supplies from Ostia for the army in Spain had been captured by the Punic

A.U.C. 537

7 Cosanum captas esse. Itaque extemplo consul Ostiam proficisci iussus navibusque quae ad urbem Romanam aut Ostiae essent completis milite ac navalibus sociis persequi hostium classem ac litora
8 Italiae tutari. Magna vis hominum conscripta Romae erat; libertini etiam quibus liberi essent et[1]
9 aetas militaris in verba iuraverant. Ex hoc urbano exercitu qui minores quinque et triginta annis erant in naves impositi, alii ut urbi praesiderent relicti.

XII. Dictator exercitu consulis accepto a Fulvio Flacco legato per agrum Sabinum Tibur, quo diem[2] ad conveniendum edixerat novis militibus, venit.
2 Inde Praeneste ac transversis limitibus in viam Latinam est egressus, unde itineribus summa cum cura exploratis ad hostem ducit, nullo loco, nisi quantum necessitas cogeret, fortunae se commissurus.
3 Quo primum die haud procul Arpis in conspectu hostium posuit castra, nulla mora facta quin Poenus educeret in aciem copiamque pugnandi faceret.
4 Sed ubi quieta omnia apud hostes nec castra ullo tumultu mota videt, increpans quidem, victos tandem illos[3] Martios animos Romanis debellatumque et concessum propalam de virtute ac gloria esse, in 5 castra rediit; ceterum tacita cura animum incessit,[4]

[1] et ς: ita P. [2] diem vulg.: die P.
[3] illos Haupt: quos P.
[4] incessit ς (Muretus): incensum P.

[1] The socii navales served as rowers.

fleet off the port of Cosa. Accordingly, the consul B.C. 217 was ordered to set out at once for Ostia and, manning such ships as were at Rome or Ostia with soldiers and naval allies,[1] to pursue the enemy's fleet and protect the coasts of Italy. A vast number of men had been enrolled in Rome; even freedmen who had children and were of military age had taken the oath. Of this urban levy those who were less than thirty-five years old were sent on board the ships; the others were left to garrison the City.

XII. The dictator, after taking over the consul's army from Fulvius Flaccus, his lieutenant, marched through the Sabine country to Tibur, where he had given the new levies notice to assemble on a certain day. From Tibur he marched to Praeneste, and striking across the country came out into the Latin Way, and then, reconnoitring the roads with the utmost circumspection, advanced in the direction of the enemy, though resolved nowhere to commit himself to fortune, except in so far as necessity might compel him.

On the day when Fabius first encamped in sight of the enemy, not far from Arpi, the Phoenician promptly led out his forces into line and offered battle. But when he perceived that all was quiet on the other side, and could hear no sounds of commotion in their camp, he went back to his quarters, exclaiming scornfully that the boasted martial spirit of the Romans was broken at last, that the war was fought and won, that they had openly bade valour and renown farewell; but in the silence of his heart he was troubled by the thought that he would have a general to deal with by no means

A.U.C. 537 quod cum duce haudquaquam Flamini Sempronique[1] simili futura sibi res esset ac tum demum edocti malis Romani parem Hannibali ducem quaesissent. 6 Et prudentiam quidem novi[2] dictatoris extemplo timuit: constantiam hauddum expertus agitare ac temptare animum movendo crebro castra populan- 7 doque in oculis eius agros sociorum coepit; et modo citato agmine ex conspectu abibat, modo repente in aliquo flexu viae, si excipere degressum in aequum posset, occultus subsistebat.

8 Fabius per loca alta agmen ducebat modico ab hoste intervallo, ut neque omitteret eum neque congrederetur. Castris, nisi quantum usus necessarii cogerent,[3] tenebatur miles; pabulum et ligna nec pauci petebant nec passim; equitum levisque arma- 9 turae statio, composita instructaque in subitos tumultus, et suo militi tuta omnia et infesta effusis 10 hostium populatoribus praebebat; neque universo periculo summa rerum committebatur et parva momenta levium certaminum ex tuto coeptorum finitimoque receptu[4] adsuefaciebant territum pristinis cladibus militem minus iam tandem aut virtutis aut fortunae paenitere suae.

11 Sed non Hannibalem magis infestum tam sanis consiliis habebat quam magistrum equitum, qui nihil aliud quam quod impar erat[5] imperio morae ad rem 12 publicam praecipitandam habebat. Ferox rapidus-

[1] Flamini Sempronique Alschefski: flaminis sempronioque P.

[2] novi (and ductoris for dictatoris) Gronovius: non uim P.

[3] necessarii cogerent Weissenborn: necessari cogeret P^1: necessario cogeret P^2.

[4] finitimoque receptu (finitimo receptu Lipsius) Luchs: finitimorum receptum quae P.

[5] impar erat Jac. Gronovius: imperabat P.

like Flaminius or Sempronius, since the Romans, B.C. 217 schooled by their misfortunes, had now at last sought out a leader to match Hannibal. The prudence of the dictator was indeed an immediate source of worry to him, but, possessing as yet no experience of his firmness, he began to provoke and try his temper by frequent shifting of his camp and by pillaging the lands of the allies before his very eyes. Now he would march off rapidly and disappear; and now would lie in wait at some turn of the road, in hopes to cut the Romans off when they had descended on to level ground.

Fabius kept leading his troops along the heights, at a moderate distance from the enemy, so as neither to lose touch nor yet come to blows with him. He would keep his men in camp, except for such necessary duties as obliged their leaving it; when they went out for wood and fodder, they were neither few in number nor dispersed; a corps of cavalry and skirmishers drawn up and ready for sudden onsets made everything safe for his own men and dangerous for the scattered pillagers of the enemy. He refused to stake all on a general engagement, and yet by means of little skirmishes, undertaken from a safe position and with a place of refuge close at hand, he at length accustomed his soldiers, disheartened by their former defeats, to be less diffident of their own courage and good fortune.

But even Hannibal was not more vexed by these prudent measures than was the master of the horse, who was only withheld from plunging the nation into ruin by his subordinate authority. Violent and hasty in his opinions and of unbridled tongue, he que in consiliis[1] ac lingua immodicus primo inter paucos, dein propalam in volgus pro cunctatore segnem pro cauto timidum, adfingens vicina virtutibus vitia, compellabat premendoque superiorem, quae pessima ars nimis prosperis multorum successibus crevit, sese extollebat.

A.U.C. 537

XIII. Hannibal ex Hirpinis in Samnium transit, Beneventanum depopulatur agrum, Telesiam urbem capit; inritat etiam de industria ducem Romanum,[2] si forte accensum tot indignitatibus cladibusque sociorum detrahere ad aequum certamen possit. 2 Inter multitudinem sociorum Italici generis qui ad Trasumennum capti ab Hannibale dimissique fuerant tres Campani equites erant, multis iam tum inlecti donis promissisque Hannibalis ad conciliandos popu- 3 larium animos. Hi nuntiantes, si in Campaniam exercitum admovisset, Capuae potiendae copiam fore, cum res maior quam auctores esset, dubium Hannibalem alternisque fidentem ac diffidentem tamen 4 ut Campanos ex Samnio peteret moverunt. Monitos etiam atque etiam ut[3] promissa rebus adfirmarent, iussosque cum pluribus et aliquibus principum redire 5 ad se dimisit. Ipse imperat duci ut se in agrum Casinatem ducat, edoctus a peritis regionum, si eum saltum occupasset, exitum Romano ad opem feren-

[1] rapidusque in consiliis ς: rapidusquem consiliis P: rapidusque consiliis ς.

[2] ducem Romanum Pauly: ducem P: dictatorem Woelfflin.

[3] etiam atque etiam ut Gron. (Madvig in later edd.): ut etiam etque (atque P^2) etiam P: etiam atque etiam Madvig (1*st ed.*): ut etiam atque etiam viderent (or curarent) ut Novák.

[1] By Samnium Livy here means the territory of the Caudini lying to the north of the Hirpini. Both tribes, as well as the Frentani and the Pentri, had belonged to the old Samnite League.

spoke of Fabius—at first in the hearing of a few, but after a time quite openly to everybody—not as deliberate but as slothful, not as cautious but as timid, inventing faults that neighboured on his virtues; and exalted himself by disparaging his superior —an infamous practice, which has grown in favour from the all too great prosperity of many who have followed it. B.C. 217

XIII. Hannibal, leaving the Hirpini, crossed over into Samnium,[1] laid waste the lands of Beneventum, and captured the city of Telesia. He even deliberately sought to vex the Roman general, for he hoped that by so often insulting and distressing his allies he might anger him and induce him to come down and fight on equal terms. Amongst the numerous allies of Italian stock who had been made prisoners by Hannibal at Trasumennus and afterwards released were three Campanian knights, whom he had even then enticed with gifts and promises to procure for him the goodwill of their countrymen. These men now informed him that if he would bring his army into Campania the opportunity would be afforded him of taking Capua. It was a weighty undertaking for such men to enter into, and Hannibal hesitated, now trusting and again distrusting them, but in the end they persuaded him to march from Samnium into Campania. He warned them again and again to confirm their words with deeds, and dismissed them with orders to come back to him with more people, including some of their leading men. He then ordered his guide to conduct him to the territory of Casinum, for he had been told by those who knew the country that if he occupied that pass he could keep the Romans from marching to the aid of their

A.U.C. 537

6 dam sociis interclusurum. Sed Punicum abhorrens ab Latinorum nominum pronuntiatione os, Casilinum pro[1] Casino dux ut acciperet fecit; aversusque ab suo itinere per Allifanum Caiatinumque[2] et Calenum
7 agrum in campum Stellatem descendit. Ubi cum montibus fluminibusque clausam regionem circumspexisset, vocatum ducem percunctatur ubi terrarum
8 esset. Cum is Casilini eo die[3] mansurum eum dixisset, tum demum cognitus est error, et Casinum
9 longe inde alia regione esse; virgisque caeso duce et ad reliquorum terrorem in crucem sublato, castris communitis, Maharbalem cum equitibus in agrum
10 Falernum praedatum dimisit. Usque ad aquas Sinuessanas populatio ea pervenit. Ingentem cladem, fugam tamen terroremque latius Numidae
11 fecerunt; nec tamen is terror, cum omnia bello flagrarent, fide socios dimovit, videlicet quia iusto et moderato regebantur imperio nec abnuebant, quod unum vinculum fidei est, melioribus parere.

XIV. Ut vero, postquam[4] ad Volturnum flumen castra sunt posita, exurebatur amoenissimus Italiae ager villaeque passim incendiis fumabant, per iuga Massici montis Fabio ducente, tum prope de integro
2 seditio accensa;[5] quieverant[6] enim per paucos dies, quia cum celerius solito ductum agmen esset, festinari ad prohibendam populationibus Campaniam credide-

[1] nominum pronuntiatione os, Casilinum pro Weissenborn: nominum pro P.

[2] Allifanum Caiatinumque Kiehl and Stier: alifanum calatinumque P: Callifanum Allifanumque Madvig.

[3] eo die ς: eodem P: eodem die ς.

[4] postquam Alschefski: quam P.

[5] seditio accensa Lipsius: seditio ac de seditione accensi P.

[6] quieverant Gronovius: quidam fuerant P: quieti fuerant Lipsius.

allies. But the difficulty experienced by Carthaginians in pronouncing Latin names caused the guide to understand Casilinum instead of Casinum; and quitting the proper road he led him down through the districts of Allifae, Caiatia and Cales into the Plain of Stella. There Hannibal, looking round on the mountains and rivers that enclosed the plain, called up the guide and asked him where in the world he was. And only when the guide had answered that he should lodge that night in Casilinum, did he perceive at last how the man had blundered, and that Casinum lay far off in another direction. Whereupon he scourged the guide, and, to terrify the others, crucified him, and going into camp behind entrenchments, dispatched Maharbal with the cavalry to ravage the Falernian countryside. The devastation extended even to the Baths of Sinuessa. The Numidians wrought great havoc and spread dismay and terror more widely still; yet this terror, even though all the country blazed with war, did not cause the allies to waver in their loyalty, assuredly because the rule under which they were governed was just and temperate, nor did they refuse—and that is the only guarantee of loyalty—to yield obedience to their betters. B.C. 217

XIV. But when Hannibal had encamped by the river Volturnus, and the fairest district in all Italy was in flames, and the smoke went curling up from burning farm-houses, while Fabius continued to march along the ridges of Mount Massicus, there was almost a new outburst of sedition. For the disaffected had kept quiet for several days, believing that the army, which had been moving more rapidly than usual, was hastening to preserve Campania

A.U.C. 537

3 rant. Ut vero in extrema iuga Massici montis ventum est et[1] hostes sub oculis erant Falerni agri colonorumque Sinuessae tecta urentes nec ulla erat mentio
4 pugnae, "Spectatum huc"[2] inquit Minucius, "ut ad[3] rem fruendam oculis, sociorum caedes et incendia, venimus? Nec, si nullius alterius nos, ne civium quidem horum pudet quos Sinuessam colonos patres nostri miserunt ut ab Samnite hoste tuta haec ora esset, quam nunc non vicinus Samnis urit sed
5 Poenus advena, ab extremis orbis terrarum terminis nostra cunctatione et socordia iam huc progressus?
6 Tantum pro degeneramus a patribus nostris ut praeter quam oram illi[4] Punicas vagari classes dedecus esse imperii sui duxerint, eam nunc plenam hostium Numidarumque ac Maurorum iam factam
7 videamus? Qui modo Saguntum oppugnari indignando non homines tantum sed foedera et deos ciebamus, scandentem moenia Romanae coloniae
8 Hannibalem[5] lenti[6] spectamus. Fumus ex incendiis villarum agrorumque in oculos atque ora venit; strepunt aures clamoribus plorantium sociorum, saepius nostram quam[7] deorum invocantium opem; nos hic pecorum modo per aestivos saltus deviasque calles exercitum ducimus conditi nubibus silvisque.
9 Si hoc modo peragrando cacumina saltusque M. Furius

[1] est et Weissenborn: est P: et Gronovius.
[2] spectatum huc ς: spectatum est hoc P.
[3] ut ad Madvig: ad P.
[4] oram illi ς: per oram illi suam P.
[5] Hannibalem ς: et hannibalem P.
[6] lenti ς: laetis P: taciti Novák.
[7] nostram quam ς: nos quamquam P.

[1] i.e. the western extremity.

from devastation. But when they reached the B.C. 217 farthest extremity[1] of the range, and saw the enemy down below them setting fire to the farms of the Falernian district and the colony of Sinuessa, and yet no word was uttered about fighting, Minucius cried, "Are we come here as to a spectacle, that we may gratify our eyes with the slaughter of our friends and the burning of their homes? If nothing else can awaken us to a sense of shame, do we feel none when we behold these fellow citizens of ours whom our fathers sent as colonists to Sinuessa to secure this frontier from the Samnite enemy? It is not our Samnite neighbours who are wasting it now, but Phoenician invaders, who have been suffered to come all this way, from the farthest, limits of the world, by our delays and slothfulness. So greatly, alas! do we degenerate from our fathers that we behold overrun with enemies and in the possession of Numidians and Moors that coast past which they could not see the Punic navies cruising without feeling that their empire was disgraced. When, a little while ago, Saguntum was besieged, we appealed indignantly, not to men only, but to treaties and to the gods; but now that Hannibal is scaling the walls of a Roman colony, we look on with indifference. The smoke from burning farm-houses and fields comes into our eyes and mouths; our ears are ringing with the lamentations of our allies, who invoke our aid more often than that of Heaven; and here we are, leading our army—like a flock of sheep—through summer pastures and by devious mountain trails, and hiding ourselves in clouds and forests. If Marcus Furius had tried to recover Rome from the Gauls by wandering thus over recipere a Gallis urbem voluisset quo hic novus Camillus, nobis dictator unicus in rebus adfectis quaesitus, Italiam ab Hannibale reciperare parat, 10 Gallorum Roma esset, quam vereor ne sic cunctantibus nobis Hannibali ac Poenis totiens servaverint

A.U.C. 537

11 maiores nostri. Sed vir ac vere Romanus, quo die dictatorem eum ex auctoritate patrum iussuque populi dictum Veios allatum est, cum esset satis altum Ianiculum ubi sedens prospectaret hostem, descendit in aequum atque illo ipso die media in urbe, qua[1] nunc busta Gallica sunt, et postero die citra
12 Gabios cecidit Gallorum legiones. Quid? Post multos annos cum ad furculas Caudinas ab Samnite hoste sub iugum missi sumus, utrum tandem L. Papirius Cursor iuga Samnii perlustrando an Luceriam premendo obsidendoque et lacessendo victorem hostem depulsum ab Romanis cervicibus iugum
13 superbo Samniti imposuit? Modo C. Lutatio quae alia res quam celeritas victoriam dedit, quod postero die quam hostem vidit classem gravem commeatibus, impeditam suomet ipsam instrumento atque ad-
14 paratu, oppressit? Stultitia est sedendo aut votis debellari credere posse; arma[2] capias oportet et descendas[3] in aequum et vir cum viro congrediaris. Audendo atque agendo res Romana crevit, non his

[1] qua ς: q. P: quae ς (Luchs).
[2] arma Madvig armari P.
[3] descendas Heerwagen: deducendas P.

---

[1] A place in Rome where the Gauls—so tradition said—had piled up and burned the bodies of those who died of a pestilence which had broken out among them while they were beleaguering the Capitol (v. xlviii. 3).

[2] For the story of this famous episode see IX. i–xv.

mountain heights and passes, even as this new B.C. 217
Camillus, this wonderful dictator to whom we have turned in our distress, is planning to recover Italy from Hannibal, the Gauls would be in Rome to-day; and I fear that if we linger thus, our fathers will so often have preserved it only for Hannibal and the Phoenicians. But that brave man and true Roman, on the day that the news was brought to Veii of his being appointed dictator, by command of the people in pursuance of a senatorial resolution—though Janiculum was high enough for him to have sat there and enjoyed a prospect of the enemy—came down into the plain, and on that very day, in the midst of the City—where now the Gallic Pyres[1] are—and again on the following day, this side of Gabii, cut the legions of the Gauls to pieces. What! When, many years later, at the Caudine Forks, our Samnite foe had sent us under the yoke,[2] was it, pray, by scouring the heights of Samnium, or by pressing Luceria hard and laying siege to it, and by challenging the victorious enemy, that Lucius Papirius Cursor struck off the yoke from Roman necks and imposed it on the haughty Samnite? What else was it than swiftness that gave the victory, not long since,[3] to Gaius Lutatius, who bore down upon the enemy's fleet, laden deep with stores and hampered with its own munitions and equipment, on the day after he sighted it? It is folly to think that a war can be won by sitting still or making vows; you must arm and go down into the field, and do battle, man to man! Rome's greatness has come from daring and [3] The victory of Lutatius off the Aegatian Islands had been won twenty-four years before (Summary of Book xx).

A.U.C. 537 15 segnibus[1] consiliis quae timidi cauta vocant." Haec velut contionanti Minucio circumfundebatur tribunorum equitumque Romanorum multitudo, et ad aures quoque militum dicta ferocia evolvebantur; ac, si militaris suffragii res esset, haud dubie ferebant Minucium Fabio ducem[2] praelaturos.

XV. Fabius, pariter in suos haud minus quam in hostes intentus, prius ab illis[3] invictum animum praestat. Quamquam probe scit non in castris modo suis sed iam etiam Romae infamem suam cunctationem esse, obstinatus tamen tenore eodem consiliorum aestatis reliquum extraxit, ut Hannibal destitutus ab spe summa ope petiti[4] certaminis iam hibernis locum circumspectaret, quia ea regio praesentis erat copiae, non perpetuae, arbusta vineaeque et consita omnia magis amoenis quam necessariis fructibus. Haec per exploratores relata Fabio. Cum satis sciret per easdem angustias quibus intraverat Falernum agrum rediturum, Calliculam[5] montem et Casilinum occupat modicis praesidiis, quae urbs Volturno flumine dirempta Falernum a Campano agro dividit; ipse iugis iisdem exercitum reducit misso exploratum cum quadringentis equitibus

[1] his segnibus ς: iis sensibus P.
[2] ducem Gronovius: duci P.
[3] illis ς: aliis P.
[4] ope petiti Alschefski: oppetiti P.
[5] Calliculam ς (chap. xvi. § 5): gallicanum P.

from doing; not from these sluggish policies that B.C. 217 timid folk term cautious." When Minucius held forth in this fashion, like a general encouraging his troops, a crowd of tribunes and Roman knights would gather round him, and his fiery words even reached the ears of the common soldiers; and if the election of their general had rested with the men, they showed unmistakably that Minucius would have been preferred to Fabius.

XV. But Fabius, watching his own men no less carefully than the enemy, proved first that it was not in them to overcome his resolution. Though he knew full well that his policy of waiting was in bad repute, not only in his camp but by this time in Rome as well, he held doggedly to the same line of conduct and dragged out the remainder of the summer; so that Hannibal, disappointed in his hopes of the battle which he had made every effort to bring on, was now looking round for a place to winter in; for the country where he was, though a land of plenty for the time being, could not support him permanently, being taken up with orchards and vineyards, and planted everywhere with agreeable rather than necessary fruits. Fabius was informed of this by his scouts. Feeling certain that Hannibal would leave the Falernian district, by the same passes through which he had entered it, he posted a fair-sized garrison on Mount Callicula and another in Casilinum. (The river Volturnus runs through this town, which marks the boundary between the Falernian district and Campania). The main army he led back by the same ridges, after sending on Lucius Hostilius Mancinus with four hundred cavalry of the allies to reconnoitre.

A.U.C. 537

5 sociorum L. Hostilio Mancino. Qui ex turba iuvenum audientium saepe ferociter contionantem magistrum equitum progressus primo exploratoris modo, ut ex tuto specularetur hostem, ubi[1] vagos passim per vicos[2] Numidas prospexit[3] ac per[4] 6 occasionem etiam paucos occidit, extemplo occupatus certamine est animus exciderunt que praecepta dictatoris, qui, quantum[5] tuto posset progressum, prius recipere sese iusserat quam in conspectum hostium 7 veniret. Numidae alii atque alii occursantes refugientesque ad castra prope ipsa eum[6] cum fatigatione equorum atque hominum pertraxere.[7] 8 Inde Carthalo, penes quem summa equestris imperii erat, concitatis equis invectus, cum prius quam ad coniectum teli veniret avertisset hostes, quinque ferme milia continenti cursu secutus est fugientes. 9 Mancinus, postquam nec hostem desistere sequi nec spem vidit effugiendi esse, cohortatus suos in proe- 10 lium rediit omni parte virium impar. Itaque ipse et delecti equitum circumventi occiduntur; ceteri effuso cursu[8] Cales primum, inde prope inviis callibus ad dictatorem perfugerunt.

11 Eo forte die Minucius se coniunxerat Fabio, missus ad firmandum praesidio saltum qui super Tarracinam in artas coactus fauces imminet mari, ne ab Sinuessa[9]

[1] ubi ς: urbis P.
[2] per vicos P^2: uicos P.
[3] prospexit Heraeus: omitted by P.
[4] ac per Wesenberg per P.
[5] quantum ς: quem P.
[6] ipsa eum Weissenborn: ipsum P.
[7] pertraxere ς: pertrahere P.
[8] cursu Voss: rursus cursu P.
[9] ab Sinuessa Gronovius: adminuissea P^1: adminuessa C: adminuisse P^2M.

Mancinus was one of the crowd of young officers who often listened to the blustering speeches of the master of the horse. He advanced at first as if making a reconnaissance, with the object of observing the enemy from a safe distance. But when he saw the Numidians roaming about through the villages, and had even seized the opportunity to cut off a few of them, his heart was suddenly filled with the lust of combat, and he forgot the instructions of the dictator, who had bade him proceed as far as was compatible with safety, and retire before the enemy should see him. The Numidians, first one troop and then another, by charging and then retreating, drew him on almost to their very camp and wore out his horses and his men. Then Carthalo, the commander of all the enemy's cavalry, swooped down upon the Romans at a gallop, and routing them before he had got within a javelin-throw, pursued them as they fled for nearly five miles at one stretch. As soon as Mancinus perceived that the enemy would not give over the pursuit, and that he could not hope to get away, he rallied his men and led them back into the fight, though overmatched in every particular. Accordingly, he himself and the best of his troopers were surrounded and slain, and the rest in a scattered flight made their way first to Cales, and thence, by well-nigh impassable trails, to the dictator. B.C. 217

It happened that on that day Minucius had joined Fabius. He had been sent to secure the pass which contracts above Tarracina into a narrow gorge close to the sea,[1] to prevent the Phoenician from taking

[1] This was the pass of Lautulae, mentioned at VII. xxxix. 7.

A.U.C. 537 12 Poenus Appiae limite pervenire in agrum Romanum posset. Coniunctis exercitibus dictator ac magister equitum castra in viam deferunt qua Hannibal ducturus erat.

XVI. Duo inde milia hostes aberant. Postero die Poeni quod viae inter bina castra erat agmine com-
2 plevere. Cum Romani sub ipso constitissent vallo haud dubie aequiore loco, successit tamen Poenus cum expeditis equitibusque ad lacessendum hostem. Carptim Poeni et procursando recipiendoque sese
3 pugnavere; restitit suo loco Romana acies. Lenta pugna et ex dictatoris magis quam Hannibalis fuit voluntate. Ducenti ab Romanis, octingenti hostium cecidere.
4 Inclusus inde videri Hannibal via[1] ad Casilinum obsessa, cum Capua et Samnium et tantum ab tergo divitum sociorum Romanis commeatus subveheret, Poenus inter Formiana[2] saxa ac Literni[3] arenas stagnaque et per horridas silvas[4] hibernaturus esset.
5 Nec Hannibalem fefellit suis se artibus peti. Itaque cum per Casilinum evadere non posset petendique montes et iugum Calliculae superandum esset, necubi Romanus inclusum vallibus agmen adgrederetur,
6 ludibrium oculorum specie terribile ad frustrandum

[1] via Gronovius: ut P.

[2] Formiana Sabellicus: fortunā/minas P^1: fortunae minas P^2.

[3] Literni Sabellicus: literne P.

[4] per horridas silvas Madvig: perhorridas situas P^1: perhorridas situ P^2: horridas silvas Luterbacher.

---

[1] Polybius (III. xcii. 11) says that Fabius had encamped "on a hill, in front of the pass and overlooking it."

[2] Weissenborn understands the reference to be to the Silva Gallinaria, now Pineta di Castel Volturno, in the neighbourhood of Liternum.

the Appian Way from Sinuessa into Roman territory. B.C. 217
Combining their forces, the dictator and the master of the horse camped on the road where Hannibal was going to march.

XVI. The enemy was two miles away. Next day the Phoenicians were on the march, filling the road which lay between the two camps. The Romans had formed up just under their rampart and had clearly the advantage of position.[1] None the less did Hannibal advance with his light infantry and cavalry, to provoke them into fighting. At one point after another the Phoenicians attacked, dashing up and then retreating. The Roman line stood firm. The battle was long drawn out and was more to the liking of the dictator than of Hannibal. Two hundred fell on the Roman side, and eight hundred of the enemy.

Hannibal now seemed to be hemmed in, the road to Casilinum being blocked. The Romans had Capua and Samnium at their backs and all their wealthy allies to furnish them with provisions; but the Phoenicians faced the prospect of passing the winter between the cliffs of Formiae and the sands and marshes of Liternum, and amid tangled forests.[2] Hannibal did not fail to perceive that his own strategy was being turned against him. Accordingly, since he could not get out by way of Casilinum, but must take to the mountains and cross the ridge of Callicula, fearing lest the Romans should assail his troops as they were marching through the gorges, he resolved to approach the mountains under cover of darkness in the forepart of the night, after first contriving a terrifying exhibition, to cheat the enemy's eyes. Preparations

A.U.C. 537 hostem commentus, principio noctis furtim succedere ad montes statuit. Fallacis consilii talis apparatus
7 fuit: faces undique ex agris collectae fascesque virgarum atque aridi sarmenti praeligantur[1] cornibus boum, quos domitos indomitosque multos inter
8 ceteram agrestem praedam agebat. Ad duo milia ferme boum effecta, Hasdrubalique negotium datum ut nocte[2] id armentum accensis cornibus[3] ad montes ageret, maxime, si posset, super saltus ab hoste insessos.

XVII. Primis tenebris silentio mota castra; boves
2 aliquanto ante signa acti. Ubi ad radices montium viasque angustas ventum est, signum extemplo datur ut accensis cornibus armenta in adversos concitentur montes. Et metus ipse relucentis flammae extemplo a capite[4] calorque iam ad vivum ad imaque[5] cornua veniens[6] velut stimulatos furore agebat boves.
3 Quo repente discursu haud secus quam silvis montibusque accensis omnia circa[7] virgulta ardere visa;[8] capitumque irrita quassatio[9] excitans flammam hominum passim discurrentium speciem praebebat.
4 Qui ad transitum saltus insidendum locati erant, ubi in summis montibus ac super se quosdam ignes conspexere, circumventos se esse rati praesidio exces-

[1] praeligantur ς: praeliganturque P.
[2] nocte Weissenborn: primis tenebris noctem (noctes P^2)P: primis tenebris nocte C: primis tenebris ortis Reuss.
[3] armentum accensis cornibus P: armentum H. J. Mueller: accensis in cornibus sarmentis Weissenborn.
[4] extemplo a capite Greenough: ex campie a capite P^1: ex capite a capite P^2: a capite ς.
[5] ad imaque ς: diuatimaque P.
[6] cornua veniens Luchs: cornuumaueniens P.
[7] circa Woelfflin: circuma P.
[8] ardere visa Perizonius: ardere P.

for the ruse were made as follows. Pine-knots, B.C. 217 collected from all the country round, and bundles of twigs and dry branches were tied to the horns of cattle, of which—counting those that were broken in and those that were not—they possessed, among their other rustic spoils, a considerable number. Of these they got together about two thousand head, and Hasdrubal was commissioned to drive this herd in the night, with their horns ablaze, on to the mountains, and particularly—if it should be feasible—above the pass held by the enemy.

XVII. In the dusk of evening the Carthaginians broke camp in silence, driving on the cattle a little way before the standards. When they reached the foothills and the narrow roads, the signal was immediately given to set fire to the horns and drive the herd up the mountain. And their very fear, as the flames at once shot up from their heads, and the heat, that soon penetrated to the quick at the base of their horns, made the cattle as wild as though they had gone crazy. As they suddenly rushed this way and that, all the bushes far and near seemed to be burning, as if the woods and mountains had been set on fire; and when they shook their heads, they only fanned the blaze and made it look as if men were running about in all directions. When the troops who had been posted to hold the pass caught sight of certain fires on the mountain-tops above them, they thought that they were surrounded and forsook their station. Where the fewest flames were [9] capitumque irrita quassatio Gronovius: captumque rita quaesatio P^1: captumque rita quae ratio P^2.

A.U.C. 537

sere; qua minime[1] densae micabant flammae, velut tutissimum iter, petentes summa montium iuga, tamen in quosdam boves palatos a suis gregibus inciderunt. Et primo, cum procul cernerent veluti flammas spirantium, miraculo attoniti constiterunt; deinde ut humana apparuit fraus, tum vero insidias rati esse cum maiore tumultu[2] concitant se in fugam. Levi quoque armaturae hostium incurrere; ceterum nox aequato timore neutros pugnam incipientes ad lucem tenuit. Interea toto agmine Hannibal transducto per saltum et quibusdam in ipso saltu hostium oppressis in agro Allifano[3] posuit castra.

XVIII. Hunc tumultum sensit Fabius; ceterum et insidias esse ratus et ab nocturno utique abhorrens certamine suos munimentis tenuit. Luce prima sub iugo montis proelium fuit, quo interclusam ab suis levem armaturam facile—etenim numero aliquantum praestabant—Romani superassent, nisi Hispanorum cohors ad id ipsum remissa ab Hannibale supervenisset.[4] Ea adsuetior montibus et ad concursandum inter saxa rupesque aptior ac levior[5] cum velocitate corporum tum armorum habitu campestrem hostem, gravem armis statariumque, pugnae genere facile elusit. Ita haudquaquam pari certamine digressi,

[1] qua minime Gronovius: quamnim P.
[2] tumultu s (Lipsius): multo P.
[3] Allifano s: albano P.
[4] supervenisset Gronovius: peruenisset P.
[5] levior s: leuiorque P.

flashing—for this seemed the safest way—they made B.C. 217 for the summits of the ridges, but nevertheless fell in with some of the cattle which had strayed from their herds. And at first, when they saw them afar, breathing fire, as they supposed, they were dazed by the wonder of it, and stood stock still; but afterwards, perceiving it to be a trick devised by men, they concluded that it was an ambush and took to their heels in greater confusion than before. They also ran into some light-armed soldiers of the enemy; the darkness, however, by equalizing their fears, kept both sides there till daylight without either beginning the battle. In the meanwhile Hannibal had conveyed his entire army through the pass—surprising some of his enemies in the pass itself—and had pitched his camp in the district of Allifae.

XVIII. Fabius heard the din, but believing it to be an ambush, and disliking, in any case, to fight at night, kept his men within their works. At break of day there was a battle under the ridge. The Romans had cut off the light-armed troops of the enemy from the others, and possessing some superiority in numbers, would easily have overpowered them, had it not been for the arrival of a cohort of Spaniards, which Hannibal had sent back expressly to forestall them. These troops were more used to mountains, and better suited to skirmishing amid rocks and crags, and being more agile and more lightly armed, they had no difficulty—thanks to the nature of the fighting—in getting the better of an enemy whose heavy armour and stationary tactics were adapted to level ground. Thus the struggle had been far from equal, when they parted and made off for their respective camps. Hardly any

A.U.C. 537

Hispani fere omnes incolumes, Romani aliquot suis amissis in castra contenderunt.

5 Fabius quoque movit castra transgressusque saltum
6 super Allifas loco alto ac munito consedit. Tum per Samnium Romam se petere simulans Hannibal usque in Paelignos populabundus rediit: Fabius medius inter hostium agmen urbemque Romam iugis duce-
7 bat nec absistens nec congrediens. Ex Paelignis Poenus flexit iter retroque Apuliam repetens Gereonium[1] pervenit, urbem metu, quia conlapsa
8 ruinis pars moenium erat, ab suis desertam; dictator in Larinati[2] agro castra communiit. Inde sacrorum causa Romam revocatus, non imperio modo, sed consilio etiam ac prope precibus agens cum magistro equitum ut plus consilio quam fortunae confidat et se potius
9 ducem quam Sempronium Flaminiumque imitetur; ne nihil actum censeret extracta prope aestate per ludificationem hostis; medicos quoque plus interdum quiete[3] quam movendo atque agendo proficere;
10 haud parvam rem esse ab totiens victore hoste vinci desisse ac respirasse ab continuis cladibus[4]—haec nequiquam praemonito magistro equitum Romam est profectus.

XIX. Principio aestatis qua haec gerebantur in Hispania quoque terra marique coeptum bellum est.

[1] Gereonium Alschefski: gleronum P.
[2] Larinati ς (XXII. xxiv. 1 and XLV. ii. 11): larinate P.
[3] medicos . . . quiete Valla: medico . . . quippe P.
[4] ac respirasse ab continuis cladibus Luchs: ab continuis cladibus ac respirasse P: et ab continuis cladibus respirasse ς (Madvig).

---

[1] Polybius (III. c.) knows nothing of this story, but says that Hannibal took the place, which he calls Γερούνιον, by

of the Spaniards had been hurt, but the Romans had lost a considerable number of their men. B.C. 217

Fabius, too, broke camp, and marching through the pass established himself in a lofty and naturally strong position above Allifae. Hannibal now feigned a movement upon Rome by way of Samnium, and marched back right to the land of the Paeligni, pillaging as he went. Fabius led his troops along the ridges between the enemy's army and the City, neither shunning his foe nor coming to grips with him. From the Paelignian country the Phoenician turned, and marched back towards Apulia till he came to Gereonium, a town which its own inhabitants had abandoned in their alarm at the collapse of a part of its walls.[1] The dictator encamped in the country about Larinum, and being summoned thence to Rome on religious business, commanded, counselled, and all but entreated the master of the horse to put more trust in prudence than in fortune, and rather to imitate his strategy than that of Sempronius and Flaminius. He was not to suppose, said Fabius, that nothing had been accomplished, because almost the whole summer had been tediously spent in baffling the enemy; physicians too sometimes found rest more efficacious than motion and activity; it was no small matter to have ceased to be defeated by an enemy who had so often been victorious, and to have breathed again after a series of disasters. When he had thus fore-warned the master of the horse —but all in vain—he set out for Rome.

XIX. At the beginning of the summer in which these operations were carried on, war was also begun siege, and Livy himself, in chap. xxiii. § 9, is inconsistent with his statement here.

A.U.C. 537

2 Hasdrubal ad eum navium numerum quem a fratre
3 instructum paratumque acceperat decem adiectis,[1] quadraginta navium classem Himilconi tradit atque ita Carthagine profectus naves[2] prope terram, exercitum in litore ducebat, paratus confligere quacumque
4 parte copiarum hostis occurrisset. Cn. Scipio postquam movisse ex hibernis hostem audivit, primo idem consilii fuit; deinde minus terra propter ingentem famam novorum auxiliorum concurrere ausus, delecto milite ad naves imposito quinque et triginta navium classe ire obviam hosti pergit.
5 Altero ab Tarracone die ad stationem[3] decem milia passuum distantem ab ostio Hiberi amnis pervenit. Inde duae Massiliensium speculatoriae praemissae rettulere classem Punicam[4] stare in ostio
6 fluminis castraque in ripa posita. Itaque ut improvidos incautosque universo simul effuso terrore opprimeret, sublatis ancoris ad hostem vadit. Multas et locis altis positas turres Hispania habet, quibus et speculis et propugnaculis adversus latrones utuntur.
7 Inde primo conspectis hostium navibus datum signum Hasdrubali est, tumultusque prius in terra et castris quam ad mare et ad naves[5] est ortus, nondum aut pulsu remorum strepituque alio nautico exaudito aut
8 aperientibus classem promunturiis, cum repente

[1] adiectis Luchs: adiecit P (Madvig).
[2] naves Ruperti: nauibus P.
[3] ad stationem ς: stationem P.
[4] Punicam ς: in publicam P.
[5] et ad naves P: ac naves Luchs.

[1] These numbers do not exactly agree with those given at XXI. xxii. 4.
[2] i.e. New Carthage, the modern Cartagena.

in Spain by land and sea. To the number of ships, B.C. 217 all rigged and fitted out, which Hasdrubal had taken over from his brother he added ten, and entrusted the fleet of forty sail to Himilco;[1] and then, setting out from Carthage,[2] he made his ships keep near the land and led his army along the shore, prepared to do battle with whatever part of their forces the Romans might bring against him. When Gnaeus Scipio learned that the enemy had left his winter quarters, he was minded at first to do the same; but on second thoughts concluded not to risk a battle on land, in view of the enormous number of auxiliaries with which rumour credited the Carthaginian, and embarking some of his best troops, went out to meet the enemy with a fleet of five and thirty ships.

On the second day out of Tarraco he came to an anchorage ten miles from the mouth of the river Ebro. Thence he dispatched two Massiliot scouting vessels, who reported that the Punic fleet was lying in the mouth of the river and their camp established on the bank. Accordingly, in order to take them off their guard and unprepared, while at the same time spreading a universal panic, he weighed anchor and proceeded towards the enemy. The Spaniards have numerous towers built on heights, which they use both as watch-towers and also for protection against pirates. From one of these the hostile ships were first descried, and on a signal being made to Hasdrubal, the alarm broke out on land and in the camp before it reached the sea and the ships; for no one had yet heard the beat of the oars or other nautical sounds, nor had the promontories yet disclosed the fleet to view, when suddenly

A.U.C. 537 eques alius super alium ab Hasdrubale missus vagos in litore quietosque in tentoriis suis, nihil minus quam hostem aut proelium eo die exspectantes, conscendere naves propere atque arma capere iubet; classem Romanam iam haud procul portu esse.
9 Haec equites dimissi passim imperabant; mox Hasdrubal ipse cum omni exercitu aderat, varioque omnia tumultu strepunt ruentibus in naves simul remigibus militibusque fugientium magis e terra[1]
10 quam in pugnam euntium modo. Vixdum omnes conscenderant, cum alii resolutis oris in ancoras evehuntur,[2] alii, ne quid teneat, ancoralia incidunt, raptimque omnia ac[3] praepropere agendo militum apparatu nautica ministeria impediuntur, trepidatione nautarum capere et aptare arma miles prohibetur.[4]
11 Et iam Romanus non adpropinquabat modo, sed derexerat etiam in pugnam naves. Itaque non ab hoste et proelio magis Poeni quam suomet ipsi tumultu turbati et temptata verius pugna quam inita
12 in fugam averterunt classem. Et cum adversi amnis os[5] lato agmini et tum[6] multis simul venientibus haud sane intrabile esset, in litus passim naves egerunt, atque alii vadis alii sicco litore excepti, partim

[1] e terra ς: e terrarum P: deleted by Bisschop.
[2] evehuntur Gronovius: eueherentur P.
[3] omnia ac Gronovius and Drakenborch: omnia P.
[4] prohibetur ς: prohibebatur P.
[5] amnis os Gronovius: adnisos P.
[6] tum Luchs: tam P.

---

[1] The orae were cables by which the stern of the vessel was made fast to the shore while the prow was held in position by anchors.

one galloper after another, sent off by Hasdrubal, B.C. 217 dashed up to the sailors, who were strolling about the beach or resting in their tents and thinking of nothing so little as of the enemy or of fighting on that day, and bade them board their ships in haste and arm themselves, for the Roman fleet was even then close to the harbour. These orders the gallopers who had been sent out carried far and wide, and presently Hasdrubal himself appeared on the scene with his entire army, and all was noise and confusion as the rowers and soldiers rushed down together to their ships, as though their object were rather to flee the shore than to enter battle. Hardly were they all on board, when some cast off the hawsers[1] and swung out on to their anchors, and others—that nothing might detain them—cut the anchor cables, and, in the hurry and excessive haste with which everything was done, the soldiers' gear interfered with the sailors in the performance of their tasks, and the confusion of the sailors kept the soldiers from taking and fitting on their armour.

By this time the Romans were not only drawing near, but had already formed their ships in order of battle. The result was that the Phoenicians were dismayed alike by the enemy's attack and by their own confusion, and after making rather a pretence of fighting than actually engaging, turned about and ran for it. With a line so extended—and many ships came up at the same time—they were quite unable to get into the river's mouth against the current, but rowed in anywhere to the land; and getting ashore, some through shoals and others on a dry beach, some with their arms and some with-armati partim inermes, ad instructam per litus aciem suorum perfugere; duae tamen primo concursu captae erant Punicae naves, quattuor suppressae.

A.U.C. 537

XX. Romani, quamquam terra hostium erat armatamque aciem toto praetentam litore[1] cernebant, haud cunctanter insecuti trepidam hostium classem, 2 naves omnes, quae non aut perfregerant proras litori[2] inlisas aut carinas fixerant vadis religatas puppibus in altum extraxere, ad quinque et viginti naves e 3 quadraginta cepere. Neque id pulcherrimum eius victoriae fuit, sed quod una levi pugna toto eius orae mari potiti erant.

4 Itaque ad Onusam classe provecti; escensio ab navibus in terram facta. Cum urbem vi cepissent 5 captamque diripuissent, Carthaginem inde petunt, atque omnem agrum circa depopulati postremo tecta 6 quoque iniuncta[3] muro portisque incenderunt. Inde iam praeda gravis ad Longunticam pervenit classis, ubi vis magna sparti erat,[4] ad rem nauticam congesta ab Hasdrubale. Quod satis in usum fuit sublato 7 ceterum omne incensum est. Nec continentis modo praelecta est ora[5] sed in Ebusum insulam trans-

[1] litore Madvig: in litore P.
[2] litori ς: litoreis P.
[3] iniuncta edd.: incuncta P^1: incomta P^2.
[4] sparti erat Madvig: spartis P: sparti fuit ς.
[5] praelecta est ora Weissenborn and Madvig: periectas oras P: perlecta est ora Frigell.

---

[1] Polybius says that they lost two ships with their crews, and the oars and marines of four others (III. xcvi. 4).

[2] Longuntica, otherwise unknown, was probably not far from New Carthage, for the Spartarius Campus (so named from a kind of rush-grass, still called esparto, which was out, they fled to the battle-line of their friends, B.C. 217 which was drawn up along the shore. Two, however, of the Punic ships had been taken in the first attack and four had been sunk.[1]

XX. The Romans, although the land was in the possession of the enemy, whose line of battle could be seen extending all along the shore, continued without the slightest hesitation to press their pursuit of the terror-stricken fleet, and, attaching cables to the stern of every vessel which had neither broken its prow on the beach nor grounded its keel in the shoals, they towed it out to sea, until they had captured some twenty-five of the forty ships. Nor was this the most brilliant feature of the victory, but the fact that the Romans in one easy battle had made themselves the masters of all that coast.

So they spread their sails for Onusa, where they disembarked and stormed and sacked the city, and thence laid a course for Carthage, and after devastating all the country round about, ended by setting fire even to the buildings that adjoined the walls and gates. Then the fleet—heavy-laden now with plunder—sailed to Longuntica,[2] where they found a great quantity of esparto-grass, which Hasdrubal had got together for the use of his ships. Of this they took what they needed and burned all the rest. And they not only cruised along the mainland, but crossed over to the island of Ebusus.[3] used for twisting into rope) lay inland from the latter town (see Strabo, III. iv. 9, p. 160; and Pliny, N.H. XIX. XXX.).

[3] Ebusus is the Phoenician name for either of the two islands usually known by their Greek name Pityusae—both names signifying pine-clad. Here the larger of the two is meant.

A.U.C. 537

missum. Ibi[1] urbe, quae caput insulae est, biduum
8 nequiquam summo labore oppugnata, ubi in spem
9 inritam frustra teri tempus animadversum est, ad populationem agri versi, direptis aliquot incensisque vicis, maiore quam ex continenti praeda parta cum in naves se recepissent, ex Baliaribus insulis legati pacem petentes ad Scipionem venerunt.
10 Inde flexa retro classis reditumque in citeriora
11 provinciae, quo omnium populorum, qui cis Hiberum incolunt,[2] multorum et ultimae Hispaniae legati concurrerunt; sed qui vere dicionis imperiique Romani facti sint obsidibus datis populi amplius fuere[3] 12 centum viginti.[4] Igitur terrestribus quoque copiis satis fidens Romanus usque ad saltum[5] Castulonensem est progressus. Hasdrubal in Lusitaniam ac propius Oceanum concessit.

XXI. Quietum inde fore videbatur reliquum aestatis tempus fuissetque per Poenum hostem;
2 sed praeterquam quod ipsorum Hispanorum inquieta avidaque in novas res sunt ingenia, Mandonius In-
3 dibilisque,[6] qui antea Ilergetum regulus fuerat, postquam Romani ab saltu recessere ad maritimam oram, concitis popularibus in agrum pacatum sociorum
4 Romanorum ad populandum venerunt. Adversus

[1] ibi ς: ubi P.
[2] cis Hiberum incolunt Gronovius: hiberum incolunt P.
[3] fuere edd.: fuerent P: fuerunt ς.
[4] centum viginti ς: centu uiginti milia P.
[5] saltum ς: factum P.
[6] Indibilisque ς: indebilisque P (for the evidence see Weissenborn-Mueller, Anhang p. 154).

[1] Now Cazlona. The pass led through the Sierra Morena, north of the city, which was famous for the silver and lead mines in its neighbourhood. Castulo enjoyed a close alliance

There they endeavoured strenuously for two days, B.C. 217 but without success, to capture the chief city of the island. And when they saw that their hopes were vain and their time was being wasted, they betook themselves to pillaging the country-side, and after sacking and burning several villages, returned to their ships with more booty than they had collected from the mainland. Here envoys from the Baliaric islands came to Scipio to sue for peace.

The fleet now put about and returned to the northern part of the province, and thither flocked ambassadors from all the communities on this side of the Ebro and even from many places in farthest Spain; but the communities that gave hostages and really came under the rule and government of Rome were more than a hundred and twenty. Feeling, therefore, sufficiently strong on land, as well as on the sea, the Roman general advanced as far as the pass of Castulo.[1] Hasdrubal retired into Lusitania, nearer the ocean.

XXI. It looked as if the rest of the summer would be undisturbed, and so it would have been as far as the Phoenicians were concerned. But, besides that the Spaniards themselves are constitutionally restless and eager for change, no sooner had the Romans withdrawn from the pass to the sea-coast, than Mandonius and Indibilis—the latter had formerly been a chieftain of the Ilergetes—roused up their countrymen and invaded the peaceful territories of Rome's allies, on a marauding expedition.

with the Carthaginians and one of its daughters became the wife of Hannibal. In 214 B.C. it revolted to the Romans, but by 211 was again in the hands of the Carthaginians (XXIV. xii. 7; XXVI. xx. 6).

A.U.C. 537

eos tribunus militum[1] cum expeditis auxiliis a Scipione missi levi certamine ut tumultuariam manum fudere, mille hominibus[2] occisis quibusdam captis[3] magnaque parte armis exuta. Hic tamen tumultus cedentem ad Oceanum Hasdrubalem cis Hiberum ad socios tutandos retraxit. Castra Punica in agro Ilergavonensium,[4] castra Romana ad Novam Classem erant, cum fama repens alio avertit bellum. Celtiberi, qui principes regionis suae legatos miserant[5] obsidesque dederant Romanis, nuntio misso a Scipione exciti arma capiunt provinciamque Carthaginiensium valido exercitu invadunt. Tria oppida vi expugnant; inde cum ipso Hasdrubale duobus proeliis egregie pugnant; ad quindecim milia hostium occiderunt, quattuor milia cum multis militaribus signis capiunt.

XXII. Hoc statu rerum in Hispania P. Scipio in provinciam venit prorogato post consulatum imperio ab senatu missus cum triginta longis navibus et octo milibus militum magnoque commeatu advecto. Ea classis ingens agmine onerariarum procul visa cum magna laetitia civium sociorumque portum Tarraconis ex alto tenuit. Ibi milite exposito profectus

[1] tribunus militum Gronovius: tribus mili//bus (ti stood where erasure is) P.
[2] mille hominibus Madvig: momnis P^1: omnibus P^2.
[3] captis ς: captisque P.
[4] Ilergavonensium Alschefski: lergavonensium P.
[5] legatos miserant Gronovius: legatos P.

---

[1] Perhaps identical with ad Novas mentioned in the Itinerarium Antonini as between Ilerda and Tarraco.

[2] The mention of captured standards points to Valerius Antias as Livy's source, for similar references occur in no less than five of the extant fragments.

To oppose them Scipio dispatched a tribune of B.C. 217
the soldiers with light-armed auxiliaries. They easily routed the enemy—a mere hastily-organized militia—slaying a thousand of them, making some prisoners, and disarming the greater part. Nevertheless, this outbreak induced Hasdrubal, who was retreating towards the ocean, to turn back and cross the Ebro, for the purpose of protecting his allies. The Phoenicians were in camp in the country of the Ilergavonenses, the Romans near Nova Classis,[1] when tidings came which gave at once a new turn to the campaign. The Celtiberians, who had sent their leading men to treat with the Romans and had given hostages, incited by a message from Scipio, rose up in arms and invaded the Carthaginian province with a powerful army. They captured three towns by assault, and afterwards twice engaged successfully in battle with Hasdrubal himself, slaying some fifteen thousand of their enemies, and taking four thousand prisoners, with many military standards.[2]

XXII. Such was the position of affairs in Spain when Publius Scipio came into the province.[3] The senate had prolonged his command after the consulship and had sent him out with thirty[4] men-of-war and eight thousand soldiers and a great convoy of supplies. This fleet, which the number of cargo-vessels swelled to an enormous size, caused great rejoicing amongst the Romans and their allies, when it was made out in the offing and standing in dropped anchor in the harbour of Tarraco. There

[3] Scipio had been appointed when consul (218 B.C.) to take command of the Roman forces destined for Spain (XXI. lx. 1 and Polyb. III. xcvii. 2).

[4] Polybius says twenty (ibid.).

A.U.C. 537

Scipio fratri se[1] coniungit, ac deinde communi animo consilioque gerebant bellum.

4 Occupatis igitur Carthaginiensibus Celtiberico bello haud cunctanter Hiberum transgrediuntur nec ullo viso hoste Saguntum pergunt ire, quod ibi obsides totius Hispaniae traditos ab Hannibale fama 5 erat modico in arce custodiri praesidio. Id unum pignus inclinatos ad Romanam societatem omnium Hispaniae populorum animos morabatur, ne sanguine 6 liberum suorum culpa defectionis lueretur. Eo vinculo Hispaniam vir unus sollerti[2] magis quam fideli consilio exsolvit. Abelux[3] erat Sagunti nobilis Hispanus, fidus ante Poenis, tum, qualia plerumque sunt barbarorum ingenia, cum fortuna mutaverat 7 fidem. Ceterum transfugam sine magnae rei proditione venientem ad hostes nihil aliud quam unum vile atque infame corpus esse ratus id agebat ut quam maximum emolumentum novis sociis esset. 8 Circumspectis igitur omnibus, quae fortuna potestatis eius poterat facere, obsidibus potissimum tradendis animum adiecit, eam unam rem maxime ratus conciliaturam Romanis principum Hispaniae amicitiam.

9 Sed cum iniussu Bostaris praefecti satis sciret nihil obsidum custodes facturos esse, Bostarem ipsum

[1] fratri se ς: fratris P.
[2] sollerti (solerti) ς: sollertia P.
[3] exsolvit. Abelux (abelox) ς: exsollicitatelux P.

[1] The town had not, apparently, been completely razed, as Alorcus had informed the Saguntines that it would be (XXI. xiii. 6).

Scipio disembarked his troops and set out to join his brother; and from that time forward they carried on the war with perfect harmony of temper and of purpose. B.C. 217

Accordingly, while the Carthaginians were taken up with the Celtiberian campaign, they lost no time in crossing the Ebro, and seeing nothing of any enemy, marched directly on Saguntum,[1] where it was said that hostages from all over Spain were being guarded in the citadel by a small garrison, to whose keeping they had been consigned by Hannibal. It was this pledge alone that checked the inclination of all the Spanish states to ally themselves with Rome, for fear that the blood of their own children might expiate the guilt of their defection. From this constraint Spain was released by the machinations—more clever than honest—of one man. Abelux was his name, and he was a noble Spaniard of Saguntum. Loyal hitherto to the Phoenicians, he had now—as barbarians are for the most part prone to do—altered his allegiance with the alteration in their fortunes. But reflecting that a deserter who went over to the enemy without betraying to them something of great moment was but a single worthless and dishonoured individual, he proposed to benefit his new allies to the utmost extent of his ability. And considering everything that fortune could put into his power, he inclined for choice to deliver up the hostages, believing that this was the one thing that would most effectively secure for the Romans the friendship of the Spanish leaders.

But since he knew that the men guarding the hostages would do nothing without the orders of

A.U.C. 537

10 arte adgreditur. Castra extra urbem in ipso litore habebat Bostar, ut aditum ea parte[1] intercluderet Romanis. Ibi eum in secretum abductum velut
11 ignorantem monet quo statu sit res: metum continuisse ad eam diem Hispanorum animos, quia procul Romani abessent; nunc cis Hiberum castra Romana esse, arcem tutam perfugiumque novas volentibus res; itaque quos metus non teneat bene-
12 ficio et gratia devinciendos esse. Miranti Bostari percunctantique quodnam id subitum tantae rei donum posset esse, "Obsides" inquit "in civitates
13 remitte. Id et privatim[2] parentibus, quorum maximum nomen in civitatibus est suis, et publice populis
14 gratum erit. Volt sibi quisque credi, et habita fides ipsam plerumque obligat fidem. Ministerium restituendorum domos obsidum mihimet deposco ipse, ut opera quoque impensa consilium adiuvem meum et rei suapte natura gratae quantam insuper gratiam possim adiciam."

15 Homini non ad cetera Punica ingenia callido ut persuasit, nocte clam progressus ad hostium stationes, conventis quibusdam auxiliaribus Hispanis et ab his 16 ad Scipionem perductus, quid adferret expromit et fide accepta dataque ac loco et tempore constituto ad obsides tradendos Saguntum redit. Diem insequentem absumpsit cum Bostare mandatis ad rem

[1] ea parte ς: ex parte P.
[2] id et privatim ς: de priuatim P: inde priuatim P^2.

Bostar, the governor, he artfully approached Bostar himself, who was encamped outside the city, on the very shore, to preclude the approach of the Romans from that quarter. Taking him on one side, he explained the situation, as though the other had no knowledge of it. Fear, he said, had until then kept the Spaniards down, because the Romans were a long way off; now the Roman camp was on this side of the Ebro, a sure stronghold and asylum for any who wished a change; those, accordingly, who were not bound by fear must be secured by kindness and generosity. When Bostar asked in amazement what this gift could be that should suddenly be of so great value, "Send back the hostages to their homes," said Abelux. "That will at once be grateful personally to their parents, who are the people of most consequence in their own states, and to their tribes in general. Everyone wishes to be trusted: confide in people, and almost always you confirm their confidence in you. The task of restoring the hostages to their homes I request for myself, that I may work, as well as counsel, for the furtherance of my plan, and to an act that is gracious in itself lend such added grace as I am able." B.C. 217

Once he had brought Bostar round—for his wits were not as sharp as those of most Phoenicians—he departed secretly by night for the enemy's outposts, and encountering certain Spanish auxiliaries, who conducted him to Scipio, disclosed his plan, and when he had given pledges and received them, and had agreed upon a time and place for turning over the hostages, returned to Saguntum. The following day he spent with Bostar, receiving

a.u.c. 537
17 agendam accipiendis. Dimissus cum se nocte iturum, ut custodias hostium falleret, constituisset, ad compositam cum iis horam excitatis custodibus puerorum profectus, veluti ignarus in praeparatas sua fraude
18 insidias ducit. In castra Romana perducti; cetera omnia de reddendis obsidibus sicut cum Bostare constitutum erat acta per eum eodem[1] ordine, quo si Carthaginiensium nomine sic ageretur.
19 Maior aliquanto Romanorum gratia fuit in re pari quam quanta futura Carthaginiensium fuerat. Illos enim graves superbosque in rebus secundis expertos
20 fortuna et timor mitigasse videri poterat: Romanus primo adventu, incognitus ante, ab re clementi liberalique initium fecerat; et Abelux, vir prudens, 21 haud frustra videbatur socios mutasse. Itaque ingenti consensu defectionem omnes spectare; armaque extemplo mota forent, ni hiems, quae Romanos quoque et Carthaginienses concedere[2] in tecta coegit, intervenisset.

XXIII. Haec in Hispania[3] secunda aestate Punici belli gesta, cum in Italia paulum intervalli cladibus
2 Romanis sollers cunctatio Fabi fecisset; quae ut

[1] eum eodem Weissenborn: eundem eodem: Heerwagen· eundem P.
[2] concedere P^2: quoque concedere P^1.
[3] in Hispania Koch: in hispania quoque P.

instructions how to carry out the enterprise, and left him with the understanding that he was to go at night, in order to elude the enemy's sentinels. At the hour agreed on with the Romans he wakened the boys' custodians, and led them all, as if unwittingly, into the trap prepared by his own treachery. They were then conducted to the Roman camp. The remainder of the plan for the restoration of the hostages to their friends was carried out, through the agency of Abelux, exactly as he and Bostar had agreed, and everything was done as it would have been if he had been acting in the name of the Carthaginians. B.C. 217

The gratitude which the Romans won under such circumstances was much greater than the Carthaginians would have enjoyed. For the Carthaginians had been found to be harsh and arrogant in the hour of their prosperity, and their gentleness might have appeared as the result of misfortune and timidity; but the Romans on first coming thither —and till then they were unknown—had begun with an act of clemency and liberality, and Abelux was held to have shown discernment, and not without reason to have changed his friends. The Spaniards were therefore all with one accord intending to revolt, and would have drawn the sword at once, if winter had not intervened and compelled both Romans and Carthaginians to retire to their quarters.

XXIII. Such was the course of events in Spain in the second summer of the Punic war. In Italy meanwhile the defeated Romans had been afforded a little breathing space by Fabius's wise policy of holding back. This policy, though it occasioned

A.U.C. 537

Hannibalem non mediocri sollicitum cura habebat, tandem eum militiae magistrum delegisse Romanos 3 cernentem, qui bellum ratione non fortuna gereret, ita contempta erat inter cives armatos pariter togatosque, utique postquam absente eo temeritate magistri equitum laeto verius[1] dixerim quam pros- 4 pero eventu pugnatum fuerat. Accesserant duae res ad augendam invidiam dictatoris, una fraude ac dolo Hannibalis, quod, cum a perfugis ei monstratus ager dictatoris esset, omnibus circa solo aequatis ab uno eo ferrum ignemque et vim omnem hostilem[2] abstineri iussit, ut occulti alicuius pacti ea merces 5 videri posset, altera ipsius facto, primo forsitan dubio, quia non exspectata in eo senatus auctoritas est, ad extremum haud ambigue in maximam laudem 6 verso. In permutandis captivis, quod sic primo Punico bello factum erat, convenerat inter duces Romanum Poenumque ut quae pars plures[3] reciperet quam daret argenti pondo bina et selibras in militem 7 praestaret. Ducentis[4] quadraginta septem cum plures Romanus quam Poenus recepisset argentumque pro eis debitum saepe iactata in senatu re, quoniam non 8 consuluisset patres, tardius erogaretur, inviolatum

[1] verius Gronovius: ueprius P: ut uerius ς.
[2] hostilem Crévier: hostium P (Madvig).
[3] plures Valla: prius P: plus ς (Madvig).
[4] ducentis Madvig: CC P: ducentos edd. before Madvig.

[1] So Coriolanus had spared the farms of the patricians in order to make bad blood between them and the plebeians (II. xxxix. 6).

Hannibal no small anxiety—for he saw that the B.C. 217
Romans had finally chosen a military leader who waged war as reason and not as blind chance dictated—yet incurred the scorn of Fabius's fellow citizens, both soldiers and civilians, especially when his absence had been followed, thanks to the rashness of the master of the horse, by a battle which may truthfully be characterized as having ended with more rejoicing than success. Two things, moreover, increased the dictator's unpopularity. One was a crafty ruse of Hannibal's. Some deserters having pointed out to him the dictator's farm, he razed to the ground all the buildings in its neighbourhood, but ordered that this one place should be preserved from fire and sword and every kind of hostile violence, in order that it might appear that Fabius was in this way being rewarded for some secret compact.[1] The other was something that he did himself, which, though perhaps open to criticism in the first place—because he had not waited for the authorization of the senate—redounded in the upshot, and in no uncertain manner, greatly to his fame. In exchanging prisoners the Roman and Phoenician generals had followed the example set in the first Punic war and had agreed that the side which recovered more men than it restored should pay for each two pounds and a half of silver. The Romans recovered two hundred and forty-seven more than the Phoenicians, but the senate, though the matter was often discussed, was slow in voting the money owing for them, on the ground that the dictator had not consulted them; till finally Fabius sent his son Quintus to Rome to sell the farm which the enemy had spared, ab hoste agrum misso Romam Quinto filio[1] vendidit fidemque publicam impendio privato exsolvit.

A.U.C. 537

9 Hannibal pro Gereoni moenibus, cuius urbis captae atque incensae ab se in usum horreorum pauca re-
10 liquerat tecta, in stativis erat. Inde frumentatum duas exercitus partes mittebat; cum tertia ipse expedita in statione erat simul castris praesidio et circumspectans necunde impetus in frumentatores fieret.

XXIV. Romanus tunc exercitus in agro Larinati erat. Praeerat Minucius magister equitum, profecto, sicut ante dictum est, ad urbem dictatore.
2 Ceterum castra, quae in monte alto ac tuto loco posita fuerant, iam in planum deferuntur; agitabanturque pro ingenio ducis consilia calidiora, ut impetus aut in frumentatores palatos aut in castra relicta cum levi praesidio fieret.

3 Nec Hannibalem fefellit cum duce mutatam esse belli rationem et ferocius quam consultius rem hostes
4 gesturos. Ipse autem—quod minime quis crederet —cum hostis propius esset, tertiam partem militum frumentatum duabus in castris retentis dimisit;
5 dein castra ipsa propius hostem movit duo ferme a Gereonio milia in tumulum hosti conspectum, ut intentum se[2] sciret esse ad frumentatores, si qua
6 vis fieret, tutandos. Propior inde ei atque ipsis

[1] Quinto filio Gronovius: qui filio P^1: filio P^2.
[2] intentum se Geist: intentum P.

and discharged the nation's obligation at his own B.C. 217 expense.

Hannibal lay encamped under the walls of Gereonium, where he had left a few buildings standing, to serve as granaries, when he captured and burned the city. From there he would send two-thirds of his army to gather corn; the other third, ready to march, he kept at the post under his own command, with the twofold object of protecting the camp and of guarding lest any attack be made upon his foragers.

XXIV. The Roman army was at that time in the neighbourhood of Larinum. Minucius, the master of the horse, was in command, for the dictator, as has been said before, had departed for the City. The camp had been established on a high hill in a position of security, but was now brought down to level ground; and more vigorous measures were being discussed—in keeping with the temper of the general—for attacking the enemy's scattered foragers, or his camp, which was left but lightly garrisoned.

Hannibal saw well enough that the change in leaders had brought a change in strategy, and that the Romans were likely to be more bold than prudent. But though the enemy was close at hand, he himself did something that would almost seem incredible, and sent out a third part of his troops to forage, retaining two-thirds in his camp; then he brought the camp itself up nearer the enemy, about two miles away from Gereonium, to a hill in full sight of the Romans, that they might know that he was watching to protect his foragers, if they should be at all molested. He then observed imminens Romanorum castris tumulus apparuit; ad quem capiendum si luce palam iretur, quia haud[1] dubie hostis breviore via praeventurus erat, nocte 7 clam missi Numidae ceperunt. Quos tenentes locum contempta paucitate Romani postero die cum deiecissent,[2] ipsi eo transferunt castra. Tum utique[3] 8 exiguum spatii vallum a vallo aberat, et id ipsum totum[4] prope compleverat Romana acies. Simul et per aversa castra[5] equitatus cum levi armatura emissus in frumentatores late caedem fugamque 9 hostium palatorum fecit. Nec acie certare Hannibal ausus, quia tanta paucitate vix castra, si oppugna- 10 rentur, tutari poterat. Iamque artibus Fabi,[6] sedendo et cunctando, bellum gerebat receperatque suos in priora castra, quae pro Gereoni moenibus erant.

A.U.C. 537

11 Iusta quoque acie et conlatis signis dimicatum quidam auctores sunt: primo concursu Poenum usque ad castra fusum, inde eruptione facta repente versum terrorem in Romanos, Numeri Decimi[7] Samnitis 12 deinde interventu[8] proelium restitutum. Hunc, principem genere ac divitiis non Boviani modo, unde erat, sed toto Samnio, iussu dictatoris octo milia

[1] quia haud ς: haud quia P.
[2] deiecissent Gronovius: iecissent P.
[3] tum utique Weissenborn: tumutitaque P: itaque Madvig.
[4] totum ς: tota P.
[5] per aversa castra Gronovius: per auersa castra e castris hannibalis P: per aversa a castris Hannibalis Madvig.
[6] After Fabi P has pars exercitus aberat iam fame which Hertz deleted.
[7] Numeri (Num.) Decimi ς: numeris deciri P.
[8] interventu ς: uentu P: aduentu ς.

---

[1] By the Porta Decumana.

a hill even nearer the Romans and threatening their very camp; but since, if he should attempt to take it openly by daylight, the Romans, who had a shorter way to go, would doubtless get ahead of him, he sent some Numidians secretly in the night, and they seized the hill. They were holding the place next day, when the Romans, despising their scanty numbers, dislodged them and transferred their own camp thither. There was now, at all events, but a very little space between rampart and rampart, and this the Romans had pretty well covered with their troops, which they had drawn up in line of battle. At the same time they had sent out their cavalry and skirmishers from the side of the camp which was farthest from the enemy,[1] and these had fallen upon the scattered foragers, whom they routed with great slaughter. Still, Hannibal did not dare to fight a battle, for his forces were so small that he was hardly able to defend his camp, if the Romans should assault it, and he now began to wage war by the arts of Fabius, inaction and delay, and had withdrawn his troops to their former camp, which lay under the walls of Gereonium. B.C. 217

Some writers relate that there was even a regular pitched battle, in which the Phoenicians were driven from the field at the first encounter and pursued all the way to their camp, from which they sallied and quickly dismayed the Romans in their turn; but that Numerius Decimius the Samnite then came up and restored the day. They say that Decimius, who was the person of most consequence both for family and fortune, not only in his own town of Bovianum but in all Samnium, was on his way to peditum et equites quingentos ducentem [1] in castra, ab tergo cum apparuisset Hannibali, speciem parti utrique praebuisse [2] novi praesidii cum Q. Fabio ab 13 Roma venientis. Hannibalem insidiarum quoque aliquid timentem recepisse suos, Romanum insecutum adiuvante Samnite duo castella eo die expugnasse.

A.U.C. 537

14 Sex milia hostium caesa, quinque admodum Romanorum; tamen in tam pari prope clade vanam famam [3] egregiae victoriae cum vanioribus litteris magistri equitum Romam perlatam.

XXV. De iis rebus persaepe et in senatu et in 2 contione actum est. Cum laeta civitate dictator unus nihil nec famae nec litteris crederet, et ut vera omnia essent, secunda se magis quam adversa
3 timere diceret, tum M. Metilius [4] tribunus plebis id
4 enim vero [5] ferendum esse negat: non praesentem solum dictatorem obstitisse rei bene gerendae, sed absentem etiam gestae obstare et in ducendo bello sedulo [6] tempus terere, quo diutius in magistratu sit solusque et Romae et in exercitu imperium habeat;
5 quippe consulum alterum in acie cecidisse, alterum specie classis Punicae persequendae procul ab Italia
6 ablegatum; duos praetores Sicilia atque Sardinia occupatos, quarum [7] neutra hoc tempore provincia praetore egeat; M. Minucium magistrum equitum,

[1] quingentos ducentem Gronovius: adducentem P.
[2] utrique praebuisse ς: utriusque praebuisset P.
[3] vanam famam Woelfflin: famam P.
[4] Metilius Sigonius (Plut. Fab. 7, 8, 9): metellus P.
[5] id enim vero ς: id enim P.
[6] sedulo ς: ac sedulo P.
[7] quarum ς: quorum P.

the camp, by the dictator's order, at the head of B.C. 217 eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, when, appearing on Hannibal's rear, he was mistaken by both armies for reinforcements coming up with Quintus Fabius from Rome. Hannibal, fearing some trap as well, drew back his men, and the Romans, pressing forward and assisted by the Samnites, carried, that same day, two redoubts. Six thousand of the enemy were slain and fully five thousand Romans. Nevertheless, though the losses had been so nearly equal, a foolish tale was carried to Rome of an extraordinary victory, with a letter from the master of the horse that was more foolish still.

XXV. These events were the occasion of many speeches both in the senate and in the popular assembly. The citizens rejoiced, and only the dictator refused to credit either rumour or dispatch, and declared that even though the story were all true, he feared success more than adversity. Then Marcus Metilius, tribune of the plebs, cried out that this was past all bearing: not only had the dictator prevented a successful engagement being fought while he was present, but he even objected now that the victory was won, and persisted in drawing out the war and wasting time, in order the longer to remain in office, and to continue, both at Rome and in the army, in sole possession of authority; for one of the consuls had fallen in battle, and the other—under the pretext of pursuing the Punic fleet—had been sent a great way off from Italy; the two praetors were employed in Sicily and Sardinia, neither of which required a praetor at this time; and Marcus Minucius, the master of the horse, that he might not see the enemy or ne hostem videret, ne quid rei bellicae gereret, 7 prope in custodia habitum. Itaque hercule non Samnium modo, quo iam tamquam trans Hiberum agro Poenis concessum sit, sed[1] Campanum Calenumque et Falernum agrum pervastatos esse, sedente

A.U.C. 537

Casilini dictatore et legionibus populi Romani agrum 8 suum tutante. Exercitum cupientem pugnare et magistrum equitum clausos prope intra vallum retentos, tamquam hostibus captivis arma adempta.
9 Tandem, ut abscesserit inde dictator, ut obsidione liberatos extra vallum egressos fudisse ac fugasse
10 hostes. Quas ob res, si antiquus animus plebei Romanae esset, audaciter se laturum fuisse de[2] abrogando Q. Fabi imperio; nunc modicam rogationem promulgaturum de aequando magistri equitum 11 et dictatoris iure. Nec tamen ne ita quidem prius mittendum ad exercitum Q. Fabium quam consulem in locum C. Flamini suffecisset.
12 Dictator contionibus se abstinuit in actione minime populari.[3] Ne in senatu quidem satis aequis auribus audiebatur, cum[4] hostem verbis extolleret biennique clades per temeritatem atque inscitiam ducum ac-13 ceptas referret et magistro[5] equitum quod contra dictum suum pugnasset rationem diceret reddendam 14 esse. Si penes se summa imperii consiliique sit,

[1] sit, sed C^2: sititet P: sitit sed C^1: sit sed et ς.
[2] de ς: deinde P. [3] populari ς (Madvig): popularis P.
[4] cum Hertz: huncum P^1: hunc cum P^2.
[5] et magistro Madvig: magister P: magistroque ς: magistro Frigell.

[1] Livy appears not to have believed that Minucius was made a dictator. But C.I.L., I. 1503 = Dessau, Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae, 11 (Hercolei | sacrum | M. Minuci. C. f. | dictator vov|| it), is ascribed by Mommsen to our Minucius, and Polybius (III. ciii. 4) says unequivocally that "two dictators were actually appointed for the same field of action."

carry out any military operation, had been kept B.C. 217 almost a prisoner. Thus it had actually come to pass that not only Samnium—whose territories, as though they lay beyond the Ebro, had already been surrendered to the Phoenicians—but Campania, and the districts both of Cales and Falerii had been utterly laid waste; while the dictator sat still at Casilinum and used the legions of the Roman People to protect his own estate. The army—eager as it was to fight—and the master of the horse had virtually been cooped up and confined within the rampart; and their swords, as though they had been captured enemies, had been taken from them. At last, when the dictator had gone away, they had come out from behind their works, as if released from a blockade, and had routed and put to flight their enemies. For all these reasons, if their ancient spirit had still animated the Roman plebs, he would boldly have proposed the abrogation of Quintus Fabius's command; as it was, he should move the adoption of a moderate measure, to wit, the elevation of the master of the horse to a footing of equality with the dictator.[1] Yet, even so, they must not let Fabius rejoin his army till he had first installed a consul in the place of Gaius Flaminius.

The dictator refrained from making speeches to the people, in a cause that was far from popular. Even the senate listened coldly when he spoke in high terms of the enemy, and charging the reverses of the past two years to the rashness and ignorance of the Roman generals, declared that the master of the horse must answer to him for having fought against his orders. If his authority and prope diem effecturum ut sciant homines bono imperatore haud magni fortunam momenti esse, mentem

A.U.C. 537

15 rationemque dominari, et in tempore et sine ignominia servasse exercitum quam multa milia hostium
16 occidisse maiorem gloriam esse. Huius generis orationibus frustra habitis et consule creato M. Atilio Regulo, ne praesens de iure imperii dimicaret, pridie quam rogationis ferendae dies adesset, nocte ad exercitum abiit.

17 Luce orta cum plebis concilium esset, magis tacita invidia dictatoris favorque magistri equitum animos versabat quam satis audebant homines ad suadendum quod volgo placebat prodire, et favore superante
18 auctoritas tamen rogationi deerat. Unus inventus est suasor legis C. Terentius Varro, qui priore anno praetor fuerat, loco non humili solum sed etiam
19 sordido ortus. Patrem lanium fuisse ferunt, ipsum institorem mercis, filioque hoc ipso in servilia eius artis ministeria usum.

XXVI. Is iuvenis, ut primum[1] ex eo genere quaestus pecunia a patre relicta animos ad spem liberalioris fortunae fecit togaque et forum placuere
2 proclamando pro sordidis hominibus causisque adversus rem et famam bonorum primum in notitiam

[1] ut primum Perizonius: utrum P: ut iam Luterbacher.

---

[1] This is possibly a sneer at Scipio, who after the Trebia took refuge with his beaten army behind the walls of Placentia and Cremona. In 205 B.C., Fabius's distrust of the Scipios was to take the form of bitter opposition to the son's project for invading Africa (XXVIII. xl.–xliii. and XXIX. xix.).

[2] He had been consul before, in 227 B.C.

strategy should be paramount, he would soon let B.C. 217 people know that with a good commander fortune was of little moment; that mind and reason were in control; and that to have preserved the army in its hour of danger, yet without disgrace,[1] was more glorious than to have slain many thousands of the enemy. After making several speeches to this purport, yet without effect, and presiding over the election of Marcus Atilius Regulus[2] to the consulship, that he might not take a personal part in the dispute about the command, on the day preceding the bringing forward of the resolution he left by night for the army.

When at break of day the plebs assembled in their council, though at heart they were inclined to dislike the dictator and to favour the master of the horse, yet they wanted sufficient courage to come forward and advocate a course which most of them approved, so that the motion, despite its exceeding popularity, lacked support. One man alone was found to urge the passage of the bill. This was Gaius Terentius Varro, praetor of the year before, whose antecedents were not merely base but even sordid. It is said that his father had been a butcher, who peddled his wares himself, and that he had employed this very son about the menial tasks associated with that calling.

XXVI. The young man had no sooner inherited from his father the money gained in this kind of occupation than he felt encouraged to hope for a more liberal career, and resolved to enter public life; and by declaiming on behalf of ignoble men and causes against the property and reputation of persons of the better sort achieved first notoriety

A.U.C. 537

3 populi, deinde ad honores pervenit, quaesturaque[1] et duabus aedilitatibus, plebeia et curuli, postremo et praetura perfunctus iam ad consulatus spem cum 4 adtolleret animos, haud parum callide auram favoris popularis ex dictatoria[2] invidia petit scitique plebis unus gratiam tulit.

5 Omnes eam rogationem, quique Romae quique in exercitu erant, aequi atque iniqui, praeter ipsum dictatorem in contumeliam eius latam acceperunt; 6 ipse qua gravitate animi criminantes se ad multitudinem inimicos tulerat eadem et populi in se 7 saevientis[3] iniuriam tulit; acceptisque in ipso itinere litteris senatus[4] de aequato imperio, satis fidens haudquaquam cum imperii iure artem imperandi aequatam, cum invicto[5] a civibus hostibusque animo ad exercitum rediit.

XXVII. Minucius vero, cum iam ante vix tolera- 2 bilis fuisset rebus secundis ac favore volgi, tum utique immodice immodesteque non Hannibale 3 magis victo ab se quam Q. Fabio gloriari: illum in rebus asperis unicum ducem ac parem quaesitum Hannibali, maiorem minori, dictatorem magistro equitum, quod nulla memoria habeat annalium, iussu populi aequatum in eadem civitate, in qua magistri

[1] quaesturaque ς (Gronovius): quaestura quoque P.
[2] dictatoria P: dictatoris ς (Madvig).
[3] saevientis ς: seuientem P.
[4] litteris senatus ς (Madvig): litteris s̄c̄. P.
[5] cum invicto ς: cumque inuicto P.

and then office. He had held the quaestorship and both aedileships—plebeian and curule—and finally even the praetorship. He now ventured to aspire to the consulship, and with considerable shrewdness sought to capture the favour of the populace by exploiting their animosity against the dictator, with the result that he alone reaped all the popularity growing out of the plebiscite. B.C. 217

Everyone, whether in Rome or with the army, whether friend or foe, looked on the passing of this bill as an insult to the dictator—everyone, that is, but the dictator himself, who with the same unruffled spirit with which he had borne the slanders uttered against him before the multitude by his adversaries now bore the injustice of the infuriated people. While still on the way he received a dispatch from the senate about the equal division of command, but fairly confident that though the authority of the commanders had been equalized, their abilities had not, he returned to the army with a spirit that neither fellow citizens nor enemies could daunt.

XXVII. As for Minucius, success and the favour of the crowd had already made him well-nigh insufferable. But now, at all events, he cast away all modesty and moderation and boasted of his triumph not only over Hannibal but over Quintus Fabius as well: that wonderful leader, to whom his countrymen had turned in their distress as a match for Hannibal, had by vote of the people been reduced to a level—the superior with his subordinate, the dictator with his master of the horse; and this action, to which history could afford no parallel, had been taken in that very state in which masters equitum virgas ac secures dictatoris tremere atque horrere soliti sint: tantum suam felicitatem virtutemque enituisse. Ergo secuturum[1] se fortunam suam, si dictator in cunctatione[2] ac segnitie deorum hominumque iudicio damnata perstaret. Itaque quo die primum congressus est cum Q. Fabio, statuendum omnium primum ait esse quem ad modum imperio aequato utantur: se optimum ducere aut diebus alternis, aut, si maiora intervalla placerent, partitis temporibus alterius summum ius imperiumque esse, ut par hosti non solum consilio[3] sed viribus etiam esset, si quam occasionem rei gerendae habuisset. Q. Fabio haudquaquam id placere: omnia enim fortunam[4] eam habituram quaecumque temeritas collegae habuisset: sibi communicatum cum alio,[5] non ademptum imperium esse: itaque se nunquam volentem parte qua posset rerum consilio gerendarum cessurum, nec se tempora aut dies imperii cum eo, exercitum divisurum, suisque consiliis, quoniam omnia non liceret, quae posset servaturum. Ita obtinuit ut legiones, sicut consulibus mos esset, inter se dividerent. Prima et quarta Minucio, secunda et tertia Fabio evenerunt. Item equites pari numero sociumque et Latini nominis auxilia

A.U.C. 537

[1] secuturum edd.: secuturumque P.

[2] dictator in cunctatione (con-) Gronovius: dictatoris cunctationi P.

[3] non solum consilio ς (Madvig): solum non consilio P: non consilio solum Alschefski.

[4] enim fortunam ς: fortunam enim P.

[5] alio P: illo ς (Madvig): eo Novák.

[1] So in the campaign of Cannae (216 B.C.), Varro and Paulus commanded on alternate days. In the present instance, however, Polybius III. (ciii. 7) says that it was Fabius who proposed the alternation, and that Minucius preferred that the army be divided.

of the horse had been used to tremble and shudder B.C. 217 at the rods and axes of the dictator; so conspicuous had been his own success and courage. He would therefore follow up his good fortune, if the dictator persisted in that dilatory and inactive course which gods and men had united in condemning. Accordingly, on the day of his first meeting with Quintus Fabius, he said that the very first thing to be settled was the manner in which they should exercise the joint command: he himself thought that the best way would be for each to have supreme command and authority either every other day,[1] or, if longer periods seemed preferable, for equally apportioned times, to the end that he might be a match for the enemy not only in strategy but in numbers also, if he should meet with a favourable opportunity for fighting.

This proposal by no means suited Quintus Fabius, for he saw that everything which his rash colleague should have got control of would be controlled by Fortune: he had been made, he said, to share the supreme command with another, not deprived of it; he would therefore never voluntarily relinquish that share which he possessed of the power to guide the campaign prudently; he would not divide with Minucius the times or days of commanding, but would divide the army, and in accordance with his own plans would save what he could, since he was not permitted to save everything. In this way he brought about a division of the legions, such as was customary between consuls. The first and fourth fell to Minucius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided equally the cavalry and auxiliaries, both allies and Latins. The master of

A.U.C. 537 diviserunt. Castris quoque se separari magister equitum voluit.

XXVIII. Duplex inde Hannibali gaudium fuit—neque enim quicquam eorum quae apud hostes agerentur eum fallebat, et perfugis multa indicanti-2 bus[1] et per suos explorantem;—nam et liberam Minuci temeritatem se suo modo captaturum et sollertiae Fabi dimidium virium decessisse.
3 Tumulus erat inter castra Minuci et Poenorum, quem qui occupasset haud dubie iniquiorem erat
4 hosti locum facturus. Eum non tam capere sine certamine volebat Hannibal, quamquam id operae pretium erat, quam causam certaminis cum Minucio, quem procursurum[2] ad obsistendum satis sciebat,
5 contrahere.[3] Ager omnis medius erat prima specie inutilis insidiatori, quia non modo silvestre quic-
6 quam, sed ne vepribus quidem vestitum habebat, re ipsa natus tegendis[4] insidiis, eo magis quod in nuda valle nulla talis fraus timeri poterat; et erant in anfractibus cavae rupes, ut quaedam earum ducenos
7 armatos possent capere. In has latebras, quot quemque locum apte insidere poterant, quinque milia
8 conduntur peditum equitumque. Necubi tamen aut motus alicuius temere egressi aut fulgor armorum fraudem in valle tam aperta detegeret, missis paucis prima luce ad capiendum quem ante diximus tumulum avertit oculos hostium.

[1] indicantibus ς: non indicantibus P: ultro indicantibus Pluygers.
[2] procursurum Madvig: per/occursurum P.
[3] contrahere ς: et contrahere P.
[4] tegendis ς: detegendis P.

the horse chose that their camps, too, should be separated. B.C. 217

XXVIII. All this caused Hannibal a twofold joy, for, fully acquainted as he was with whatever went on amongst his enemies both from much information brought in by deserters and from the discoveries of his own spies, he reckoned on entrapping the uncontrolled rashness of Minucius after his own fashion, while he saw that the sagacity of Fabius had been deprived of half its strength.

There was a hill between the camp of Minucius and that of the Phoenicians, and it was certain that he who occupied it would place his enemy in a rather bad position. This Hannibal was desirous not so much of capturing without a struggle —though this would have been worth while—as of using to bring on a battle with Minucius, who would sally forth, as he well knew, to oppose him. It appeared at first sight that none of the ground between could be used for an ambush, since it not only had nothing on it in the shape of trees, but was nowhere so much as screened with brambles. But in fact it was formed by nature for covering an ambuscade—all the more because in a bare valley no such trap could be suspected—for in its windings there were hollow cliffs, so large that some of them would hold two hundred soldiers. In these lurking-places Hannibal concealed five thousand foot and horse—as many in each as could readily lie in wait there. Lest, however, the movement of anyone who might carelessly step out or the glint of arms should betray the ruse, in a valley so bare and open, he dispatched a small party at dawn to seize the hill already mentioned and draw off the enemy's attention.

A.U.C. 537

9 Primo statim conspectu contempta paucitas, ac sibi quisque deposcere pellendos inde hostes ac locum[1] capiendum; dux ipse inter stolidissimos ferocissimosque ad arma vocat et vanis minis[2] 10 increpat hostem. Principio levem armaturam dimittit; deinde conferto agmine mittit equites; postremo, cum hostibus quoque subsidia mitti 11 videret, instructis legionibus procedit. Et Hannibal laborantibus suis alia atque alia crescente[3] certamine mittens auxilia peditum equitumque iam iustam expleverat aciem, ac totis utrimque viribus certatur. 12 Prima levis armatura Romanorum, praeoccupatum ex inferiore loco[4] succedens tumulum, pulsa detrusaque terrorem in succedentem intulit equitem 13 et ad signa legionum refugit. Peditum acies inter perculsos impavida sola erat, videbaturque, si iusta ac directa[5] pugna esset, haudquaquam impar futura: tantum animorum fecerat prospere ante 14 paucos dies res gesta; sed exorti repente insidiatores eum tumultum terroremque in latera utrimque ab tergoque incursantes fecerunt ut nec animus[6] ad pugnam neque ad fugam spes cuiquam superesset.

XXIX. Tum Fabius primo clamore paventium

[1] ac locum Perizonius: ad locum P.
[2] minis ς: animis et nimis P: animis et minis ς.
[3] crescente ς: aut crescente P.
[4] ex inferiore loco Madvig: inferiore loco P.
[5] directa Madvig: si recta P: recta ς.
[6] ut nec animus ς: nec ut animus P.

The Romans no sooner descried them than they B.C. 217 laughed at their small numbers, and everybody asked to be assigned the duty of dislodging the Carthaginians and capturing the place. Their general himself, as fatuous and rash as anyone, called the men to arms and railed at the enemy with idle threats. First he ordered out the light infantry; then he sent the cavalry off in a solid column; finally, when he saw that the enemy too were bringing up supports, he set forth with his legions in battle array. Hannibal likewise, as the struggle waxed hotter and his men were sore bested, sent in reinforcement after reinforcement, horse and foot, till he now had a regular army in the field, and both sides were engaged with all their forces. The Roman light infantry, as they were advancing from the lower ground on to the height which the enemy had already occupied, was the first to suffer a repulse, and as they were driven downhill, caused a panic among the cavalry, which was coming up behind them, and fled to the standards of the legions. These alone maintained their line undaunted, when all the rest were in full flight, and it looked as if, had the battle been a regular front-to-front engagement, they would have proved fully equal to their enemy—so encouraged had they been by the successful action a few days before. But the men in ambush, suddenly springing out and charging them on both flanks and in the rear, worked such havoc and alarm that not one of them had any courage left for fighting or any hope in flight.

XXIX. "There it is," said Fabius, when first the cries of the frightened soldiers were heard, and

A.U.C. 537

audito, dein conspecta procul turbata acie, "Ita est" inquit; "non celerius[1] quam timui deprendit
2 fortuna temeritatem. Fabio aequatus imperio Hannibalem et virtute et fortuna superiorem videt. Sed aliud iurgandi suscensendique tempus erit: nunc signa extra vallum proferte; victoriam hosti[2] extorqueamus, confessionem erroris civibus."
3 Iam magna ex parte caesis aliis, aliis circumspectantibus fugam Fabiana se acies repente velut
4 caelo demissa ad auxilium ostendit. Itaque, priusquam ad coniectum teli veniret aut manum consereret, et suos a fuga effusa et ab nimis[3] feroci pugna hostes continuit. Qui solutis ordinibus vage dissipati erant undique confugerunt ad integram
5 aciem; qui plures simul terga dederant conversi in hostem volventesque orbem nunc sensim referre pedem, nunc conglobati restare. Ac iam prope una acies facta erat victi atque integri exercitus
6 inferebantque signa in hostem, cum Poenus receptui cecinit, palam ferente Hannibale ab se Minucium, se ab Fabio victum.
7 Ita per variam fortunam diei maiore parte exacta
8 cum in castra reditum esset, Minucius convocatis militibus, "Saepe ego" inquit "audivi, milites, eum primum esse virum qui ipse consulat quid in rem

[1] non celerius P: celerius Lipsius (Plut., Fab. 12).
[2] hosti ς: hostibus Drakenborch: hostis P.
[3] ab nimis M^2: ab animis PC^1M^1: a nimis C^2.

then the confusion in the distant battle-line became B.C. 217 discernible; "misfortune has not overtaken rashness more quickly than I feared. Though made equal to Fabius in authority, he finds Hannibal his superior, both in courage and in fortune. But another time will do for upbraiding and resentment; for the present, march out from your trenches, and let us wrest from the enemy his victory and from our fellow citizens a confession of their blunder."

By this time large numbers of the Romans had either been slain or were casting about for a way to escape, when suddenly Fabius and his army appeared, as though they had come down from heaven to help them; and before they got within a javelin's range or struck a blow, had checked both the headlong flight of the Romans and the reckless fury of the enemy's attack. Those who had quitted their ranks and dispersed this way and that came running up on every side to the unbroken line; those who had retreated in a body faced about to meet the enemy and, forming a circle, at first slowly retreated, but presently, being more compactly drawn together, stood their ground. And now the beaten army and the fresh one had pretty much united into a single line and were ready to advance against the enemy, when Hannibal sounded the recall, declaring openly that he had beaten Minucius, but that Fabius had beaten him.

When the troops had got back to their camps, towards the close of a day of such varied fortune, Minucius called his men together and thus addressed them: "Soldiers, I have often heard that the best man is he who can himself advise us what is profit-

A.U.C. 537

sit; secundum eum qui bene monenti oboediat; qui nec ipse consulere nec alteri parere sciat,[1] eum 9 extremi ingenii esse. Nobis quoniam prima animi ingeniique negata sors est, secundam ac mediam teneamus, et dum imperare discimus, parere pru-
10 denti in animum inducamus. Castra cum Fabio iungamus; ad praetorium eius signa cum tulerimus,[2] ubi ego eum parentem appellavero, quod beneficio 11 eius erga nos ac maiestate eius dignum est, vos, milites, eos quorum vos modo arma ac dexterae[3] texerunt patronos salutabitis, et si nihil aliud, gratorum certe nobis animorum gloriam dies hic dederit."

XXX. Signo dato conclamatur inde ut colligantur vasa. Profecti et agmine incedentes ad dictatoris[4] castra in admirationem et ipsum et omnes qui circa 2 erant converterunt. Ut constituta sunt ante tribunal signa, progressus ante alios magister equitum cum patrem Fabium appellasset circumfusosque militum eius totum agmen patronos consalutasset,
3 "Parentibus" inquit "meis, dictator, quibus te modo nomine, quod[5] fando possum, aequavi, vitam

[1] sciat M^2: nesciat PCM^1.
[2] cum tulerimus ς: contulerimus P: cum detulerimus Novák.
[3] ac dexterae Madvig: dexterae P: dexteraeque ς.
[4] ad dictatoris ς: di///catoris P: per dictatoris Madvig.
[5] quod Voss: quo P.

---

[1] A sentiment borrowed from the Works and Days of Hesiod, who says (293 ff.): That man is altogether best who considers all things himself and marks what will be better afterwards and at the end; and he, again, is good who listens to a good adviser; but whoever neither thinks for able; the next best he who listens to good advice; B.C. 217 but that he who can neither counsel well nor obey another has the meanest capacity of all.[1] Since to us the first rank of intelligence and capacity has been denied, let us hold fast to the second or middle state, and while we are learning to command, make up our minds to obey a man of wisdom. Let us join our camp to that of Fabius; and when we have brought our standards to his tent, and I have given him the name of 'Father'—as befits his goodness to us and his great position—you, soldiers, will salute as 'patrons'[2] those whose hands and swords just now protected you; and, if nothing else, this day shall at least have conferred on us the glory of possessing thankful hearts."

XXX. The moment the signal was given, the order to pack was shouted round.[3] Setting forth they marched in column to the dictator's camp, to the astonishment of Fabius himself and all who were about. When they had planted their ensigns before the tribunal,[4] the master of the horse advanced in front of the rest and called upon Fabius by the name of Father, and his entire army saluted the soldiers who had gathered round them as their patrons. Then Minucius said, "To my parents, Dictator, with whom I have just made you equal in name, which is all that speech can do, I owe only my life; to himself nor keeps in mind what another tells him, he is an unprofitable man (Evelyn White's Trans. in L.C.L.).

[2] The soldiers of Fabius, by preventing the Carthaginians from capturing the soldiers of Minucius, have preserved their liberty, as the patronus guarded the liberty of his client.

[3] vasa colligere means literally "to collect one's traps," hence "to prepare to march."

[4] A platform in front of the general's tent.

A.U.C. 537

tantam debeo, tibi cum meam salutem tum omnium
4 horum. Itaque plebeiscitum, quo oneratus magis quam honoratus sum,[1] primus antiquo abrogoque et, quod tibi mihique exercitibusque[2] his tuis, servato ac conservatori, sit felix, sub imperium auspiciumque tuum redeo et signa haec legionesque
5 restituo. Tu, quaeso, placatus me magisterium equitum, hos ordines suos[3] quemque tenere iubeas."
6 Tum dextrae interiunctae militesque contione dimissa ab notis ignotisque benigne atque hospitaliter invitati, laetusque dies ex admodum tristi paulo ante ac prope exsecrabili factus.
7 Romae, ut est perlata fama rei gestae, dein litteris non magis ipsorum imperatorum quam volgo militum ex utroque exercitu adfirmata, pro se
8 quisque Maximum laudibus ad caelum ferre. Pari[4] gloria apud Hannibalem hostesque Poenos erat; ac tum demum sentire cum Romanis atque in Italia
9 bellum esse; nam biennio ante adeo et duces Romanos et milites spreverant ut vix cum eadem gente bellum esse crederent cuius terribilem[5] famam
10 a patribus accepissent; Hannibalemque[6] ex acie redeuntem dixisse ferunt tandem eam nubem quae sedere in iugis montium solita sit cum procella imbrem dedisse.

[1] honoratus sum ς: oneratus P.
[2] mihique exercitibusque ς: mihique quod exercitusque F.
[3] magisterium equitum, hos ordines suos Gronovius: magisterium equitum hos ordinibus suis P.
[4] pari Pavlikovski: par P (Madvig).
[5] terribilem ς: terribilem eam P: tam terribilem Perizonius.
[6] Hannibalemque Luchs: hannibalem quoque P.

[1] The battle on the Ticinus had been fought in the autumn of 218 B.C., and it was now late in the year 217, but the war had already lasted through two campaigns.

you I owe not merely my own safety but the safety B.C. 217 of all of these. Accordingly I am the first to reject and repeal that plebiscite which has been more onerous to me than honourable, and to place myself again under your command and auspices and restore to you these standards and these legions; and may good fortune come of it to you and to me and to these your armies, to the preserved and the preserver. Lay aside, I pray, your just resentment, and bid me retain my post of master of the horse and these their own proper companies and ranks." Then hands were clasped, and the assembly being dismissed, the soldiers were kindly and hospitably entertained, alike by friends and strangers, and a day which a little earlier had been very gloomy and almost accurst was turned into one of rejoicing.

In Rome, when the report of this affair came in, and was later confirmed by letters not only from both commanders, but from the soldiers generally in both armies, all men joined in lauding Maximus to the skies. With Hannibal and the hostile Phoenicians his renown was equally great; then for the first time they realized that they were fighting with Romans and in Italy. For during the past two years[1] they had so despised the Roman generals and soldiers that they could hardly believe that they were at war with the same nation as that of which they had heard such terrifying stories from their fathers. And Hannibal is said to have remarked, as he was returning from the field, that at last that cloud which had long been hovering about the mountain-tops had broken in a storm of rain.

A.U.C. 537

XXXI. Dum haec geruntur in Italia, Cn. Servilius Geminus consul cum classe centum viginti[1] navium circumvectus Sardiniae et Corsicae oram et obsidibus utrimque acceptis in Africam transmisit, et priusquam in continentem escensiones faceret, 2 Menige insula vastata et ab incolentibus Cercinam,[2] ne et ipsorum ureretur diripereturque ager, decem talentis argenti acceptis ad litora Africae accessit 3 copiasque exposuit. Inde ad populandum agrum ducti milites navalesque socii iuxta effusi, ac si in 4 insulis[3] cultorum egentibus praedarentur. Itaque in insidias temere inlati, cum a frequentibus palantes, ab locorum gnaris ignari,[4] circumvenirentur, cum multa caede ac foeda fuga retro ad naves compulsi 5 sunt. Ad mille hominum cum Ti.[5] Sempronio Blaeso quaestore amissum. Classis ab litoribus hostium plenis trepide soluta in Siciliam cursum tenuit 6 traditaque Lilybaei T. Otacilio praetori, ut ab legato 7 eius P. Cincio[6] Romam reduceretur; ipse per Siciliam pedibus profectus freto in Italiam traiecit, litteris Q. Fabi accitus et ipse et collega eius M. Atilius, ut exercitus ab se exacto iam prope semestri imperio acciperent.

[1] centum viginti (centum et viginti) navium Lipsius: nauium P.

[2] Cercinam Sigonius: circanam P^1: circa eam P^2.

[3] in insulis Weissenborn: insulis P.

[4] ab locorum gnaris ignari Gronovius: ad locorum et ignari gnaris (gnaris deleted by P^2) P.

[5] cum Ti. Ruperti: cum iis P: cum Doujatius: cum Tib. H. J. Mueller (XLI. xii. 4).

[6] Cincio Hertz: circi P^1: circa P^2.

---

[1] Menix (or Meninx) and Cercina were in the Lesser Syrtis. The former was supposed to have been the land of the lotus-eaters. (The modern names are Djerba and Kerkenna.)

XXXI. While these things were happening in Italy, Gnaeus Servilius Geminus the consul, with a fleet of a hundred and twenty ships, sailed round Sardinia and Corsica, and after taking hostages from both, bore away for Africa. Before descending on the mainland, he plundered the island of Menix; and after accepting ten talents of silver, which the people of Cercina gave him,[1] to induce him not to burn and pillage their territory also, he sailed in to the coast of Africa and disembarked his troops.[2] Soldiers and naval allies went off to pillage the country-side and dispersed as freely as if they were plundering desert islands. And so they quickly fell into an ambush, and losing contact with each other, and knowing nothing of the country, were set upon by large bands of their enemies, who knew it well, and driven back to their ships in a bloody and disgraceful rout. Fully a thousand men were lost, including the quaestor, Tiberius Sempronius Blaesus. Moorings were cast off in a hurry, and the fleet, leaving the shore behind it lined with enemies, stood away for Sicily. At Lilybaeum it was handed over to the praetor Titus Otacilius, to be conducted by his lieutenant, Publius Cincius, back to Rome. The consul himself proceeded overland through Sicily to the straits, where he crossed into Italy, in obedience to a dispatch from Quintus Fabius. The dictator had sent for Servilius, and for Marcus Atilius his colleague, to take over his armies, for his six months' tenure of authority was drawing to a close. B.C. 217

[2] Polybius (III. xcvi. 13) mentions the ransom of Cercina, and speaks of the capture not of Menix but of Cossyrus (a little island to the E. of Carthage). He says nothing of the landing in Africa.

A.U.C. 537

8 Omnium prope annales Fabium dictatorem adversum Hannibalem rem gessisse tradunt; Coelius etiam eum primum a populo creatum dictatorem
9 scribit. Sed et Coelium et ceteros fugit uni consuli Cn. Servilio, qui tum procul in Gallia provincia
10 aberat, ius fuisse dicendi dictatoris; quam moram quia exspectare territa tanta[1] clade civitas non poterat, eo decursum esse ut a populo crearetur
11 qui pro dictatore esset; res inde gestas gloriamque insignem ducis et augentes titulum imaginis[2] posteros, ut, qui pro dictatore creatus erat fuisse dictator[3] crederetur[4] facile obtinuisse.

XXXII. Consules Atilius Fabiano, Geminus Servilius Minuciano exercitu accepto, hibernaculis mature communitis, quod reliquum[5] autumni erat Fabi artibus cum summa inter se concordia bellum
2 gesserunt. Frumentatum exeunti Hannibali diversis locis opportuni aderant carpentes agmen palatosque excipientes; in casum universae dimicationis, quam omnibus artibus petebat hostis, non 3 veniebant[6]; adeoque inopia est coactus Hannibal ut, nisi cum fugae specie abeundum timuisset,[7]

[1] tanta H. J. Mueller: iam P.
[2] augentes titulum imaginis Gronovius: augendis titulum imagines P.
[3] dictatore creatus erat fuisse dictator H. J. Mueller: dictatore P.
[4] crederetur ς: caederetur P.
[5] quod reliquum (-quom) Madvig: quom P^1: cum P^2.
[6] Consules (§ 1) . . . veniebant P places after gererent (§ 3): the transposition was made by Froben (ed. 1531).
[7] timuisset P (Weissenborn): si fuisset Madvig.

---

[1] i.e. in Northern Italy, in the neighbourhood of Ariminum.
[2] In this inscription the expression II dictator (as in the Fasti) or bis dictator (as in the Elogium of Fabius, C. I. L.,

Nearly all the annalists state that Fabius was B.C. 217 dictator in his campaign against Hannibal; Coelius even writes that he was the first to be created dictator by the people. But Coelius and the rest forget that only the consul Gnaeus Servilius, who was then far away in his province of Gaul,[1] had the right of naming a dictator. It was because the nation, appalled by their great disaster, could not put up with so long a delay that resort was had to the popular election of an acting dictator. Thereafter the general's successes and his great renown, and the additions which his descendants made to the inscription which accompanies his portrait,[2] led easily to the belief that one who had in fact been made acting dictator had been dictator.

XXXII. The consuls—Atilius taking over the army of Fabius and Geminus Servilius that of Minucius—constructed a winter camp betimes, and carried on the war for the rest of the autumn with the greatest harmony, on the lines laid down by Fabius. As often as Hannibal went out to forage, they were sure to appear, at one place or another, harassing his march and cutting off the stragglers: a general engagement, which the enemy sought with all the arts at his command, they declined to risk; and Hannibal was driven to such extremity of want, that if he had not thought that his departure would

I. 228) very likely occurred, conveying the erroneous impression that Fabius was in 217 formally elected dictator, whereas he was in fact invested with the powers of a dictator but not with the actual title. Note that at chap. viii. § 6 Livy accepted, without citing his authority, the tradition which he now rejects and ascribes to Cœlius. This is a striking instance of the ancient custom of citing sources only in cases where the writer's suspicions are aroused.

A.U.C. 537

Galliam repetiturus fuerit nulla relicta spe alendi exercitus in eis locis, si insequentes consules eisdem artibus bellum gererent.

4 Cum ad Gereonium iam hieme impediente constitisset bellum, Neapolitani legati Romam venere. Ab iis quadraginta paterae aureae magni ponderis in curiam inlatae atque ita verba facta ut dicerent
5 scire sese populi Romani[1] aerarium bello exhauriri, et cum iuxta pro urbibus agrisque sociorum ac
6 pro capite atque arce Italiae, urbe Romana, atque imperio geratur, aequum censuisse Neapolitanos, quod auri sibi cum ad templorum ornatum, tum ad subsidium fortunae, a maioribus relictum foret,
7 eo iuvare populum Romanum; si quam opem in sese[2] crederent, eodem studio fuisse oblaturos. Gratum sibi patres Romanos populumque facturum,
8 si omnes res Neapolitanorum suas duxissent, dignosque iudicaverint ab quibus donum, animo ac voluntate eorum qui libentes darent quam re maius
9 ampliusque, acciperent. Legatis gratiae actae pro munificentia curaque; patera quae ponderis minimi fuit accepta.

XXXIII. Per eosdem dies speculator[3] Carthaginiensis qui per biennium fefellerat Romae de-
2 prensus praecisisque manibus dimissus, et servi quinque et viginti in crucem acti, quod in campo

[1] populi Romani ς: populi P.
[2] in sese P: in sese esse Weissenborn: in se esse H. J. Mueller.
[3] speculator ς: spectator P.

necessarily look like flight, he would have gone back B.C. 217 into Gaul. For he had given up all hope of supporting his army in those regions, if the next consuls should make use of the same strategy.

Winter had already brought the fighting about Gereonium to a standstill, when envoys from Neapolis arrived in Rome. Bringing forty massive golden bowls into the senate-house, they delivered themselves to this effect: that they knew that the treasury of the Roman People was becoming exhausted by the war, and since it was being waged no less in behalf of the cities and lands of the allies than for the capital and citadel of Italy—the City of Rome—and for its empire, the Neapolitans had deemed it right to employ the gold which their ancestors had bequeathed them, whether for the adornment of their temples or as a subsidy in time of need, to assist the Roman People; had they thought themselves capable of helping with their persons, they would have offered these with the same heartiness; it would gratify them if the Roman senators and people would look on all the possessions of the Neapolitans as their own, and consider that their gift deserved a willing acceptance, as being greater and of more account in respect of the friendliness and good-will of the givers than in actual value. The envoys received a vote of thanks for this generosity and thoughtfulness, and the bowl of least weight was accepted.

XXXIII. At about this time a Carthaginian spy who for two years had eluded capture was caught in Rome, and after his hands had been cut off, was allowed to go; and five and twenty slaves were crucified, on the charge of having conspired in the

A.U.C. 537

Martio coniurassent.[1] Indici data libertas et aeris
3 gravis viginti milia. Legati et ad Philippum Macedonum regem missi ad deposcendum Demetrium Pharium, qui bello victus ad eum fugisset,
4 et alii in Ligures ad expostulandum, quod Poenum opibus auxiliisque suis iuvissent, simul ad visendum ex propinquo quae in Bois atque Insubribus gere-
5 rentur. Ad Pineum quoque regem in Illyrios legati missi ad stipendium, cuius dies exierat, poscendum, aut si diem proferri[2] vellet, obsides accipiendos.
6 Adeo, etsi bellum ingens in cervicibus erat, nullius usquam terrarum rei cura Romanos, ne longinqua[3]
7 quidem, effugiebat. In religionem etiam venit aedem Concordiae, quam per seditionem militarem biennio ante L. Manlius praetor in Gallia vovisset, 8 locatam ad id tempus non esse. Itaque duumviri ad eam rem creati a M. Aemilio praetore urbano C. Pupius et K. Quinctius Flamininus aedem in arce faciendam locaverunt.

[1] quod in campo Martio coniurassent P: in campo Martio quod coniurassent V. Voss.
[2] proferri Madvig: proferre P.
[3] longinqua P: longinque ς: longinquae J. H. Voss.

---

[1] Philip V., with whom the Romans were to fight the first two Macedonian wars of 216–205 B.C. and 200–197 B.C.

[2] Demetrius of Pharus (an island off the coast of Illyria) had (in 229 B.C.) treacherously surrendered to the Romans the island Corcyra, of which the Illyrian queen Teuta had made him governor. Rewarded for this service with the governorship of a number of islands, he was guilty of plundering Roman allies, and Aemilius Paulus led an expedition against him which resulted (in 219) in his defeat and exile.

[3] In view of the revolt recorded in XXI. XXV.

[4] Whom the Romans had placed on the Illyrian throne in 228 B.C. after their defeat of Teuta.

Campus Martius. The informer was rewarded with B.C. 217 freedom and twenty thousand sesterces. Ambassadors were dispatched to Philip,[1] King of the Macedonians, to demand the person of Demetrius of Pharus,[2] who, beaten in war, had fled to him for refuge; and others to expostulate with the Ligurians, because they had aided the Phoenician with supplies and men, and at the same time to observe at close range what was going on amongst the Boi and the Insubres.[3] Ambassadors were likewise sent to King Pineus[4] in Illyria, to demand a tribute which was overdue, or, in case he wished the time extended, to take hostages. So far were the Romans, though bearing upon their shoulders the burden of a mighty war, from permitting any concern of theirs to escape them, in however remote a part of the world it lay. They were troubled, too, that the contract for the temple of Concord, which the praetor Lucius Manlius had vowed two years before in Gaul, during the mutiny of the soldiers,[5] had hitherto not been let. Accordingly the city praetor, Marcus Aemilius, appointed for the purpose two commissioners, Gaius Pupius and Caeso Quinctius Flamininus, who arranged to have the temple built on the Citadel.[6]

[5] Livy says nothing of this mutiny, which probably occurred (notwithstanding the phrase biennio ante) in connexion with the events related in XXI. XXV.

[6] One of the two summits of the Capitoline, the other being the Capitol, where stood the temple of Jupiter, Juno and Minerva. The temple of Concord, dedicated in 216 (XXIII. XXI. 7), must not be confounded with the temple of the same goddess situated at the N.W. corner of the Forum—the ruins of which may still be seen—which was first erected in 367 by Camillus on the passing of the Licinian Laws.

A.U.C. 537

9 Ab eodem praetore ex senatus consulto litterae ad consules missae, ut si iis videretur, alter eorum ad consules creandos Romam veniret: se in eam 10 diem quam iussissent comitia edicturum. Ad haec a consulibus rescriptum sine detrimento rei publicae abscedi non posse ab hoste; itaque per interregem comitia habenda esse potius quam consul alter a 11 bello avocaretur. Patribus rectius visum est dictatorem a consulibus[1] dici comitiorum habendorum causa. Dictus L. Veturius Philo M. Pomponium 12 Mathonem magistrum equitum dixit. Iis vitio creatis iussisque die quarto decimo se magistratu abdicare res ad interregnum rediit.

XXXIV. Consulibus prorogatum in annum imperium. Interrex proditus[2] a patribus C. Claudius[3] Appi filius Cento, inde P. Cornelius Asina. In eius interregno comitia habita magno certamine patrum ac plebis.

2 C. Terentio Varroni, quem sui generis hominem, plebi[4] insectatione principum popularibusque artibus conciliatum, ab Q. Fabi opibus et dictatorio imperio concusso[5] aliena invidia splendentem, volgus extrahere[6] ad consulatum nitebatur, patres summa ope obstabant, ne se insectando sibi aequari adsuescerent

[1] consulibus Ruperti: consul P.
[2] interrex proditus Luchs: interreges proditius P.
[3] C. Claudius Sigonius: c̄n. claudius P.
[4] plebi Aldus: plebis P.
[5] concusso ς concussū P.
[6] extrahere ς: et extrahere P.

The same praetor, acting on instructions from the senate, wrote to the consuls, requesting that, if it seemed good to them, one of them would come to Rome to hold an election of consuls, and promising to appoint the comitia for the day which they should designate. To this the consuls answered that they could not withdraw from the presence of the enemy without detriment to the republic; it would therefore be better that the election be conducted by an interrex than that one of the consuls be called away from the seat of war. To the senators it seemed preferable that the consuls should appoint a dictator to preside at the election. They appointed Lucius Veturius Philo, who named Marcus Pomponius Matho master of the horse. There was a flaw in their appointment and they were commanded on the fourteenth day to resign their magistracy, whereupon the state reverted to an interregnum. B.C. 217

XXXIV. The authority of the consuls was extended for a year. To be interrex the Fathers named Gaius Claudius Cento, the son of Appius, and after him Publius Cornelius Asina. The latter conducted an election, which was marked by a bitter struggle between patricians and plebeians.

Gaius Terentius Varro had endeared himself to the plebeians—the class to which he himself belonged—by invectives against the leading men and the usual tricks of the demagogue. The blow he had struck at the influence and dictatorial authority of Fabius brought him the glory which is won by defaming others, and the rabble was now striving to raise him to the consulship, while the patricians opposed the attempt with all their might, lest men should acquire the custom of assailing them

A.U.C. 537

homines. Q. Baebius Herennius tribunus plebis, 3 cognatus C. Terenti, criminando non senatum modo sed etiam augures, quod dictatorem prohibuissent comitia perficere, per invidiam eorum favorem 4 candidato suo conciliabat: ab hominibus nobilibus per multos annos bellum quaerentibus Hannibalem in Italiam adductum; ab iisdem, cum debellari 5 possit, fraude bellum trahi. Cum quattuor[1] legionibus universis pugnari prospere[2] posse apparuisset[3] eo quod M. Minucius absente Fabio prospere 6 pugnasset, duas legiones hosti ad caedem obiectas, deinde ex ipsa caede ereptas, ut pater patronusque appellaretur qui prius vincere prohibuisset Romanos 7 quam vinci. Consules deinde Fabianis artibus, cum debellare possent,[4] bellum traxisse. Id foedus inter omnes nobiles ictum, nec finem ante belli habituros quam consulem vere plebeium, id est 8 hominem novum, fecissent; nam plebeios nobiles iam eisdem initiatos esse sacris et contemnere plebem ex quo contemni a patribus desierint 9 coepisse. Cui non apparere[5] id actum et quaesitum esse ut interregnum iniretur, ut in patrum potestate

[1] quattuor Crévier: quattuor milia P.
[2] pugnari prospere Riemann: pugnari P.
[3] posse apparuisset ς: posset apparuisse P.
[4] debellare possent ς: debellare posset P: debellari posset ς.
[5] non apparere id ς: non id apparere id P.

---

[1] The absurdity of this allegation is evident as soon as one recalls the bitter opposition to Fabius and his policy on the part of a large section of the senate (see Dimsdale's note).

[2] A novus homo was one who, like Cicero, attained, first of as a means of rising to their level. Quintus Baebius B.C. 217 Herennius, a tribune of the plebs and kinsman of Gaius Terentius, railed not only at the senate but at the augurs too, because they had forbidden the dictator to accomplish the election, and by placing them in an unfavourable light, strengthened the candidacy of his friend. The nobles, he said, had been seeking war for many years, and it was they who had brought Hannibal into Italy. It was their machinations, too, that were spinning out the war, when it might be brought to a victorious conclusion.[1] That four legions if united were able to hold their own in a general engagement had been shown in a successful battle fought by Marcus Minucius, when Fabius was absent. Notwithstanding this, two legions had just been exposed to be massacred by the enemy and subsequently rescued from the massacre, to the end that the names of Father and Patron might be conferred on one who had kept the Romans from conquering before keeping them from being conquered. After that the consuls had employed the arts of Fabius to prolong the war, when they were able to have ended it. The nobles had all made a compact to this effect; nor would his hearers see an end of the war until they had elected a true plebeian, a new man,[2] to the consulship; for the plebeian nobles had already been admitted to the same rites as the others and had begun to look down on the plebs from the moment when they themselves had ceased to be looked down on by the patricians. Who could fail to see that their end and purpose in resorting to an interregnum had been to keep the election in the hands of the his family, to curule office. Such a man and his descendants were thereafter reckoned as nobles.

A.U.C. 537
10 comitia essent? Id consules ambos ad exercitum morando quaesisse; id postea, quia invitis iis dictator esset dictus comitiorum causa, expugnatum esse, 11 cum[1] vitiosus dictator per augures fieret. Habere[2] igitur interregnum eos; consulatum unum certe plebis Romanae esse,[3] et populum eum liberum habiturum ac daturum ei qui mature[4] vincere quam diu imperare malit.

XXXV. Cum his orationibus accensa plebs esset, tribus patriciis petentibus, P. Cornelio Merenda
2 L. Manlio Volsone M. Aemilio Lepido, duobus nobilium iam[5] familiarum plebeis,[6] C. Atilio Serrano et Q. Aelio Paeto, quorum alter pontifex, alter augur erat, Terentius consul unus creatur, ut in manu eius essent comitia rogando collegae.
3 Tum experta nobilitas parum fuisse virium in competitoribus eius L. Aemilium Paulum, qui cum M. Livio consul fuerat, ex damnatione collegae, ex qua[7] prope ambustus evaserat, infestum plebei, diu ac multum recusantem ad petitionem compellit.

[1] esse cum Luchs: esse ut P.
[2] habere P. Rubens: haberet P.
[3] esse ς: esset P.
[4] mature Kiehl: magis uere P.
[5] nobilium iam Freinsheimius: nobilibus iam P: nobilium Weissenborn.
[6] familiarum plebeis ς: familiarium plebei P.
[7] ex damnatione collegae ex qua Harant: et damnatione collegae et sua P.

---

[1] The magistrate who presided at the elections was naturally in a position to influence the voters by his attitude towards the various candidates.

[2] L. Aemilius Paulus and M. Livius Salinator were consuls in 219 B.C. On the expiration of their term of office, Livius was tried and convicted by the people (XXVII. xxxiv. 3) for patricians? To this end both consuls had remained B.C. 217 with their army in the field; to this end, later on, because a dictator had been named, against their wishes, for the purpose of holding an election, they had succeeded in having the augurs declare that there had been a flaw in his appointment. They had therefore the interregnum they desired. But at least one consulship belonged to the Roman plebs; and the people meant to keep it free, and bestow it on him who would rather win an early victory than remain long in command.

XXXV. When the plebs had been inflamed by these harangues, though there were three patrician candidates, Publius Cornelius Merenda, Lucius Manlius Volso, and Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, and two plebeians of families which had already been ennobled, namely, Gaius Atilius Serranus and Quintus Aelius Paetus, of whom one was a pontifex, the other an augur, Gaius Terentius was the only consul elected, and the assembly called to choose a colleague for him was therefore under his control.[1] The nobles, finding that Varro's competitors had not been able to command the necessary strength, thereupon obliged Lucius Aemilius Paulus to stand, though he held out long and earnestly against their importunity. He had been consul together with Marcus Livius, and the condemnation of his colleague—from which he had not himself escaped unscathed—had embittered him against the plebs.[2] On the next election day peculation in connexion with the war against Demetrius of Pharus (De viris illustr. 50), or unfair division of the spoil (Frontinus, Strategemata, IV. i. 45). In 207 B.C. he and his colleague in the consulship, Gaius Nero, defeated Hasdrubal near Sena Gallica, at the river Metaurus (XXVII. xl.–xlix.).

A.U.C. 537

4 Is[1] proximo comitiali die concedentibus omnibus qui cum Varrone certaverant, par magis in ad-
5 versando[2] quam collega datur consuli. Inde praetorúm comitia habita: creati M. Pomponius Matho et P. Furius Philus. Philo[3] Romae iuri dicundo urbana sors, Pomponio inter cives Romanos et
6 peregrinos evenit. Additi duo praetores, M. Claudius Marcellus in Siciliam, L. Postumius[4]
7 Albinus in Galliam. Omnes absentes creati sunt, nec cuiquam[5] eorum praeter Terentium consulem mandatus honos quem non iam[6] antea gessisset, praeteritis aliquot fortibus ac strenuis viris, quia in tali tempore nulli novus magistratus videbatur mandandus.

XXXVI. Exercitus quoque multiplicati sunt; quantae autem copiae peditum equitumque additae sint,[7] adeo et numero et genere copiarum variant auctores ut vix quicquam satis certum adfirmare
2 ausus sim. Decem milia novorum militum alii scripta in supplementum tradunt,[8] alii novas quattuor
3 legiones, ut[9] octo legionibus rem gererent. Numero quoque peditum equitumque legiones auctas milibus[10] peditum et centenis equitibus in singulas adiectis, ut quina milia peditum, treceni equites essent,

[1] is ς: is ius P.
[2] adversando Fuegner: aduersandum P (Madvig and Luchs).
[3] Philus. Philo Alschefski: philo P: philus ς.
[4] L. Postumius ς: ā postumius P.
[5] nec cuiquam ς: ne cuiquam P.
[6] non iam Madvig: iam non P.
[7] sint ς: sunt P.
[8] in supplementum tradunt Luterbacher: in supplementum P.

all those who had been Varro's rivals withdrew their B.C. 217 names, the consul was given Paulus, rather as a competent opponent than as a colleague. The election of praetors then took place, and Marcus Pomponius Matho and Publius Furius Philus were chosen. To Philus the lot assigned the urban praetorship, for administering justice in Rome;[1] to Pomponius the jurisdiction in suits between Roman citizens and foreigners. Two additional praetors were elected, Marcus Claudius Marcellus for Sicily, and Lucius Postumius Albinus for Gaul. These were all elected in their absence, and not one of them, except Terentius the consul, received a magistracy which he had not already filled before, a number of stout-hearted, active men being passed over because it seemed unwise at such a juncture to give any man an office to which he was new.

XXXVI. The armies also were augmented. But how large were the additions of infantry and cavalry I should hardly venture to declare with any certainty —so greatly do historians differ in regard to the numbers and kinds of troops. Some say that ten thousand new soldiers were enlisted as replacements; others that four new legions were enrolled, so that they took the field with eight. Some assert that the legions were also increased in the numbers of their infantry and cavalry, and that each received an additional thousand foot and a hundred horse, bringing up the total of every one to five thousand

[1] Sc. between litigants both of whom were citizens.

---

[9] ut ς: et P.
[10] milibus ς: militibus P.

A.U.C. 537 socii duplicem numerum equitum darent, peditis[1] aequarent,[2] quidam[3] auctores sunt. Illud haudquaquam discrepat, maiore conatu atque impetu rem actam quam prioribus annis, quia spem posse vinci hostem dictator praebuerat.

A.U.C. 538 Ceterum priusquam signa ab urbe novae legiones moverent, decemviri libros adire atque inspicere iussi propter territos volgo homines novis prodigiis. Nam et Romae in Aventino et Ariciae nuntiatum erat sub idem tempus lapidibus pluvisse, et multo cruore signa in Sabinis, Caere[4] aquas fonte calido[5] manasse—id quidem etiam, quod saepius acciderat, magis terrebat; et in via fornicata, quae ad campum erat, aliquot homines de caelo tacti exanimatique fuerant. Ea prodigia ex libris procurata. Legati a Paesto pateras aureas Romam attulerunt. Iis sicut Neapolitanis gratiae actae, aurum non acceptum.

XXXVII. Per eosdem dies ab Hierone classis Ostia cum magno commeatu accessit. Legati in senatum introducti nuntiarunt caedem C. Flamini consulis exercitusque allatam adeo aegre tulisse regem Hieronem ut nulla sua propria regnique sui clade moveri magis potuerit. Itaque, quamquam probe sciat magnitudinem populi Romani admirabiliorem prope adversis rebus quam secundis esse,

[1] peditis Drakenborch: peditи P.
[2] aequarent edd.: aequarunt P.
[3] quidam Weissenborn: septem et octoginta milia armatorum et ducentos in castris Romanis cum pugnatum ad Cannas est quidam P.
[4] Caere Luterbacher: caedes P. [5] calido s: callidos P.

[1] Cf. chap. i. § 10. Aelian (Varia Historia, xii. 67) and Diodorus (xvii. 10) allude to the story that the fountain of Dirce ran with blood just before the destruction of Thebes by Alexander.

foot and three hundred horse; and that double the B.C. 217 number of horse and an equal number of foot were furnished by the allies. One thing is not disputed —that they proceeded with more energy and enthusiasm than in former years, because the dictator had given them ground for hoping that they would be able to defeat the enemy.

Before, however, the new legions marched out B.C. 216 from the City, the decemvirs were instructed to consult the Sacred Books, on account of a general alarm occasioned by strange portents. For a shower of stones had been reported as having fallen at Rome on the Aventine, and about the same time at Aricia; in the Sabine country the images of the gods, and at Caere the waters that flowed from the hot spring had been drenched with blood—a prodigy all the more alarming from its having occurred so often;[1] and in the arched way which used to lead to the Campus Martius some men had been struck by lightning and killed. These prodigies were expiated as the Books directed. Ambassadors came from Paestum, bringing golden bowls to Rome. They were thanked, as the Neapolitans had been, but the gold was not accepted.

XXXVII. About this time a fleet came in to Ostia from King Hiero with a great store of supplies. His envoys were introduced into the senate, where they told how the news of the destruction of Gaius Flaminius the consul and his army had so grieved the King that no disaster to himself or his own kingdom could have distressed him more. Accordingly, though well aware that the greatness of the Roman People was almost more astonishing in adversity than in prosperity, he had nevertheless sent

A.U.C. 538

4 tamen se[1] omnia quibus a bonis fidelibusque sociis bella iuvari soleant misisse; quae ne accipere abnuant 5 magno opere se patres conscriptos orare. Iam omnium primum ominis causa Victoriam auream pondo ducentum ac viginti adferre sese: acciperent eam tenerentque et haberent propriam et perpetuam. 6 Advexisse etiam trecenta milia modium tritici, ducenta hordei, ne commeatus deessent, et quantum praeterea opus esset, quo iussissent, subvecturos. 7 Milite atque equite scire nisi Romano Latinique nominis non uti populum Romanum; levium armorum[2] auxilia etiam externa vidisse in castris 8 Romanis; itaque misisse mille sagittariorum ac funditorum, aptam manum adversus Baliares ac 9 Mauros pugnacesque alias missili telo gentes. Ad ea dona consilium[3] quoque addebant, ut praetor cui provincia Sicilia evenisset classem[4] in Africam traiceret, ut et hostes in terra sua bellum haberent minusque laxamenti daretur iis ad auxilia Hannibali summittenda.

10 Ab senatu ita responsum regiis[5] est, virum bonum egregiumque socium Hieronem esse atque uno tenore, ex quo in amicitiam populi Romani venerit, fidem coluisse ac rem Romanam omni tempore ac loco munifice adiuvisse. Id perinde ac deberet 11 gratum populo Romano esse. Aurum et a civita-

[1] tamen se Gronovius: mense P^1: missa a se P^2: tamen senatui (or tamen) Luterbacher.
[2] armorum Gronovius: armatorum P.
[3] consilium ς: consilio P.
[4] classem P: classe C. Heraeus.
[5] regiis Bitschofsky: regis P: regi ς: regis legatis Luchs.

[1] The modius was about equivalent to our peck.

them all those things with which good and faithful allies were wont to assist their friends in time of war, and he earnestly besought the Conscript Fathers not to refuse them. In the first place, for the omen's sake, they were bringing a golden Victory, weighing two hundred and twenty pounds, which they begged the Romans to accept and keep, and to regard it as their own for ever. They had also brought three hundred thousand measures[1] of wheat and two hundred thousand of barley, that there might be no failure of provision; and whatever additional quantity were needed they stood ready to convey to any place which the senate might designate. For heavy foot and horse, the King knew that the Roman People employed none but Romans and Latins; but amongst the light-armed auxiliaries, he had seen in the camps of the Romans even foreigners; he had therefore sent a thousand archers and slingers, a force well adapted to cope with Moors and Baliares and other tribes that fought with missiles. To these gifts they added a piece of advice, that the praetor, namely, who might be assigned to Sicily should sail over with his fleet to Africa, so that the enemy, too, might have war on their own soil, whereby they would experience less freedom in dispatching aid to Hannibal. B.C. 216

The senate, in replying to the royal emissaries, said that Hiero was a good man and a rare ally, who from the time when he became a friend of the Roman People had maintained an unswerving loyalty, and always and in every place had given generous assistance to the Roman cause. For this the Romans were grateful, as in duty bound. As for the gold, other states as well had proffered it, but the Roman

A.U.C. 538 tibus quibusdam allatum gratia rei accepta non 12 accepisse populum Romanum; Victoriam omenque accipere sedemque ei divae[1] dare dicare Capitolium, templum Iovis optimi maximi. In ea arce urbis Romanae sacratam, volentem propitiamque, firmam ac stabilem fore populo Romano.

13 Funditores sagittariique et frumentum traditum consulibus. Quinqueremes ad quinquaginta navium[2] classem quae cum T. Otacilio[3] propraetore in Sicilia erat[4] quinque et viginti additae, permissumque est ut, si e re publica censeret esse, in Africam traiceret.

XXXVIII. Dilectu perfecto consules paucos morati dies, dum ab sociis ac[5] nomine Latino venirent
2 milites. Tum, quod nunquam antea factum erat,
3 iure iurando ab tribunis militum adacti milites; nam ad eam diem nihil praeter sacramentum fuerat, iussu consulum conventuros neque iniussu abituros,[6] et ubi convenissent,[7] sua voluntate ipsi inter sese de-
4 curiati equites, centuriati pedites coniurabant sese fugae atque formidinis ergo non abituros neque ex ordine recessuros nisi teli sumendi aut petendi et 5 aut hostis feriendi aut civis servandi causa. Id ex voluntario inter ipsos foedere ad tribunos ac[8] legitimam iuris iurandi adactionem translatum.

[1] ei divae Novák: ei se divae P.

[2] ad quinquaginta navium Luterbacher (XXI. li. 7): ad nauium P: ad centum viginti navium Gronovius (XXII. xxxi. 1): ad navium centum Boettcher (XXIV. xxvii. 5).

[3] T. Otacilio Aldus: m̄ otacilio P.

[4] erat ς: erant P.

[5] ab sociis ac Madvig: sociis ab P.

[6] the words iussu . . . iniussu abituros were placed here by Crévier: in P they stand after adacti milites.

[7] convenissent C. F. Mueller: ad decuriatum aut centuriatum conuenissent P.

People, though thankful for the kind intention, had not accepted it; the Victory and her omen they did accept; and to that goddess they dedicated and assigned the Capitol, the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, to be her seat. Established in that citadel of Rome she would be gracious and propitious, faithful and steadfast, to the Roman People. B.C. 216

The slingers and archers and the corn were turned over to the consuls. Twenty-five quinqueremes were added to the fleet of fifty ships that was under the command of Titus Otacilius in Sicily, and permission was given him, if he deemed it advantageous to the state, to sail across to Africa.

XXXVIII. When they had finished with the levy, the consuls waited a few days for the soldiers from the allies and the Latins to come in. An oath was then administered to the soldiers by their tribunes—which was a thing that they had never done before. For until that day there had only been the general oath[1] to assemble at the bidding of the consuls and not depart without their orders; then, after assembling, they would exchange a voluntary pledge amongst themselves—the cavalrymen in their decuries and the infantry in their centuries—that they would not abandon their ranks for flight or fear, but only to take up or seek a weapon, either to smite an enemy or to save a fellow citizen. This voluntary agreement amongst the men themselves was replaced by an oath administered formally by the tribunes.

[1] Like the one mentioned in chap. xi. § 8 of the year before, or in III. xx. 3, of 460 B.C.

---

[8] ac Weissenborn: ad P.

A.U.C. 538 6 Contiones, priusquam ab urbe signa moverentur, consulis Varronis multae ac feroces fuere denuntiantis[1] bellum arcessitum in Italiam ab nobilibus 7 mansurumque in visceribus rei publicae, si plures Fabios imperatores haberet, se quo die hostem 8 vidisset perfecturum. Collegae eius Pauli una, pridie quam ab urbe[2] proficisceretur, contio fuit, verior quam gratior populo, qua nihil inclementer 9 in Varronem dictum nisi id modo, mirari se, quidni, qui[3] dux, priusquam aut suum aut hostium exercitum, locorum situm, naturam regionis nosset, iam nunc togatus[4] in urbe sciret quae sibi agenda 10 armato forent, et diem[5] quoque praedicere posset 11 qua cum hoste signis collatis esset dimicaturus. Se, quae consilia magis res dent hominibus quam homines rebus, ea ante tempus immatura non praecepturum. Optare ut quae caute ac[6] consulte gesta essent satis 12 prospere evenirent; temeritatem, praeterquam quod stulta sit, infelicem etiam ad id locorum fuisse. 13 Sua[7] sponte apparebat tuta celeribus consiliis praepositurum; et, quo id constantius perseveraret, Q. Fabius Maximus sic eum proficiscentem adlocutus fertur:

XXXIX. "Si aut collegam, id quod mallem, tui similem, L. Aemili, haberes aut tu collegae tui 2 esses similis, supervacanea esset oratio mea; nam et duo boni consules etiam me indicente[8] omnia

[1] denuntiantis C^2: denuntiantes PC^1.
[2] ab urbe ς: ex urbe ς: in urbe P: urbi Riemann.
[3] quidni, qui Zachariae: quodnequi P: quinam C. Heraeus.
[4] togatus Muretus: locatus P.
[5] et diem (diem Zachariae) Madvig.
[6] ac ς: a P^1: et H. J. Mueller.
[7] sua Luchs: id sua P: et sua Gronovius.
[8] indicente ς (Gronovius): indigentes P.

Before the troops marched from the City, the consul Varro uttered many truculent harangues. He declared that the war had been brought into Italy by the nobles, and would not cease to prey upon the nation's vitals, if they had many generals like Fabius; but that he himself would put an end to it on the day when he came within sight of the enemy. His colleague Paulus spoke but once, on the day before he left the City. His words were more truthful than agreeable to the people; but he said nothing harsh against Varro, except this: that he marvelled—and indeed how should he not?—that a general, who before he knew either his own or the enemy's army or the lie of the land or the character of the country, was already certain, ere he had yet laid aside the dress of a civilian, what measures he must adopt when in the field—he marvelled that such a general should even be able to predict the very day on which he would be giving battle to the enemy! For himself, he would not anticipate, before they ripened, those plans with which circumstances provided men but which men could not well impose on circumstances. He hoped that what was done with care and caution would turn out for the best: rashness was not only foolish but had hitherto been unfortunate as well It was quite apparently his own intention to choose a safe course rather than a hasty one; and, to confirm him in this resolution, Quintus Fabius Maximus is said to have addressed him, on his setting out, to this effect:— B.C. 216

XXXIX. "If either, Lucius Aemilius, you had, as I should prefer, a colleague like yourself, or if you were like your colleague, my words would be superfluous. For, as two good consuls, even if I held my

A.U.C. 538

e re publica fideque[1] vestra faceretis, et mali[2] nec mea verba auribus vestris nec consilia animis accipe-
3 retis. Nunc et collegam tuum et te talem virum intuenti mihi tecum omnis oratio est, quem video nequiquam et virum bonum et civem fore, si altera parte claudente re publica[3] malis consiliis idem ac
4 bonis iuris et potestatis erit. Erras enim, L. Paule, si tibi minus certaminis cum C. Terentio quam cum Hannibale futurum censes; nescio an infestior hic
5 adversarius quam ille hostis maneat te, et[4] cum illo in acie tantum cum hoc omnibus locis ac temporibus sis certaturus, et[5] adversus Hannibalem legionesque eius tuis equitibus ac peditibus pugnandum tibi sit, Varro dux tuis militibus te sit oppugnaturus.
6 "Ominis etiam tibi causa absit C. Flamini memoria. Tamen ille consul demum et in provincia et ad exercitum coepit furere: hic, priusquam peteret consulatum, deinde in petendo consulatu, nunc quoque consul, priusquam castra videat aut hostem, insanit.
7 Et qui[6] tantas iam nunc procellas proelia atque acies iactando inter togatos ciet, quid inter armatam iuventutem censes facturum et ubi extemplo res verba
8 sequitur? Atqui si,[7] quod facturum se denuntiat, extemplo pugnaverit, aut ego rem militarem, belli

[1] fideque Perizonius: fide P: ac fide H. J. Mueller.
[2] mali ς: malem P.
[3] claudente re publica Ussing: claudet rei p̄ P.
[4] maneat te, et Fabri: maneat et P: maneat te Madvig.
[5] scis certaturus, et ς: si certaturus est P^1: certaturus est P^2.
[6] qui ς: quia P.
[7] si Luchs: sic P: si hic ς: si, id Harant.

peace, you would act in all respects in accordance with the public interest and your own loyalty; and, as bad ones, you would neither take my words into your ears nor my advice into your hearts. As it is, when I see what your colleague is like and what you are like, it is to you alone that I must address myself: though I perceive that you will be a good man and good citizen to little purpose, if the state is lame on the other side and evil counsels enjoy the same rights and the same authority as good. For you err, Lucius Paulus, if you suppose that your struggle will be less with Gaius Terentius than with Hannibal. I am not sure that you may not find the one more dangerous as an opponent than the other as an enemy, and that with your enemy you will have to contend only in battle; with your opponent, everywhere and at all times. Against Hannibal and his legions you will have your cavalry and infantry to fight for you: when Varro takes the field, it will be to attack you with your own soldiers. B.C. 216

"For the very omen's sake, I would not have you remember Gaius Flaminius! Yet Flaminius only began to rave when he had been made consul and was in his province and had joined his army; whereas Varro was mad before he sought the consulship, as he was thereafter during his canvass, and is now as consul, before he has ever beheld his camp or the enemy. And if a man can rouse such gusts of passion even now, by bragging of battles and of stricken fields among civilians, what think you he will do when surrounded by armed youths, where words are translated instantly into deeds? And yet, if he fights at once, as he declares that he intends to do, either I know nothing of military science, of the hoc genus, hostem hunc ignoro, aut nobilior alius Trasumenno locus nostris cladibus erit.

A.U.C. 538

9 "Nec[1] gloriandi tempus adversus unum est, et[2] ego contemnendo potius quam adpetendo gloriam modum excesserim; sed ita res se habet: una ratio belli gerendi adversus Hannibalem est qua ego gessi.
10 Nec eventus modo hoc docet—stultorum iste magister est—sed eadem ratio quae fuit futura,[3] donec res
11 eaedem manebunt, immutabilis est. In Italia bellum gerimus, in sede ac solo nostro; omnia circa plena civium ac sociorum sunt; armis viris equis com-
12 meatibus iuvant iuvabuntque—id iam fidei documentum in adversis rebus nostris dederunt; meliores, prudentiores constantiores nos tempus diesque facit.
13 Hannibal contra in aliena, in hostili est terra, inter omnia inimica infestaque, procul ab domo ac patria;[4] neque illi terra neque mari est pax; nullae eum urbes accipiunt, nulla moenia; nihil usquam sui
14 videt; in diem rapto[5] vivit; partem vix tertiam exercitus eius habet quem Hiberum amnem traiecit; plures fame quam ferro absumpti,[6] nec his paucis
15 iam victus suppeditat. Dubitas ergo quin sedendo superaturi simus eum qui senescat in dies, non commeatus, non supplementum, non pecuniam
16 habeat? Quam diu pro Gereoni, castelli Apuliae

[1] nec ς: ne P. [2] et ς: ut P.
[3] futura J. Fischer: futura quae P: futuraque ς.
[4] ac patria H. J. Mueller: ab patria P.
[5] rapto ς: capto P.
[6] absumpti Heerwagen: absumsit P.

[1] Mommsen, History of Rome, ii. p. 285 (cited by Dowdall), remarks that "it was not the Cunctator that saved Rome but the compact structure of its confederacy, and not less, perhaps, the national hatred with which the Phoenician hero was regarded on the part of the Occidentals."

nature of this war, and of our enemy, or another B.C. 216 place will be more notorious than Trasumennus for our overthrow.

"It is no time to boast, when I am speaking to one man, and for my part I had rather go too far in despising than in seeking reputation; but the simple truth is that the only way of conducting a war with Hannibal is the way in which I have conducted it; and not only the event—that schoolmaster of fools—teaches us this, but the same reasoning which held good then will hold unchanged, so long as circumstances remain the same. It is in Italy, our home-land, that we are fighting; everywhere about us are fellow citizens and friends; they are helping us with arms, men, horses, and supplies, and will continue helping us—such proof of loyalty have they already given us in our adversity;[1] each day that passes makes us better, wiser, more steadfast men. Hannibal, on the contrary, is in an alien and hostile country, where all his surroundings are inimical and threatening, far from home and native city; for him there is no peace, on either land or sea; no cities receive him, no walls protect him; nowhere does he see aught that he can call his own; he subsists on the plunder of each day; he has barely a third of that army which he led across the Ebro; more have perished by starvation than by the sword, and the few that are left have no longer any food. Can you doubt then that if we sit still we must gain the victory over one who is growing weaker every day and is destitute of provisions, of replacements, and of money? How long, before Gereonium,[2] a pitiful fort in Apulia, as if it had been

[2] See chap. xxiii. § 9. The sentence was to have ended with something like sedet? ("has he been sitting?").

A.U.C. 538 inopis, tamquam pro Carthaginis moenibus—sed ne 17 adversus te quidem de me[1] gloriabor; Servilius[2] atque Atilius, proximi consules, vide quem ad modum eum ludificati sint.

"Haec una salutis est via, L. Paule, quam difficilem infestamque cives tibi[3] magis quam[4] hostes facient. 18 Idem enim tui quod hostium milites volent; idem Varro consul Romanus quod Hannibal Poenus imperator cupiet. Duobus ducibus unus resistas oportet. Resistes autem, si adversus[5] famam rumoresque hominum satis firmus steteris, si te neque collegae 19 vana[6] gloria neque tua falsa infamia moverit. Veritatem[7] laborare nimis saepe aiunt, exstingui nun- 20 quam; vanam gloriam[8] qui spreverit veram habebit. Sine timidum pro cauto, tardum pro considerato, imbellem pro perito belli vocent. Malo te sapiens hostis metuat quam stulti cives laudent. Omnia audentem contemnet Hannibal, nihil temere agentem 21 metuet. Nec ego ut nihil agatur suadeo,[9] sed ut agentem te ratio ducat, non fortuna; tuae potestatis semper tu tuaque omnia sint; armatus intentusque sis; neque occasioni tuae desis neque suam occa- 22 sionem hosti des. Omnia non properanti clara certaque erunt; festinatio improvida est et caeca."

XL. Adversus ea oratio consulis haud sane laeta fuit magis fatentis[10] ea quae diceret vera quam facilia

[1] quidem de me Alschefski: quideme P.
[2] Servilius Luchs: p̄. seruilius P: cn. seruilius ς.
[3] tibi ς: sibi Γ. [4] magis quam ς: quam magis P.
[5] si adversus Madvig: aduersus P. [6] vana ς: una P.
[7] veritatem ϛ: ꝛ ueritate P.
[8] vanam gloriam H. J. Mueller (gloriam vanam Muretus): gloriam P.
[9] agatur suadeo Madrig: agatur P.
[10] fatentis ς: patentis P^1: petentis P^2.

the walls of Carthage, has he—but of myself I will B.C. 216 not boast, even to you. See how the consuls of last year, Servilius and Atilius, made a mock of him!

"This is the only way of safety, Lucius Paulus, and your fellow citizens will do more than your enemies to make it hard and dangerous for you. For your own soldiers will desire the same thing as the soldiers of the enemy; Varro, the Roman consul, will long for the same thing as Hannibal, the Phoenician commander-in-chief. Single-handed you will have to thwart two generals. But thwart them you will, if you stand out with sufficient firmness against rumours and men's idle talk, if neither the foolish applause bestowed upon your colleague nor your own unmerited disgrace shall move you. Truth, they say, is all too frequently eclipsed but never extinguished. He who scorns false glory shall possess the true. Let them call you timid, instead of cautious; slow, instead of circumspect; unwarlike, instead of experienced soldier. I had rather a wise enemy should fear you than foolish fellow citizens should praise you. He who dares all things will earn Hannibal's contempt; he who does nothing rashly will inspire him with fear. Yet I do not urge that you do nothing, but that reason and not fortune should be your guide. Be master always of yourself and all that is yours; be armed and watchful; be not wanting when opportunity presents itself to you, neither present an opportunity to your enemy. All things will be clear and definite to one who does not hurry. Haste is improvident and blind."

XL. In reply to this the consul spoke in no very cheerful strain, admitting rather that what Fabius said was true than that it was easy of accomplish-

A.U.C. 538

2 factu esse. Dictatori magistrum equitum intolerabilem fuisse: quid consuli[1] adversus collegam seditiosum ac temerarium virium atque auctoritatis
3 fore? Se populare incendium priore consulatu semustum effugisse; optare ut omnia prospere evenirent;[2] sed si[3] quid adversi caderet,[4] hostium se telis potius quam suffragiis iratorum civium caput 4 obiecturum.

Ab hoc sermone profectum Paulum tradunt prosequentibus primoribus patrum; plebeium consulem sua plebes prosecuta, turba conspectior, cum dignitates deessent.

5 Ut in castra venerunt, permixto novo exercitu ac vetere, castris bifariam factis, ut nova minora essent propius Hannibalem, in veteribus maior pars et omne
6 robur virium esset, consulum[5] anni prioris M. Atilium aetatem excusantem Romam miserunt, Geminum Servilium in minoribus castris legioni Romanae et socium peditum equitumque duobus milibus praefici-
7 unt. Hannibal, quamquam parte dimidia auctas hostium copias cernebat, tamen adventu consulum mire gaudere. Non solum enim nihil ex raptis in diem commeatibus superabat, sed ne unde raperet quidem quicquam reliqui erat[6] omni undique frumento, postquam ager parum tutus erat, in urbes
8 munitas convecto, ut vix decem dierum, quod com-

[1] consuli ς (Florebellus): consilia P.

[2] prospere evenirent ς: prospe/reuenirent P: prospera euenirent ς.

[3] sed si Heerwagen: et si P: at si ς: si H. J. Mueller.

[4] caderet ς: caperet P.

[5] consulum Crévier: consultum P: consulum tum (or tum consulum) ς.

[6] reliqui erat ς: reliquerat P.

ment. The dictator had found his master of the horse intolerable: what power or influence then would a consul have over a turbulent and headstrong colleague? In his former consulship he had escaped badly burnt from the flames of popular resentment; he hoped that everything would turn out for the best; but if any misfortune should befall, he would sooner expose his life to the swords of the enemy than to the suffrages of his angry fellow citizens. B.C. 216

Immediately after this conference they say that Paulus set out, escorted by the foremost senators: the plebeian consul was escorted by his own friends, the plebeians—in point of numbers the more imposing throng, though it contained no persons of distinction.

When they got to the camp, the new forces were united with the old and the camp was divided into two, with the new and smaller one nearer Hannibal, while the greater part of the army and all the choicest troops were in the old one. Of the consuls of the year before, Marcus Atilius pleaded the excuse of age and was sent back to Rome; Geminus Servilius was put in command of the smaller camp, having under him a Roman legion and two thousand infantry and cavalry of the allies. Hannibal, though he perceived that the forces of his enemies were augmented by a half, was nevertheless greatly rejoiced at the coming of the consuls. For not only were the spoils exhausted on which his men had subsisted from day to day, but there was not even any district left for them to spoil; for when it appeared that the farms were no longer safe, the corn had everywhere been carried into the walled towns, and in consequence there was barely grain pertum postea est, frumentum superesset Hispanorumque ob inopiam transitio parata fuerit, si maturitas temporum exspectata foret.

A.U.C. 538

XLI. Ceterum temeritati consulis ac praepropero[1] ingenio materiam etiam fortuna dedit, quod in prohibendis praedatoribus tumultuario proelio a procursu[2] magis militum quam ex praeparato aut iussu imperatorum orto haudquaquam par Poenis dimicatio
2 fuit. Ad mille et septingenti caesi, non plus centum Romanorum sociorumque occisis. Ceterum victoribus effuse sequentibus metu insidiarum obstitit Paulus
3 consul, cuius eo die—nam alternis imperitabant—imperium erat, Varrone indignante ac vociferante emissum hostem e manibus debellarique, ni cessatum foret, potuisse.
4 Hannibal id damnum haud aegerrime pati; quin potius gaudere[3] velut inescatam temeritatem ferocioris consulis ac novorum maxime militum esse.
5 Et omnia ei hostium haud secus quam sua nota erant: dissimiles discordesque imperitare, duas prope
6 partes tironum militum in exercitu esse. Itaque locum et tempus insidiis aptum se habere ratus nocte proxima nihil praeter arma ferente secum milite[4]
7 castra plena omnis fortunae publicae privataeque

[1] praepropero ς: prospero P.
[2] a procursu Heraeas: ac procursu P.
[3] gaudere Pluygers: credere P.
[4] ferente secum milite Weissenborn: ferentis secum milites P.

[1] Obviously Varro is meant, but it is rather odd that he should not be specified. Weissenborn thinks it likely that with this paragraph Livy began to draw from another source and did not notice the indefiniteness of the word consulis in the resulting context.

enough left—as was afterwards discovered—to last ten days, and the Spaniards, for want of food, had made ready to desert, if the Romans had only waited till the time was ripe. B.C. 216

XLI. But even Fortune furnished material to the recklessness and over-hasty temper of the consul.[1] The repulse of a foraging party had led to a general mellay, which came about from the soldiers rushing forward to attack the enemy, rather than from any plan or orders on the part of the generals; and in this the Phoenicians by no means held their own. About seventeen hundred of them were slain and not more than a hundred of Romans and allies. But the consul Paulus, who was in command that day—for they commanded on alternate days—was fearful of an ambuscade and checked the victors in their headlong pursuit, despite the angry remonstrances of Varro, who cried out that they had let the enemy slip through their hands and that they might have brought the war to a conclusion if they had not relaxed their efforts.

Hannibal was not greatly disconcerted by this reverse; indeed he rejoiced that the hook should have been baited, as it were, for the rashness of the more impetuous consul, and especially for that of the new soldiers. All the circumstances of his enemies were as familiar to him as his own: that their generals were unlike each other and were at loggerheads, and that nearly two-thirds of their army consisted of recruits. Believing, therefore, that place and time were favourable for a ruse, he left his camp full of every sort of public and of private riches, and putting himself at the head of his troops, who carried nothing but their weapons, marched over the nearest

A.U.C. 538 relinquit transque proximos montes laeva pedites instructos condit, dextra equites, impedimenta per 8 convallem[1] mediam[2] traducit, ut diripiendis velut desertis fuga dominorum castris occupatum impedi-
9 tumque hostem opprimeret. Crebri relicti in castris ignes, ut fides fieret, dum ipse longius spatium fuga praeciperet, falsa imagine castrorum, sicut Fabium priore anno frustratus esset, tenere in locis consules voluisse.

XLII. Ubi inluxit, subductae primo stationes, deinde propius adeuntibus insolitum silentium ad-
2 mirationem fecit. Tum satis comperta solitudine in castris concursus fit ad praetoria consulum nuntiantium fugam hostium adeo trepidam ut tabernaculis stantibus castra reliquerint, quoque fuga obscurior
3 esset crebros etiam relictos ignes. Clamor inde ortus ut signa proferri iuberent ducerentque ad persequendos hostes ac protinus castra diripienda, et 4 consul alter velut unus turbae militaris erat. Paulus etiam atque etiam dicere providendum praecavendumque esse ; postremo, cum aliter neque seditionem neque ducem seditionis sustinere posset, Marium Statilium praefectum cum turma Lucana exploratum mittit.

5 Qui ubi adequitavit portis, subsistere extra munimenta ceteris iussis ipse cum duobus equitibus vallum

[1] convallem Gronovius: cornuallem P^1: cornua in P^2.
[2] mediam Madvig: medium amnem PC^1: medium agnem C^2: medium agmen M.

ridge, drew up the infantry in ambush on the left, B.C. 216 and the cavalry on the right, and made the baggage-train pass through the valley between, intending to fall upon the enemy whilst they were preoccupied and encumbered with the pillage of the camp, which would seem to them to have been deserted by its owners. He left a large number of fires burning, as though he had sought by means of this illusory appearance of an encampment to hold the consuls to their positions—as he had cheated Fabius the year before—till he could gain as long a start as possible in his retreat.

XLII. When day came, first the fact that the outposts had been withdrawn, and afterwards—as they came nearer—the unwonted silence filled the Romans with amazement. Then, as it became quite evident that there was no one in the camp, there was a rush of men to the headquarters of the consuls, announcing that the enemy had retreated in such trepidation as to quit the camp without striking their tents, and had even left a great number of fires burning to conceal their flight. Next they began to clamour for the order to advance and to pursue the enemy and plunder the camp without delay, and one of the consuls behaved like a member of the mob of soldiers. Paulus kept insisting on the need for watchfulness and circumspection, and finally, when there was no other way in which he could withstand the mutiny and the leader of the mutiny, he sent the praefect Marius Statilius with a troop of Lucanian horse to reconnoitre.

Riding up to the gates, Statilius commanded the others to wait outside the trenches, and himself with two horsemen entered the camp. After making a

A.U.C. 538

intravit speculatusque omnia cum cura renuntiat
6 insidias profecto esse: ignes in parte castrorum quae vergat[1] in hostem[2] relictos, tabernacula aperta et omnia cara in promptu relicta; argentum quibusdam locis temere per vias velut obiectum ad praedam vidisse.

7 Quae ad deterrendos[3] a cupiditate animos nuntiata erant, ea accenderunt, et clamore orto a militibus, ni signum detur sine ducibus ituros, haudquaquam dux defuit: nam extemplo Varro signum dedit proficis-
8 cendi. Paulus, cum ei sua sponte cunctanti pulli quoque[4] non addixissent, nuntiari iam efferenti porta
9 signa collegae iussit. Quod quamquam Varro aegre est passus, Flamini tamen recens casus Claudique consulis primo Punico bello memorata navalis clades
10 religionem animo incussit. Di prope ipsi eo die magis distulere quam prohibuere imminentem pestem Romanis: nam forte ita evenit ut, cum referri signa
11 in castra iubenti consuli milites non parerent, servi duo, Formiani unus alter Sidicini equitis, qui Servilio atque Atilio consulibus inter pabulatores excepti a Numidis fuerant, profugerent eo die ad dominos deductique ad consules nuntiant omnem exercitum

[1] quae vergat ς: quae uergant P: qua vergant Frigell.
[2] in hostem ς: ad hostem MC^2 (Madvig): ad in hostem PC^1.
[3] deterrendos Gronovius: deterendos P^1: detenendos P^2.
[4] pulli quoque Fuegner: pulli quoque auspicio P.

---

[1] sc. between the rows of tents.
[2] A Roman general took with him on his campaign a pullarius—keeper of the sacred chickens—who reported favourable or unfavourable omens, according to the eagerness with which the fowls fed. See VI. xli. 8, VIII. xxx. 2.

thorough and careful examination he reported that B.C. 216
there was undoubtedly some treachery afoot. The fires, he said, had been left on the side of the camp that faced the Romans; the tents were open and all kinds of valuables were left exposed to view; here and there he had seen silver carelessly flung down in the lanes,[1] as if to tempt a pillager.

The report, which had been made with the purpose of checking the soldiers' greed, only inflamed it, and they began to shout that if the signal were not given, they would go without any leaders. But there was no lack of a leader; for Varro at once gave the command to start. Paulus himself wished to delay; and when the sacred fowls had refused their sanction,[2] he gave orders to notify his colleague, who was just setting forth with the standards from the gate. Varro was greatly vexed at this, but the recent disaster of Flaminius and the memorable defeat at sea of the consul Claudius, in the first Punic War[3] made him fearful of offending the heavenly powers. On that day, it might almost be said, the very gods put off, but did not prevent, the calamity that impended over the Romans: for it chanced that when the consul ordered the standards back into the camp and the soldiers were refusing to obey him, two slaves appeared on the scene, one belonging to a Formian, the other to a Sidicinian knight. They had been captured by the Numidians, along with other foragers, in the consulship of Servilius and Atilius, and on that day had escaped back to their masters. Being conducted to the

[3] P. Claudius Pulcher disregarded the warning of the sacred fowls and was defeated off Drepanum in 249 B.C. (Summary of Book XIX.)

A.U.C. 538 Hannibalis trans proximos montes sedere in insidiis.
12 Horum opportunus adventus consules imperii potentes fecit, cum ambitio alterius suam primum apud eos prava indulgentia maiestatem[1] solvisset.

XLIII. Hannibal, postquam motos magis inconsulte Romanos quam ad ultimum temere evectos vidit, nequiquam detecta fraude in castra rediit.
2 Ibi plures dies propter inopiam frumenti manere nequit, novaque consilia in dies non apud milites solum mixtos ex conluvione omnium gentium, sed
3 etiam apud ducem ipsum oriebantur. Nam cum initio fremitus, deinde aperta vociferatio fuisset exposcentium stipendium debitum querentiumque annonam primo, postremo famem; et mercennarios
4 milites, maxime Hispani generis, de transitione cepisse consilium fama esset; ipse etiam interdum Hannibal de fuga in Galliam dicitur agitasse, ita ut relicto peditatu omni cum equitibus se proriperet.
5 Cum haec consilia atque hic habitus animorum esset in castris, movere inde statuit in calidiora atque eo maturiora messibus Apuliae loca, simul quod, quo[2] longius ab hoste recessisset transfugia impeditiora

[1] apud eos prava indulgentia maiestatem edd.: apud eos prauam indulgentiam maiestate P: apud eos maiestatem C. Heraeus: deinde collegae maiestatem Novák.
[2] quod, quo Weissenborn: quod P: ut quo ς.

---

[1] According to Polybius (III. cvii. ff.), Servilius, consul in 217, was still in command of the army before Gereonium when Hannibal marched south and seized the citadel of Cannae, which the Romans had been using as a granary. On receiving the disquieting news of this serious loss, Servilius sent to Rome and asked for instructions. The senate decided to give battle, and sent the new consuls to the front to take command. The engagement at Cannae consuls, they stated that Hannibal's entire army was B.C. 216 lying in ambush just over the nearest hills. Their opportune arrival restored the authority of the consuls, when one of them, by running after popularity, and by unprincipled indulgence, had impaired their prestige—beginning with his own—amongst the soldiers.

XLIII. Hannibal, perceiving that the Romans, although they had acted ill-advisedly, had not proceeded to the extremity of rashness, returned to the camp, his stratagem having been detected and rendered idle. There, however, the scarcity of corn forbade his remaining many days, and new plans were daily forming, not only amongst the soldiers, the mingled offscourings of every race on earth, but even in the mind of the general himself. For when the men, with murmurs at first and afterwards with loud clamours, demanded their arrears of pay, and complained at first of the scarcity of corn, and finally of being starved; and when the report went round that the mercenaries—particularly those of Spanish blood—had resolved on going over to the enemy; they say that even Hannibal himself had thoughts of abandoning all his infantry and saving himself and his cavalry by escaping into Gaul. Such being the projects that were entertained in camp and such the temper of his soldiers, he decided to move from his present quarters to Apulia,[1] where the climate was warmer and in consequence of this the harvest earlier; at the same time it would be the more difficult, the greater their distance from the enemy, for those of his followers who

[1] was fought seven days after the Romans had set out to follow Hannibal.

A.U.C. 538

6 levibus ingeniis essent. Profectus est nocte ignibus similiter factis tabernaculisque paucis in speciem relictis, ut insidiarum par priori metus contineret Romanos.

7 Sed per eundem Lucanum Statilium omnibus ultra castra transque montes exploratis cum relatum esset visum procul hostium agmen, tum de sequendo eo[1] 8 consilia agitari coepta. Cum utriusque consulis eadem quae ante semper fuisset[2] sententia, ceterum Varroni fere omnes, Paulo nemo praeter Servilium 9 prioris anni consulem adsentiretur, ex maioris[3] partis sententia ad nobilitandas clade Romana Cannas 10 urgente fato profecti sunt. Prope eum vicum Hannibal castra posuerat aversa a Volturno vento, qui 11 campis torridis siccitate nubes pulveris vehit. Id cum ipsis castris percommodum fuit, tum salutare praecipue futurum erat, cum aciem dirigerent, ipsi

[1] de sequendo eo Novák: die sequenti eo P: de insequendo eo Lipsius.
[2] fuisset P: esset Doering.
[3] ex maioris Luchs: maioris P.

---

[1] Weissenborn suggests the possibility that the repetition of this stratagem in Livy's narrative may be due to a combination of different versions occurring respectively in Coelius Antipater and in Valerius Antias. The whole passage (chap. xl.—chap. xliii.) is discussed by De Sanctis, III. 2, p. 59[90], who regards the story of the two camps at Gereonium as a repetition of the situation on the Aufidus (chap. xliv. § 1). The scarcity of provisions attributed to Hannibal was invented, he thinks, in order to make it appear the less excusable in the Romans to have accepted battle. The new skirmish at Gereonium is a repetition of the one to which Polybius refers as taking place fifty stades from Cannae. Finally, the stratagem of the abandoned camp were fickle to desert. He set out in the night, B.C. 216 after making up some fires, as before, and leaving a few tents standing where they would be seen, so that the Romans might be withheld from following him through fear of an ambush, as before.[1]

But when the same Lucanian, Statilius, had made a thorough reconnaissance beyond the camp and on the other side of the mountains, and had reported seeing the enemy on the march a long way off, then the question of pursuing him began to be debated. The consuls were each of the same mind as they had always been; but Varro had the support of almost everybody, Paulus of none except Servilius, the consul of the year before. The will of the majority prevailed, and they set forward, under the urge of destiny, to make Cannae famous for the calamity which there befell the Romans. This was the village near which Hannibal had pitched his camp,[2] with his back to the Volturnus,[3] a wind that brings clouds of dust over the drought-parched plains. Such a disposition was very convenient for the camp itself and bound to be particularly salutary when the troops formed up for battle, facing in the opposite direction, with is ridiculous and absurd, for the Romans had only to occupy it with a couple of legions and Hannibal would have found it very difficult to recover, and even if Aemilius had chosen to allow Hannibal to return to his camp, he would have deserved a court-martial if he had not first destroyed the tents and levelled the camp and filled the trenches. De Sanctis thinks that the whole episode is characteristic of Valerius Antias.

[2] Livy forgets to point out that Hannibal later crossed the river and encamped on the western side (Map 7).

[3] This was the Eurus of the Greeks (Seneca, Nat. Quaest. v. xvi. 4), now called Scirocco. The Latin name is from Mt. Voltur in Apulia, S.W. of Cannae.

A.U.C. 538

aversi, terga tantum adflante vento, in occaecatum pulvere offuso[1] hostem pugnaturi.

XLIV. Consules satis exploratis itineribus sequentes Poenum,[2] ut ventum ad Cannas est et in[3] conspectu Poenum habebant, bina castra communiunt eodem ferme intervallo quo ad Gereonium, sicut 2 ante copiis divisis. Aufidus[4] amnis utrisque[5] castris adfluens aditum aquatoribus ex sua cuiusque oppor- 3 tunitate haud sine certamine dabat; ex minoribus tamen castris, quae posita trans Aufidum erant, liberius aquabantur Romani, quia ripa ulterior nullum habebat hostium praesidium.

4 Hannibal spem nanctus locis natis ad equestrem pugnam, qua parte virium invictus erat, facturos copiam pugnandi consules, derigit aciem lacessitque 5 Numidarum procursatione hostes. Inde rursus sollicitari seditione militari ac discordia consulum Romana castra, cum Paulus Sempronique et Flamini temeritatem Varroni, Varro Paulo[6] speciosum timidis ac 6 segnibus ducibus exemplum Fabium obiceret, testareturque deos hominesque hic, nullam penes se culpam esse, quod Hannibal iam velut usu[7] cepisset

[1] offuso Walch: effuso P.
[2] sequentes Poenum P: sequentes Schenkl.
[3] et in Gronovius: ut in P.
[4] Aufidus P^2: aufidius (and in § 3 aufidium corrected from aufidum) P^1 (cf. Plut., Fab. 15 and Ptol. III. i. 15).
[5] utrisque edd.: utriusque P.
[6] Varro Paulo Wesenberg: uarro P.
[7] velut usu s: uel usu P.

[1] At chap. xl. § 5 we were not told how far apart the camps were, but only that the smaller one was nearer Hannibal than the larger one.

[2] Neither Livy nor Polybius (III. cx.) states explicitly that the larger camp of the Romans was on the left, or western bank, but that such was the fact may fairly be inferred from the wind blowing only on their backs, and ready to fight with enemies half-blinded by the dust driven into their faces. B.C. 216

XLIV. The consuls, after making a sufficient reconnaissance of the roads, followed the Phoenicians until they came to Cannae, where, having the enemy in view, they divided their forces, as they had done before, and fortified two camps, at about the same distance from one another as at Gereonium.[1] The river Aufidus, flowing past both their camps, was readily accessible to water-carriers at such spots as were convenient for each, though not without fighting; it was, however, from the smaller camp, which was situated across the Aufidus,[2] that the Romans could fetch water more freely, since the enemy had no troops posted on the further bank.

Hannibal had conceived a hope that the consuls would give him an opportunity of fighting in a place that was formed by nature for a cavalry action, in which arm he was invincible. He therefore drew out his men in battle array and ordered the Numidians to make a sally and provoke the enemy. This caused the camp of the Romans to be once more the scene of strife amongst the soldiers and dissension between the consuls. Paulus cast in Varro's teeth the recklessness of Sempronius and Flaminius; Varro retorted that Fabius was a specious example for timid and slothful generals, and called on gods and men to witness that it was through no fault of his that Hannibal had by now acquired as it were a

Livy's trans Aufidum (§ 3) and Polybius's πέραν, ἀπὸ διαβάσεως πρὸς τὰς ἀνατολάς (III. cx. 10), both of which phrases are used of the smaller camp, and such is the view of Professor Kromayer. (See map.)

A.U.C. 538 Italiam; se constrictum a collega teneri; ferrum atque arma iratis et pugnare cupientibus adimi 7 militibus: ille, si quid proiectis ac proditis ad inconsultam atque improvidam pugnam legionibus accideret, se omnis culpae exsortem, omnis eventus participem fore diceret; videret ut quibus lingua prompta [1] ac temeraria aeque in pugna vigerent manus.

XLV. Dum altercationibus magis quam consiliis tempus teritur, Hannibal ex acie, quam ad multum diei tenuerat instructam, cum in castra ceteras reciperet 2 copias, Numidas ad invadendos ex minoribus castris 3 Romanorum aquatores trans flumen mittit. Quam inconditam turbam cum vixdum in ripam egressi clamore ac tumultu fugassent, in stationem [2] quoque pro vallo locatam atque ad ipsas [3] prope portas evecti 4 sunt. Id vero adeo indignum [4] visum, ab tumultuario auxilio [5] iam etiam castra Romana terreri, ut ea modo una causa ne extemplo transirent flumen derigerentque aciem tenuerit Romanos, quod summa imperii eo die penes Paulum fuerit.

5 Itaque postero die Varro,[6] cui sors eius diei imperii erat, nihil consulto collega signum proposuit instructasque copias flumen traduxit sequente Paulo, quia magis non probare quam non adiuvare consilium 6 poterat. Transgressi flumen eas quoque quas in

[1] lingua prompta P: lingua tam prompta C (Madvig).
[2] in stationem ς: stationem P.
[3] ad ipsas Fugner: ipsas P.
[4] adeo indignum ς: indignum P.
[5] auxilio P: vexillo Hachtmann.
[6] postero die Varro Alschefski: uarro postero die uarro P^1: uarro postero die P^2C.

prescriptive right to Italy, for he was kept in fetters B.C. 216 by his colleague, and the soldiers, enraged as they were and eager to fight, were deprived of swords and arms. Paulus rejoined that if anything untoward should befall the legions, recklessly abandoned to an ill-advised and rash engagement, he would himself be guiltless of all blame, but would share in all the consequences; let Varro, he said, see to it, that where tongues were bold and ready, hands—when it came to fighting—were no less so.

XLV. While they wasted time, rather quarrelling than consulting, Hannibal withdrew the rest of his troops, whom he had kept in line till far on in the day, into his camp, and sent the Numidians across the river to attack the men from the smaller Roman camp who were fetching water. They had hardly come out upon the other bank when their shouts and tumult sent that unorganized rabble flying, and they rode on till they came to the party that was stationed in front of the rampart, and almost to the very gates. So wholly outrageous, however, did it seem that by now even a Roman camp should be terrorized by irregular auxiliaries, that only one thing kept the Romans from crossing the river forthwith and giving battle—the fact that Paulus happened then to be in command.

The next morning, therefore, Varro, whom the lot had made commander for that day, hung out the signal, without saying a word of the matter to his colleague, and, making his troops fall in, led them over the river. Paulus followed him, for he could more easily disapprove the plan than deprive it of his help. Once across, they joined to their own the

A.U.C. 538 castris minoribus habuerant copias suis adiungunt atque ita instruunt aciem :[1] in dextro cornu—id erat
7 flumini propius—Romanos equites locant, deinde pedites; laevum cornu extremi equites sociorum, intra pedites, ad medium iuncti legionibus Romanis, tenuerunt; iaculatores cum ceteris[2] levium armorum auxiliis prima acies facta. Consules cornua tenuere,[3] 8 Terentius laevum, Aemilius dextrum; Gemino Servilio media pugna tuenda data.

XLVI. Hannibal luce prima Baliaribus levique alia armatura praemissa transgressus flumen, ut
2 quosque traduxerat ita in acie locabat: Gallos Hispanosque equites prope ripam laevo in cornu
3 adversus Romanum equitatum; dextrum cornu Numidis equitibus datum; media acies[4] peditibus firmata, ita ut Afrorum utraque cornua essent, inter-
4 ponerentur his medii Galli atque Hispani. Afros[5] Romanam crederes[6] aciem: ita armati erant armis et ad Trebiam, ceterum magna ex parte ad Trasu-
5 mennum captis. Gallis Hispanisque scuta eiusdem formae fere erant, dispares ac dissimiles gladii, Gallis praelongi ac sine mucronibus, Hispano, punctim magis quam caesim adsueto petere hostem, brevitate habiles et cum mucronibus. Ante alios[7] habitus[8] gentium harum cum magnitudine corporum tum

[1] instruunt aciem Weissenborn: instructa acie P.
[2] cum ceteris Doujatius and Drakenborch: ex ceteris P.
[3] tenuere Alschefski: tenuerent P^1: tenerent P^2.
[4] acies ς: acie P.
[5] Afros ς: afro P^1: afri P^2: Afrorum Alschefski.
[6] crederes Woelfflin: magna ex parte crederes P.
[7] ante alios Madvig: antetalius P.
[8] habitus ς: hannibatus P^1: hanimatus P^2.

[1] The Romans adopted this sword for their legionaries. It was provided with two sharp edges for cutting as well forces which they had kept in the smaller camp, B.C. 216 and marshalled their battle-line as follows: on the right wing—the one nearer the river—they placed the Roman cavalry, and next them the Roman foot; the left wing had on the outside the cavalry of the allies; and nearer the centre, in contact with the Roman legions, the infantry of the allies. The slingers and other light-armed auxiliaries were formed up in front. The consuls had charge of the wings, Terentius of the left, Aemilius of the right; and Geminus Servilius was entrusted with the centre.

XLVI. Hannibal crossed the river at break of day, after sending ahead of him the Baliares and the other light-armed troops, and posted each corps in line of battle, in the order in which he had brought it over. The Gallic and Spanish horse were next the river, on the left wing, facing the Roman cavalry; the right wing was assigned to the Numidian horse; the centre was composed of infantry, so arranged as to have the Africans at both ends, and between them Gauls and Spaniards. The Africans might have passed for an array of Romans, equipped as they were with arms captured partly at the Trebia but mostly at Lake Trasumennus. The Gauls and the Spaniards had shields of almost the same shape; their swords were different in use and in appearance, those of the Gauls being very long and pointless, whilst the Spaniards, who attacked as a rule more by thrusting than by striking, had pointed ones that were short and handy.[1] These tribes were more terrifying to look on than the others, because of the size of their bodies and the display they made of them. The Gauls as with a point, and had a strong, firm blade (Polybius VI. xxiii. 7).

A.U.C. 538

6 specie terribilis erat. Galli super umbilicum erant nudi: Hispani linteis praetextis purpura tunicis candore miro fulgentibus constiterant. Numerus[1] omnium peditum qui tum[2] stetere in[3] acie milium
7 fuit quadraginta, decem equitum. Duces cornibus praeerant, sinistro Hasdrubal, dextro Maharbal; mediam aciem Hannibal ipse cum fratre Magone tenuit.
8 Sol, seu de industria ita locatis seu quod forte ita stetere,[4] peropportune utrique parti obliquus erat, Romanis in meridiem, Poenis in septemtrionem
9 versis; ventus—Volturnum regionis incolae vocant —adversus Romanis coortus multo pulvere in ipsa ora volvendo prospectum ademit.

XLVII. Clamore sublato procursum ab auxiliis[5] et pugna levibus primum armis commissa; deinde equitum Gallorum Hispanorumque laevum cornu cum dextro Romano concurrit, minime equestris
2 more pugnae: frontibus enim adversis concurrendum erat quia nullo circa ad evagandum relicto spatio
3 hinc amnis hinc peditum acies claudebant. In derectum utrimque nitentes stantibus ac confertis[6] postremo turba equis vir virum amplexus detrahebat equo. Pedestre magna iam ex parte certamen factum erat; acrius tamen quam diutius pugnatum est, pulsique Romani equites terga vertunt.
4 Sub equestris finem certaminis coorta est peditum

[1] Numerus Gronovius: numerum P.
[2] qui tum Gronovius: equititum P.
[3] stetere in ς: steterentin P^1: terentina P^2.
[4] stetere Gronovius: statere P^1: stare P^2.
[5] ab auxiliis ς: auxiliis P.
[6] ac confertis ς: ad confertis P.

were naked from the navel up; the Spaniards had B.C. 216 formed up wearing crimson-bordered linen tunics that shone with a dazzling whiteness. The total number of the infantry who then took their place in line was forty thousand, of the cavalry ten thousand. The generals commanding on the wings were Hasdrubal on the left, Maharbal on the right; Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, had the centre.

The sun—whether they had so placed themselves on purpose or stood as they did by accident—was, very conveniently for both sides, on their flanks, the Romans looking south, the Phoenicians north. A wind—which those who live in those parts call Volturnus—beginning to blow against the Romans carried clouds of dust right into their faces and prevented them from seeing anything.[1]

XLVII. With a shout the auxiliaries rushed forward and the battle began between the light-armed troops. Then the Gallic and Spanish horse which formed the left wing engaged with the Roman right in a combat very unlike a cavalry action. For they had to charge front to front, there being no room to move out round the flank, for the river shut them in on one side and the ranks of infantry on the other. Both parties pushed straight ahead, and as the horses came to a standstill, packed together in the throng, the riders began to grapple with their enemies and drag them from their seats. They were fighting on foot now, for the most part; but sharp though the struggle was, it was soon over, and the defeated Roman cavalry turned and fled.

Towards the end of the cavalry engagement the [1] Note the repetition—apparently unconscious—of what was said at chap. xliii. § 10.

A.U.C. 538 pugna, primo et viribus et animis par, dum[1] constabant ordines Gallis Hispanisque; tandem Romani, diu ac saepe conisi, aequa[2] fronte acieque densa impulere hostium cuneum nimis tenuem eoque parum validum, a cetera prominentem acie. Impulsis deinde ac trepide referentibus pedem institere[3] ac tenore uno per praeceps pavore fugientium agmen[4] in mediam primum aciem inlati, postremo nullo resistente ad subsidia Afrorum pervenerunt, qui utrimque reductis alis constiterant, media, qua Galli[5] Hispanique steterant, aliquantum prominente acie. Qui cuneus ut pulsus aequavit frontem primum, dein cedendo[6] etiam sinum[7] in medio dedit, Afri circa iam cornua fecerant irruentibusque incaute in medium Romanis circumdedere alas, mox cornua extendendo clausere et ab tergo hostes. Hinc Romani, defuncti nequiquam proelio uno, omissis

[1] par, dum Madvig: parum P.
[2] conisi (connisi) aequa ς (cf. Franz Miltner, Wiener Studien 45 (1926–7) 251–253): consiliaequa P^1: consilio qua P^2: connisi obliqua Lipsius.
[3] institere Gronovius: insistere P.
[4] agmen ς: agmine P.
[5] qua Galli ς: quaefalli P.
[6] dein cedendo Alschefski: deindetendo P^1: deinde nitendo P^2: deinde cedendo Ruperti.
[7] sinum ς: in sinum P.

---

[1] Polybius says (III. cxv. 6) that "they had crowded up from the wings to the centre, where the fighting was going on." Consequently their line was much deeper than that of their adversaries.

[2] This is called by Polybius (III. cxiii. 8) μηνοειδὲς κύρτωμα, "a crescent-shaped convexity." Kromayer rightly insists that this expression must not be taken literally, and understands it of a formation in echelon (see Schlachten-Atlas I., columns 23 and 26, and his map reproduced as No. 7 in this volume.)

infantry got into action. At first they were evenly B.C. 216 matched in strength and courage, as long as the Gauls and Spaniards maintained their ranks; but at last the Romans, by prolonged and frequent efforts, pushing forward with an even front and a dense line,[1] drove in the wedge-like formation [2] which projected from the enemy's line, for it was too thin to be strong; and then, as the Gauls and Spaniards gave way and fell back in confusion, pressed forward and without once stopping forced their way through the crowd of fleeing, panic-stricken foes, till they reached first the centre [3] and ultimately—for they met with no resistance—the African supports. These had been used to form the two wings, which had been drawn back, while the centre, where the Gauls and Spaniards had been stationed, projected somewhat. When this wedge was first driven back so far as to straighten the front, and then, continuing to yield, even left a hollow in the centre, the Africans had already begun a flanking movement on either side, and as the Romans rushed incautiously in between, they enveloped them, and presently, extending their wings, crescent-wise, even closed in on their rear.[4] From this moment the Romans, who had gained one battle to no purpose, gave over the [3] in mediam aciem is a puzzling phrase, as it ought to mean the same thing as the projecting wedge which constituted the Carthaginian centre. But the Romans had already driven in this wedge. Livy perhaps means that the Romans have now reached a point where they are level with the two flanks (consisting of Africans) and midway between them.

[4] Polybius (III. cxv. 9) gives a somewhat different account of this manœuvre. According to him the Africans—who must have been drawn up in a line so deep as to be more like a column—merely faced inward, as the Romans pursued the fleeing Gauls and Spaniards, and charged them on both flanks.

A.U.C. 538 Gallis Hispanisque, quorum terga ceciderant,[1] adversus Afros integram pugnam ineunt, non tantum eo[2] iniquam quod inclusi adversus circumfusos sed etiam quod fessi cum recentibus ac vegetis pugnabant.

XLVIII. Iam et sinistro cornu Romano,[3] ubi sociorum equites adversus Numidas steterant, consertum proelium erat, segne primo et a Punica coeptum fraude. Quingenti ferme Numidae, praeter solita[4] arma telaque gladios occultos sub loricis habentes, specie transfugarum cum ab suis parmas post terga habentes adequitassent, repente ex equis desiliunt parmisque et[5] iaculis ante pedes hostium proiectis in mediam aciem accepti ductique ad ultimos considere ab tergo iubentur. Ac dum proelium ab omni parte conseritur, quieti manserunt; postquam omnium animos oculosque occupaverat certamen, tum arreptis scutis, quae passim inter acervos caesorum corporum strata erant, aversam adoriuntur Romanam aciem tergaque ferientes ac poplites caedentes stragem ingentem ac maiorem aliquanto pavorem ac tumultum fecerunt. Cum alibi terror ac fuga, alibi pertinax in mala iam spe proelium esset, Hasdrubal, qui ea parte praeerat, subductos ex media acie Numidas, quia[6] segnis eorum cum adversis pugna erat, ad persequendos passim

[1] ceciderant ς: caeciderat et P.
[2] eo ς: in eo P. [3] Romano ς: romani P.
[4] praeter solita N. Heinsius and J. Perizonius: praeter consueta ς: praeterita P: praeter iusta Gronovius.
[5] et ς: etiam P. [6] quia C: qui P.

[1] The "panic rout" was on the Roman left (the Roman right had already been annihilated), the "obstinate though hopeless struggle" at the centre.

pursuit and slaughter of the Gauls and Spaniards and began a new fight with the Africans. In this they were at a twofold disadvantage: they were shut in, while their enemies ranged on every side of them; they were tired, and faced troops that were fresh and strong. B.C. 216

XLVIII. By this time the Roman left, where the cavalry of the allies had taken position facing the Numidians, was also engaged, though the fighting was at first but sluggish. It began with a Punic ruse. About five hundred Numidians, who, in addition to their customary arms and missiles, carried swords concealed under their corslets, pretended to desert. Riding over from their own side, with their bucklers at their backs, they suddenly dismounted and threw down bucklers and javelins at the feet of their enemies. Being received into the midst of their ranks they were conducted to the rear and ordered to fall in behind. And while the battle was getting under way at every point, they kept quite still; but no sooner were the minds and eyes of all absorbed in the struggle, than they snatched up the shields which lay strewn about everywhere amongst the heaps of slain, and assailing the Romans from behind and striking at their backs and hamstrings, effected a great slaughter and a terror and confusion that were even greater. And now in one place there was a panic rout and in another an obstinate though hopeless struggle,[1] when Hasdrubal, who commanded in that part of the field, withdrew the Numidians from the centre—since they fought but half-heartedly against men who met them face to face—and dispatching them in pursuit of the scattered fugitives, sent in the Spanish and Gallic cavalry to help the 6 fugientes mittit, Hispanos et Gallos equites[1] Afris prope iam fessis caede magis quam pugna adiungit.

A.U.C. 538

XLIX. Parte altera pugnae Paulus, quamquam primo statim proelio funda graviter ictus fuerat, 2 tamen et occurrit saepe cum confertis Hannibali et aliquot locis proelium restituit, protegentibus eum equitibus Romanis, omissis postremo equis, quia consulem vel ad[2] regendum equum vires deficiebant. 3 Tum nuntianti[3] cuidam, iussisse consulem ad pedes descendere equites, dixisse Hannibalem ferunt: 4 "Quam mallem, vinctos mihi traderet!" Equitum pedestre proelium, quale iam haud dubia hostium victoria, fuit, cum victi mori in vestigio mallent quam fugere, victores morantibus victoriam irati 5 trucidarent, quos pellere non poterant. Pepulerunt tamen iam paucos superantes et labore ac volneribus fessos, inde dissipati omnes sunt equosque ad fugam qui poterant repetebant.

6 Cn. Lentulus tribunus militum, cum praetervehens equo sedentem in saxo cruore oppletum consulem

[1] equites Gronovius: pedites P: deleted by Fabri.
[2] vel ad Heraeus: et ad P: ad ς.
[3] nuntianti (nunc-) Crévier: denuntianti P: renuntianti Gronovius.

[1] The Numidians (both the five hundred and the main body of them) after routing the Roman left had presumably swung round to attack the Roman centre, when Hasdrubal withdrew them from the battle to use them as pursuit troops, replacing them with the cavalry originally posted on the Punic left, which after defeating the Roman cavalry (chap. xlvii. §§ 1-3) had presumably ridden round the Roman centre and joined the Numidians. The episode of the five hundred (not mentioned by Polybius) is perhaps derived from the account of Coelius Antipater. Appian (VII. iv. 22) describes the ruse as being executed by five hundred Celtiberians (foot-soldiers in the Punic centre).

Africans, who were now almost exhausted, though more with slaying than with fighting.[1] B.C. 216

XLIX. In the other part of the field[2] Paulus, although he had received a severe wound from a sling at the very outset of the battle, nevertheless repeatedly opposed himself to Hannibal,[3] with his men in close formation, and at several points restored the fight. He was guarded by Roman cavalry, who finally let their horses go, as the consul was growing too weak even to control his horse. At this Hannibal, being told by someone that the consul had ordered his troopers to dismount, is said to have exclaimed: "How much better if he had handed them over to me in fetters!"[4] The dismounted horsemen fought as men no longer doubting that the enemy must be victorious. They were beaten, but chose rather to die where they stood than to run away; and the victors, angry that their victory was thus delayed, cut them down, when they could not rout them. But they routed them at last, when only a few were left, exhausted with fighting and with wounds. The survivors were now all dispersed, and those who could attempted to regain their horses and escape.

Gnaeus Lentulus, a tribune of the soldiers, as he rode by on his horse, caught sight of the consul sitting on a stone and covered with blood. "Lucius

[2] In chap. xlviii. § 5 ea parte means the Punic right = Roman left. Here Parte altera is the centre—where Livy thinks of Paulus as having taken over the command from Servilius.

[3] That is, the Punic centre.

[4] An ironical intimation that, since the consul's order amounted to depriving his troopers of any hope of escape, he might as well have surrendered them at once and saved Hannibal all further trouble.

A.U.C. 538

7 vidisset, "L. Aemili," inquit, "quem unum insontem culpae cladis hodiernae dei respicere debent, cape hunc equum, dum et tibi virium aliquid superest et 8 comes[1] ego te tollere possum ac protegere. Ne funestam hanc pugnam morte consulis feceris; etiam sine hoc[2] lacrimarum satis luctusque est."
9 Ad ea consul: "Tu[3] quidem, Cn. Corneli, macte virtute esto: sed cave frustra miserando exiguum
10 tempus e manibus hostium evadendi absumas. Abi, nuntia publice patribus, urbem Romanam muniant ac priusquam victor hostis advenit praesidiis firment; privatim Q. Fabio, L. Aemilium[4] praeceptorum eius 11 memorem et vixisse adhuc et mori. Me[5] in hac strage militum meorum patere exspirare, ne aut reus iterum e consulatu sim aut accusator collegae exsistam, ut[6] alieno crimine innocentiam meam protegam."
12 Haec eos[7] agentes prius turba fugientium civium deinde hostes oppressere; consulem ignorantes quis esset, obruere[8] telis, Lentulum inter tumultum[9] abripuit equus. Tum undique[10] effuse fugiunt.
13 Septem milia hominum in minora castra, decem in maiora, duo ferme in vicum ipsum Cannas perfugerunt; qui extemplo a Carthalone atque equitibus nullo munimento tegente[11] vicum circumventi sunt.
14 Consul alter, seu forte seu consilio nulli fugientium

[1] et comes Walch: comes P.
[2] sine hoc ς: si hoc P: sine hac Gronovius.
[3] consul: "Tu ς: consulto P.
[4] L. Aemilium ς: aemilium P.
[5] me ς: me et P: memet Weissenborn.
[6] ut ς: aut P.
[7] haec eos Madvig: haec ex P: haec Weissenborn.
[8] obruere ς: obruerent P.
[9] inter tumultum Gronovius: in tumulum P: in tumultu ς.
[10] undique Alschefski: unde P.
[11] tegente ς: tegentes P.

Aemilius," he cried, "on whom the gods ought to look down in mercy, as the only man without guilt in this day's disaster, take this horse, while you have still a little strength remaining and I can attend you and raise you up and guard you. Make not this battle calamitous by a consul's death; even without that there are tears and grief enough." B.C. 216

To this the consul answered, "All honour, Cornelius, to your manhood! But waste not in unavailing pity the little time you have to escape the enemy. Go, and tell the senators in public session to fortify the City of Rome and garrison it strongly before the victorious enemy draws near: in private say to Quintus Fabius that Lucius Aemilius has lived till this hour and now dies remembering his precepts. As for me, let me breathe my last in the midst of my slaughtered soldiers, lest either for a second time I be brought to trial after being consul,[1] or else stand forth the accuser of my colleague, blaming another in defence of my own innocence." While they were speaking, there came up with them first a crowd of fleeing Romans, and then the enemy, who overwhelmed the consul, without knowing who he was, beneath a rain of missiles. Lentulus, thanks to his horse, escaped in the confusion. The rout was now everywhere complete. Seven thousand men escaped into the smaller camp, ten thousand into the larger, and about two thousand into the village of Cannae itself. These last were immediately cut off by Carthalo and his cavalry, for the village was not fortified. The other consul, whether by accident

[1] Chap. xxxv. § 3.

A.U.C. 538 insertus[1] agmini, cum quinquaginta fere equitibus Venusiam perfugit.

15 Quadraginta quinque milia quingenti pedites, duo milia septigenti equites et tantadem[2] prope civium
16 sociorumque pars caesi dicuntur; in his ambo consulum quaestores, L. Atilius et L. Furius Bibaculus, et undetriginta[3] tribuni militum, consulares quidam praetoriique et aedilicii—inter eos Cn. Servilium Geminum[4] et M. Minucium numerant, qui magister equitum priore anno, aliquot annis ante consul[5] fuerat, 17 —octoginta praeterea aut senatores aut qui eos magistratus gessissent unde in senatum legi deberent cum sua voluntate milites in legionibus facti essent.
18 Capta eo proelio tria milia peditum et equites mille et quingenti dicuntur.

L. Haec est[6] pugna Cannensis, Alliensi[7] cladi nobilitate par, ceterum uti eis[8] quae post pugnam
2 accidere levior, quia ab hoste est cessatum, sic strage
3 exercitus gravior foediorque. Fuga namque ad

[1] insertus C. L. Bauer: infestus P.
[2] et tantadem Madvig: etanta P.
[3] undetriginta (XXIX) Gronovius: uigintiunudice P.
[4] Geminum Gronovius: inimum P.
[5] aliquot annis ante consul J. Gronovius: consul aliquot ante annis J. F. Gronovius: aliquot annis ante P.
[6] est ς: et P.
[7] Cannensis, Alliensi (the spelling -ll- is established by the Fasti Antiates, an inscr. of A.D. 51) Gronovius: aliiensi (and in § 3 aliam) P^1: cannensi P^2.
[8] uti eis Luchs: utilis P: ut illis ς: ut iis Novák.

---

[1] The other ancient accounts give the numbers as follows: Eutropius (III. 10) 40,000 foot and 3500 horse; Appian (VII. iv. 25) and Livy himself in three speeches (chap. lix. § 5; chap. lx. § 14 and XXV. vi. 13) as well as Plutarch or by design, had not joined any throng of fugitives, B.C. 216 but fled to Venusia with some fifty horsemen.

It is said that forty-five thousand five hundred foot and two thousand seven hundred horse were slain, in an almost equal proportion of citizens and allies.[1] In the number were the quaestors of both consuls, Lucius Atilius and Lucius Furius Bibaculus, and twenty-nine military tribunes,[2] some of consular rank, some of praetorian or aedilician—amongst others are mentioned Gnaeus Servilius Geminus and Marcus Minucius, who had been master of the horse in the preceding years and consul several years before[3]—and besides these, eighty senators or men who had held offices which would have given them the right to be elected to the senate,[4] but had volunteered to serve as soldiers in the legions. The prisoners taken in this battle are said to have numbered three thousand foot-soldiers and fifteen hundred horsemen.

L. Such was the battle of Cannae, a calamity as memorable as that suffered at the Allia, and though less grave in its results—because the enemy failed to follow up his victory—yet for the slaughter of the army even more grievous and disgraceful. For (Fab. 16), 50,000 men; Quintilian (VIII. vi. 26), 60,000 men; Polybius (III. cxvii. 4), 70,000.

[2] There would have been forty-eight when the battle began (six for each legion), assuming that there were eight legions, as some of Livy's authorities held (chap. xxxvii. § 2).

[3] 221 B.C.

[4] The Ovinian Law (soon after 368 B.C.) had provided that the censors must enrol in the senate such as had held curule office (curule aedileship, praetorship, consulship) since the last censorship.

A.U.C. 538

Alliam sicut urbem prodidit ita exercitum servavit: ad Cannas fugientem consulem vix quinquaginta secuti sunt, alterius morientis prope totus[1] exercitus fuit.

4 Binis in castris cum multitudo semiermis sine ducibus esset, nuntium qui in maioribus erant mittunt, dum proelio deinde ex laetitia epulis fatigatos quies nocturna hostes premeret, ut ad se transirent: uno 5 agmine Canusium abituros esse. Eam sententiam alii totam aspernari; cur enim illos qui se arcessant ipsos non venire, cum aeque coniungi possent? Quia videlicet plena hostium omnia in medio essent et aliorum quam sua corpora tanto periculo mallent obicere. 6 Aliis non tam sententia[2] displicere quam animus deesse. Tum P. Sempronius[3] Tuditanus tribunus militum, "Capi ergo mavoltis," inquit, "ab avarissimo et crudelissimo hoste aestimarique capita vestra et exquiri pretia ab interrogantibus Romanus civis sis an Latinus socius, ut ex tua contumelia et miseria 7 alteri honos quaeratur? Non tu, si quidem L. Aemili consulis, qui se bene mori quam turpiter vivere maluit, et tot fortissimorum virorum qui circa 8 eum cumulati iacent cives estis. Sed antequam opprimit lux maioraque hostium agmina obsaepiunt iter, per hos qui inordinati atque incompositi obstre- 9 punt portis[4] erumpamus! Ferro atque audacia via fit

[1] totus ς: totius P.
[2] sententia ς: sententia est P.
[3] Tum P. Sempronius Luchs: p. sempronius P.
[4] portis ς: portas P.

[1] An allusion to the story told in chap. vii. § 5. Note how in the text the shift from plural (mavoltis) to singular (tua . . . tu) has all the effect of a personal appeal to each of the men Tuditanus is addressing.

the flight at the Allia, though it betrayed the City, B.C. 216 saved the army: at Cannae the consul who fled was accompanied by a scant fifty men; the other, dying, had well-nigh the entire army with him.

In the two Roman camps the crowd was half-armed and destitute of leaders. The men in the larger camp sent a messenger bidding those in the smaller one come over to them in the night, while the enemy, exhausted by the fighting and by the feasting that had followed on their triumph, were sunk in sleep: they would then set out in one body for Canusium. This plan some were for totally rejecting. Why, they asked, did not those who summoned them come themselves to the smaller camp, where they could just as well effect a junction? Clearly because the ground between was covered with enemies and they preferred to expose to such danger the persons of others rather than their own. Some were not so much displeased with the plan as wanting in resolution. Then said the military tribune Publius Sempronius Tuditanus: "So you had rather be captured by the greediest and most cruel of foes, and be appraised at so much a head by those who ask, 'Are you a Roman citizen or a Latin ally?' in order that from the insults and misery you suffer, the other may win distinction?[1] 'Not so!' each man will answer, if you are indeed fellow citizens of Lucius Aemilius the consul, who preferred an honourable death to life with ignominy, and of all those heroes who lie in heaps around him! But before daylight surprises us and the enemy blocks our way in greater force, let us break out through these men that are clamouring in disorder and confusion at our gates. With a quamvis per confertos hostes. Cuneo quidem hoc laxum atque solutum agmen, ut si nihil obstet, disicias.[1] Itaque ite mecum, qui et vosmet ipsos et 10 rem publicam salvam voltis!" Haec ubi dicta dedit, stringit gladium cuneoque facto per medios vadit

A.U.C. 538

11 hostes; et cum in latus dextrum, quod patebat, Numidae iacularentur, translatis in dextrum scutis in maiora castra ad sescenti[2] evaserunt atque inde protinus alio magno agmine adiuncto Canusium in-12 columes perveniunt. Haec apud victos magis impetu animorum, quos[3] ingenium suum cuique aut fors dabat, quam ex consilio ipsorum aut imperio cuiusquam agebantur.

LI. Hannibali victori cum ceteri circumfusi gratularentur suaderentque ut tanto perfunctus bello diei quod reliquum esset noctisque insequentis quietem et ipse sibi sumeret et fessis[4] daret militibus,
2 Maharbal praefectus equitum minime cessandum ratus, "Immo, ut quid hac pugna sit actum scias, die quinto" inquit "victor in Capitolio epulaberis.

[1] disicias (dissicias) Gronovius: uisscias P: dissicias Ribbeck.
[2] ad sescenti (sex-) J. Gronovius: ad dc P: ad sexcentos ς.
[3] quos Bauer: quod P: quem ς.
[4] et fessis ς: fessis P.

---

[1] cuneus (literally "wedge") is a technical term sometimes used to designate a body of men drawn up in fighting column, in order, as here, to force a way through the enemy's lines (Caesar, B.G. VI. xl. 2).

[2] In the original the words Haec . . . medios form a complete hexameter and half of another. We have here perhaps a bit appropriated from Ennius, either directly, or, more probably, at second hand, through Coelius (see next note).

[3] A detail which Livy may have owed to Coelius, from whom the grammarian Priscian (III. 22) cites the phrase:

sword and a stout heart a man may pass through B.C. 216 enemies, be they never so thick. In close formation[1] you may scatter this loose and unorganized force as though there were nothing in your way. Follow me, then, as many of you as desire safety for yourselves and for the commonwealth!" Uttering these words he grasped his sword, and, forming a column, strode away through the midst of the enemy;[2] and when the Numidians hurled missiles at their right sides, which were unprotected, they shifted their shields to the right[3] and so got through, about six hundred[4] of them, to the larger camp; and thence, after being joined by the other great body of men, they made their way at once without loss to Canusium. These things the conquered did rather from the urge of such courage as each derived from his own nature or from chance than in consequence of their own deliberation or any man's authority.

LI. Hannibal's officers crowded round him with congratulations on his victory. The others all advised him, now that he had brought so great a war to a conclusion, to repose himself and to allow his weary soldiers to repose for the remainder of that day and the following night. But Maharbal, the commander of the cavalry, held that no time should be lost. "Nay," he cried, "that you may realize what has been accomplished by this battle, in five days you shall banquet in the Capitol!

dextimos in dextris scuta iubet habere ("he orders those on the right to carry their shields on the right arm").

[4] Pseudo-Frontinus (IV. v. 7) says that only twelve horsemen and fifty foot-soldiers followed Sempronius and another tribune, Cn. Octavius.

A.U.C. 538

Sequere; cum equite, ut prius venisse[1] quam ven-3 turum sciant, praecedam." Hannibali nimis laeta res est visa[2] maiorque quam ut eam statim capere[3] animo posset. Itaque voluntatem se laudare Mahar-balis ait; ad consilium pensandum temporis opus 4 esse. Tum Maharbal: "Non omnia nimirum eidem di[4] dedere: vincere scis, Hannibal, victoria uti nescis." Mora eius diei satis creditur saluti fuisse urbi atque imperio.
5 Postero die, ubi primum inluxit, ad spolia legenda foedamque etiam hostibus spectandam stragem 6 insistunt.[5] Iacebant tot Romanorum milia, pedites passim equitesque, ut quem cuique fors aut pugna iunxerat aut fuga. Adsurgentes quidam ex strage media cruenti, quos stricta matutino[6] frigore excita-7 verant volnera, ab hoste oppressi sunt; quosdam et iacentes vivos succisis[7] feminibus poplitibusque invenerunt, nudantes cervicem iugulumque et re-8 liquum sanguinem iubentes[8] haurire; inventi quidam sunt mersis in effossam terram capitibus, quos sibi[9] ipsos fecisse foveas obruentesque ora superiecta[10] 9 humo interclusisse spiritum apparebat. Praecipue convertit omnes subtractus[11] Numida mortuo super-

[1] venisse P: te uenisse ς.
[2] praecedam." Hannibali nimis laeta res est visa Gronovius: praecedant hannibalinimicis-l-aeturesetuisa P.
[3] capere ς: capite P.
[4] eidem di (dii) ς: eidemin P.
[5] spectandam stragem insistunt ς: spectandainstrage | insistunt P: spectandam stragem exeunt Madvig.
[6] quos stricta (-tā) matutino P^2: questracta | aututino P^1.
[7] succisis ς: succisos P.
[8] iubentes Gronovius: libentes P.
[9] quos sibi ς: quod si P.
[10] superiecta ς: subiecta super P.
[11] subtractus P: substratus ς.

Follow after; I will precede you with the cavalry, B.C. 216 that the Romans may know that you are there before they know that you are coming!" To Hannibal the idea was too joyous and too vast for his mind at once to grasp it. And so, while praising Maharbal's goodwill, he declared that he must have time to deliberate regarding his advice. Then said Maharbal, "In very truth the gods bestow not on the same man all their gifts; you know how to gain a victory, Hannibal: you know not how to use one." That day's delay is generally believed to have saved the City and the empire.

The morning after, as soon as it was light, they pressed forward to collect the spoil and to gaze on a carnage that was ghastly even to enemies. There lay those thousands upon thousands of Romans, foot and horse indiscriminately mingled, as chance had brought them together in the battle or the rout. Here and there amidst the slain there started up a gory figure whose wounds had begun to throb with the chill of dawn, and was cut down by his enemies; some were discovered lying there alive, with thighs and tendons slashed,[1] baring their necks and throats and bidding their conquerors drain the remnant of their blood. Others were found with their heads buried in holes dug in the ground. They had apparently made these pits for themselves, and heaping the dirt over their faces shut off their breath. But what most drew the attention of all beholders was a Numidian who was dragged out alive from under

[1] i.e. cut down from behind as they fled. Cf. Horace's nec parcit imbellis iuventae poplitibus timidove tergo (Odes, III. ii. 15 sq.)

A.U.C. 538 incubanti Romano vivus naso auribusque laceratis, cum ille,[1] manibus ad capiendum telum inutilibus, in rabiem ira versa laniando dentibus hostem exspirasset.

LII. Spoliis ad multum diei[2] lectis Hannibal ad minora ducit castra oppugnanda et omnium primum 2 bracchio obiecto a flumine[3] eos excludit. Ceterum ab omnibus labore vigiliis volneribus etiam fessis maturior 3 ipsius spe deditio est facta. Pacti ut arma atque equos traderent, in capita Romana trecenis nummis quadrigatis, in socios ducenis, in servos centenis, et ut eo pretio persoluto cum singulis abirent vestimentis, in castra hostes acceperunt, traditique in 4 custodiam omnes sunt, seorsum cives sociique. Dum ibi tempus teritur, interea, cum ex maioribus castris, quibus satis virium et animi[4] fuit, ad quattuor milia hominum et ducenti equites, alii agmine alii palati passim per agros, quod haud minus tutum erat, Canusium perfugissent, castra ipsa ab sauciis timidisque eadem condicione qua altera tradita hosti. 5 Praeda ingens parta[5] est, et praeter equos virosque

[1] cum ille H. J. Mueller: cum P.
[2] diei ς: de P: die Alschefski.
[3] obiecto a flumine H. J. Mueller: obiecto flumine ς: flumine obiecto P.
[4] et animi ς: ut nimis P.
[5] parta ς: parata P.

---

[1] cf. Dante's Ugolino, Inferno, xxxii.

[2] The chariot-pieces were silver denarii stamped with a Jupiter in a four-horse chariot. This money was used not only by the Romans, who coined it, but by their allies, who had been denied the right to coin silver since 268 B.C. The ransom of the citizen would be roughly equivalent in weight of silver to $50 or £10.

a dead Roman, but with mutilated nose and ears; B.C. 216 for the Roman, unable to hold a weapon in his hands, had expired in a frenzy of rage, while rending the other with his teeth.[1]

LII. After spending a good part of the day in gathering spoils, Hannibal proceeded to attack the smaller camp. The first thing that he did was to throw up an entrenchment which cut them off from the river. But they were all so tired out from fighting and lack of sleep, as well as from wounds, that they surrendered even sooner than he had expected. The terms agreed upon were as follows: they were to give up their arms and horses; the ransom was fixed at three hundred chariot-pieces for every Roman, two hundred for every ally, and one hundred for every slave; on the payment of this price they were to go free, with a single garment each.[2] They then received their enemies into the camp and were all placed in custody, citizens being separated from allies. During the delay there, those in the larger camp who possessed sufficient strength and courage, amounting to four thousand foot and two hundred horse, had escaped, some in a body, others scattering —no less safely—over the country-side, and reached Canusium. The camp itself the wounded and timorous surrendered to the enemy on the same terms as the other.[3] It yielded enormous spoils, and except for [3] Polybius (III. cxvii.) gives a very different story. According to him ten thousand Romans were left in camp when the battle was fought, with orders to attack the camp of Hannibal. Hannibal, however, had left a garrison in his own camp and they held the Romans at bay, till Hannibal, having now gained the battle, came up and rescued them, killing two thousand of the Romans and afterwards making the rest of them prisoners.

A.U.C. 538

et si quid argenti—quod plurimum in phaleris equorum erat, nam ad vescendum facto perexiguo, utique militantes, utebantur—omnis cetera praeda 6 diripienda data est. Tum sepeliendi causa conferri in unum corpora suorum iussit. Ad octo milia fuisse dicuntur fortissimorum virorum. Consulem quoque Romanum conquisitum[1] sepultumque quidam auctores sunt.

7 Eos qui Canusium perfugerant mulier Apula[2] nomine Busa, genere clara ac divitiis, moenibus tantum tectisque a Canusinis acceptos, frumento veste viatico etiam iuvit, pro qua ei munificentia postea, bello perfecto, ab senatu honores habiti sunt.

LIII. Ceterum cum ibi tribuni militum quattuor essent, Q. Fabius Maximus[3] de legione prima, cuius 2 pater priore anno dictator fuerat, et de legione secunda L. Publicius Bibulus et P. Cornelius Scipio et de legione tertia Ap. Claudius Pulcher, qui 3 proxime aedilis fuerat, omnium consensu ad P. Scipionem admodum adulescentem et ad[4] Ap. 4 Claudium summa imperii delata est. Quibus consultantibus inter paucos de summa rerum nuntiat P. Furius Philus, consularis viri filius, nequiquam eos perditam spem fovere; desperatam comploratamque 5 rem esse publicam; nobiles iuvenes quosdam, quorum

[1] conquisitum P: inquisitum Fuegner.
[2] Apula Lipsius: paula (corrected from apaula) P.
[3] Q. Fabius Maximus Weissenborn: Fabius Maximus P.
[4] admodum adulescentem et ad ς: atmodum P.

---

[1] For similar legends of Hannibal's generosity see XXV. xvii. 4, XXVII. xxviii. 1. and chap. vii. § 5 of this book.

[2] Valerius Maximus (IV. viii. 2) says that the woman supplied about ten thousand Romans with food without wrecking her fortune. The name Busa is Oscan.

the horses and men and such silver as there was— which was mostly on the harness of the horses, for they then used very little plate, especially when in the field—the rest of the booty was all given up to pillage. He then commanded the bodies of his dead to be brought into one place for burial. It is said that they numbered about eight thousand of his bravest men. Some historians state that the Roman consul, too, was sought out and given burial.[1] B.C. 216

Those who escaped to Canusium were aided by an Apulian woman of birth and fortune named Busa. The townspeople had merely afforded them the protection of the walls and shelter, but she provided them with corn, clothing, and money for the way, in return for which munificence she was afterwards, on the conclusion of the war, voted honours by the senate.[2]

LIII. Now though there were four tribunes of the soldiers on the ground—Quintus Fabius Maximus of the first legion, whose father had been dictator the year before, Lucius Publicius Bibulus and Publius Cornelius Scipio of the second legion, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who had very recently been aedile, of the third legion—the supreme command was by unanimous consent made over to Publius Scipio, the merest youth,[3] and to Appius Claudius. These two were considering the general situation, in company with a few others, when Publius Furius Philus, the son of an ex-consul, came in and told them that they were idly entertaining a lost hope; the state was already given over and mourned as dead; some of the young [3] He was about nineteen years old (XXI. xlvi. 7 and Polybius x. iii. 4).

A.U.C. 538 principem M. Caecilium Metellum,[1] mare ac naves spectare, ut deserta Italia ad regum aliquem transfugiant. Quod malum, praeterquam atrox, super tot clades etiam novum, cum stupore ac miraculo torpidos defixisset qui aderant et consilium advocandum de eo censerent, negat consilii rem esse Scipio iuvenis, fatalis dux huiusce belli. Audendum atque agendum non consultandum ait in tanto malo esse;[2] irent secum extemplo armati qui rem publicam salvam vellent; nulla[3] verius quam ubi ea cogitentur hostium castra esse. Pergit ire sequentibus paucis in hospitium Metelli, et cum concilium ibi iuvenum de quibus adlatum erat invenisset, stricto super capita consultantium gladio "Ex mei animi sententia," inquit, "ut ego rem publicam populi Romani non deseram neque alium civem Romanum deserere patiar; si sciens fallo, tum me Iuppiter optimus maximus[4] domum familiam remque meam pessimo leto adficiat. In haec verba, M. Caecili, iures postulo ceterique qui adestis: qui non iuraverit, in se hunc gladium strictum esse sciat." Haud secus pavidi quam si victorem Hannibalem cernerent, iurant omnes custodiendosque semet ipsos Scipioni tradunt.

LIV. Eo tempore quo haec[5] Canusii agebantur Venusiam ad consulem ad quattuor milia et quingenti pedites equitesque, qui sparsi fuga per agros

[1] M. Caecilium Metellum H. J. Mueller: l. caecilium metellum (so also § 12) P.

[2] esse ς: esse scipio P.

[3] nulla Bauer: nullo P: nullo loco ς.

[4] optimus maximus Drakenborch: optime maxime P: optime maxime (with afficias) ς (Madvig).

[5] haec ς: et P.

nobles, of whom Marcus Caecilius Metellus was the chief, were looking to the sea and ships, proposing to abandon Italy and flee for refuge to some king. These evil tidings, dreadful in themselves and coming as a new distress on the top of so many disasters, stunned those who heard them with a dull amazement. But when they would have called a council to talk the matter over, young Scipio, the predestined leader in this war, declared that it was no matter for taking counsel: they must be bold and act, not deliberate, in the face of this great evil; let them take arms and go with him at once, as many as wished to save the state; no camp was so truly the camp of the enemy as one where such thoughts were rife. He proceeded, with only a few followers, to the quarters of Metellus, where he found a gathering of the young men of whom he had been informed. Raising his sword over their heads, as they sat in consultation, "I solemnly swear," he said, "that even as I myself shall not desert the republic of the Roman People, so likewise shall I suffer no other Roman citizen to do so; if I wittingly speak false, may Jupiter Optimus Maximus utterly destroy me, my house, my family, and my estate. Marcus Caecilius, I call on you and the others who are present to swear after these terms, and if any refuse to swear, let him know that against him this sword is drawn." Quaking as though they beheld the victorious Hannibal, all took the oath, and delivered themselves into the custody of Scipio. B.C. 216

LIV. While this was happening at Canusium, about four thousand five hundred horse and foot, who had scattered over the country-side in flight,

A.U.C. 538

2 fuerant, pervenere. Eos omnes Venusini per familias benigne accipiendos curandosque cum divisissent, in singulos equites togas et tunicas et quadrigatos nummos quinos vicenos et pediti denos et arma, 3 quibus deerant, dederunt; ceteraque publice ac privatim hospitaliter facta, certatumque ne a muliere Canusina populus Venusinus officiis vinceretur.

4 Sed gravius onus Busae multitudo faciebat—et iam 5 ad decem milia hominum erant—Appiusque et Scipio, postquam incolumem esse alterum consulem acceperunt, nuntium extemplo mittunt, quantae secum peditum equitumque copiae essent, sciscitatumque simul utrum[1] Venusiam adduci exercitum 6 an manere iuberet Canusi. Varro ipse Canusium copias traduxit; et iam aliqua species[2] consularis exercitus erat, moenibusque se certe, etsi non armis, ab hoste videbantur defensuri.

7 Romam ne has quidem reliquias superesse civium sociorumque, sed occidione occisum cum duobus consulibus[3] exercitum[4] deletasque omnes copias 8 allatum fuerat. Nunquam salva urbe tantum pavoris tumultusque intra moenia Romana fuit. Itaque succumbam oneri neque adgrediar narrare

[1] utrum edd.: utrumque P.
[2] species ς: specie P.
[3] duobus consulibus Gronovius: duobus P: ducibus Luterbacher.
[4] exercitum Gronovius: exercitibus P.

---

[1] From Polybius VI. xix. 12 we learn that the cavalryman received pay at the rate of a denarius per diem, and the infantryman one-third as much. It appears then that the present given to the soldiers—if the toga and tunic of the cavalryman be reckoned in—amounted to about one made their way to Venusia, to the consul. All B.C. 216 these the inhabitants distributed amongst various families where they might be kindly received and cared for, and bestowed on each horseman a toga and a tunic and twenty-five chariot-pieces, and on each foot-soldier ten pieces, together with arms, where they were needed.[1] In all other matters, too, they dealt hospitably by them, both as a town and as individuals, in their zeal that the People of Venusia should not lag behind a Canusian woman in friendly offices.

But the great multitude was beginning to be too heavy a burden upon Busa—and indeed there were now as many as ten thousand men[2]—and Appius and Scipio, when they learned that the other consul was alive, immediately dispatched a messenger to let him know what forces of infantry and cavalry they had with them, and at the same time to enquire whether he desired the army to be brought to Venusia or remain at Canusium. Varro transferred his own troops to Canusium; and they now had something resembling a consular army, and might look to defend themselves against the enemy, behind walls, at all events, if not in the field.

But at Rome it was reported that not even these pitiful remnants of citizens and allies survived, but that the army with its two consuls was clean destroyed and all their forces blotted out. Never, save when the City had been captured, was there such terror and confusion within the walls of Rome. I shall therefore confess myself unequal to the task, month's pay. (The toga was then worn even by soldiers when in garrison or in winter quarters.)

[2] i.e. in both camps, see chap. lvi. § 2.

A.U.C. 538

9 quae edissertando minora vero faciam.[1] Consule exercituque ad Trasumennum priore anno amisso non volnus super volnus sed multiplex clades, cum duobus consulibus duo[2] consulares exercitus amissi nuntiabantur, nec ulla iam castra Romana nec ducem 10 nec militem esse; Hannibalis Apuliam, Samnium, ac iam prope totam Italiam factam. Nulla profecto 11 alia gens tanta mole cladis non obruta esset. Compares[3] cladem ad Aegates insulas Carthaginiensium proelio navali acceptam, qua fracti Sicilia ac Sardinia cessere et[4] vectigales ac stipendiarios fieri se passi sunt, aut pugnam adversam in Africa cui postea hic ipse Hannibal succubuit? Nulla ex parte comparandae sunt, nisi quod minore animo latae sunt.

LV. P. Furius Philus et M. Pomponius praetores senatum in curiam Hostiliam vocaverunt, ut de 2 urbis custodia consulerent; neque enim dubitabant deletis exercitibus hostem ad oppugnandam Romam, 3 quod unum opus belli restaret, venturum. Cum in malis[5] sicuti ingentibus ita ignotis ne consilium quidem satis expedirent, obstreperetque clamor lamentantium mulierum et nondum palam facto vivi mortuique per omnes paene[6] domos promiscue 4 complorarentur, tum Q. Fabius Maximus censuit equites expeditos et Appia et Latina via mittendos,

[1] faciam J. H. Voss: facie P.
[2] duo ς: cum P.
[3] compares P^1: comparesset P.
[4] et Madvig: in P.
[5] in malis ς: in aliis P.
[6] per omnes paene ς: et paene omnes paene P.

nor attempt a narrative where the fullest description B.C. 216 would fall short of the truth. The year before a consul and his army had been lost at Trasumennus, and now it was not merely one blow following another, but a calamity many times as great that was reported; two consuls and two consular armies had been lost, and there was no longer any Roman camp, or general, or soldier; Hannibal was master of Apulia, Samnium, and well-nigh the whole of Italy. Surely there was no other people that would not have been overwhelmed by a disaster of such vast proportions. Would you compare the disaster off the Aegatian islands, which the Carthaginians suffered in the sea-fight, by which their spirit was so broken that they relinquished Sicily and Sardinia and suffered themselves to become tax-payers and tributaries? or the defeat in Africa to which this very Hannibal afterwards succumbed? In no single aspect are they to be compared with this calamity, except that they were endured with less of fortitude.

LV. Publius Furius Philus and Marcus Pomponius, the praetors, called the senate together in the Curia Hostilia, to consult about the defence of Rome; for they made no doubt that the enemy, after wiping out their armies, would be advancing to besiege the City, which was all that remained to do to end the war. But when, amid dangers at once so immense and so incalculable, they failed to think of even any tolerable plan of action, and were deafened with the cries and lamentations of the women, both the living and the dead—in the lack as yet of any announcement —being indiscriminately mourned in almost every house, then Quintus Fabius Maximus urged that light-armed horsemen be sent out along the Appian qui obvios percunctando—aliquos profecto [1] ex fuga passim dissipatos fore [2]—referant quae fortuna consulum atque exercituum sit, et si quid di immortales, miseriti imperii, reliquum Romani nominis fecerint, ubi eae copiae sint; quo [3] se Hannibal post proelium contulerit, quid paret, quid agat acturusque sit. 6 Haec exploranda noscendaque per impigros iuvenes esse; illud per patres ipsos agendum, quoniam magistratuum parum sit, ut tumultum ac trepidationem in urbe tollant, matronas publico arceant continerique intra suum quamque limen cogant, 7 comploratus familiarum coerceant, silentium per urbem faciant, nuntios rerum omnium ad praetores deducendos curent—suae quisque fortunae domi 8 auctorem exspectent—custodesque praeterea ad portas ponant, qui prohibeant quemquam egredi urbe [4] cogantque homines nullam nisi urbe ac moenibus salvis salutem sperare. Ubi conticuerit tumultus,[5] tum in curiam patres revocandos consulendumque de urbis custodia esse.

A.U.C. 538

LVI. Cum in hanc sententiam pedibus omnes issent, summotaque foro per magistratus [6] turba patres diversi ad sedandos tumultus discessissent, tum demum litterae a C. Terentio consule allatae 2 sunt: L. Aemilium consulem exercitumque caesum; sese Canusi esse reliquias tantae cladis velut ex naufragio colligentem; ad decem milia militum

[1] profecto ς (Jac. Gronovius): profectos P.
[2] fore ς (Jac. Gronovius): forte P.
[3] quo ς; quae P^1: qua P^2.
[4] urbe Madvig: urbem P.
[5] tumultus Ulrich: recte tumultus P: certe tumultus Frigell and Kiderlin.
[6] summotaque . . . per magistratus ς: summotasque . . . magistratus P.

and Latin ways, and questioning those they met— B.C. 216 for some there would surely be who had dispersed and made off in the rout—bring back word of the fortunes of the consuls and the armies, and if the immortal gods, taking pity on the empire, had spared any remnant of the Roman name, where those forces were; whither Hannibal had gone after the battle, what his plans were, what he was doing and was likely to do. To discover and ascertain these facts was a task, he said, for active youths; what the Fathers themselves must do, since there were not magistrates enough, was this: quell the panic and confusion in the City; keep the matrons off the streets and compel them each to abide in her own home; restrain families from lamentation; procure silence throughout the City; see that bearers of any news were brought before the praetors—every man must wait at home for tidings that concerned himself;—and, besides this, post sentries at the gates, to keep anyone from leaving the City, and make the people rest all hope of safety on the safety of Rome and of its walls. When the tumult had died down, then the Fathers must be convened again and consider how to defend the City.

LVI. After they had all voted for this proposal without debate, and the throng had been cleared out of the Forum by the magistrates, and the Fathers had dispersed in various directions to still the uproar, then at last came a dispatch from Gaius Terentius the consul, announcing that the consul Lucius Aemilius and his army had been destroyed; that he himself was at Canusium, collecting—as though after a storm at sea—the wreckage of that great disaster; that he had about ten thousand men, not organised ferme esse incompositorum inordinatorumque;

A.U.C. 538

3 Poenum[1] sedere ad Cannas in[2] captivorum pretiis praedaque alia nec victoris animo nec magni ducis more nundinantem.[3]
4 Tum privatae quoque per domos clades volgatae sunt, adeoque totam urbem opplevit luctus ut sacrum anniversarium Cereris intermissum sit, quia nec lugentibus id facere est fas nec ulla in illa
5 tempestate matrona expers luctus fuerat. Itaque ne ob eandem causam alia quoque sacra publica aut privata desererentur, senatus consulto diebus triginta luctus est finitus.
6 Ceterum cum sedato urbis tumultu revocati in curiam patres essent, aliae insuper ex Sicilia litterae allatae sunt ab T. Otacilio propraetore: regnum
7 Hieronis classe Punica vastari; cui cum opem imploranti ferre vellet, nuntiatum sibi esse[4] aliam classem ad Aegates insulas stare paratam instruc-
8 tamque, ut, ubi se versum ad[5] tuendam Syracusanam oram Poeni sensissent, Lilybaeum extemplo provinciamque aliam Romanam adgrederentur; itaque classe opus esse, si regem socium Siciliamque tueri vellent.

[1] Poenum Gronovius: menum P^1: me nunc P^2.
[3] in ς: an P.
[2] nundinantem Gronovius: nuntiantem P.
[4] vellet, nuntiatum sibi esse ς: uellent nuntiatum his est P.
[5] versum ad ς: aduersum P.

or assigned to companies; that the Phoenician was B.C. 216 sitting down at Cannae, haggling over the ransom of his prisoners and over the rest of the booty, exhibiting neither the spirit of a conqueror nor the behaviour of a great commander.

Announcement was then made from house to house of the losses they had each sustained, and the entire City was so filled with lamentation that the annual rite of Ceres was allowed to lapse, since it may not be performed by mourners, nor was there at that time a single matron who was not bereaved. Accordingly, lest for this same reason other public or private rites might be neglected, the senate decreed that mourning should be limited to thirty days.[1]

But when the confusion in the City had subsided and the Fathers had been summoned back to the senate-house, another dispatch was brought in from Sicily, from the propraetor Titus Otacilius. He reported that Hiero's kingdom was being laid waste by a Punic fleet, and that when he would have responded to Hiero's appeal for help, he had got news of another fleet, that was standing off the Aegatian islands, all ready and equipped, so that when the Phoenicians should perceive that he had turned his back on them to go to the rescue of the Syracusan coast, they might instantly descend on Lilybaeum and the rest of the Roman province. A fleet was therefore necessary if they desired to protect the king, their ally, and Sicily.[2]

[1] The Cerealia, the chief festival in honour of Ceres, took place on April 19th. The reference in the text must be to another, otherwise unknown, festival, as the battle of Cannae was fought on August 2nd.

[2] Otacilius already had a fleet, according to chap. xxxvii. § 13.

A.U.C. 538

LVII. Litteris consulis praetorisque recitatis censuerunt praetorem [1] M. Claudium,[2] qui classi ad Ostiam stanti praeesset, Canusium ad exercitum mittendum, scribendumque consuli, ut, cum praetori exercitum tradidisset, primo quoque tempore, quantum per commodum rei publicae fieri posset, Romam veniret.

2 Territi etiam super tantas clades cum ceteris prodigiis, tum quod duae Vestales eo anno, Opimia atque Floronia, stupri compertae et altera sub terra, uti mos est, ad portam Collinam necata fuerat, altera 3 sibimet ipsa mortem consciverat; L. Cantilius, scriba pontificius,[3] quos nunc [4] minores pontifices appellant, qui cum Floronia stuprum fecerat, a pontifice maximo eo usque virgis in comitio caesus erat ut 4 inter verbera exspiraret. Hoc nefas cum inter tot, ut fit, clades in prodigium versum esset, decemviri 5 libros adire iussi sunt, et Q. Fabius Pictor Delphos ad oraculum missus est sciscitatum quibus precibus suppliciisque deos possent placare et quaenam futura 6 finis tantis cladibus foret. Interim ex fatalibus libris sacrificia aliquot extraordinaria facta; inter

[1] recitatis censuerunt praetorem added by Woelfflin (censuerunt had been added by ς and praetorem by Gronovius).

[2] M. Claudium ς: m|arcium P^1: m appium P^2: Marcellum Heusinger.

[3] pontificius Vaassen (Cassius Hemina ap. Priscian VII. xi.): pontificis P.

[4] nunc ς: non P: deleted by Vaassen.

---

[1] M. Claudius Marcellus, one of the best of the Roman generals in the war, had won renown by his defeat of the Gauls at Clastidium in 222 B.C., where he killed the enemy's chief, Virdomarus, with his own hand and won the "spoils of honour" (I. x. 5, and IV. xx. tell of the only other instances recorded). He fell in a cavalry engagement in 208,

LVII. When the dispatches from the consul and B.C. 216
the praetor had been read out, the senate voted to send Marcus Claudius,[1] the praetor commanding the fleet at Ostia, to Canusium, and to write to the consul to turn the army over to him and come to Rome at the earliest moment compatible with the welfare of the state.

They were terrified not only by the great disasters they had suffered, but also by a number of prodigies, and in particular because two Vestals, Opimia and Floronia, had in that year been convicted of unchastity. Of these one had been buried alive, as the custom is, near the Colline Gate, and the other had killed herself. Lucius Cantilius, a secretary to the pontiffs—one of those who are now called the lesser pontiffs—had been guilty with Floronia, and the Pontifex Maximus had him scourged in the Comitium so severely that he died under the blows. Since in the midst of so many misfortunes this pollution[2] was, as happens at such times, converted into a portent, the decemvirs were commanded to consult the Books, and Quintus Fabius Pictor[3] was dispatched to Delphi, to enquire of the oracle with what prayers and supplications they might propitiate the gods, and what would be the end of all their calamities. In the meantime, by the direction of the Books of Fate, some unusual sacrifices were offered; amongst others a Gaulish when a detachment with which he was making a reconnaissance was overwhelmed by a greatly superior force of Carthaginians (XXVII. xxvi.-xxvii).

[2] Not the death of Cantilius, but the Vestals' violation of their vows.

[3] This was the annalist, who wrote a history of Rome in Greek.

A.U.C. 538

quae Gallus et Galla,[1] Graecus et Graeca in foro bovario sub terram [2] vivi demissi sunt in locum saxo consaeptum,[3] iam ante [4] hostiis humanis, minime Romano sacro, imbutum.

7 Placatis satis, ut rebantur,[5] deis M. Claudius Marcellus ab Ostia mille et quingentos milites, quos in classem scriptos habebat, Romam, ut urbi praesidio essent, mittit; ipse, legione classica—ea legio tertia erat—cum tribunis militum Teanum Sidicinum praemissa, classe tradita P. Furio Philo collegae, paucos post dies Canusium magnis itineribus contendit. Inde [6] dictator ex auctoritate patrum dictus M.[7] Iunius et Ti. Sempronius [8] magister equitum dilectu edicto iuniores ab annis septendecim et quosdam praetextatos scribunt. Quattuor ex his legiones et mille equites effecti. Item ad socios Latinumque nomen ad milites ex formula accipiendos mittunt. Arma, tela, alia parari iubent et vetera spolia hostium detrahunt templis porticibusque. Et formam [9] novi dilectus inopia liberorum

[1] Gallus et Galla ς: callus et galia (corrected from callus e galia) P^1: callus et galina P^2.
[2] terram Duker: terra P.
[3] consaeptum ς: consectum P.
[4] iam ante Gronovius: uiam ante P^1: ubi ante P^2.
[5] ut rebantur ς: uerebantur P.
[6] inde Crévier: in P^1: deleted by P^2.
[7] dictus M. Aldine ed.: dictum (corr. from ductum) P^1: dictus P^2.
[8] Ti. Sempronius Sigonius: t. sempronius P.
[9] et formam Luchs: et alia formam P: et aliam formam ς (Madvig).

man and woman and a Greek man and woman were B.C. 216 buried alive in the Cattle Market, in a place walled in with stone, which even before this time had been defiled with human victims, a sacrifice wholly alien to the Roman spirit.[1]

Deeming that the gods had now been sufficiently appeased, Marcus Claudius Marcellus sent fifteen hundred soldiers whom he had under him, enrolled for service with the fleet, from Ostia to Rome, to defend the City; and sending before him to Teanum Sidicinum the naval legion (to wit, the third[2]) under its tribunes, handed over the fleet to his colleague Publius Furius Philus and a few days later hastened by forced marches to Canusium. The senate then authorized the appointment of a dictator and Marcus Junius [Pera] was named to that office, with Tiberius Sempronius as master of the horse. Proclaiming a levy they enlisted the young men over seventeen and some who still wore the purple-bordered dress of boyhood. Of these they made up four legions and a thousand horse. They also sent men to the allies and the Latins to take over their soldiers, as by treaty provided. They gave orders that armour, weapons and other equipment should be made ready, and took down from the temples and porticoes the ancient spoils of enemies. The levy wore a strange appearance, for, owing to [1] Livy means that the sacrifice, prescribed by the Greek Sibylline Books, was a Greek and not a Roman rite. The earlier instance referred to in the text was in 228 B.C. (Zonaras VIII. xix.).

[2] In chap. liii. § 2 the "third" legion is one of those which fought at Cannae. Possibly the naval legions were separately numbered, or (more probably) there had now been a new numbering of all the legions.

A.U.C. 538 capitum ac necessitas dedit: octo milia iuvenum validorum ex servitiis prius sciscitantes singulos, 12 vellentne militare, empta publice armaverunt. Hic miles magis placuit, cum pretio minore redimendi[1] captivos copia fieret.

LVIII. Namque Hannibal secundum tam prosperam ad Cannas pugnam victoris magis quam bellum gerentis intentus curis, cum captivis productis segregatisque socios, sicut ante ad Trebiam 2 Trasumennumque lacum, benigne adlocutus sine pretio dimisisset, Romanos quoque vocatos, quod nunquam alias antea, satis miti sermone adloquitur: 3 non internecivum sibi esse cum Romanis bellum; de dignitate atque imperio certare. Et patres virtuti Romanae cessisse, et se id adniti, ut suae 4 in vicem simul felicitati et virtuti cedatur. Itaque redimendi se captivis copiam facere; pretium fore in capita equiti quingenos quadrigatos nummos, trecenos pediti, servo centenos.[2]

5 Quamquam aliquantum adiciebatur equitibus ad id pretium quo pepigerant dedentes se, laeti tamen quamcumque condicionem paciscendi acceperunt. 6 Placuit suffragio ipsorum decem deligi qui Romam ad senatum irent, nec pignus aliud fidei quam ut 7 iurarent se redituros acceptum. Missus cum his Carthalo, nobilis Carthaginiensis, qui, si forte ad

[1] redimendi ς: redime P^1: redimi P^2.
[2] centenos ς: centum P.

the scarcity of free men and the need of the hour, B.C. 216 they bought, with money from the treasury, eight thousand young and stalwart slaves and armed them, first asking each if he were willing to serve. They preferred these slaves for soldiers, though they might have redeemed the prisoners of war at less expense.

LVIII. For Hannibal, after his great victory at Cannae, had been more concerned with the projects of a conqueror than with those of one who was still waging war. Mustering the prisoners and dividing them into two groups, he addressed a few kindly words to the allies and dismissed them without ransom, as he had done previously at the Trebia and Lake Trasumennus. He then called up the Romans also and spoke to them with a mildness he had never shown before. He was waging, he said, no war of extermination with them, but was contending for honour and dominion. His forerunners had yielded to the valour of the Romans, and he was striving to compel them in their turn to yield to his own good fortune and valour. He would therefore give them an opportunity to redeem the prisoners, and would fix their ransom at five hundred chariot-pieces for each horseman, three hundred for each foot-soldier, and a hundred for each slave.

Although this was a rather large addition to the ransom which the horsemen had agreed to on surrendering, they joyfully accepted any terms of treaty. It was resolved that the prisoners should themselves elect ten representatives to go to the senate in Rome; nor did Hannibal take any other pledge of their good faith than their oath that they would return. Carthalo, a Carthaginian noble, was sent with them, so that, if he should see that the pacem inclinare cerneret animos,[1] condiciones ferret. 8 Cum egressi castris essent, unus ex iis, minime Romani ingenii homo, veluti[2] aliquid oblitus, iuris iurandi solvendi causa cum in castra redisset, ante 9 noctem comites adsequitur. Ubi Romam venire eos nuntiatum est, Carthaloni obviam lictor missus qui dictatoris verbis denuntiaret[3] ut ante noctem excederet finibus Romanis.

A.U.C. 538

LIX. Legatis captivorum senatus ab dictatore datus est. Quorum princeps "M. Iuni vosque,[4] patres conscripti," inquit, "nemo nostrum ignorat nulli unquam civitati viliores fuisse captivos quam 2 nostrae; ceterum, nisi nobis plus iusto nostra placet causa, non alii unquam minus neglegendi vobis quam 3 nos[5] in hostium potestatem venerunt. Non enim in acie per timorem arma tradidimus, sed cum prope ad noctem superstantes cumulis caesorum corporum proelium extraxissemus, in castra recepimus nos; 4 diei reliquum ac noctem insequentem fessi labore 5 ac volneribus vallum sumus tutati; postero die, cum circumsessi ab exercitu victore aqua arceremur nec ulla iam per confertos hostes erumpendi spes esset, nec esse nefas duceremus quinquaginta milibus hominum ex acie nostra trucidatis aliquem ex 6 Cannensi pugna Romanum militem restare, tunc demum pacti sumus pretium quo redempti dimitteremur; arma, in quibus nihil iam auxilii erat, hosti 7 tradidimus. Maiores quoque acceperamus se a Gallis

[1] inclinare cerneret animos Koch: inclinaret animos P.
[2] veluti Alschefski: uelutillut P: uelut C.
[3] denuntiaret Luchs: nuntiaret P.
[4] Iuni vosque Harant: iuniusque P^1: iunius P^2.
[5] nos ς; alios P.

Romans inclined to peace, he might offer terms. B.C. 216
The envoys had just left the camp when one of them, a fellow of thoroughly un-Roman character, returned to it—as if he had forgotten something—in order to free himself from his oath, and before dark had caught up with his companions. When the news reached Rome that they were coming, a lictor was sent to meet Carthalo on the way and warn him in the name of the Dictator to depart before nightfall out of Roman territory.

LIX. As for the envoys of the prisoners, the dictator admitted them into the senate, where their leader spoke as follows: "Marcus Junius and Conscript Fathers, none of us is unaware that no state ever held prisoners of war in less esteem than ours. But, unless we overrate our cause, there have never been men who came into the power of the enemy less deserving than ourselves of your neglect. For we did not yield up our swords through fear on the field of battle, but standing on the heaped bodies of the slain prolonged the combat almost until nightfall and then retired to our camp. The rest of the day and the succeeding night, though exhausted with fighting and with wounds, we defended the stockade. On the following day, surrounded by a victorious army and cut off from water, having no longer any hope of breaking through the throng of enemies, and thinking it no disgrace that when fifty thousand of our troops had been cut down, some few Roman soldiers should survive the battle of Cannae, we finally stipulated for a price at which we might be ransomed, and delivered to the enemy the arms in which there was no longer any help. Even our ancestors—so we had heard—redeemed

A.U.C. 538

auro redemisse, et patres vestros, asperrimos illos ad condiciones[1] pacis, legatos tamen captivorum[2] 8 redimendorum gratia Tarentum misisse. Atqui et ad Alliam[3] cum Gallis et ad Heracleam cum Pyrrho utraque non tam clade infamis quam pavore et fuga pugna fuit. Cannenses campos acervi Romanorum corporum tegunt, nec supersumus pugnae, nisi in quibus trucidandis et ferrum et vires hostem de-
9 fecerunt. Sunt etiam de nostris quidam qui ne in acie quidem fuerunt,[4] sed praesidio castris relicti, cum castra traderentur, in potestatem hostium venerunt.
10 Haud equidem ullius civis et commilitonis fortunae aut condicioni invideo nec premendo alium me extulisse velim;—ne illi quidem, nisi pernicitatis pedum et cursus aliquod praemium est, qui plerique inermes ex acie fugientes non prius quam Venusiae aut Canusi constiterunt, se nobis merito praetulerint gloriatique sint in se plus quam in nobis praesidii
11 rei publicae esse. Sed et illis[5] bonis ac fortibus militibus utemini et nobis etiam promptioribus pro patria, cum[6] beneficio vestro redempti atque in 12 patriam restituti fuerimus. Dilectum ex omni aetate et fortuna habetis; octo milia servorum audio armari. Non minor numerus noster est, nec maiore pretio redimi possumus quam ii emuntur; nam si conferam nos cum illis, iniuriam nomini

[1] condiciones C: condicione P.
[2] captivorum ς; ad captiuorum P.
[3] ad Alliam Gronovius: aliam P.
[4] fuerunt Alschefski and Madvig: refugerunt P.
[5] et illis Crévier: illis et P: illis et nobis Heerwagen.
[6] cum Luchs: quod P.

themselves from the Gauls with gold; and your B.C. 216 fathers, despite their fierce opposition to terms of peace, sent envoys to Tarentum to ransom prisoners. And yet neither the battle with the Gauls at the Allia nor that with Pyrrhus at Heraclea owed its unhappy fame so much to carnage as to craven flight. At Cannae the plains are covered with heaps of Roman corpses, and if we survive, it is only because our enemies' swords were dulled and their strength spent with slaughtering. There are some of us, too, who were never even in the battle, but were left to guard the camp, and on its surrender passed into the enemy's hands. Think not that I envy the good luck or circumstances of any fellow citizen or fellow soldier,[1] nor would I raise myself by thrusting another down; but—unless there be a prize for fleetness of foot and running—it is not those who, without weapons for the most part and fleeing from the fight, never stopped until they reached Venusia or Canusium that can justly set themselves above us or boast that they are better defenders of the state than we. Both in them and in us you shall have good and valiant soldiers; but we shall be even more eager than they to defend our country, since we shall owe to your kindness our redemption and our restoration to that country. You are levying soldiers of every age and condition; I hear that eight thousand slaves are being armed. Our number is not less than that, and our ransom would be no more costly than their purchase; I make no comparison between our worth and theirs, for that would be to insult the name of [1] i.e. in one of the contingents of allies—the distinction is not between civilian and soldier, but between citizen soldier and allied soldier.

A.U.C. 538

13 Romano faciam. Illud etiam in tali consilio animadvertendum vobis censeam, patres conscripti, si iam[1] duriores esse velitis—quod nullo nostro merito
14 faciatis—cui[2] nos hosti relicturi sitis. Pyrrho videlicet, qui hospitum[3] numero captivos habuit? An barbaro ac Poeno, qui utrum avarior an crudelior sit 15 vix existimari potest? Si videatis catenas squalorem deformitatem civium vestrorum, non minus profecto vos ea species moveat quam si ex altera parte cernatis stratas Cannensibus campis legiones
16 vestras. Intueri potestis sollicitudinem et lacrimas in vestibulo curiae stantium cognatorum nostrorum exspectantiumque responsum vestrum. Cum ii pro nobis proque iis qui absunt ita suspensi ac solliciti sint, quem censetis animum ipsorum esse quorum in 17 discrimine vita libertasque est?[4] Si, me dius fidius, ipse in nos mitis Hannibal contra naturam suam esse velit, nihil tamen nobis vita opus esse censeamus, cum indigni ut redimeremur vobis[5] visi
18 simus.[6] Rediere Romam quondam[7] remissi a Pyrrho sine pretio captivi,[8] sed rediere cum legatis, primoribus civitatis, ad redimendos sese missis; redeam ego in patriam trecentis nummis non aestimatus civis? Suum quisque habet animum,[9] patres
19 conscripti. Scio in discrimine esse vitam corpusque meum: magis me famae periculum movet, ne a vobis

[1] iam Valla: tam P: tamen ς: deleted by Sigonius.
[2] cui ς: quin P.
[3] hospitum Bauer and Fabri: uos hospitum P: velut hospitum Meyerhoefer.
[4] est? ς: estse|||P^1: esset P^2: est? sed Alschefski.
[5] vobis Madvig: a uobis P.
[6] simus Muretus: sumus P.
[7] quondam ς: quam P.
[8] captivi C. Heraeus: captiti P^1: capti P.

Roman. One other point I would suggest, as meriting B.C. 216 consideration, when you deliberate about this matter, Conscript Fathers: if haply you should incline to deal harshly by us—which we do not in the least deserve—to what enemy would you be leaving us? To a Pyrrhus, pray, who treated his prisoners like guests? or to a barbarian and Phoenician, of whom it can hardly be determined whether his avarice or cruelty be greater? If you could behold the fetters, the squalor, the degradation of your fellow-citizens, assuredly the sight would move you no less profoundly than if, on the other hand, you saw your legions lying slaughtered on the fields of Cannae. One thing you can see—the distress and tears of our kinsmen who are standing at the entrance of the Curia awaiting your decision. When these people are in such suspense and agony for us and for those who are absent, what think you the men themselves must feel whose life and liberty are hanging in the balance? If Hannibal—Heaven help me!—should himself be pleased, against his nature, to show us mercy, we should nevertheless deem life a worthless boon, if we had seemed to you unworthy of being ransomed. There once came back to Rome some prisoners whom Pyrrhus had allowed to go scot-free; but they came back in company with envoys, the first men of the state, whom you had sent to ransom them. Am I to come back to my country as a citizen not reckoned to be worth three hundred pieces? Every man, Conscript Fathers, has his own way of thinking. I know that my life and person are in jeopardy; but I am troubled more by the danger to my honour—lest we depart under your [9] habet animum s: animum P.

A.U.C. 538

damnati ac repulsi abeamus; neque enim vos pretio pepercisse homines credent."

LX. Ubi is finem fecit, extemplo ab ea turba quae in comitio erat clamor flebilis est sublatus, manusque ad curiam tendebant orantes ut sibi 2 liberos fratres cognatos redderent. Feminas quoque metus ac necessitas in foro[1] turbae virorum immiscuerat. Senatus summotis arbitris consuli coep- 3 tus. Ibi cum sententiis variaretur, et alii redimendos de publico, alii nullam publice impensam faciendam, 4 nec prohibendos ex privato redimi; si quibus argentum in praesentia deesset, dandam ex aerario pecuniam mutuam praedibusque ac praediis caven- 5 dum populo censerent; tum T. Manlius Torquatus, priscae ac nimis durae, ut plerisque videbatur,[2] severitatis, interrogatus sententiam ita locutus fertur: 6 "Si tantummodo postulassent legati pro iis qui in hostium potestate sunt, ut redimerentur, sine ullius insectatione eorum brevi sententiam pere- 7 gissem; quid enim aliud quam admonendi essetis, ut morem traditum a patribus necessario ad rem militarem exemplo servaretis? Nunc autem, cum prope gloriati sint quod se hostibus dediderint, praeferrique non captis modo in acie ab hostibus, sed etiam iis[3] qui Venusiam Canusiumque pervene-

[1] in foro Gronovius: in foro ac P: foro ac Koehler: in foro ac comitio M. Mueller: deleted by Voss.

[2] videbatur ς (Madvig) · uideuatur P^2: uideatur P^1.

[3] iis ς: ab iis P.

---

[1] The Comitium was an open area next to the Curia. Here stood the male relatives of the prisoners, and on the outskirts of the crowd (in the Forum, which lay just beyond the Comitium and sometimes, as in this sentence, is thought of as including it) their wives and mothers. The children condemnation and rebuff; for the world will never B.C. 216 believe that you were niggardly about the cost."

LX. As soon as he had finished speaking, the throng in the Comitium began to utter doleful cries, and holding out their hands to the Curia besought the senators to give them back their sons, their brothers, and their kinsmen. Even the women had been driven by their fear and destitute condition to mingle in the Forum with the crowd of men.[1] The senate was cleared of strangers and the debate began. Opinions differed. Some were for ransoming the prisoners at the public cost; others would have no money disbursed by the state, but would not prohibit ransoming at the expense of individuals, and to such as might not have the money in hand proposed to grant loans from the treasury, guarding the people against loss by taking sureties and mortgages. Then Titus Manlius Torquatus, a man of an old-fashioned and, as it seemed to many, a too harsh austerity, was called upon for his opinion and spoke as follows:

"If, in pleading the cause of those who are in the hands of our enemies, their representatives had been content to ask that they be ransomed, I should have said my say in a few words, without reflecting upon any of them; for what else need I have done than warn you to hold fast to the tradition of our fathers and teach a lesson necessary for military discipline? But as it is, since they have almost boasted of having surrendered to the enemy, and have held that they are to be preferred not only to those who were captured by the enemy in battle, but also to those who made their way to Venusia and Canusium, and [1] were not admitted even to the Forum, as Livy implies when in the foregoing sentence in the text he omits the word patres.

A.U.C. 538

runt, atque ipsi C. Terentio consuli aequum censuerint, nihil vos eorum, patres conscripti, quae illic
8 acta sunt ignorare patiar. Atque utinam haec quae apud vos acturus sum Canusi apud ipsum exercitum agerem, optimum testem ignaviae cuiusque et virtutis, aut unus hic saltem adesset P. Sempronius, quem si isti ducem secuti essent, milites hodie in castris Romanis, non captivi in hostium
9 potestate essent. Sed[1] cum, fessis pugnando hostibus tum victoria laetis, et ipsis plerisque regressis in castra sua, noctem ad erumpendum liberam habuissent, et septem milia[2] armatorum hominum erumpere etiam per confertos[3] hostes possent, neque per se ipsi id facere conati sunt
10 neque alium sequi voluerunt. Nocte prope tota P. Sempronius Tuditanus non destitit monere, adhortari eos, dum paucitas hostium circa castra, dum quies ac silentium esset, dum nox inceptum tegere posset, se ducem sequerentur: ante lucem pervenire
11 in tuta loca, in sociorum urbes posse. Si ut avorum memoria P. Decius tribunus militum in Samnio, si ut[4] nobis adulescentibus priore Punico bello M. Calpurnius Flamma[5] trecentis voluntariis, cum ad tumulum eos capiendum situm inter medios duceret hostes, dixit: 'Moriamur, milites, et morte nostra eripiamus ex obsidione circumventas legiones,' 12 —si hoc P. Sempronius diceret, nec viros equidem nec Romanos vos ducerem,[6] si nemo tantae virtutis

[1] sed Gronovius: et P.
[2] septem millia ς: septem P.
[3] per confertos Alschefski: confertos P.
[4] si ut . . . si ut Madvig: sicut . . . sicut P.
[5] M. Calpurnius Flamma H. J. Mueller: calpurnius flamma P.
[6] equidem . . . ducerem Koch: quidem . . . duceret P.

even to the consul, Gaius Terentius himself, I will B.C. 216 not permit you to be ignorant, Conscript Fathers, of any part of their conduct there. And I wish that what I am going to say to you I might say at Canusium in the presence of the army itself, the most competent witness to any man's cowardice or valour, or that Sempronius, at least, were with us here, whose leadership if yonder men had followed, they would to-day be soldiers in a Roman camp, not prisoners in the hands of our enemies. But when the enemy, worn out with fighting, and rejoicing in their victory, had themselves for the most part gone back to their own camp and left the night free for a sally; though seven thousand armed men could have forced their way even through a close array of foes, they neither attempted to do this of themselves, nor yet were willing to follow another. During almost all that night Publius Sempronius Tuditanus ceased not to admonish and exhort them to let him lead them, while only a few of their enemies were near the camp, while everything was hushed and still, while the darkness might afford a cover for their enterprise. Before daylight, he declared, they could reach a place of safety among the towns of the allies. If he had said what, within the recollection of our grandsires, Publius Decius, tribune of the soldiers, said in Samnium; or what Marcus Calpurnius Flamma said, when we ourselves were young men, in the former Punic war, to three hundred volunteers whom he was leading to take a hill that rose in the very midst of the enemy: 'Soldiers, let us die, and by our death set free the beleaguered legions'—if Publius Sempronius had said this, I should have deemed you no true men, to say nothing of Romans,

A.U.C. 538

13 exstitisset comes. Viam non ad gloriam magis quam ad salutem ferentem demonstrat; reduces [1] in patriam ad parentes ad coniuges ac liberos facit. 14 Ut servemini deest vobis animus; quid, si moriendum pro patria esset, faceretis? Quinquaginta milia civium sociorumque circa vos eo ipso die caesa iacent. Si tot exempla virtutis non movent, nihil unquam movebit; si tanta clades vilem [2] vitam non 15 fecit, nulla faciet. Liberi atque incolumes desiderate patriam; immo desiderate, dum patria est, dum cives eius estis. Sero [3] nunc desideratis, deminuti capite, abalienati iure civium, servi Carthaginiensium 16 facti. Pretio redituri estis eo unde ignavia ac nequitia abistis? P. Sempronium, civem vestrum, non audistis arma capere ac sequi se iubentem: [4] Hannibalem post paulo audistis castra prodi et arma 17 tradi iubentem.[5] Quamquam [6] quid ego [7] ignaviam istorum accuso, cum scelus possim accusare? Non modo enim sequi recusarunt bene monentem, sed obsistere ac retinere conati sunt, ni strictis gladiis viri fortissimi inertes summovissent. Prius, inquam, P. Sempronio per civium agmen quam per hostium 18 fuit erumpendum. Hos cives patria desideret? Quorum si ceteri similes fuissent, neminem hodie ex 19 iis qui ad Cannas pugnaverunt, civem haberet. Ex

[1] demonstrat; reduces Lipsius: demonstraret duces P.
[2] uilem ς: uelem P^1: inuelem P^2.
[3] sero ς: desero P.
[4] iubentem ς: iuuentem P^2: iuuentutem P^1.
[5] iubentem ς: iuuentutem P.
[6] quamquam Ussing: quam P.
[7] quid ego Weissenborn: ego P.

if none had come forward to share so brave an exploit. B.C. 216
But instead he points out to you a road that leads to safety as surely as to fame. He proposes to restore you to your country, to your parents, to your wives and children. You lack even the spirit to be saved! What would you do then if your country called on you to die? Fifty thousand fellow Romans and allies lay slaughtered round you that very day. If so many brave examples could not move you, nothing ever will. If that dreadful carnage has not made life cheap, none ever will. Long for your country, whilst you are free and unattainted. Nay, rather, long for it whilst it is your country, whilst you are reckoned with its citizens. Too late now is your longing; you have forfeited your status, lost your civic rights, been made slaves of the Carthaginians. Do you think to return, for ransom, to that condition which you forfeited by cowardice and turpitude? You would not listen to Publius Sempronius, your fellow citizen, when he bade you arm and follow him; but you listened to Hannibal a little later, when he bade you betray the camp and surrender your arms. But why do I charge these men with cowardice when I could bring against them a charge of crime? For not only did they refuse to follow a man who gave them good advice, but they tried to thwart and hinder him; and those heroic men were forced to draw their swords and thrust the cowards from their path. Aye, Publius Sempronius must needs break through a band of Roman citizens before he could break through their enemies! Can their country wish to recover such citizens as these? If the others had resembled these, she would possess to-day no single citizen of all those who fought at Cannae. Out of

A.U.C. 538 milibus septem armatorum sescenti exstiterunt qui erumpere auderent, qui in patriam liberi atque armati redirent, neque his sescentis[1] hostes ob-
20 stitere : quam tutum iter duarum prope legionum agmini futurum censetis fuisse? Haberetis hodie viginti milia armatorum Canusi fortia fidelia, patres conscripti. Nunc autem quem ad modum hi boni fidelesque—nam fortes ne ipsi quidem dixerint—
21 cives esse possunt? Nisi quis credere potest adfuisse[2] erumpentibus, qui, ne erumperent, obsistere conati sunt ; aut non invidere eos cum incolumitati, tum gloriae illorum per virtutem partae, cum sibi timorem ignaviamque servitutis ignominiosae causam
22 esse sciant. Maluerunt in tentoriis latentes simul lucem atque hostem exspectare, cum silentio noctis erumpendi occasio esset. At enim ad[3] erumpendum e castris defuit animus, ad tutanda fortiter castra
23 animum habuerunt ; dies noctesque aliquot obsessi vallum armis,[4] se ipsi tutati vallo sunt ; tandem ultima ausi passique, cum omnia subsidia vitae deessent[5] adfectisque fame viribus arma iam sustinere nequirent, necessitatibus magis humanis quam
24 armis victi sunt. Orto sole hostis ad vallum accessit ;[6] ante secundam horam, nullam fortunam certaminis experti, tradiderunt arma ac se ipsos.

[1] sescentis (sex-) Ingerslev (Madvig) : sexcentis milia ς : sescenta milia P.
[2] adfuisse Luchs : fuisse ut P : fuisse utiles Koch.
[3] at enim ad ς : ad P.
[4] armis Gronovius : arma P.
[5] deessent ς : abdesunt P^1 : desunt P^2.
[6] hostis . . . accessit ς : ab hostibus . . . accessit P.

seven thousand soldiers, six hundred were sufficiently B.C. 216 courageous to force their way through and return to their country, free and armed. Nor did these six hundred encounter any opposition from the enemy; how safe then, think you, would have been their march, if they had amounted almost to two legions? You would have to-day under arms at Canusium, Conscript Fathers, twenty thousand brave and loyal men. But how can these men now be good and loyal citizens—for they themselves would hardly claim to be brave? Unless we are to believe that they helped their comrades to sally out, when in fact they tried to prevent the sally; or that they grudge not those men both the safety and the renown their courage has earned them, knowing, as they do, that fear and cowardice are the cause of their own disgraceful servitude. They had a good chance of escaping in the silence of the night, but preferred to hide in their tents and await both the day and the enemy. But perhaps, though they lacked the courage to sally forth, they had courage enough for a valiant defence of the camp? Perhaps they were besieged for several days and nights, and protected the rampart with their swords, and themselves with the rampart? and finally, after suffering the last extremities, when every support of life gave out and their strength was so impaired with hunger that they could now no longer hold up their shields, they were overcome by the necessities of human nature and not by arms? Nay, the sun was up when the enemy approached the rampart, and the day was not two hours old when, without once putting their fortune to the test of battle, they surrendered both their arms and their persons. Such, mark you, were

A.U.C. 538

25 Haec vobis istorum[1] per biduum militia fuit. Cum in acie[2] stare ac pugnare decuerat,[3] in castra[4] refugerunt; cum pro vallo pugnandum erat, castra tradiderunt, neque in acie neque in castris utiles.
26 Et vos[5] redimamus? Cum erumpere e castris oportet, cunctamini ac manetis; cum manere et[6] castra tutari armis necesse est, et castra et arma
27 et vos ipsos traditis hosti. Ego non magis istos redimendos, patres conscripti, censeo quam illos dedendos Hannibali qui per medios hostes e castris eruperunt ac per summam virtutem se patriae restituerunt."

LXI. Postquam Manlius dixit, quamquam patrum quoque plerosque captivi cognatione attingebant, praeter exemplum civitatis minime in captivos iam inde antiquitus indulgentis, pecuniae quoque summa
2 homines movit, quia[7] nec aerarium exhauriri,[8] magna iam summa erogata in servos ad militiam emendos armandosque, nec Hannibalem maxime huiusce rei,
3 ut fama erat, egentem locupletari volebant. Cum triste responsum, non redimi captivos, redditum

[1] istorum Weissenborn: ipsorum P.
[2] in acie ς: acie P.
[3] decuerat ς: decuerit P.
[4] in castra Luchs: cum in castra P.
[5] et vos Alschefski: quos P: uos ς.
[6] manere et ς: manere P.
[7] quia ς: quam P: qua ς.
[8] exhauriri C. Heraeus: exaurire P.

---

[1] But the senate could not keep Hannibal from making money out of his prisoners. When the senate would not ransom them, he sold them into slavery, and Polybius (see Livy XXXIV. 1. 6) told how, in 194 B.C., at the request of Flamininus, the Greek states bought up and liberated a the exploits these men performed during two days. B.C. 216

When they ought to have stood fast in the line and fought, they fled to their tents; when they ought to have fought for their stockade, they surrendered the camp, worthless alike in the field and behind entrenchments. And you would have us ransom you? When it is time to sally from your camp, you hesitate and stop there; when it is needful that you stop and defend it with your swords, you hand over camp and swords and your own bodies to the enemy! No, Conscript Fathers, I would no more vote for ransoming these men than I would for giving those others up to Hannibal, who forced their way from the camp through the midst of enemies, and, by exerting the utmost valour, gave themselves back to their country."

LXI. After the speech of Manlius, though most of the senators, too, had relatives amongst the prisoners, yet, besides the example of a state which had shown from of old the scantiest consideration for prisoners of war, they were also moved by the greatness of the sum required, not wishing either to exhaust the treasury, on which they had already made a heavy draft to purchase slaves and arm them for service, or to furnish Hannibal with money[1]— the one thing of which he was rumoured to stand most in need. When the stern reply, that the prisoners would not be ransomed, had gone forth, great number of Roman prisoners who had been purchased from Hannibal. No less than twelve hundred were freed by the Achaeans alone, at a cost to their state of one hundred talents. Valerius Maximus (v. ii. 6), puts the whole number at two thousand, and doubtless thousands more had died in the course of twenty-two years.

A.U.C. 538

esset, novusque super veterem luctus tot iactura civium adiectus esset, cum magnis fletibus questi-
4 busque legatos ad portam prosecuti sunt. Unus ex iis domum abiit, quod fallaci reditu in castra iure iurando se exsolvisset. Quod ubi innotuit relatumque ad senatum est, omnes censuerunt comprehendendum et custodibus publice datis deducendum ad Hannibalem esse.
5 Est et alia de captivis fama: decem primo legatos[1] venisse; de eis cum dubitatum in senatu esset, admitterentur in urbem necne, ita admissos esse ne
6 tamen iis senatus daretur; morantibus deinde longius omnium spe alios tres insuper legatos venisse, L.
7 Scribonium et C. Calpurnium et L. Manlium; tum demum ab cognato Scriboni tribuno plebis de redimendis captivis relatum esse nec censuisse redimendos senatum; et novos legatos tres ad Hannibalem
8 revertisse, decem veteres remansisse, quod per causam recognoscendi nomina captivorum ad Hannibalem ex itinere regressi religione sese exsolvissent; de iis dedendis magna contentione actum in senatu esse, victosque paucis sententiis qui dedendos cen-
9 suerint; ceterum proximis censoribus adeo omnibus notis ignominiisque confectos esse ut quidam eorum

[1] primo legatos Luchs: primos P: primo Woelfflin.

---

[1] This seems to be a fusion of the account preserved by Appian (Hann. 28), where the number of envoys is given as three, with the commoner version of the story, which speaks of ten. The combination may have been made by the C. Acilius who wrote a history in Greek in which he told of the battle of Cannae (Cicero, De Officiis III. 115), and is perhaps the man whose name is given by the MSS. of the Summary of Book LIII. as c. iulius (cf. Schanz-Hosius, Römische Literaturgeschichte, I.[4], p. 177).

and fresh sorrow had been added to the old, at the B.C. 216 loss of so many of their fellow-citizens, the crowd attended the envoys to the gate with many tears and lamentations. One of them departed to his home, pretending to have freed himself from his oath when he deceitfully returned to the enemy's camp. As soon as this became known and was reported to the senators, they voted unanimously to arrest him and appointed guards to conduct him back to Hannibal.

There is also another account[1] of the prisoners of war: that ten envoys came at first, and that the senate, after hesitating whether or no to admit them to the City, admitted them, with the proviso that they should have no hearing. Later, on their delaying longer than anybody had anticipated, three additional envoys came, namely Lucius Scribonius and Gaius Calpurnius and Lucius Manlius; then at last a motion was made in the senate by a kinsman of Scribonius, who was tribune of plebs,[2] that the prisoners be ransomed, but the motion was defeated; the three new envoys now returned to Hannibal, but the original ten remained in Rome, alleging that they had freed themselves of their obligation by going back to Hannibal's camp, after starting on their journey, under the pretext of reviewing the prisoners' names. A proposal to surrender them was hotly debated in the senate and was lost by only a few votes. However, under the next censors the ten were so overwhelmed with every species of reprobation and disgrace that some of them killed themselves forthwith, and the rest

[2] This was probably the L. Scribonius Libo mentioned at XXIII. XXI. 6.

A.U.C. 538 mortem sibi ipsi extemplo consciverint, ceteri non foro solum omni deinde vita, sed prope luce ac
10 publico caruerint. Mirari magis adeo discrepare inter auctores quam quid veri sit discernere queas.

Quanto autem maior ea clades superioribus cladibus fuerit, vel[1] ea res indicio est, quod fides sociorum,[2] quae ad eam[3] diem firma steterat, tum labare[4] coepit, nulla profecto alia de re quam quod desperaverant de imperio. Defecere autem ad Poenos hi 11 populi: Campani, Atellani,[5] Calatini, Hirpini, Apulorum pars, Samnites praeter Pentros, Bruttii omnes, 12 Lucani, praeter hos Uzentini et Graecorum omnis ferme ora, Tarentini, Metapontini, Crotonienses
13 Locrique, et Cisalpini omnes Galli. Nec tamen eae clades defectionesque sociorum moverunt ut pacis usquam[6] mentio apud Romanos fieret, neque ante consulis Romam adventum nec postquam is rediit
14 renovavitque memoriam acceptae cladis; quo in tempore ipso adeo magno animo civitas fuit ut consuli ex tanta clade, cuius ipse causa maxima fuisset, redeunti et obviam itum frequenter ab omnibus ordinibus sit et gratiae actae quod de re publica 15 non desperasset; qui si Carthaginiensium ductor fuisset, nihil recusandum supplicii foret.

[1] vel ς: uelde P.
[2] indicio est, quod fides sociorum Alschefski: indiciorum P.
[3] ad eam ς: eadem P.
[4] labare ς: laborare P: labrare ς.
[5] Campani, Atellani Weissenborn: atellani P.
[6] usquam P: umquam ς.

---

[1] This list includes all the peoples of Italy who revolted at one time or another during the war with Hannibal.
[2] An allusion to the alleged Carthaginian custom of during all the remainder of their lives avoided not B.C. 216 only the Forum, but, one might almost say, the light of day and the public streets. It is more amazing that the authorities should be so divergent than easy to make out the truth.

For the rest, how greatly this disaster exceeded those that had gone before is plain from this: the loyalty of the allies, which had held firm until the day of Cannae, now began to waver, assuredly for no other reason than because they had lost all hope of the empire. Now these are the peoples that revolted: the Campanians, the Atellani, the Calatini, the Hirpini, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnites but the Pentri, all the Bruttii, the Lucanians, and besides these the Uzentini and almost all the Greeks on the coast, the Tarentines, the Metapontines, the Crotoniates and the Locri, together with all the Cisalpine Gauls.[1] Yet these disasters and the falling away of the allies could not induce the Romans anywhere to mention peace, either before the consul came to Rome or after his coming had turned men's thoughts anew to the calamity which they had suffered. In that very hour there was such courage in the hearts of the citizens that when the consul was returning from that defeat for which he himself had been chiefly responsible, a crowd of all sorts and conditions went out to meet him on the way, and gave him thanks because he had not despaired of the state; whereas, had he been the commander of the Carthaginians, there was no punishment he would not have been compelled to suffer.[2] crucifying incompetent generals. See XXXVIII. xlviii. 13 and Valerius Maximus II. vii. Ext. 1.

LIBRI XXII PERIOCHA

HANNIBAL per continuas vigilias in paludibus oculo amisso in Etruriam venit; per quas paludes quadriduo et tribus noctibus sine ulla requie iter fecit. C. Flaminius consul, homo temerarius, contra auspicia profectus, signis militaribus effossis, quae tolli non poterant, et ab equo quem conscenderat per caput devolutus, insidiis ab Hannibale circumventus ad Thrasymennum lacum cum exercitu caesus est. Sex milia, quae eruperant, fide ab Atherbale[1] data perfidia Hannibalis vincta sunt. Cum ad nuntium cladis Romae luctus esset, duae matres ex insperato receptis filiis gaudio mortuae sunt. Ob hanc cladem ex Sibyllinis libris ver sacrum votum.

Cum deinde Q. Fabius Maximus dictator adversus Hannibalem missus nollet acie cum eo confligere, ne contra ferocem tot victoriis hostem territos[2] adversis proeliis milites pugnae[3] committeret, et opponendo se tantum conatus Hannibalis impediret, M. Minucius magister equitum, ferox et temerarius, criminando dictatorem tamquam segnem et timidum effecit ut populi iussu aequaretur ei cum dictatore imperium; divisoque exercitu cum iniquo loco conflixisset et in magno discrimine legiones eius essent, superveniente cum exercitu Fabio Maximo liberatus est. Quo beneficio victus castra

[1] ab atherbale (or attherbale) MSS.: a Maharbale Cod. Leidensis and ed. prin. (to agree with Liv. XXII. vi. 11).

[2] hostem territos edd. (after hostem territum . . . militem of the Aldine ed.): hostem MSS.

[3] pugnae cod. Vossianus and ed. prin.: pugnare MSS.

---

[1] See note on text.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXII

HANNIBAL, losing sleep continuously in the marshes, went blind in one eye, and reached Etruria after marching through the swamps for four days and three nights without repose. Gaius Flaminius the consul, a headstrong man, set out, against the warning of the auspices, after digging out the military standards which they had been unable to pull up, and after the horse which he had mounted had thrown him over its head; and, entrapped by Hannibal in an ambush at Lake Thrasymennus, was slain and his army cut to pieces. Six thousand men who had broken through the enemy's lines were thrown into chains through Hannibal's perfidy, notwithstanding the pledge which Atherbal[1] had given them. While the Romans were mourning at the tidings which had come of this calamity, two mothers died of joy on recovering the sons whom they had given up for lost. Because of this defeat a Sacred Spring was vowed, by the direction of the Sibylline Books.

When, after that, Quintus Fabius Maximus, who had been sent out as dictator to oppose Hannibal, was loath to meet him in the open field, for he would not trust his soldiers, who had been cowed by these defeats, in a battle with an enemy emboldened by his victories; and was satisfied merely to thwart the efforts of Hannibal, by blocking his way; Marcus Minucius, the master of the horse, a rash and headstrong man, charging the dictator with sluggishness and timidity persuaded the people to decree that his own authority should be equal to that of the dictator. But, the army being divided between them, Minucius gave battle in an unfavourable position, and his legions were in great peril, when Fabius Maximus came up with his army and saved him. Won over by this generosity, he joined his camp to that of cum eo iunxit et patrem eum salutavit idemque facere milites iussit.

Hannibal, vastata Campania inter Casilinum oppidum et Calliculam montem a Fabio clusus, sarmentis ad cornua boum alligatis et incensis praesidium Romanorum quod Calliculam insidebat fugavit et sic transgressus est saltum. Idemque Q. Fabi Maximi dictatoris, cum circumposita ureret, agro pepercit, ut illum tamquam proditorem suspectum faceret.

Aemilio deinde Paulo et Terentio Varrone consulibus ducibus[1] cum magna clade adversus Hannibalem ad Cannas pugnatum est, caesaque eo proelio Romanorum $\overline{\text{XLV}}$ cum Paulo consule et senatoribus XC et consularibus aut praetoriis aut aediliciis XXX. Post quae cum a nobilibus adulescentibus propter desperationem consilium de relinquenda Italia iniretur, P. Cornelius Scipio tribunus militum, qui Africanus postea vocatus est, stricto supra capita deliberantium ferro iuravit pro hoste se habiturum eum qui in verba sua non iurasset, effecitque ut omnes non relictum iri a se Italiam iure iurando adstringerentur.

Propter paucitatem militum $\overline{\text{VIII}}$ servorum armata sunt. Captivi, cum potestas esset redimendi, redempti non sunt.

Praeterea trepidationem urbis et luctum et res in Hispania meliore eventu gestas continet. Opimia et Florentia[2] virgines Vestales incesti damnatae sunt. Varroni obviam itum et gratiae actae, quod de re publica non desperasset.

[1] consulibus ducibus Madvig: consulibus et ducibus MSS.
[2] Florentia MSS.: Floronia Liv. XXII. lvii. 2.

Fabius, and, saluting him as his father, bade his army do the same.

Hannibal, after laying waste Campania, was penned in by Fabius between the town of Casilinum and Mount Callicula. Binding twigs about the horns of oxen and setting them on fire, he frightened off the detachment of Romans stationed on Callicula, and so marched over the pass. It was Hannibal, too, who spared the farm of Quintus Fabius Maximus the dictator, when burning all that country-side, in order to make him suspected of being a traitor.

Aemilius Paulus and Terentius Varro then became consuls and commanded the army which fought disastrously with Hannibal at Cannae. There were slain in that battle forty-five thousand Romans, including the consul Paulus, and ninety senators, and thirty others who had been consuls or praetors or aediles. After that some young nobles were plotting, in their despair, to abandon Italy, when Publius Cornelius Scipio, a tribune of the soldiers, who was later surnamed Africanus, held his drawn sword over the heads of the conspirators and vowing that he would treat as a public enemy whoever should not swear at his dictation, compelled them all to bind themselves with an oath not to abandon Italy.

There were so few soldiers that they armed eight thousand slaves. They were given an opportunity of ransoming the prisoners, but did not ransom them.

The book also describes the panic and grief in the City, and the operations, conducted more successfully, in Spain. The Vestals Opimia and Florentia were convicted of unchastity. The people went out to meet Varro, and thanked him because he had not despaired of the Republic.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IN THIRTEEN VOLUMES

VI

BOOKS XXIII—XXV

TRANSLATED BY

FRANK GARDNER MOORE

PROFESSOR EMERITUS IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

384165
13.9.40

LONDON

WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

MCMXL

CONTENTS

PAGE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE vii

THE MANUSCRIPTS ix

BOOK XXIII 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIII 171

BOOK XXIV 173

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIV 337

BOOK XXV 339

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXV 503

APPENDIX: THE TOPOGRAPHY OF SYRACUSE 505

INDEX OF NAMES. 511

MAPS AND PLANS—

1. CENTRAL ITALY . . . . . At end

2. SOUTH ITALY AND SICILY . . . . . ,,

3. SYRACUSE . . . . . ,,

4. TARENTUM . . . . . ,,

5. SPAIN . . . . . ,,

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXIII

A.U.C. 538

I. HANNIBAL[1] post Cannensem pugnam castraque[2] capta ac direpta confestim ex Apulia in Samnium moverat, accitus in Hirpinos a Statio Trebio[3] pollicente se Compsam traditurum. Compsanus erat Trebius nobilis inter suos; sed premebat eum Mopsiorum factio, familiae per gratiam Romanorum potentis. Post famam Cannensis pugnae volgatumque Trebi sermonibus adventum Hannibalis cum Mopsiani[4] urbe excessissent, sine certamine tradita urbs Poeno praesidiumque acceptum est. Ibi praeda omni atque impedimentis relictis, exercitu partito Magonem regionis eius urbes aut deficientis ab Romanis accipere aut detractantis cogere ad defectionem iubet, ipse per agrum Campanum mare inferum petit, oppugnaturus Neapolim, ut urbem maritimam haberet. Ubi fines Neapolitanorum

[1] Hannibal Valla : haec Hannibal P(1).
[2] castraque Valla : castra A^{xz} : binaque castra Luchs : om. P(1).
[3] Trebio Gronovius : om. P(1).
[4] Mopsiani Gronovius : compsam P(1).

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXIII

I. After the battle of Cannae and the capture and B.C. 216. plunder of the camps, Hannibal had moved at once out of Apulia into Samnium, being invited into the land of the Hirpini by Statius Trebius, who promised that he would turn over Compsa to him. Trebius was a Compsan of high rank among his people, but opposed by the party of the Mopsii, a family made powerful by the favour of the Romans. After the news of the battle of Cannae, and when the coming of Hannibal had been made known by utterances of Trebius, since the Mopsii had left the city, it was handed over to the Carthaginians without resistance and a garrison admitted. There Hannibal left all his booty and the baggage, divided his army, and ordered Mago either to take over such cities of that region as were deserting the Romans or to compel them to desert in case they refused. He himself made his way through the Campanian region to the Lower Sea,[1] intending to attack Neapolis, that he might have a seaport. On entering the territory of the [1] I.e. the Tuscan Sea; cf. xxxviii. 1.

A.V.C. 538

intravit, Numidas partim in insidiis—et pleraeque cavae sunt viae sinusque occulti—quacumque apte poterat disposuit, alios prae se actam praedam ex
7 agris ostentantis obequitare portis iussit. In quos, quia nec multi et incompositi videbantur, cum turma equitum erupisset, ab cedentibus consulto tracta in 8 insidias circumventa est; nec evasisset quisquam, ni mare propinquum et haud procul litore naves, piscatoriae pleraeque, conspectae peritis nandi
9 dedissent effugium. Aliquot tamen eo proelio nobiles iuvenes capti caesique, inter quos et Hegeas, praefectus equitum, intemperantius cedentes secutus
10 occidit. Ab urbe oppugnanda Poenum absterruere conspecta moenia haudquaquam prompta oppugnanti.

II. Inde Capuam flectit iter luxuriantem longa felicitate atque indulgentia fortunae, maxime tamen inter corrupta omnia licentia plebis sine modo liber-
2 tatem exercentis. Senatum et sibi et plebi obnoxium Paeuvius Calavius fecerat, nobilis idem ac popularis
3 homo, ceterum malis artibus nanctus opes. Is cum eo forte anno quo res male gesta ad Trasumennum est in summo magistratu esset, iam diu infestam senatui plebem ratus per occasionem novandi res magnum ausuram facinus ut, si in ea loca Hannibal cum victore exercitu venisset, trucidato senatu traderet

[1] He was called medix tuticus; cf. xxxv. 13. For the defeat of Flaminius at the Trasumennus cf. XXII. iv ff.

Neapolitans, he stationed some of the Numidians in B.C. 216 ambush, wherever he conveniently could (and most of the roads are deep-cut and the turnings concealed). Other Numidians he ordered to ride up to the gates, making a display of the booty they were driving along before them from the farms. Against these men, because they seemed to be few in number and disorganized, a troop of cavalry made a sally, but being drawn into the ambush by the enemy's purposely retreating, it was overpowered. And not a man would have escaped if the proximity of the sea and the sight of vessels, chiefly of fishermen, not far from the shore had not given those who could swim a way of escape. However a number of young nobles were captured or slain in that battle, among them Hegeas, a cavalry commander, who fell as he rashly pursued the retreating. From besieging the city the Carthaginian was deterred by the sight of walls such as by no means invited an attacker.

II. Hannibal then directed his march to Capua, which was vegetating from long-continued prosperity and the favour of fortune, but, along with the general corruption, especially from the licence of the common people, who enjoyed an unlimited freedom. As for the senate, Pacuvius Calavius, a noble who was at the same time of the people's party, but had gained his influence by base arts, had made it subservient both to himself and to the common people. He, being in their highest office,[1] as it happened, in the year of the defeat at the Trasumennus, thought that the commons, long hostile to the senate, would use the opportunity of a revolution and dare to commit a great crime, namely, if Hannibal should come into the region with his victorious army, they would slay

A.U.C. 38

4 Capuam Poenis, improbus homo sed non ad extremum perditus, cum mallet incolumi quam eversa re publica dominari, nullam autem incolumem esse orbatam publico consilio crederet, rationem iniit qua et senatum servaret et obnoxium sibi ac plebi 5 faceret. Vocato senatu cum sibi defectionis ab Romanis consilium placiturum nullo modo, nisi 6 necessarium fuisset, praefatus esset, quippe qui liberos ex Appii Claudii filia haberet filiamque 7 Romam nuptum M. Livio dedisset; ceterum maiorem multo rem magisque timendam instare; non enim per defectionem ad tollendum ex civitate senatum plebem spectare, sed per eaedem senatus vacuam rem publicam tradere Hannibali ac Poenis velle; 8 eo se periculo posse liberare eos, si permittant sibi et certaminum in re publica obliti credant,—cum 9 omnes victi metu permitterent, "Claudam" inquit "in curia vos et, tamquam et ipse cogitati facinoris particeps, adprobando consilia quibus nequiquam adversarer, viam saluti vestrae inveniam. In hoc 10 fidem, quam voltis ipsi, accipite." Fide data egressus claudi curiam iubet, praesidiumque in vestibulo relinquit, ne quis adire curiam iniussu suo neve inde egredi possit.

III. Tum vocato ad contionem populo "Quod saepe" inquit "optastis, Campani, ut supplicii sumendi vobis ex improbo ac detestabili senatu the senators and hand over Capua to the Cartha- B.C. 216

ginians. A bad man, but not utterly abandoned, he preferred to dominate a state still intact rather than one that had been wrecked, yet believed that none was intact if deprived of its deliberative body. He accordingly entered upon a scheme to save the senate and at the same time to make it submissive to himself and to the commons. Summoning the senate he began by saying that, unless it should prove necessary, a plan to revolt from the Romans would by no means have his approval, since he had children by a daughter of Appius Claudius and had given a daughter in marriage to Marcus Livius at Rome. But, he went on to say, something much more serious and more to be dreaded was impending; for the common people were not aiming to rid the state of the senate by a revolt, but by the massacre of the senate wished to hand over the republic, left helpless, to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. From that danger he could free them if they should leave it to him, and, forgetting civil conflicts, trust him. When, overcome by fear, they unanimously left matters to him, "I will shut you up," he said, "in the Senate House and, just as if I were myself a sharer in the crime intended, by approving plans which it would be vain for me to oppose, I will find a way to save you. For this accept a pledge, as you yourselves desire." Having given the pledge he went out, ordered the Senate House to be closed and left a guard before the entrance, that no one might be able to enter the Senate House or leave it without his order.

III. Then calling the people to an assembly he said: "You have often desired, Campanians, to have the power to exact punishment from a base and potestas esset, eam non per tumultum expugnantes domos singulorum, quas praesidiis clientium servorumque tuentur, cum summo vestro periculo, sed tutam habetis ac liberam; clausos omnis in curia[1] accipite, solos, inermis. Nec quicquam raptim aut forte temere egeritis; de singulorum capite vobis ius sententiae dicendae faciam, ut quas quisque meritus est poenas pendat; sed ante omnia ita vos irae indulgere oportet, ut potiorem ira salutem atque utilitatem vestram habeatis. Etenim hos, ut opinor, odistis senatores, non senatum omnino habere non voltis; quippe aut rex, quod abominandum, aut, quod unum liberae civitatis consilium est, senatus habendus est. Itaque duae res simul agendae vobis sunt, ut et veterem senatum tollatis et novum cooptetis. Citari singulos senatores iubebo de quorum capite vos consulam; quod de quoque censueritis fiet; sed prius in eius locum virum fortem ac strenuum novum senatorem cooptabitis quam de noxio supplicium sumatur." Inde consedit et nominibus in urnam coniectis citari quod primum sorte nomen excidit ipsumque e curia produci iussit. Ubi auditum est nomen, malum et improbum pro se quisque clamare et supplicio dignum. Tum Pacuvius "Video quae de hoc sententia sit; date igitur pro malo atque improbo bonum senatorem et iustum." Primo silentium erat inopia potioris subiciundi; deinde cum aliquis omissa verecundia quempiam

A.U.C. 538

[1] curia D? Madvig: curiam $P(3)D^{2}?$

odious senate. That power you have, not by riotously storming, with great danger to yourselves, the houses of individuals who defend them with garrisons of clients and slaves, but you have the power secure and unrestricted. As they are shut up there, every man of them, in the Senate House, seize them, left alone, unarmed! And do nothing in haste or at haphazard. I will give you the right to decide their fate in each separate case, so that each shall pay the penalty he has deserved. But above all things you should vent your wrath with due regard to the conviction that your safety and advantage are worth more than wrath. For it is these senators that you hate, I think; it is not your wish to have no senate at all. In fact you must either have a king—save the mark!—or else a senate, the only deliberative body in a free state. And so you have two things to do at the same time—to do away with the old senate, and to choose a new one. I will order the senators to be called one by one and will consult you as to their fate. Whatever is your opinion in each case shall be done, but before punishment is inflicted on the guilty one you will choose in his place a brave and active man as a new senator." He then sat down, and after the names had been placed in the urn, he ordered the first name drawn by lot to be called and the man himself to be led out of the Senate House. On hearing the name every man shouted his loudest, that he was a bad man and base and deserved punishment. Upon that Pacuvius said: "I see what your verdict is in this man's case; therefore in place of a bad man and base nominate a good and just senator." At first there was silence from their inability to suggest a better man. Then when someone, over- B.C. 216

A.U.C. 538

nominasset, multo maior extemplo clamor oriebatur, 11 cum alii negarent nosse, alii nunc probra nunc humilitatem sordidamque inopiam et pudendae artis 12 aut quaestus genus obicerent. Hoc multo magis in secundo ac tertio citato senatore est factum, ut ipsius paenitere homines appareret, quem autem in 13 eius substituerent locum deesse, quia nec eosdem nominari attinebat, nihil aliud quam ad audienda probra nominatos, et multo humiliores obscurioresque ceteri erant eis qui primi memoriae occurrerant.
14 Ita dilabi homines, notissimum quodque malum maxime tolerabile dicentes esse iubentesque sena-tum ex custodia dimitti.

IV. Hoc modo Pacuvius cum obnoxium vitae bene-ficio senatum multo sibi magis quam plebi fecisset, sine armis iam omnibus concedentibus dominabatur.
2 Hinc senatores omissa dignitatis libertatisque memoria plebem adulari;[1] salutare, benigne invitare, 3 apparatis accipere epulis, eas causas suscipere, ei semper parti adesse, secundum eam litem iudices dare quae magis popularis aptiorque in volgus 4 favori conciliando esset; iam vero nihil in senatu agi[2] aliter quam si plebis ibi esset concilium. Prona semper civitas in luxuriam non ingeniorum modo vitio sed affluenti copia voluptatium et inlecebris
5 omnis amoenitatis maritimae terrestrisque, tum vero

[1] adulari Salmasius: advari P: adfari P^2(1).
[2] agi Madvig: aet P(4): actum C^2DA.

---

[1] Capua, prospering by its varied industries established by the Etruscans, was already noted for its wealth and a luxury greater than that of Croton and Sybaris; Polybius VII. i. 1 and III. xci. 6; Cicero Leg. Agr. II. 95; cf. Strabo V. iv. 3.

coming his timidity, named a man, at once there was B.C. 21 a much louder outcry, some saying they did not know him, others taunting him, now with shameful conduct, now with low rank and sordid poverty and the disreputable nature of his trade or business. All the more was this done in the case of the second and third senator called. So it was clear that people were dissatisfied with the man himself, but had no one to put in his place. For nothing was gained by once more naming the same men, who had been named only to be reviled. And the rest were much lower in rank and less known than those who first came to mind. Accordingly men slipped away, saying that the most familiar evil is the most endurable, and bidding Pacuvius release the senate from confinement.

IV. In this way Pacuvius, having made the senate much more subservient to himself than to the common people by saving their lives, ruled without arms, as all now gave way to him. Thereafter the senators, forgetting their rank and freedom, flattered the common people, greeted them, invited them graciously, entertained them at well appointed feasts; invariably undertook cases, appeared as counsel, or as jurors gave a verdict, only for that side which was the more popular and better suited to win favour with the populace. Moreover, nothing was done in the senate otherwise than if a meeting of the common people was being held there. The state had always been inclined to luxury,[1] not only from defects in character, but also from the abundant opportunity for indulgences and the beguilement of all the charms of sea and land. But at that time, thanks to the servility of the leading men and the

A.U.C. 538

ita obsequio principum et licentia plebei lasciuire 6 ut nec libidini nec sumptibus modus esset. Ad contemptum legum, magistratuum, senatus accessit tum, post Cannensem cladem, ut, cuius aliqua verecundia erat, Romanum quoque spernerent imperium.
7 Id modo erat in mora ne extemplo deficerent, quod conubium vetustum multas familias claras ac potentis
8 Romanis miscuerat, et [1] cum militarent aliquot [2] apud Romanos, maximum vinculum erant trecenti equites, nobilissimus quisque Campanorum, in praesidia Sicularum urbium delecti ab Romanis ac missi. V. Horum parentes cognatique aegre pervicerunt ut legati ad consulem Romanum mitterentur.

Ii nondum Canusium profectum sed Venusiae cum paucis ac semiermibus consulem invenerunt, quam poterant [3] maxime miserabilem bonis sociis, superbis atque infidelibus, ut erant Campani, spernendum.
2 Et auxit rerum suarum suique contemptum consul 3 nimis detegendo cladem nudandoque. Nam cum legati aegre ferre senatum populumque Campanum adversi quicquam evenisse Romanis nuntiassent pollicerenturque omnia quae ad bellum opus essent, 4 "Morem magis" inquit "loquendi cum sociis ser-vastis, Campani, inbentes quae opus essent ad bellum imperare, quam convenienter ad praesentem for-5 tunae nostrae statum locuti estis. Quid enim nobis

[1] et Crévier: et quod $P(2)A$ Conway^2.

[2] aliquot (aliquod) $P(2)A^2$: aliquando Conway, placing cum-clause after Campanorum.

[3] poterant $P(1)$: poterat z.

---

[1] As belonging to the most prominent families and dispersed among the cities of Sicily, they were in effect hostages.

licence of the common people, they were so unrestrained that no limit was set to passion or to expense. To their contempt for laws, the magistrates, the senate, there was now added, after the defeat at Cannae, their disparagement of the Roman power also, for which there used to be some respect. All that held them back from at once revolting was that the long-established right of intermarriage had united many distinguished and powerful families with the Romans, and that, although a considerable number were serving on the Roman side, the strongest bond was the three hundred horsemen, noblest of the Campanians, who had been chosen to garrison Sicilian cities by the Romans and sent thither.[1] V. Their parents and relatives with difficulty carried their point, that representatives should be sent to the Roman consul. B.C. 216

These men found the consul not yet departed for Canusium, but with a few half-armed men at Venusia,[2] exciting the utmost pity in good allies, but contempt in the haughty and faithless, such as were the Campanians. And the consul increased the contempt for his situation and for himself by needlessly uncovering and laying bare the disaster. For when the delegation had reported that the senate and the Campanian people were distressed that any reverse had befallen the Romans, and were promising everything that might be needed for the war, he said: "You, Campanians, have observed the customary manner of speaking to allies, in bidding me requisition whatever is needed for the war, rather than spoken conformably to the present state of our fortunes.

[2] Immediately after the battle of Cannae; XXII. xlix. 14; liv. 1 and 6.

A.U.C. 358

ad Cannas relictum est, ut, quasi [1] aliquid habeamus, id quod deest expleri ab sociis velimus? Pedites vobis imperemus, tamquam equites habeamus? Pecuniam deesse dicamus, tamquam ea tantum desit? 6 Nihil, ne quod suppleremus quidem, nobis reliquit fortuna. Legiones, equitatus, arma, signa, equi virique, pecunia, commeatus aut in acie aut binis postero die 7 amissis castris perierunt. Itaque non iuvetis nos in bello oportet, Campani, sed paene bellum pro nobis 8 suscipiatis. Veniat in mentem, ut trepidos quondam maiores vestros intra moenia compulsos, nec Samnitem modo hostem sed etiam Sidicinum paventis, receptos in fidem ad Saticulam defenderimus, coeptumque propter vos cum Samnitibus bellum per centum prope annos variante fortuna eventum 9 tulerimus. Adicite ad haec, quod foedus aequum deditis, quod leges vestras, quod ad extremum, id quod ante Cannensem certe cladem maximum fuit, civitatem nostram magnae parti vestrum dedimus 10 communicavimusque vobiscum. Itaque communem vos hanc cladem quae accepta est credere, Campani, oportet, communem patriam tuendam arbitrari esse. 11 Non cum Samnite aut Etrusco res est, ut quod a nobis ablatum sit in Italia tamen imperium maneat; Poenus hostis, ne Africae quidem indigena,[2] ab ultimis terrarum oris, freto Oceani Herculisque

[1] quasi A^{γ}: quia $P(1)$.
[2] indigena $P(1)$: indigenam x Madvig.

---

[1] On the contrary, it was by aiding the Sidicinians against the Samnites that the Campanians became involved in the 1st Samnite War, 343 B.C.; VII. xxix.

For what has been left to us at Cannae, so that, as if B.C. 216
we had something, we may wish what is lacking to be made up by the allies? Are we to requisition infantry from you, as though we had cavalry? Are we to say that money is lacking, as if that alone were lacking? Nothing has fortune left us, even to supplement. Legions, cavalry, arms, standards, horses and men, money and supplies have vanished either in the battle or in the loss of two camps the next day. And so you, Campanians, have not to help us in war, but almost to undertake the war in our stead. Recall how, when your ancestors were once confined in alarm within their walls, dreading not only the Samnite enemy but also the Sidicinian,[1] we took them under our protection and defended them at Saticula. Also how with varying fortunes we endured for almost a hundred years[2] the war begun with the Samnites on your account. Add to this that upon your submission we gave you a fair treaty and your own laws, and finally—and before the disaster at Cannae this was certainly the greatest privilege—our citizenship to a large number of you and shared it with you. A share, then, Campanians, you should believe you have in this disaster which has befallen us, and should think that you must defend the country in which you have a share. Not with the Samnite or Etruscan is the struggle to have the power which has been wrested from us nevertheless remain in Italy. A Carthaginian enemy, not even of African origin, is dragging after him from the farthest limits of the world, from the strait of Ocean and the Pillars of Hercules, soldiers who

[2] Really seventy-one years. More rhetorical exaggeration in propter vos, and especially in the following sentence.

A.U.C. 538

columnis, expertem omnis iuris et condicionis et lin-12 guae prope humanae militem trahit. Hunc natura et moribus immitem ferumque insuper dux ipse efferavit pontibus ac molibus ex humanorum corporum struc faciendis et, quod proloqui etiam piget, vesci cor-
13 poribus humanis docendo. His infandis pastos epulis, quos contingere etiam nefas sit, videre atque habere dominos et ex Africa et a Carthagine iura petere et Italiam Numidarum ac Maurorum pati provinciam esse, cui non, genito modo in Italia, 14 detestabile sit? Pulchrum erit, Campani,[1] prolapsum clade Romanum imperium vestra fide, vestris viribus
15 retentum ac recuperatum esse. Triginta milia peditum, quattuor milia equitum arbitror ex Campania scribi posse; iam pecuniae adfatim est frumentique. Si parem fortunae vestrae fidem habetis, nec Hannibal se vicisse sentiet nec Romani victos esse."

VI. Ab[2] hac oratione consulis dimissis redeuntibusque domum legatis unus ex iis, Vibius Virrius, tempus venisse ait quo Campani non agrum solum ab Romanis quondam per iniuriam ademptum recupe-
2 rare, sed imperio etiam Italiae potiri possint; foedus enim cum Hannibale quibus velint legibus facturos; neque controversiam fore quin, cum ipse confecto bello Hannibal victor in Africam decedat exercitumque deportet, Italiae imperium Campanis relin-
3 quatur. Hace Virrio loquenti adsensi omnes ita

[1] Campani z: campanis P(1).
[2] ab Gronovius: om. P(1) Conway.

[1] So Polybius had said of Hannibal's polyglot troops, οἷς οὐ νόμος, οὐκ ἔθος, οὐ λόγος, κτλ., XI. xix. 4.

[2] Livy makes Varro repeat exaggerated statements about Hannibal; cf. Appian Hann. 28.

are unacquainted with any civilized laws and or- B.C. 216 ganization and, one may almost add, language too.[1] Ruthless and barbarous by nature and custom, these men have been further barbarized by the general himself, in making bridges and embankments of piled up human bodies, and by teaching them—horrible even to relate—to feed upon the bodies of men.[2] To see and have as our masters men who fatten upon these unspeakable feasts, men whom it is a crime even to touch, and to get our law from Africa and Carthage, and to allow Italy to be a province of the Numidians and the Mauri—who, if merely born in Italy, would not find that abominable? It will be a glorious thing, Campanians, if the Roman power, brought low by disaster, shall have been maintained and restored by your loyalty and your resources. Thirty thousand foot-soldiers and four thousand horsemen can be enrolled from Campania, I believe. Moreover you have sufficient money and grain. If you have a loyalty to match your prosperity Hannibal will not be aware of his victory, nor the Romans of their defeat."

VI. After this speech of the consul the legates were dismissed, and on their way home Vibius Virrius, one of them, said the time had come when the Campanians could not only recover the territory formerly taken from them unjustly by the Romans, but could also gain authority over Italy. For they would make a treaty with Hannibal on their own terms. And there would be no doubt that, when Hannibal, upon the completion of the war, retired as victor to Africa and removed his army, authority over Italy would be left to the Campanians. Having agreed unanimously with these words of Virrius, they renuntiant legationem uti deletum omnibus videretur 4 nomen Romanum. Extemplo plebes ad defectionem ac pars maior senatus spectare; extracta tamen

A.U.C. 538

5 auctoritatibus seniorum per paucos dies est res.
Postremo vincit sententia plurium, ut iidem legati qui ad consulem Romanum ierant ad Hannibalem 6 mitterentur. Quo priusquam iretur certumque de-fectionis consilium esset, Romam legatos missos a Campanis in quibusdam annalibus invenio, postulantes ut alter consul Campanus fieret, si rem Ro-7 manam adiuvari vellent; indignatione orta summo-veri a curia iussos esse, missumque lictorem qui ex urbe educeret eos atque eo die manere extra finis 8 Romanos iuberet. Quia nimis compar Latinorum quondam postulatio erat, Coeliusque et alii id haud [1] sine causa praetermiserant [2] scriptores, ponere pro certo sum veritus.

VII. Legati ad Hannibalem venerunt pacemque cum eo his [3] condicionibus fecerunt, ne quis imperator magistratusve Poenorum ius ullum in civem Campanum haberet, neve civis Campanus invitus militaret
2 munusve faceret: ut suae leges, sui magistratus
Capuae essent; ut trecentos ex Romanis captivis Poenus daret Campanis, quos ipsi elegissent, eum quibus equitum Campanorum, qui in Sicilia stipendia

[1] id haud Aldus: haud A^{y}: sit aut $P(4)$: ita ut $C^{x}DA$.
[2] praetermiserant $P(1)$: -miscrint C^{4}; -missuri erant Madvig.
[3] his z: om. $P(1)$.

[1] Not so to Calavius' son; viii. 3 and 11.
[2] Cicero mentions this demand of Capua; Leg. Agr. II. 95.

made such a report of their embassy that the Roman name seemed to all to have been blotted out.[1] At once the populace and most of the senate were aiming to revolt. But action was postponed for a few days by the weighty advice of the older men. Finally the view of the majority prevailed, that the same legates who had gone to the Roman consul should be sent to Hannibal. Before they went to him and before the plan to revolt was settled upon, I find in some of the annals that legates were sent to Rome by the Campanians with the demand that, if they wished them to aid the Roman state, one of the consuls should be a Campanian:[2] that resentment was aroused and the legates were ordered to be removed from the Senate House, and that a lictor was sent to lead them out of the city and bid them lodge that night outside of Roman territory. Because there was once a suspiciously similar demand made by the Latins,[3] and Caelius and other historians had not without reason omitted the matter, I have been afraid to set this down as established. B.C. 216

VII. The legates came to Hannibal and made an alliance with him on these terms: that no general or magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any authority over a Campanian citizen, and that no Campanian citizen should be a soldier or perform any service against his will; that Capua should have its own laws, its own magistrates; that the Carthaginian should give the Campanians three hundred of the Roman captives of their own choosing, with whom there should be an exchange of the Campanian

[3] That one of the consuls should be from Latium, 340 B.C., VIII. v. 5 and 7 (the threat of Manlius mentioned below, xxii. 7).

A.U.C. 538

3 facerent, permutatio fieret. Haec pacta; illa insuper quam quae pacta erant facinora Campani ediderunt: nam praefectos socium civisque Romanos alios, partim aliquo militiae munere occupatos, partim privatis negotiis implicitos, plebs repente omnis comprehensos velut custodiae causa balneis includi iussit, ubi fervore atque aestu anima interclusa foedum in modum exspirarent.[1]

4 Ea ne fierent neu legatio mitteretur ad Poenum, summa ope Decius Magius, vir cui ad summam auctoritatem nihil praeter sanam civium mentem
5 defuit, restiterat. Ut vero praesidium mitti ab Hannibale audivit, Pyrrhi superbam dominationem miserabilemque Tarentinorum servitutem exempla referens, primo ne reciperetur praesidium palam
6 vociferatus est, deinde ut receptum aut eiceretur aut, si malum facinus quod a vetustissimis sociis consanguineisque defecissent forti ac memorabili facinore purgare vellent, ut interfecto Punico praesidio
7 restituerent Romanis se. Haec—nec enim occulta agebantur—cum relata Hannibali essent, primo misit qui vocarent Magium ad sese in castra; deinde, cum is ferociter negasset se iturum, nec enim Hannibali ius esse in civem Campanum, concitatus ira Poenus comprehendi hominem vinctumque adtrahi
8 ad sese iussit. Veritus deinde ne quid inter vim tumultus atque ex concitatione animorum inconsulti certaminis oreretur, ipse praemisso nuntio ad Marium Blossium, praetorem Campanum, postero

[1] ex(s)pirarent P(1): exspirarunt Heusinger.

horsemen who were serving in Sicily. Such were the terms. In addition to what was agreed upon the Campanians perpetrated these misdeeds: the populace suddenly seized prefects of the allies and other Roman citizens, some of them employed in a military duty, some engaged in private business, and with the pretence of guarding them ordered them all to be confined in the baths, that there they might die a terrible death, being suffocated by the extreme heat. B.C. 216

Such conduct and the sending of an embassy to the Carthaginian had been opposed to the utmost by Decius Magius, a man who lacked nothing for the attainment of the highest authority except sanity on the part of the citizens. But when he heard that a garrison was being sent by Hannibal, recalling the haughty rule of Pyrrhus and the wretched servitude of the Tarentines as warning examples, he at first openly protested that the garrison should not be admitted; then, after it had been admitted, either that it should be driven out, or, if they wished to atone for their evil action in having revolted from their oldest allies and men of the same blood by a brave and notable act, that they should slay the Punic garrison and return to their Roman allegiance. When this was reported to Hannibal (for it was not done in secret), he first sent men to summon Magius to him at the camp. Then when the latter replied with spirit that he would not go, for Hannibal had no authority over a Campanian citizen, the Carthaginian was enraged and ordered the man to be seized and brought before him in chains. Later, fearing that in the use of force some commotion, and in view of the excitement some unpremeditated conflict, might occur, he first sent word to Marius Blossius, the die se Capuae futurum, proficiscitur e castris cum 9 modico praesidio. Marius contione advocata edicit ut frequentes cum coniugibus ac liberis obviam irent Hannibali. Ab universis id non oboedienter modo sed enixe, favore etiam volgi et studio visendi tot iam victoriis clarum imperatorem, factum est.

A.U.C. 538

10 Decius Magius nec obviam egressus est nec, quo timorem aliquem ex conscientia significare posset, privatim [1] se tenuit; in foro cum filio clientibusque paucis otiose inambulavit trepidante tota civitate ad 11 excipiendum Poenum visendumque. Hannibal ingressus urbem senatum extemplo postulat, precantibusque inde primoribus Campanorum ne quid eo die seriae rei gereret dieinque ut [2] ipse adventu suo 12 festum laetus ac libens celebraret, quamquam praeceps ingenio in iram erat, tamen, ne quid in principio negaret, visenda urbe magnam partem dici consumpsit.

VIII. Deversatus est apud Nimnios Celeres, Sthenium Pacuviumque, inclitos nobilitate ac divitiis.
2 Eo Pacuvius Calavius, de quo ante dictum est, prin-ceps factionis eius quae traxerat rem ad Poenos, filium iuvenem adduxit abstractum a Deci Magi 3 latere, cum quo ferocissime pro Romana societate adversus Punicum foedus steterat, nec eum aut inclinata in partem alteram civitas aut patria maiestas 4 sententia depulerat. Huic tum pater iuveni Hanni-

[1] privatim P(1): privato Gronovius.
[2] ut P(1): et Gruter.

[1] Chapters ii–iv.

Campanian magistrate, that he would be in Capua the next day, and then he set out from the camp with a small escort. Marius, calling an assembly, ordered them to go out to meet Hannibal en masse with wives and children. This was done by all not only obediently but also eagerly, owing to the enthusiasm of the crowd as well and the desire to go and see a general already famous for so many victories. Decius Magius neither went out to meet him nor remained in seclusion, by doing which he might show some fear due to conscience. He strolled idly in the market-place with his son and a few clients, although the whole city was astir to welcome and to see the Carthaginian. Hannibal entered the city and at once demanded a session of the senate, and then when the leading Campanians begged him not to do any serious business that day, and that he should himself cheerfully and willingly honour the day gladdened by his coming, though he was naturally hot-tempered, still in order not to deny them anything at the start, he spent a large part of the day in seeing the city. B.C. 216

VIII. He lodged at the house of the Ninnii Celeres, the brothers Sthenius and Pacuvius, men distinguished for their rank and wealth. To that house Pacuvius Calavius, of whom mention has been made above,[1] leader of the party which had drawn the state to the side of the Carthaginians, came bringing his young son. He had got him away from the company of Decius Magius, with whom the son in the most confident spirit had stood up for the Roman alliance against a treaty with Carthage. And neither the decision of the state for the other side nor his father's high position had dislodged him from his opinion. Such was the young man to whom his father, rather

A.U.C. 538

balem deprecando magis quam purgando placavit, victusque patris precibus lacrimisque etiam ad
5 cenam eum cum patre vocari iussit, cui convivio neminem Campanum praeterquam hospites Vibelliumque Tauream, insignem bello virum, adhibiturus
6 erat. Epulari coeperunt de die, et convivium non ex more Punico aut militari disciplina esse sed, ut in civitate atque etiam domo diti ac[1] luxuriosa,[2]
7 omnibus voluptatium inlecebris instructum. Unus nec dominorum invitatione nec ipsius interdum Hannibalis Calavius filius perlici ad[3] vinum potuit, ipse valetudinem excusans, patre animi quoque eius
8 haud mirabilem perturbationem causante. Solis ferme occasu patrem Calavium ex convivio egressum secutus filius, ubi in secretum—hortus erat posticis
9 aedium partibus—pervenerunt, "Consilium" inquit "adfero, pater, quo non veniam solum peccati, quod defecimus ad Hannibalem, impetraturi[4] ab Romanis, sed in multo maiore dignitate et gratia simus Cam-
10 pani quam umquam fuimus futuri."[5] Cum mirabundus pater quidnam id esset consilii quaereret, toga reiecta ab umero latus succinctum gladio nudat.
11 "Iam ego" inquit "sanguine Hannibalis sanciam Romanum foedus. Te id prius scire volui, si forte abesse, dum facinus patratur, malles."

IX. Quae ubi vidit audivitque senex, velut si iam
2 agendis quae audiebat interesset, amens metu "Per [1] diti ac Kreyssig : divad P(1).

[2] luxuriosa Gronovius : variosa P(4).
[3] perlici ad Heerwagen : perhola P : perholla P^2(4).
[4] impetraturi A^y : impetravi P : impetrari P^2*?*(1) : impetremus A^y : impetrare possimus x.
[5] futuri Madvig : om. P(1).

by pleading than by excusing, reconciled Hannibal, B.C. 216 and he, prevailed upon by the father's prayers and tears, even ordered that the son should be invited with the father to a dinner at which he was to have the company of no Campanian except his hosts and Vibellius Taurea, a distinguished soldier. They began feasting by daylight, and the banquet was not according to Carthaginian custom or military regimen, but provided with all that tempts indulgence, as it was to be expected in a city, and a house as well, of wealth and luxury. Calavius the son was the only one who could not be prevailed upon to drink either by the invitation of the owners or even, now and then, of Hannibal. He himself pleaded ill health as an excuse, while his father alleged distress of mind also, at which one could not wonder. About sunset the son followed the elder Calavius coming out from the feast, and when they had reached a secluded spot—it was a garden in the rear of the house—he said: "I propose a plan, father, by which we may not only gain pardon from the Romans for our offence in having revolted to Hannibal, but as Campanians may be in a position of much greater respect and favour than we should ever have been otherwise." When the astonished father asked what that plan was, the son throwing his toga off his shoulder bared his side girt with a sword. "Presently," he said, "I will ratify a treaty with the Romans by the blood of Hannibal. I wished you to know that in advance, in case you should prefer not to be there when the deed is being done."

IX. When the old man saw and heard that, he was beside himself with fear, as if he were already present at the execution of the plan of which he was ego te" inquit, "fili, quaecumque iura liberos iungunt parentibus, precor quaesoque ne ante oculos patris

A.U.C. 538

3 facere et pati omnia infanda velis. Paucae horae sunt intra quas iurantes per quidquid deorum est, dextrae dextras iungentes, fidem obstrinximus,—ut sacratas fide manus digressi a conloquio extemplo in 4 eum armaremus? Ab hospitali mensa surgis, ad quam tertius Campanorum adhibitus es ab Hannibale,—ut eam ipsam mensam eruentares hospitis sanguine? Hannibalem pater filio meo potui pla-
5 care, filium Hannibali non possum? Sed sit nihil sancti, non fides, non religio, non pietas; audeantur infanda, si non perniciem nobis cum scelere ferunt.
6 Unus adgressurus es Hannibalem? Quid illa turba tot liberorum servorumque? Quid in unum intenti omnium oculi? Quid tot dextrae? Torpescent in 7 amentia illa? Voltum ipsius Hannibalis, quem armati exercitus sustinere nequivere,[1] quem horret populus Romanus, tu sustinebis? Ut ab aliis[2]
8 auxilia desint, me ipsum ferire corpus meum opponentem pro corpore Hannibalis sustinebis? Atqui per meum pectus petendus ille tibi transfigendusque est. Sed hic te deterreri sine potius quam illic vinci; valeant preces apud te meae, sient pro te 9 hodie valuerunt." Lacrimantem inde iuvenem cernens medium complectitur atque osculo haerens non

[1] sustinere nequivere Wölfflin (nequeunt Gronovius): sustineren P: -em R^2M: -rent (6): -re M^2.

[2] ut ab aliis Mayerhöfer: italis P: talis P^1? (1): ut alia Drakenborch.

being told, and said: "I pray and implore you, my B.C. 216 son, by all the rights which link children to their parents, not to do and suffer all that is unutterable before the eyes of your father. It is but a few hours since, with an oath by all the gods that exist and joining our right hands to his, we pledged our honour. Was it with the intention, as soon as we left the conference, to arm against him the hands hallowed by our plighted faith? From the hospitable board, to which you were invited by Hannibal with but two other Campanians, do you rise with the intention of staining that very board with the blood of a guest? Was I able as a father to reconcile Hannibal with my son, and can not reconcile my son with Hannibal? But assuming that there is nothing hallowed, no honour, no scruple, no filial devotion, dare to do unspeakable things, if they do not bring destruction to us as well as guilt. Single-handed will you attack Hannibal? What of that crowd, so many free men and slaves? What of all men's eyes fixed upon one man? What of so many sword-hands? Will they be paralysed in the moment of that mad deed? Will you withstand Hannibal's own countenance, which armed forces have been unable to withstand, which the Roman people dreads? Supposing that help from others is lacking, will you bring yourself to strike me, when I interpose my body in place of Hannibal's? And yet it is through my breast that you will have to attack him and run him through. But allow yourself to be dissuaded here, rather than overpowered there. Let my prayers prove effectual with you, as they have proved this day for you." Seeing the young man in tears he threw his arms about his waist, and repeatedly kissing him he did ante precibus abstitit quam pervicit ut gladium 10 ponceret fidemque daret nihil facturum tale. Tum invenis " Ego quidem " inquit " quam patriae debeo pietatem exsolvam patri. Tuam doleo vicem, cui 11 ter proditae patriae sustinendum est crimen, semel cum defectionem [1] inisti [2] ab Romanis, iterum cum pacis cum Hannibale fuisti auctor, tertio hodie, cum restituendae Romanis Capuae mora atque impedi-12 mentum es. Tu, patria, ferrum, quo pro te armatus hanc arcem hostium inii, quoniam parens extorquet, 13 recipe." Haec cum dixisset, gladium in publicum trans maceriam horti abiecit et, quo minus res suspecta esset, se ipse convivio reddidit.

A.U.C. 538

X. Postero die senatus frequens datus Hannibali. Ubi prima eius oratio perblanda ac benigna fuit, qua gratias egit Campanis quod amicitiam suam Romanae
2 societati praeposuissent, et inter cetera magnifica promissa pollicitus est [3] brevi caput Italiae omni Capuam fore iuraque inde cum ceteris populis
3 Romanum etiam petiturum. Unum esse exsortem Punicae amicitiae foederisque secum facti, quem neque esse Campanum neque diei debere, Magium Decium; cum postulare ut sibi dedatur ac se praesente de eo referatur senatusque consultum fiat.
4 Omnes in eam sententiam ierunt, quamquam magnae parti et vir indignus ea calamitate et haud parvo initio

[1] defectionem D^xAz: defectione $P(2)A^x$: defectionis x Gronovius.

[2] inisti z: inissa P: missa $P^{2?}$: imissa RM: in(or im)missa $CM^{1?}DA$.

[3] est Weissenborn: om. $P(1)$.

not desist from entreaties until he had prevailed upon B.C. 216 him to put down his sword and give his pledge that he would do no such crime. Then the young man said: "As for me, I will pay my father the debt of devotion which I owe to my country. For you I am sorry, for you will have to meet the charge of thrice betraying your country, once when you took part in the revolt from the Romans, a second time when you advised peace with Hannibal, a third time today when you are an obstacle and a hindrance to restoring Capua to the Romans. Do you, my country, take back the sword with which I had armed myself in your defence and entered this stronghold of the enemy; for my father wrests it from me." Having thus spoken, he threw the sword over the garden wall into a street, and, that his conduct might not be open to suspicion, himself returned to the banquet.

X. On the following day a full session of the senate was given to Hannibal. There his speech was at the outset very genial and kindly, thanking the Campanians for having preferred his friendship to a Roman alliance. And among his other magnificent assurances he promised them that Capua should soon be the capital of all Italy, and that from it the Roman people along with the rest of the nations should derive its law. He said that one man had no part in friendship with Carthage and the treaty made with himself, namely Magius Decius, a man who ought neither to be a Campanian nor to be so called; he demanded that the man be surrendered to him, and that in his own presence his case be brought up and a decree of the senate framed. All voted for that proposal, although it seemed to many of them that the man did not deserve that misfortune; also

A.U.C. 538

5 minui videbatur ius libertatis. Egressus curia in templo magistratuum consedit comprehendique Decium Magium atque ante pedes destitutum causam
6 dicere iussit. Qui cum manente ferocia animi negaret lege foederis id cogi posse, tum iniectae catenae, ducique ante lictorem in castra est iussus.
7 Quoad capite aperto est ductus, contionabundus incessit ad circumfusam undique multitudinem vociferans: "Habetis libertatem, Campani, quam petistis; foro medio, luce clara, videntibus vobis nulli Campanorum secundus vinctus ad mortem rapior.
8 Quid violentius capta Capua fieret? Ite obviam Hannibali, exornate urbem diemque adventus eius consecrate, ut hunc triumphum de cive vestro spectetis."

9 Haec vociferanti,[1] cum moveri volgus videretur, obvolutum caput est, ociusque rapi extra portam iussus. Ita in castra perducitur extemploque in-10 positus in navem et Carthaginem missus, ne motu aliquo Capuae ex indignitate rei orto senatum quoque paeniteret dediti principis et, legatione missa ad repetendum eum, aut negando rem quam primam peterent offendendi sibi novi socii, aut tribuendo habendus Capuae esset seditionis ac turbarum auctor.
11 Navem Cyrenas detulit tempestas, quae tum in dicione regum erant. Ibi cum Magius ad statuam

[1] vociferanti x: -te P(1).

---

[1] I.e. of Egypt. Ptolemy IV Philopator was then reigning; XXIV. xxvi. 1.

that the right of liberty was being infringed by a first act that was not insignificant. Leaving the Senate House Hannibal took his seat on the tribune of the magistrates and ordered the arrest of Decius Magius, and that he be placed at his feet and make his defence. While with undaunted spirit Magius was saying that by the terms of the treaty he could not be compelled to do that, chains were put upon him and he was ordered to be led to the camp with a lictor following. So long as they led him with bare head, he kept haranguing as he went, shouting to the crowd all about him: "You have the freedom you wanted, Campanians. Through the middle of the market-place, in broad daylight, before your eyes, I, who am second to no one of the Campanians, am being hurried away in chains to my death. What deed of greater violence could be done if Capua had been taken? Go to meet Hannibal, decorate your city and make the day of his coming a holiday,—that you may witness this triumph over your fellow-citizen." B.C. 216

As he was thus shouting and the populace seemed to be aroused, his head was covered and they were ordered to drag him more swiftly outside the gate. Thus he was led into the camp, at once put on shipboard and consigned to Carthage, for fear, if there should be some outbreak at Capua in consequence of the shameful act, the senate also might regret having surrendered a leading man, and, when an embassy was sent to demand his return, Hannibal either must offend his new allies by refusing their first request, or by granting it be obliged to keep at Capua a fomenter of insurrection and riots. A storm carried the ship to Cyrenae, which was then subject to kings.[1] On fleeing for refuge to the statue of

A.U.C. 538

Ptolomaei regis confugisset, deportatus a custodibus
12 Alexandream ad Ptolomaeum, cum eum docuisset contra ius foederis vinctum se ab Hannibale esse, vinclis liberatur, permissumque ut rediret, seu Romam
13 seu Capuam mallet. Nec Magius Capuam sibi tutam dicere et Romam eo tempore quo inter Romanos Campanosque bellum sit transfugae magis quam hospitis fore domicilium; nusquam malle quam in regno eius vivere quem vindicem atque auctorem habeat libertatis.

XI. Dum haec geruntur, Q. Fabius Pictor legatus a Delphis Romam rediit responsumque ex scripto recitavit. Divi divaeque in eo erant quibus
2 quoque modo supplicaretur; tum "Si ita faxitis, Romani, vestrae res meliores facilioresque erunt, magisque ex sententia res publica vestra vobis procedet, victoriaque duelli populi Romani erit.
3 Pythio Apollini re publica vestra bene gesta servataque e [1] lueris meritis donum mittitote deque praeda, manubiis spoliisque honorem habetote; lasciviam a
4 vobis prohibetote." Haec ubi ex Graeco carmine interpretata recitavit, tum dixit se oraculo egressum extemplo iis omnibus divis rem divinam ture ac vino
5 fecisse; inssumque a templi antistite, sicut coronatus laurea corona et oraculum adisset et rem divinam fecisset, ita coronatum navem ascendere nec ante

[1] e Crévier, Madvig: de Weissenborn: om. P(1) Walters.

[1] He had been sent to Delphi after the battle of Cannae: XXII. lvii. 5. His history, written in Greek, was one of Livy's sources.

King Ptolemy there, Magius was carried under guard B.C. 216 to Ptolemy at Alexandria. And having informed him that he had been bound by Hannibal contrary to his treaty rights, he was freed from his chains and allowed to return to Rome or to Capua, as he might prefer. Magius said that Capua was unsafe for him, and on the other hand, at a time when there was a war between the Romans and the Campanians, Rome would be the abode of a deserter rather than of a guest; that he had no wish to live elsewhere than in the land of a king in whom he found the giver and defender of his freedom.

XI. While these things were going on, Quintus Fabius Pictor[1] returned to Rome from his embassy to Delphi and read from a manuscript the response of the oracle. In it were indicated the gods and goddesses to whom offerings should be made, and in what manner. It continued: "If you do thus, Romans, your situation will be better and easier, and your state will go on more in accordance with your desire, and the Roman people will have the victory in the war. When you have successfully administered and preserved your state, from the gains made you shall send a gift to Pythian Apollo and do honour to him out of the booty, the profits and the spoils. You shall keep yourselves from exulting." After reading these words translated from the Greek verses, he went on to say that, on coming out of the oracle, he had at once made offerings to all those divinities with incense and wine; also that he had been bidden by the high-priest of the temple, just as he had come to the oracle and also conducted the rite while wearing a garland of laurel, so also to wear the garland when he boarded the ship, and not to lay

A.U.C. 538

6 deponere eam quam Romam pervenisset; se, quaecumque imperata sint, cum summa religione ac diligentia exsecutum coronam Romae in aram Apollinis deposuisse. Senatus decrevit ut eae res divinae supplicationesque primo quoque tempore cum cura fierent.

7 Dum haec Romae atque in Italia geruntur, nuntius victoriae ad Cannas Carthaginem venerat Mago Hamilcaris filiius, non ex ipsa acie a fratre missus sed retentus aliquot dies in recipiendis civitatibus
8 Bruttiorum, quae [1] deficiebant. Is, cum ei senatus datus esset, res gestas in Italia a fratre exponit: cum sex imperatoribus eum, quorum quattuor consules, duo dictator ac magister equitum fuerint, cum
9 sex consularibus exercitibus acie conflixisse; occidisse supra ducenta milia hostium, supra quinquaginta milia cepisse. Ex quattuor consulibus duos occidisse: ex duobus saucium alterum, alterum toto amisso exercitu vix cum quinquaginta hominibus
10 effugisse. Magistrum equitum, quae consularis potestas sit, fusum fugatum; dictatorem, quia se in aciem numquam commiserit, unicum haberi imperato-
11 rem. Bruttios Apulosque, partem Samnitium ac Lucanorum defecisse ad Poenos. Capuam, quod

[1] quae A^2: quaeq. $P(1)$: Apulorum Lucanorumque quae Conway (one line).

---

[1] Livy possibly mentioned others besides the Bruttii. In i. 4 Mago is in Samnium for the same purpose.

[2] Five consuls had been defeated by Hannibal: Scipio (Ticinus), Sempronius (Trebia), Flaminius (Trasumennus) Paulus and Varro (Cannae). As Scipio was the wounded consul of § 9, it must be Sempronius who is here omitted. Yet elsewhere much is made of the battle of the Trebia (xviii. 7; xlv. 6). A copyist may have written viimperatoribus instead it aside until he should reach Rome. Further, that B.C. 216 he had carried out with the utmost scrupulosity and care all the instructions given him, and had then laid the wreath upon the altar of Apollo at Rome. The senate decreed that at the first opportunity those rites should be duly observed with prayers.

While these things were happening at Rome and in Italy, Mago, the son of Hamilcar, had come to Carthage to report the victory at Cannae. He had not been sent by his brother directly from the battle, but had been detained for some time in taking over the Bruttian states which were revolting.[1] Accorded a hearing in the senate, he set forth the achievements of his brother in Italy: that he had fought pitched battles with six high commanders, of whom four were consuls,[2] and two a dictator and a master of the horse,[3] in all with six consular armies; that he had slain over 200,000 of the enemy and captured over 50,000;[4] that of the four consuls he had slain two;[5] of the other two one had fled wounded,[6] the other with barely fifty men, after losing his entire army;[7] that the master of the horse, whose power is that of a consul, had been routed and put to flight; that the dictator was accounted an extraordinary general because he never ventured into battle-line; that the Bruttians and Apulians and some of the Samnites and Lucanians had revolted to the Carthaginians; that of viiimperatoribus. That done, the change of v to iv (same line and § 9) would be an effort to make the figures tally.

[3] Fabius Maximus, the Cunctator, and Minucius Rufus. Both are included among the defeated generals in spite of what is said in regard to the dictator in § 10.

[4] Exaggerated figures in both cases.

[5] Flaminius and Aemilius Paulus.

[6] Scipio at the Ticinus. [7] Terentius Varro.

A.U.C. 538

caput non Campaniae modo sed post adflictam rem Romanam Cannensi pugna Italiae sit, Hannibali se [1] 12 tradidisse. Pro his tantis totque victoriis verum esse grates deis immortalibus agi haberique.

XII. Ad fidem deinde tam laetarum rerum effundi in vestibulo curiae iussit anulos aureos, qui tantus acervus fuit ut metientibus dimidium supra [2] tris 2 modios explesse sint quidam auctores; fama tenuit, quae propior vero est, haud plus fuisse modio. Adiecit deinde verbis, quo maioris cladis indicium esset, neminem nisi equitem, atque eorum ipsorum 3 primores, id gerere insigne. Summa fuit orationis, quo propius spem belli perficiendi sit, eo magis omni ope iuvandum Hannibalem esse; procul enim ab domo militiam esse, in media hostium terra; 4 magnam vim frumenti pecuniae absumi, et tot acies, ut hostium exercitus delesse, ita victoris etiam copias 5 parte aliqua minuisse; mittendum igitur supplementum esse, mittendam in stipendium pecuniam frumentumque tam bene meritis de nomine Punico militibus.

6 Secundum haec dicta Magonis laetis omnibus Himilco, vir factionis Barcinae, locum Hannonis increpandi esse ratus, "Quid est, Hanno?" inquit," etiam nunc paenitet belli suscepti adversus Romanos? 7 Iube dedi Hannibalem; veta in tam prosperis rebus

[1] se M^4 (after sit in A^2): om. $P(1)$.
[2] supra Madvig (rejecting dimidium $P(1)$): super $PM^3(5)$.

Capua, which was the capital not only of Campania, B.C. 216 but, since the blow inflicted upon the Roman state by the battle of Cannae, of Italy also, had surrendered to Hannibal. For these victories, so many and so great, it was proper, he said, that gratitude be expressed and felt toward the immortal gods.

XII. Then in evidence of such successes he ordered the golden rings to be poured out at the entrance of the Senate House. And so great was the heap of them that, when measured, they filled, as some historians assert, three pecks and a half. The prevailing report, and nearer the truth, is that there was not more than one peck. Then, that it might be proof of a greater calamity, he added in explanation that no one but a knight, and even of the knights only those of the higher class, wore that token. The main point of his speech was that the nearer Hannibal came to realizing his hope of ending the war, the more necessary it was to help him by every means. For his campaigning was far from home, in the midst of the enemy's country. A large amount of grain and money was being consumed, he said, and though so many battles had destroyed the enemy's armies, still they had considerably diminished the forces of the victor as well. Therefore they must send reinforcements, they must send money to pay them and grain to soldiers who had deserved so well of the Carthaginian nation.

After these words of Mago, while all were rejoicing, Himilco, a man of the Barca party, thought it an opportunity to rebuke Hanno. "Tell me, Hanno," he said, "is it still to be regretted that we undertook a war against the Romans? Order the surrender of Hannibal! In the midst of such successes forbid the grates deis immortalibus agi; audiamus Romanum 8 senatorem in Carthaginiensium curia." Tum Hanno:

A.U.C. 538

"Tacuissem hodie, patres conscripti, ne quid in communi omnium gaudio minus laetum quod esset 9 vobis loquerer; nunc interroganti senatori, paeni-teatne[1] adhuc suscepti adversus Romanos belli, si reticeam, aut superbus aut obnoxius videar, quorum alterum est hominis alienae libertatis obliti, alterum 10 suae. Respondeam[2]" inquit "Himilconi, non desisse paenitere me belli neque desiturum ante invictum vestrum imperatorem incusare quam finitum ali-qua tolerabili condicione bellum videro; nec mihi pacis antiquae desiderium ulla alia res quam pax
11 nova finiet. Itaque ista quae modo Mago iactavit Himilconi ceterisque Hannibalis satellitibus iam laeta sunt: mihi possunt laeta esse, quia res bello bene gestae, si volumus fortuna uti, pacem nobis 12 aequiorem dabunt; nam si praetermittimus hoc tempus quo magis dare quam accipere possumus videri pacem, vereor ne haec quoque laetitia luxuriet 13 nobis ac vana evadat. Quae tamen nunc quoque qualis est? 'Occidi exercitus hostium; mittite milites mihi.' Quid aliud rogares, si esses victus?
14 'Hostium cepi bina castra,' praedae videlicet plena et commeatuum; 'frumentum et pecuniam date.'
Quid aliud, si spoliatus, si exutus castris esses,
15 peteres? Et ne omnia ipse mirer—mihi quoque

[1] paeniteatne Alschefski: paeniteat me P(1).
[2] respondeam $P^2(5)M^2$: -ead P: -ebo x: -eo Madvig (or -ebo).

---

[1] As in the last years of the 1st Punic War.

rendering of thanks to the immortal gods! Let us B.C. 216 listen to a Roman senator in the Carthaginian Senate House." Thereupon Hanno said: "I should have remained silent to-day, members of the senate, for fear of saying something which in the universal rejoicing would bring less joy to you. As it is, when a senator asks me whether it is still a matter of regret that we entered upon a war against the Romans, if I were to remain silent I should be thought either haughty or subservient, of which the one marks a man forgetful of another's independence, the other a man who forgets his own. I should like to say in reply to Himilco," he said, "that I have not ceased to regret the war, and will not cease to accuse your invincible commander until I shall see the war ended on some sufferable terms; nor will anything else than a new peace end my longing for the old peace. And so those facts which Mago has just boastfully reported already give joy to Himilco and the other minions of Hannibal, and may give joy to me, since successes in war, if we are willing to make use of our good fortune, will give us a more favourable peace. I mean that if we let slip this moment, when we may be considered as giving, rather than receiving, a peace, I fear that this joy also of ours may run to excess and come to nothing.[1] But even now what is it worth? 'I have slain armies of the enemy. Send me soldiers!' What else would you ask for if you had been defeated? 'I have captured two camps of the enemy,' full of booty and supplies, of course. 'Give me grain and money!' What else would you beg if you had been despoiled, if you had lost your camp? And, not to have all the amazement to myself—for it is right and proper for me too, having

A.U.C. 538

enim, quoniam respondi Himilconi, interrogare ius fasque est—velim seu Himilco seu Mago respondeat, cum ad internecionem Romani imperii pugnatum ad Cannas sit constetque in defectione totam Italiam
16 esse, primum, ecquis Latini nominis populus defecerit ad nos, deinde, ecquis homo ex quinque et triginta
17 tribubus ad Hannibalem transfugerit?" Cum utrumque Mago negasset, "Hostium quidem ergo" inquit "adhuc nimis multum superest. Sed multitudo ea quid animorum quidve spei habeat scire velim." XIII. Cum id nescire Mago diceret, "Nihil facilius scitu est" inquit. "Ecquos legatos ad Hannibalem Romani miserunt de pace? Ecquam denique mentionem pacis Romae factam esse adla-
2 tum ad vos est?" Cum id quoque negasset, "Bellum igitur" inquit "tam integrum habemus quam habuimus qua die Hannibal in Italiam est transgressus.
3 Quam varia victoria priore Punico[1] bello fuerit plerique qui meminerimus supersumus. Numquam terra marique magis prosperae res nostrae visae sunt quam ante consules C. Lutatium et A. Postumium fuerunt:
4 Lutatio et Postumio consulibus devicti ad Aegatis insulas sumus. Quod si, id quod di omen avertant, nunc quoque fortuna aliquid variaverit, tum pacem speratis cum vincemur, quam nunc cum vincimus
5 dat nemo? Ego, si quis de pace consulet seu deferenda hostibus seu accipienda, habeo quid sententiae dicam: si de iis quae Mago postulat refertis,

[1] Punico P(1): bracketed Gronovius.

[1] "Roman War" would seem to us better suited to a speaker addressing Carthaginians. Livy here prefers the Roman standpoint.

[2] It was this defeat which brought the previous war to an end, 241 B.C.

answered Himilco, to turn questioner,—I should like B.C. 216 either Himilco or Mago to answer, in the first place, whether any state among the Latins has revolted to us, although the battle of Cannae meant the utter destruction of the Roman power, and it is known that all Italy is in revolt; in the second place, whether any man out of the thirty-five tribes has deserted to Hannibal." On Mago's negative answer to both Hanno said: "Accordingly there remains, to be sure, a very great number of the enemy. But what spirit, what hope that multitude has, I should like to know." XIII. As Mago said he did not know, "Nothing is easier to know," said Hanno. "Have the Romans sent any emissaries to Hannibal suing for peace? Has it been reported to you that even any mention of peace has been made at Rome?" The answer to this also being negative, "Therefore," he said, "we have the war intact, as truly as we had on the day on which Hannibal crossed into Italy. How often victory shifted in the previous Punic War [1] very many of us are alive to remember. Never have our fortunes seemed more favourable on land and sea than they were before the consulship of Gaius Lutatius and Aulus Postumius. But in the consulship of Lutatius and Postumius we were utterly defeated off the Aegates Islands.[2] And if now also—may the gods avert the omen!—fortune shall shift to any extent, do you hope that at the time of our defeat we shall have a peace which no one gives us now when we are victorious? For myself, if some one is about to bring up the question either of offering peace to the enemy or of accepting it, I know what opinion to express. But if you are raising the question of Mago's demands, I do not think it to the nec victoribus mitti attinere puto et frustrantibus nos falsa atque inani spe[1] multo minus censeo mittenda esse."

A.U.C. 538

6 Haud multos movit Hannonis oratio; nam et simultas cum familia Barcina leviorem auctorem faciebat et occupati animi praesenti laetitia nihil quo vanius fieret gaudium suum auribus admittebant, debellatumque mox fore, si adniti paulum voluissent,
7 rebantur. Itaque ingenti consensu fit senatus consultum ut Hannibali quattuor milia Numidarum in supplementum mitterentur et quadraginta elephanti
8 et argenti talenta . . . que[2] cum Magone in Hispaniam praemissus est ad conducenda viginti milia peditum, quattuor milia equitum, quibus exercitus qui in Italia quique in Hispania erant supplerentur.

XIV. Ceterum haec, ut in secundis rebus, segniter otioseque gesta; Romanos praeter insitam industriam
2 animis fortuna etiam cunctari prohibebat. Nam nec consul ulli rei quae per eum agenda esset deerat, et dictator M. Iunius Pera rebus divinis perfectis latoque, ut solet, ad populum ut equum escendere liceret, praeter duas urbanas legiones, quae principio anni a consulibus conscriptae fuerant, et servorum dilectum cohortesque ex agro Piceno et Gallico

[1] spe Gronovius: que P(8): quae C^4R: om. A.
[2] A lost numeral (D?) and a general's name (Carthalo Madvig) have been corrupted into dictator(que) P(1).

---

[1] Infantry are not mentioned as to be sent from Carthage. Mercenaries were to be engaged in Spain and sent thence to Hannibal.
[2] In fact Mago is still at Carthage in xxxii. 5.

point to send those things to victors, and I think it B.C. 216 much less necessary to send them to men who are deluding us with a hope unfounded and empty."

Not many were moved by Hanno's speech. For the feud with the Barca family made his advice less weighty, and then minds filled with the joy of the moment would not listen to anything which made their rejoicing less well-founded. And they thought that, if they were willing to add a little to their efforts, the war would soon be finished. Accordingly the senate with great unanimity decreed that four thousand Numidians should be sent to Hannibal as a reinforcement;[1] also forty elephants and . . . silver talents. And . . . was sent in advance to Spain with Mago,[2] for the purpose of hiring twenty thousand infantry and four thousand horse, to reinforce the armies that were in Italy and those in Spain.

XIV. But, as usual in prosperous times, these measures were carried out without spirit and in leisurely fashion, while the Romans, in addition to their inborn activity, were prevented by misfortune also from delaying. That is, the consul was not found wanting in anything which it was his to do, and the dictator, Marcus Junius Pera, after performing the religious rites, proposed to the people according to custom a bill allowing him to be mounted.[3] And then, in addition to the two city legions which had been enrolled by the consuls at the beginning of the year, and the levy of slaves, also the cohorts raised from the Picene and Gallic districts, he stooped

[3] The dictator, as commander of the infantry, was by tradition unmounted. Special permission could be obtained from the people, as here, or from the senate, as Plutarch has it in Fabius iv.

A.U.C. 538

collectas, ad ultimum prope desperatae rei publicae
3 auxilium, cum honesta utilibus cedunt, descendit edixitque qui capitalem fraudem ausi quique pecuniae[1] iudicati in vinculis essent, qui eorum apud se milites fierent, eos noxa pecuniaque sese exsolvi
4 iussurum. Ea sex milia hominum Gallicis spoliis, quae triumpho C. Flamini tralata erant, armavit, itaque cum viginti quinque milibus armatorum ab urbe proficiscitur.

5 Hannibal Capua recepta cum iterum Neapolitanorum animos partim spe, partim metu nequiquam temptasset, in agrum Nolanum exercitum traduxit,
6 ut non hostiliter statim, quia non desperabat voluntariam deditionem, ita, si morarentur spem, nihil eorum quae pati aut timere possent praetermissurus.
7 Senatus ac maxime primores eius in societate Romana cum fide perstare; plebs novarum, ut solet, rerum atque Hannibalis tota esse metumque agrorum populationis et patienda in obsidione multa gravia indignaque proponere animo; neque auctores
8 defectionis deerant. Itaque ubi senatum metus cepit, si propalam tenderent, resisti multitudini concitatae non posse, secunda simulando[2] dilationem
9 mali inveniunt. Placere enim sibi defectionem ad Hannibalem simulant; quibus autem condicionibus in foedus amicitiamque novam transeant, parum 10 constare. Ita spatio sumpto legatos propere ad praetorem Romanum Marcellum Claudium, qui

[1] pecuniae z: pecunia P(1).
[2] secunda simulando CM[2]: secunda simulanda simulando P(12); obsecundando Gronovius.

---

[1] He triumphed over the Gauls in the Po valley in 223 B.C.

to that last defence of a state almost despaired of, B.C. 216 when honour yields to necessity: namely, he issued an edict that, if any men who had committed a capital offence, or were in chains as judgment debtors, should become soldiers under him, he would order their release from punishment or debt. Six thousand such men he armed with Gallic spoils which had been carried in the triumph of Gaius Flaminius,[1] and thus set out from the city with twenty-five thousand armed men.

Hannibal, after gaining possession of Capua and vainly trying, partly by hope, partly by fear, to work for the second time upon the feelings of the Neapolitans, led his army over into the territory of Nola. Though this was not at first with hostile intent, since he did not despair of a voluntary surrender, still he was ready, if they baulked his hope, to omit none of the things which they might suffer or fear to suffer. The senate and especially its leading members stood loyally by the alliance with Rome. But the common people, as usual, were all for a change of government and for Hannibal; and they called to mind the fear of devastation of their lands and the many hardships and indignities they must suffer in case of a siege. And men were not lacking to propose revolt. Accordingly the senators, now obsessed by the fear that, if they should move openly, there could be no resisting the excited crowd, found a way to postpone the evil by pretending agreement. For they pretend that they favour revolt to Hannibal, but that there is no agreement as to the terms on which they may go over to a new alliance and friendship. Thus gaining time, they send emissaries in haste to the Roman praetor, Marcellus Claudius, who

A.U.C. 538

Casilini cum exercitu erat, mittunt docentque quanto in discrimine sit Nolana res: agrum Hannibalis esse et Poenorum, urbem extemplo futuram ni 11 subveniatur: concedendo plebei senatum ubi velint defecturos se, ne deficere praefestinarent effecisse. 12 Marcellus conlaudatis Nolanis eadem simulatione extrahi rem in suum adventum iussit; interim celari quae secum acta essent spemque omnem auxilii 13 Romani. Ipse a Casilino Caiatiam petit atque inde Volturno amni traiecto per[1] agrum Saticulanum Trebianumque super Suessulam per montis Nolam pervenit.

XV. Sub adventum praetoris Romani Poenus agro Nolano excessit et ad mare proxime Neapolim descendit, cupidus maritimi oppidi potiundi, quo 2 cursus navibus tutus ex Africa esset. Ceterum postquam Neapolim a praefecto Romano teneri accepit—M. Iunius Silanus erat, ab ipsis Neapolitanis accitus—, Neapoli quoque, sicut Nola, omissa 3 petit Nuceriam. Eam cum aliquamdiu circumsedisset, saepe vi saepe sollicitandis nequiquam nunc plebe, nunc principibus, fame demum in deditionem accepit, pactus ut inermes cum singulis abirent 4 vestimentis. Deinde ut qui a principio mitis omnibus Italicis praeter Romanos videri vellet, praemia atque honores qui remanserint[2] ac militare secum voluis-

[1] per Otto: perque P(1).
[2] remanserint x: remanserant PC1.

---

[1] Marcellus had been sent to Canusium directly after the battle of Cannae to take command (XXII. lvii. 1), and is now near Capua.

[2] This wide detour into mountain country was in order to avoid meeting Hannibal.

was at Casilinum[1] with his army, and inform him in B.C. 216 what danger the Nolan state is placed; that its territory is in the hands of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, and that the city will be so at once, if help be not given; that the senate, by conceding to the common people that they would revolt whenever the people wished, had prevented their making haste to revolt. Marcellus, after warmly praising the men of Nola, bade them postpone matters by the same pretence until his arrival; in the meantime to conceal the dealings they had had with him and all hope of Roman aid. He himself went from Casilinum to Caiatia, and thence, after crossing the river Volturnus, made his way to Nola through the territory of Saticula and that of Trebia, above Suessula and through the mountains.[2]

XV. Upon the arrival of the Roman praetor the Carthaginian left the territory of Nola and came down to the sea near Neapolis, desiring to gain possession of a coast town to which ships might have a safe passage from Africa. But on learning that Neapolis was held by a Roman prefect—it was Marcus Junius Silanus, who had been called in by the Neapolitans themselves—he turned aside from Neapolis also, as he had from Nola, and made for Nuceria. He had besieged that city for some time, often attacking, often attempting in vain to win over the populace, and at another time the leading citizens, when at last by starving them he gained their surrender, stipulating that they leave unarmed and with one garment only. And then, as from the beginning he had wished to be thought merciful to all Italians except the Romans, he promised rewards and honours to any who remained and would serve under

A.U.C. 538

5 sent proposuit. Nec ea spe quemquam tenuit; dilapsi omnes, quocumque hospitia aut fortuitus animi impetus tulit, per Campaniae urbes, maxime
6 Nolam Neapolimque. Cum ferme triginta senatores, ac forte primus quisque, Capuam petissent, exclusi inde, quod portas Hannibali clausissent, Cumas se contulerunt. Nuceriae praeda militi data est, urbs direpta atque incensa.

7 Nolam Marcellus non sui magis fiducia praesidii quam voluntate principum habebat; plebs timebatur et ante omnis L. Bantius, quem conscientia temptatae defectionis ac metus a praetore Romano nunc ad proditionem patriae, nunc, si ad id fortuna defuisset, ad
8 transfugiendum stimulabat. Erat iuvenis acer et sociorum ea tempestate prope nobilissimus eques. Semineeem eum ad Cannas in acervo caesorum corporum inventum curatumque benigne etiam cum
9 donis Hannibal domum remiserat. Ob eius gratiam meriti rem Nolanam in ius dicionemque dare voluerat Poeno, anxiumque eum et sollicitum cura novandi
10 res praetor cernebat. Ceterum cum aut poena cohibendus esset aut beneficio conciliandus, sibi adsumpsisse quam hosti ademisse fortem ac strenuum maluit
11 socium, accitumque ad se benigne appellat: multos eum invidos inter popularis habere inde existimatu facile esse quod nemo civis Nolanus sibi indicaverit him. And yet he did not hold anyone by that hope. B.C. 216

They all dispersed, wherever hospitality or impulse happened to carry them, among the cities of Campania, especially Nola and Neapolis. About three hundred senators, and as it chanced all the most prominent, came to Capua, and being refused admission because they had closed their gates to Hannibal, went to Cumae. At Nuceria the booty was given to the soldiers, the city sacked and burned.

As for Nola, Marcellus held it not more by confidence in his force than by the good-will of the leading citizens. He was apprehensive of the common people and above all of Lucius Bantius, who was impelled by the consciousness of an attempted revolt and by fear of the Roman praetor, now to betray his native city, now, if fortune should not favour him in that, to desert. He was a young man of spirit and at that time almost the best-known horseman among the allies. He had been found half-dead at Cannae in a pile of the slain; and Hannibal, after nursing him kindly, had sent him home, even adding gifts. Out of gratitude for that service Bantius had wished to put the state of Nola under the authority and rule of the Carthaginian. And the praetor saw that he was troubled and tormented by his desire for a revolution. But since he had either to be restrained by punishment or else won over by kindness, Marcellus preferred rather to gain for himself a brave and energetic ally than merely to take such a man away from the enemy, and summoning him addressed him kindly. It was easy, he said, to judge that he had among his countrymen many who envied him, and this from the fact that no citizen of Nola had told the speaker how many were his

A.U.C. 538 quam multa eius egregia facinora militaria essent;
12 sed qui in Romanis militaverit castris, non posse obscuram eius virtutem esse. Multos sibi, qui cum eo stipendia fecerint, referre qui vir esset ille, quaeque et quotiens pericula pro salute ac dignitate populi
13 Romani adisset, utique Cannensi proelio non prius pugna abstiterit quam prope exsanguis ruina superincidentium virorum, equorum armorumque sit 14 oppressus. "Itaque macte virtute esto" inquit; "apud me tibi omnis honos atque omne praemium erit, et quo frequentior mecum fueris, senties eam
15 rem tibi dignitati atque emolumento esse." Laetoque iuveni promissis equum eximium dono dat, bigatosque quingentos quaestorem numerare iubet; lictoribus imperat ut cum se adire quotiens velit patiantur. XVI. Hac comitate Marcelli ferocis iuvenis animus adeo est mollitus ut nemo inde sociorum rem Romanam fortius ac fidelius iuverit.

2 Cum Hannibal ad portas esset—Nolam enim rursus a Nuceria movit castra—plebesque Nolana
3 de integro ad defectionem spectaret, Marcellus sub adventum hostium intra muros se recepit, non castris metuens sed ne prodendae urbis occasionem nimis
4 multis in eam imminentibus daret. Instrui deinde utrimque acies coeptae, Romanorum pro moenibus Nolae, Poenorum ante castra sua. Proelia hinc parva inter urbem castraque et vario eventu fiebant,

[1] These silver coins at that time bore the image of Diana (of Victory not long after) driving a two-horse chariot (biga).

brilliant feats of arms. But to a man who had served B.C. 216 in the Roman camp his bravery could not be unknown. Many who had been in the service with Bantius were telling the speaker what a man he was, and what dangers he had incurred for the safety and honour of the Roman people, and how often; also how at the battle of Cannae he had not ceased fighting until, almost lifeless, he had been overwhelmed by the mass of men, horses and arms that fell upon him. "And so," he said, "all honour to your courage! Under me you will have every advancement and every reward, and the more constantly you are with me, the more you will feel that it is a distinction and an advantage to you." The youth was delighted with the promises, and Marcellus gave him a fine horse and ordered the quaestor to pay him five hundred denarii.[1] The lictors were bidden to allow him access to the commander whenever he wished. XVI. By this kindliness on the part of Marcellus the high spirit of the young man was so tempered that thereafter none of the allies more bravely and loyally aided the Roman cause.

While Hannibal was at the gates—for he again moved his camp from Nuceria to Nola—and the common people of Nola were making fresh plans to revolt, Marcellus, upon the arrival of the enemy, withdrew within the walls, not fearing for his camp, but lest he give the great number who were impatient for it an opportunity to betray the city. Then on both sides they began to form their battle-lines, the Romans before the walls of Nola, the Carthaginians in front of their camp. Thereupon there were small engagements with varying results in the space between the city and the camp, since the commanders quia duces nec prohibere paucos temere provocantis [1] nec dare signum universae pugnae volebant. In hac cotidiana duorum exercituum statione principes Nolanorum nuntiant Marcello noeturna conloquia inter plebem ac Poenos fieri statutumque esse ut, cum Romana acies egressa portis foret,[2] impedimenta eorum ac sarcinas diriperent, clauderent deinde portas murosque occuparent, ut potentes rerum suarum atque urbis Poenum inde pro Romano acciperent. Haec ubi nuntiata Marcello sunt, conlaudatis senatoribus Nolanis, priusquam aliqui motus in urbe oreretur, fortunam pugnae experiri statuit. Ad tris portas in hostes versas tripertito exercitum instruxit; impedimenta subsequi iussit, calones lixasque et invalidos milites vallum ferre. Media porta robora legionum et Romanos equites, duabus circa portis novos milites levemque armaturam ac sociorum equites statuit. Nolani muros portasque adire vetiti, subsidiaque destinata impedimentis data, ne occupatis proelio legionibus in ea impetus fieret. Ita instructi intra portas stabant.

A.U.C. 538

Hannibali sub signis, id quod per aliquot dies fecerat, ad multum diei in acie stanti primo miraculo esse quod nec exercitus Romanus porta egrederetur nec armatus quisquam in muris esset. Ratus deinde

[1] provocantis M^1?A^2: procantis PCR?M: procursantis Luchs.

[2] foret Gronovius: iret $P(1)$: staret Weissenborn.

wished neither to forbid small numbers who rashly B.C. 216 challenged the enemy, nor to give the signal for a general engagement. During this daily guard-duty of the two armies leading citizens of Nola reported to Marcellus that conferences between the common people and the Carthaginians were taking place by night; and that it had been settled that, when the Roman force should be outside the gates and in line, they would plunder their baggage-train and their packs, then close the gates and take possession of the walls, so that, having the control of their affairs and the city in their own hands, they would then admit the Carthaginian instead of the Roman. This being reported to Marcellus, he warmly praised the senators of Nola and resolved to try the fortune of battle before there should be any movement in the city. At the three gates facing the enemy he drew up his army in three sections. He ordered the baggage to bring up the rear, the camp-servants and sutlers and incapacitated soldiers to carry stakes. At the middle gate he posted the pick of the legionaries with the Roman cavalry, at the two gates to right and left the recruits, light-armed and cavalry of the allies. The men of Nola were forbidden to approach the walls and gates, and the forces to be used as reserves were assigned to the baggage, in order to prevent an attack upon it while the legions were fighting. In this formation they were standing inside the gates.

Hannibal, who remained in battle-line under the standards until late in the day, as he had done for several days, at first wondered that the Roman army did not come out of the gate and that there was not one armed man on the walls. Then, supposing prodita conloquia esse metuque resides factos, partem militum in castra remittit iussos propere adparatum omnem oppugnandae urbis in primam aciem adferre, satis fidens, si cunctantibus instaret, tumultum ali-12 quem in urbe plebem moturam. Dum in sua quisque ministeria discursu trepidat ad prima signa succeditque ad muros acies, patefacta repente porta Marcellus signa canere clamoremque tolli ac pedites primum, deinde equites, quanto maximo possent impetu in 13 hostem erumpere iubet. Satis terroris tumultusque in aciem mediam intulerant, cum duabus circa portis P. Valerius Flaccus et C. Aurelius legati in cornua

A.U.C. 538

14 hostium erupere. Addidere clamorem lixae calonesque et alia turba custodiae impedimentorum adposita, ut paucitatem maxime spernentibus Poenis 15 ingentis repente exercitus speciem fecerit. Vix equidem ausim adfirmare, quod quidam auctores sunt, duo milia et octingentos hostium caesos non 16 plus quingentis Romanorum amissis; sed [1] sive tanta sive minor victoria fuit, ingens eo die res ac nescio an maxima illo bello gesta est:[2] non vinci enim ab Hannibale [3] difficilius fuit quam postea vincere.

XVII. Hannibal spe potiundae Nolae adempta cum Acerras recessisset, Marcellus extemplo clausis portis custodibusque dispositis, ne quis egrederetur,

[1] amissis; sed Alschefski: amisisset PMD^2R^x: amisisse CM^x: amisisse sed A.

[2] est Freinsheim: sit $P(1)$.

[3] After Hannibale $P(1)$ have vincentibus (with tum or tunc x): vinci timentibus Weissenborn, Conway.

the conferences to have been betrayed, and that B.C. 216 inaction was the result of fear, he sent part of his soldiers back to the camp, with orders to bring up in haste to the front line all the equipment for besieging the city. He was quite confident that, if he should press the hesitating, the common people would stir up some outbreak in the city. While they were scattering to their several duties and hastening to the first standards, and the line was advancing to the walls, the gate suddenly opened and Marcellus ordered the trumpets to be sounded and a shout raised; that infantry at first, and then cavalry should sally out against the enemy with all the dash possible. They had carried sufficient panic and confusion into the centre, when Publius Valerius Flaccus and Gaius Aurelius, his lieutenants, sallied out of the two gates on this side and that, to attack the enemy's wings. Sutlers and camp-servants raised another shout, as did the rest of the crowd stationed to guard the baggage so that the shouting gave the sudden impression of a very large army to the Carthaginians, who particularly despised their small numbers. I should hardly venture to assert, what some have affirmed, that 2800 of the enemy were slain, while not more than 500 of the Romans were lost. But whether the victory was on such a scale or less, a very great thing, I rather think the greatest in that war, was accomplished that day. For not to be defeated by Hannibal was a more difficult thing than it was later to defeat him.

XVII. Now that Hannibal had lost hope of gaining Nola and had retired to Acerrae, Marcellus at once closed the gates, stationed guards to prevent anyone from leaving, and carried on in the forum an

a.u.c. 538

quaestionem in foro de iis qui clam in conloquiis
2 hostium fuerant habuit. Supra septuaginta damnatos proditionis securi percussit bonaque eorum iussit
3 publica populi Romani esse, et summa rerum senatui tradita cum exercitu omni profectus supra Suessulam
4 castris positis consedit. Poenus Acerras primum ad voluntariam deditionem conatus perlicere, inde [1] postquam obstinatos videt, obsidere atque oppugnare
5 parat. Ceterum Acerranis plus animi quam virium erat; itaque desperata tutela urbis, ut circumvallari moenia viderunt, priusquam continuarentur hostium opera, per intermissa munimenta neglectasque
6 custodias silentio noctis dilapsi, per vias inviaque qua quemque aut consilium aut error tulit, in urbes Campaniae, quas satis certum erat non mutasse fidem, perfugerunt.

7 Hannibal Acerris direptis atque incensis, cum a Casilino [2] dictatorem Romanum legionesque novas acciri [3] nuntiassent, ne quid [4] tam propinquis hostium castris Capuae quoque moveretur,[5] exercitum ad
8 Casilinum ducit. Casilinum eo tempore quingenti Praenestini habebant cum paucis Romanis Latinique nominis, quos eodem audita Cannensis clades contu-
9 lerat. Hi, non confecto Praeneste ad diem dilectu, serius profecti domo cum Casilinum ante famam adversae pugnae venissent, et, aliis adgregantibus sese Romanis sociisque, profecti a Casilino cum satis

[1] inde $P(1)$, but after obstinatos; before postquam Walters.
[2] Casilino A^2 Valla: Casino $P(1)$.
[3] novas acciri A^y Valla: nimis accipi $P(5)M^x$: acciri Walters.
[4] ne quid Lipsius: ne quis $P(1)$: ne quid novi Walters.
[5] moveretur Gronovius: orerecurrunt P: recurrunt $P^{2?}(4)$: occurreret Lipsius.

investigation of those who had been in secret confer- B.C. 216 ences with the enemy. Over seventy having been condemned as traitors, he beheaded them and ordered that their possessions should be public property of the Roman people. And setting out with his whole army, after turning over the government to the senate, he pitched camp and established himself above Suessula. The Carthaginian first tried to entice Acerrae into a voluntary surrender: then, seeing them steadfast, prepared to blockade and attack them. But the men of Acerrae had more courage than resources. Accordingly they gave up hope of defending the city, and when they saw that their walls were being encircled, before the enemy's works should be made continuous, they slipped away in the dead of night through the gaps in the earthworks and through neglected guard-posts. Making their way along the roads and where there were none, just as prudence or chance guided the wanderer, they fled for refuge to those cities of Campania of which it was known that they had not changed sides.

After plundering and burning Acerrae, when word had come from Casilinum that the Roman dictator and fresh legions were being summoned, Hannibal led his army to Casilinum, in order to prevent any uprising at Capua also, while the enemy's camp was so near. Casilinum was at that time held by five hundred Praenestines, with a few Romans and Latins, whom the news of the disaster at Cannae had brought thither. As the levy at Praeneste was not completed at the proper date, they had been late in setting out from home, and had reached Casilinum before the news of the defeat. And joined by others, Romans and allies, they set out from Casilinum and, as

A.U.C. 538

magno agmine irent, avertit eos retro Casilinum
10 nuntius Cannensis pugnae. Ibi cum dies aliquot, suspecti Campanis timentesque, cavendis ac struendis in vicem insidiis traduxissent, ut de Capuae defectione agi acciperique Hannibalem satis pro certo habuere, interfectis nocte oppidanis partem urbis, quae eis Volturnum est—eo enim dividitur amni—occupavere, idque praesidii Casilini habebant Ro-
11 mani. Additur et Perusina cohors, homines quadringenti sexaginta, eodem nuntio quo Praenestini
12 paucos ante dies, Casilinum compulsi. Et satis ferme armatorum ad tam exigua moenia et flumine altera parte cincta tuenda erat: penuria frumenti nimium etiam ut videretur hominum efficiebat.

XVIII. Hannibal cum iam inde haud procul esset, Gaetulos cum praefecto nomine Isalca praemittit ac primo, si fiat conloquii copia, verbis benignis ad portas aperiundas praesidiumque accipiendum perlicere iubet: si in pertinacia perstent, vi rem gerere ac temptare si qua parte invadere urbem possit.
2 Ubi ad moenia adcessere, quia silentium erat, solitudo visa; metuque concessum barbarus ratus moliri
3 portas et claustra refringere parat, cum patefactis repente portis cohortes duae, ad id ipsum instructae intus, ingenti cum tumultu erumpunt stragemque
4 hostium faciunt. Ita primis repulsis Maharbal cum

[1] The right (north) bank of the river.

they were proceeding in a fairly large column, the B.C. 216 report of the battle of Cannae turned them back again to Casilinum. There, being suspected by the Campanians and apprehensive, they spent some days in alternately guarding against plots and hatching them. When credibly informed that the revolt of Capua and Hannibal's entry were being negotiated, they slew townspeople in the night and seized that part of the city which is on this side [1] of the Volturnus—for it is divided by that river; and this was the garrison the Romans had at Casilinum. It was joined by a cohort from Perusia, four hundred and sixty men, who had been driven to Casilinum by the same news as the Praenestines a few days before. And there were quite enough men to defend so small a walled city, bounded on one side by the river. But the lack of grain made it seem that there were even too many men.

XVIII. Hannibal, being now not far away, sent his Gaetulians ahead under a prefect named Isalca. And he ordered him, if there should be an opportunity for a conference, at first by kind words to entice them to open the gates and admit a garrison; but if they persisted in their obstinacy, to use force and see if at some point he could make his way into the city. When they approached the walls, because of the stillness they thought them deserted. And the barbarian, supposing the garrison had withdrawn in alarm, was preparing to force the gates and break open the bars, when suddenly the gates were opened and the two cohorts, drawn up inside for that very purpose, sallied out with a mighty uproar, and wrought havoc among the enemy. The first troops being thus beaten back, Maharbal, who had been maiore robore virorum missus nec ipse eruptionem cohortium sustinuit. Postremo Hannibal castris ante ipsa moenia oppositis[1] parvam urbem parvumque praesidium summa vi atque omnibus copiis oppugnare parat, ac dum instat lacessitque, corona undique circumdatis moenibus, aliquot milites et promptissimum quemque e muro turribusque ictos amisit. Semel ultro erumpentis agmine elephantorum opposito prope interclusit trepidosque compulit in urbem satis multis ut ex tanta paucitate interfectis. Plures cecidissent ni nox proelio intervenisset. Postero die omnium animi ad oppugnandum accenduntur, utique postquam corona aurea muralis proposita est, atque ipse dux castelli plano loco positi segnem oppugnationem Sagunti expugnatoribus exprobrabat, Camarum Trasumennique et Trebiae singulos admonens universosque. Inde vineae quoque coeptae agi cuniculique; nec ad varios conatus hostium aut vis ulla aut ars deerat sociis Romanorum. Propugnacula adversus vineas statuere, transversis cuniculis hostium cuniculos excipere, et palam et clam coeptis obviam ire, donec pudor etiam Hannibalem ab incepto avertit, castrisque communitis ac praesidio modico imposito, ne omissa res videretur, in hiberna Capuam concessit.

A.U.C. 538

Ibi partem maiorem hiemis exercitum in tectis

[1] oppositis P(1): positis x Madvig.

[1] The elephants sent by order of the Carthaginian senate (xiii. 7) must have arrived. Of those he had brought from Spain only one reached Central Italy (XXII. ii. 10).

[2] Awarded to the first man to scale the wall of a city; Polybius VI. xxxix. 5; Livy XXVI. xlviii. 5; Gellius V. vi. 16 and 19.

[3] Cf. XXI. xv.

sent with a larger number of picked men, was likewise unable to withstand the sally of the cohorts. Finally Hannibal pitched his camp directly before the walls and prepared to assault the small city and small garrison with the greatest violence and with all his forces. And while he was pressing the attack, the walls being completely encircled by his men, he lost a considerable number, the most active at that, being hit by missiles from the wall and the towers. When they actually sallied out once, he almost cut off their retreat by sending a column of elephants[1] against them, and drove them in alarm into the city, after a good number, for so small a force, had been slain. More would have fallen if night had not interrupted the battle. On the next day all were fired to make the assault, especially after a mural crown of gold[2] was displayed to them, and the general himself kept making their spiritless attack upon a fort on level ground a reproach to the captors of Saguntum,[3] reminding them singly and collectively of Cannae and Trasumennus and Trebia. Then they began to push forward their sheds also and mines. And to meet the different attempts made by the enemy no kind of activity, no ingenuity, proved lacking to the allies of the Romans. They set up defences to meet the sheds; by transverse mines they intercepted the enemy's mines; they forestalled his attempts both visible and invisible, until shame helped to divert Hannibal from his undertaking. And after fortifying his camp and posting a small garrison, that the attempt might not appear to have been abandoned, he retired into winter-quarters at Capua. B.C. 216

There he kept under roofs for the greater part of

A.U.C. 538

habuit, adversus omnia humana mala saepe ac diu
11 duratum, bonis inexpertum atque insuetum. Itaque, quos nulla mali vicerat vis, perdidere nimia bona ac voluptates immodicae, et eo impensius quo avidius ex
12 insolentia in eas se merserant. Somnus enim et vinum et epulae et scorta balineaque et otium consuetudine in dies blandius ita enervaverunt corpora animosque ut magis deinde praeteritae victoriae eos
13 quam praesentes tutarentur vires, maiusque id peccatum ducis apud peritos artium militarium haberetur quam quod non ex Cannensi acie protinus ad urbem Romanam duxisset: illa enim cunctatio distulisse modo victoriam videri potuit, hic error
14 vires ademisse ad vincendum. Itaque hercule, velut si cum alio exercitu a Capua exiret, nihil usquam
15 pristinae disciplinae tenuit. Nam et redierunt plerique scortis impliciti, et, ubi primum sub pellibus haberi coepti sunt, viaque et alius militaris labor excepit, tironum modo corporibus animisque deficie-
16 bant, et deinde per omne aestivorum tempus magna pars sine commeatibus ab signis dilabebantur, neque aliae latebrae quam Capua desertoribus erant.

XIX. Ceterum mitescente iam hieme educto ex
2 hibernis milite Casilinum redit, ubi, quamquam ab oppugnatione cessatum erat, obsidio tamen continua

[1] For the effect of wintering at Capua cf. xlv. 4 (the famous epigram, as if from the lips of Marcellus), and ib. 6 (Hannibal's words, as Livy imagined them). Strabo confirms, Polybius denies (V. iv. 13; XI. xix. 3 respectively).

the winter troops that had been hardened long and repeatedly against all human hardships, but had no experience or familiarity with comforts. And so those whom no severe hardship had conquered were ruined by excess of comfort and immoderate pleasures and the more completely ruined the more eagerly they in their inexperience had plunged into them. For sleep and wine, and feasts and harlots, and baths and idleness, which habit made daily more seductive, so weakened their bodies and spirits that it was their past victories rather than their present strength which thereafter protected them; and this was regarded among the military experts as a more serious failure in their commander than that he had not led his men from the field of Cannae forthwith to the city of Rome. For that delay could be regarded as having merely retarded the victory, this mistake as having robbed him of the power to win. And so in fact, just as if he were setting out from Capua with a different army, not a trace of the old-time morale survived. For they came back most of them ensnared by harlots, and also as soon as they began to be quartered in tents, and the march and other tasks of the soldier followed, they would give out both in body and in spirit after the manner of recruits. And afterwards through the whole season of summer camps a great many kept slipping away from their standards without furloughs; and deserters had no hiding-places other than Capua.[1] B.C. 216

XIX. But when winter was now growing mild, Hannibal led his troops out of winter quarters and returned to Casilinum. There, although they had been making no more attacks, an uninterrupted

A.U.C. 538

oppidanos praesidiumque ad ultimum inopiae
3 adduxerat. Castris Romanis Ti. Sempronius praeerat dictatore auspiciorum repetendorum causa
4 profecto Romam. Marcellum et ipsum cupientem ferre auxilium obsessis et Volturnus amnis inflatus aquis et preces Nolanorum Acerranorumque tenebant, Campanos timentium si praesidium Romanum
5 abscessisset. Graechus adsidens tantum Casilino, quia praedictum erat dictatoris ne quid absente eo rei gereret, nihil movebat, quamquam quae facile omnem patientiam vincerent nuntiabantur a Casi-
6 lino: nam et praecipitasse se quosdam non tolerantes famem constabat, et stare inermes in muris, nuda
7 corpora ad missilium telorum ictus praebentes. Ea aegre patiens Graechus, cum neque pugnam conserere dictatoris iniussu auderet—pugnandum autem esse, si palam frumentum importaret, videbat—neque clam
8 importandi spes esset, farre ex agris circa undique convecto cum complura dolia complesset, nuntium ad magistratum Casilinum misit ut exciperent dolia
9 quae amnis deferret. Insequenti nocte intentis omnibus in flumen ac spem ab nuntio Romano factam dolia medio missa amni defluxerunt; aequaliterque 10 inter omnes frumentum divisum. Id postero quoque die ac tertio factum est; nocte et mittebantur et 11 perveniebant; eo custodias hostium fallebant. Imbribus deinde continuis citatior solito amnis transverso

[1] If the auspices were alleged to be defective, the commander returned to Rome to take them again: VIII. xxx. 2.

[2] The city had not been entirely destroyed (xvii. 7), and part of the population must have returned.

blockade had nevertheless brought townspeople B.C. 216 and garrison to extreme want. The Roman camp was commanded by Tiberius Sempronius, since the dictator had gone to Rome to take new auspices.[1] Marcellus, who was likewise eager to bring aid to the besieged, was held back both by a flood of the river Volturnus and by entreaties of the men of Nola and Acerrae,[2] who feared the Campanians if the Roman garrison should withdraw. Gracchus, merely remaining near Casilinum, because it was the dictator's order that he take no action in his absence, made no move, although facts which would easily pass all endurance were being reported from Casilinum. For it was established that some, unable to endure hunger, had thrown themselves from the wall, and that men stood unarmed on the walls exposing unprotected bodies to wounds from missile weapons. Gracchus, though indignant at this, did not dare to engage the enemy without the dictator's order, and saw that, if he should try openly to carry in grain, he must fight. As there was also no hope of carrying it in secretly, he filled many huge jars with spelt brought from the farms all around, and sent word to the magistrate at Casilinum that they should catch up the jars which the river was bringing down. In the following night, while all were intent upon the river and the hope aroused by the Roman messenger, the jars set adrift in midstream floated down, and the grain was evenly divided among them all. This was done the next day also and the third day. It was night when they were set adrift and when they arrived. In that way they escaped the notice of the enemy's guards. After that the stream, now swifter than usual because of incessant rains, forced vertice dolia impulit ad ripam quam hostes servabant. Ibi haerentia inter obnata ripis salicta conspiciuntur, nuntiatumque Hannibali est, et deinde intentiore custodia cautum ne quid falleret Volturno ad urbem 12 missum. Nuces tamen fusae ab Romanis castris, cum medio amni ad Casilinum defluerent, cratibus excipiebantur.

A.U.C. 538

13 Postremo ad id ventum inopiae est ut lora detractasque scutis pelles, ubi fervida mollissent aqua, mandere conarentur nec muribus aliove animali abstinerent et omne herbarum radicumque genus
14 aggeribus infimis muri eruerent. Et cum hostes obarassent quidquid herbidi terreni extra murum erat, raporum semen iniecerunt, ut Hannibal "Eone usque dum ea nascuntur ad Casilinum sessurus sum?"
15 exclamaret; et qui nullam antea pactionem auribus admiserat, tum demum agi secum est passus de
16 redemptione liberorum capitum. Septunces auri in singulos pretium convenit. Fide accepta tradiderunt sese. Donec omne aurum persolutum est, in vinculis
17 habiti; tum remissi summa cum fide. Id verius est quam ab equite in abeuntis immisso interfectos. Praenestini maxima pars fuere. Ex quingentis septuaginta qui in praesidio fuerunt minus [1] dimidium ferrum famesque absumpsit: ceteri incolumes Praeneste cum praetore suo M. Anicio—scriba is antea

[1] minus P(1): haud minus x Madvig.

---

[1] Hannibal had a chain across the river according to Frontinus Strat. III. xiv. 2.

[2] This was to impress Hannibal with their confidence that their supplies would hold out for months, and that they did not need the grass and herbs of which he had deprived them; Frontinus III. xv. 3; Strabo V. iv. 10.

the jars by a cross current to the bank guarded by B.C. 216
the enemy. There, caught among the willows growing on the banks, they were seen and it was reported to Hannibal. And thereafter by a closer watch they saw to it that nothing sent down the Volturnus to the city should escape notice.[1] However nuts which were poured out from the Roman camp, as they floated down the middle of the river to Casilinum, were caught by crates.

Finally they reached such a pitch of distress that they tried, after softening them by hot water, to chew thongs and the hides stripped off of shields; and they did not abstain from rats and other animals, and dug out every kind of plant and root from the bank beneath the wall. And when the enemy had ploughed up all the grassy ground outside the wall, the garrison sowed turnips,[2] so that Hannibal exclaimed "Am I to sit before Casilinum until those seeds come up?" And the man who had never before listened to any terms now at last allowed them to treat with him in regard to ransoming the free men. Seven-twelfths of a pound of gold was agreed upon as the price per man.[3] On receiving his promise they surrendered. They were kept in chains until all the gold was paid, then with strict regard for his promise they were released. This is the more correct version than that they were slain by a charge of cavalry as they departed. The majority were Praenestines. Of the five hundred and seventy who were in the garrison sword and starvation carried off less than half. The rest returned safe to Praeneste with their commander Marcus Anicius, who had [3] Nearly four times the ransom demanded for an ally (200 denarii) after the battle of Cannae; XXII. lii. 2.

A.U.C. 538

18 fuerat—redierunt. Statua eius indicio fuit Praeneste in foro statuta, loricata, amicta toga, velato capite, cum titulo lamnae aeneae inscripto, M. Anicium pro militibus qui Casilini in praesidio fuerint votum solvisse. Idem titulus tribus signis in aede Fortunae positis fuit subiectus. XX. Casilinum oppidum redditum Campanis est, firmatum septingentorum militum de exercitu Hannibalis praesidio, ne, ubi Poenus inde abscessisset, Romani oppugnarent. 2 Praenestinis militibus senatus Romanus duplex stipendium et quinquennii militiae vacationem decrevit; civitate cum donarentur ob virtutem, non 3 mutaverunt. Perusinorum casus obscurior fama est, quia nec ipsorum monumento ullo est inlustratus nec decreto Romanorum.

4 Eodem tempore Petelinos, qui uni ex Bruttiis manserant in amicitia Romana, non Carthaginienses modo qui regionem obtinebant, sed Bruttii quoque ceteri ob separata ab se consilia oppugnabant. 5 Quibus cum obsistere malis nequirent Petelini, legatos Romam ad praesidium petendum miserunt. Quorum preces lacrimaeque—in questus enim flebiles, cum sibimet ipsi consulere iussi sunt, sese in vestibulo curiae profuderunt—ingentem misericordiam patri- 6 bus ac populo moverunt; consultique iterum a M. Aemilio praetore patres circumspectis omnibus

---

[1] I.e. they did not accept.

[2] Petelia, not far north of Croton, was an exception to the statement that all the Bruttians had gone over to the Carthaginians; XXII. lxi. 12.

[3] Probably elected in place of Postumius, who fell in Gaul (xxiv. 11).

formerly been a clerk. As evidence there formerly B.C. 216 stood in the forum of Praeneste a statue of the man, wearing a cuirass and draped in a toga, with his head covered. It had an inscription on a bronze plate, stating that Marcus Anicius had paid his vow on behalf of the soldiers who were in the garrison at Casilinum. The same inscription was placed beneath three images of gods set up in the Temple of Fortune. XX. The town of Casilinum was restored to the Campanians and defended by a garrison of seven hundred men from the army of Hannibal, that the Romans might not attack it when the Carthaginian should withdraw. To the Praenestine soldiers the Roman senate voted double pay and exemption from service for five years. Though rewarded for their courage with the gift of Roman citizenship, they made no change.[1] As to the fate of the Perusians the report is less clear, since no light has been thrown upon it either by any record of their own or by a decree of the Romans.

At the same time the Petelini,[2] who alone among the Bruttians had remained in the friendship of Rome, were being attacked not only by the Carthaginians, who were holding the region, but also by the rest of the Bruttians for not making common cause with them. Unable to withstand these dangers, the Petelini sent legates to Rome to ask for a garrison. The prayers of the legates and their tears—for when ordered to shift for themselves they gave way to tearful complaints before the entrance of the Senate House—stirred great compassion among senators and people. And when consulted a second time by Marcus Aemilius, a praetor,[3] the senators, after surveying all the resources of the empire, were imperii viribus fateri coacti nihil iam longinquis sociis in se praesidii esse, redire domum fideque ad ultimum expleta consulere sibimet ipsos in reliquum

A.U.C. 538

7 pro[1] praesenti fortuna iusserunt. Haec postquam renuntiata legatio Petelinis est, tantus repente maeror pavorque senatum eorum cepit ut pars profugiendi qua quisque posset ac deserendae urbis
8 auctores essent, pars, quando deserti a veteribus sociis essent, adiungendi se ceteris Bruttiis ac per eos
9 dedendi Hannibali. Vicit tamen ea pars quae nihil raptim nec temere agendum consulendumque de 10 integro censuit. Relata postero die per minorem trepidationem re tenuerunt optimates ut convectis omnibus ex agris urbem ac muros firmarent.

XXI. Per idem fere tempus litterae ex Sicilia
2 Sardiniaque Romam allatae. Priores ex Sicilia T. Otacilii propraetoris in senatu recitatae sunt: P. Furium praetorem cum classe ex Africa Lilybaeum venisse; ipsum graviter saucium in discrimine ultimo vitae esse; militi ac navalibus sociis neque stipendium neque frumentum ad diem dari neque
3 unde detur esse; magnopere suadere ut quam primum ea mittantur, sibique, si ita videatur, ex
4 novis praetoribus successorem mittant. Eademque ferme de stipendio frumentoque ab A. Cornelio Mammula propraetore ex Sardinia scripta. Responsum

[1] pro Madvig: in z: om. P(1).

[1] The siege lasted eleven months, and at the last they were subsisting on hides, bark, twigs, etc.; xxx. 1 ff.; Polybius VII. i. 3.

compelled to admit that they themselves no longer B.C. 216 had any means to protect distant allies. They ordered them to return home, and having fulfilled their obligation to the last, to shift for themselves for the future as best the situation permitted. When this outcome of the embassy was reported at Petelia, such dejection and fear unexpectedly seized their senate that some proposed to flee, each taking any possible road, and to abandon the city, while others, since they had been deserted by their old allies, proposed to join the rest of the Bruttians and through them to surrender to Hannibal. But those who thought nothing should be done hastily or rashly, and that they should deliberate again, prevailed. When the matter was brought up in less excitement the following day, the optimates carried their point, that they should bring in everything from the farms and strengthen the city and the walls.[1]

XXI. About the same time letters from Sicily and Sardinia were brought to Rome. First to be read in the senate were those from Sicily and Titus Otacilius, the propraetor, reporting that Publius Furius, the praetor, had come with his fleet from Africa to Lilybaeum: that Furius himself had been seriously wounded and his life was in the utmost danger; that neither pay nor grain was being furnished to the soldiers and the crews at the proper date, and they had no means of doing so; that he strongly urged that both be sent as soon as possible, and that they send a successor chosen, if they saw fit, from the number of the new praetors. Much the same facts in regard to pay and grain were reported from Sardinia by Aulus Cornelius Mammula, the propraetor. To each the reply was that there

U.C. 558

utrique non esse unde mitteretur, iussique ipsi
5 classibus atque exercitibus suis consulere. T. Otacilius ad unicum subsidium populi Romani, Hieronem, legatos cum misisset, in stipendium quanti argenti
6 opus fuit et sex mensum frumentum accepit; Cornelio in Sardinia civitates sociae benigne contulerunt. Et Romae quoque propter penuriam argenti triumviri mensarii rogatione M. Minuci tribuni plebis facti, L. Aemilius Papus, qui consul censorque fuerat, et M. Atilius Regulus, qui bis consul fuerat, et L.
7 Scribonius Libo, qui tum tribunus plebis erat. Et duumviri creati M. et C. Atilii aedem Concordiae, quam L. Manlius praetor voverat, dedicaverunt; et tres pontifices creati, Q. Caecilius Metellus et Q. Fabius Maximus et Q. Fulvius Flaccus, in locum P. Scantini demortui et L. Aemili Pauli consulis et Q. Aeli Paeti, qui ceciderant pugna Cannensi.

XXII. Cum cetera quae continuis cladibus fortuna minuerat, quantum consiliis humanis adsequi po-
2 terant, patres explessent, tandem se quoque et solitudinem curiae paucitatemque convenientium ad
3 publicum consilium respexerunt. Neque enim post L. Aemilium et C. Flaminium censores senatus lectus fuerat, cum tantum senatorum adversae pugnae, ad

---

[1] Hiero II had ruled Syracuse 270–215 B.C.; a faithful ally of the Romans from 263 to his death. For his sympathy and aid, including the gift of a golden Victory, after the battle of the Trasumennus, cf. XXII. xxxvii.

[2] In the citadel, begun in 217 B.C.; XXII. xxxiii. 7 f.

was nothing on hand to send, and they were ordered B.C. 216 to provide for their own fleets and armies. Titus Otacilius sent legates to Hiero, the mainstay of the Roman people,[1] and received what money was needed for pay, and grain for six months. In Sardinia the allied states made generous contributions to Cornelius. And at Rome besides, on account of the lack of money, three bank-commissioners were named in accordance with a bill of Marcus Minucius, a tribune of the plebs, namely, Lucius Aemilius Papus, who had been consul and censor, and Marcus Atilius Regulus, who had been consul twice, and Lucius Scribonius Libo, who was at that time a tribune of the plebs. And Marcus Atilius and Gaius Atilius, elected duumvirs, dedicated a temple of Concord,[2] which Lucius Manlius had vowed in his praetorship. And three pontiffs, Quintus Caecilius Metellus and Quintus Fabius Maximus and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, were elected[3] in place of Publius Scantinius, deceased, and of Lucius Aemilius Paulus, the consul, and Quintus Aelius Paetus, both of whom had fallen in the battle of Cannae.

XXII. After making good, in so far as they could accomplish it by human wisdom, the other losses fortune had caused by a series of disasters, the fathers at last had regard for themselves as well and for the desolate Senate House and the small number that came to the council of state. For since the censorship of Lucius Aemilius and Gaius Flaminius the list of the senate had not been revised, although the defeats and in addition the fate of individuals

[3] I.e. by the college of pontiffs. Fabius is the Delayer, dictator in 217 B.C. Fulvius was consul twice before this war, and twice again during the war, 212 and 209.

A.U.C. 538

hoc sui quemque casus per quinquennium absump-
4 sissent. Cum de ea re M. Aemilius praetor, dictatore post Casilinum amissum profecto iam [1] ad exercitum, exposcentibus cunctis rettulisset, tum Sp. Carvilius, cum longa oratione non patrum [2] solum inopiam sed paucitatem etiam civium ex quibus in patres legeren-
5 tur conquestus esset, explendi senatus causa et iungendi artius Latini nominis cum populo Romano magnopere se suadere dixit ut ex singulis populis Latinorum binis senatoribus, quibus [3] patres Romani censuissent, civitas daretur atque inde in [4] demor-
6 tuorum locum in senatum legerentur. Eam sententiam haud aequioribus animis quam ipsorum quon-
7 dam postulatum Latinorum patres audierunt; et cum fremitus indignantium tota curia esset, et praecipue T. Manlius esse etiam nunc eius stirpis virum diceret ex qua quondam in Capitolio consul minatus esset quem Latinum in curia vidisset cum sua manu
8 se interfecturum, Q. Fabius Maximus numquam rei ullius alieniore tempore mentionem factam in senatu dicit quam inter tam suspensos sociorum animos incertamque fidem id iactum quod insuper sollici-
9 taret eos. Eam unius hominis temerariam vocem silentio omnium exstinguendam esse et, si quid unquam arcani sanctive ad silendum in curia fuerit,

[1] iam A^{γ} Valla : tam $P(1)$: tandem Luchs : om. xC^{x}.
[2] patrum H. J. Müller (this order) : senatus x : senatorum Weissenborn : eam Harant : om. $P(1)$.
[3] quibus J. H. Voss : quos A^{γ} : si x : om. $P(1)$.
[4] inde in x Frigell : in $P(1)$: ei in Madvig.

[1] Cf. above, vi. 8 and note.

had in the five years carried off so large a number B.C. 216 of senators. Marcus Aemilius, the praetor, raised that question, as all demanded that he should, since the dictator had already gone to the army after the loss of Casilinum. Thereupon Spurius Carvilius, after complaining in a long speech, not of the lack of senators only, but also of the small number of citizens from whom men might be chosen into the senate, said that for the sake of recruiting the senate and of linking the Latins more closely with the Roman people, he strongly urged that citizenship be bestowed upon two senators from each of the Latin states, to be selected by the Roman fathers; and that from this number men be chosen into the senate in place of the deceased members. The fathers gave no more favourable hearing to this proposal than they had given to a former demand of the Latins themselves.[1] There was a murmur of indignation everywhere in the hall, and in particular Titus Manlius said that there still lived a man of the family to which belonged the consul who on the Capitol had once threatened that he would slay with his own hand any Latin he should see in the Senate House.[2] Upon that Quintus Fabius Maximus said that never had anything been mentioned in the senate at a more unfavourable moment than this had been broached, in the midst of such unsettled feeling and wavering loyalty among the allies, only to stir them up the more: that that rash utterance of a single man should be drowned by silence on the part of them all: and that, if there was ever any hallowed secret to be left unmentioned

[2] The threat was recorded in VIII. v. 7. The present Manlius had opposed ransoming the captives at Cannae; XXII. lx. 5 ff.

A.U.C. 538

id omnium maxime tegendum, occulendum, oblivis-cendum, pro non dicto[1] habendum esse. Ita eius rei oppressa mentio est.
10 Dictatorem, qui censor ante fuisset vetustissi-musque ex iis qui viverent censoriis esset, creari placuit qui senatum legeret, accirique C. Terentium 11 consulem ad dictatorem dicendum iusserunt. Qui ex
Apulia relicto ibi praesidio cum magnis itineribus
Romam redisset, nocte proxima, ut mos erat, M.
Fabium Buteonem ex senatus consulto sine magistro equitum dictatorem in sex menses dixit. XXIII. Is ubi cum lictoribus in rostra escendit, neque duos dictatores tempore uno, quod numquam antea factum 2 esset, probare se dixit, neque dictatorem sine magistro equitum, nec censoriam vim uni permissam et eidem iterum, nec dictatori, nisi rei gerendae causa 3 creato, in sex menses datum imperium. Quae inmoderata forsan[2] tempus ac necessitas fecerit, iis se modum impositurum: nam neque senatu quemquam moturum ex iis quos C. Flaminius L. Aemilius 4 censores in senatum legissent; transcribi tantum recitarique eos iussurum, ne penes unum hominem iudicium arbitriumque de fama ac moribus senatoris fuerit; et ita in demortuorum locum sublecturum ut ordo ordini, non homo homini praelatus videretur.
5 Recitato vetere senatu, inde primos in demortuorum locum legit qui post L. Aemilium C. Flaminium cen-

[1] non dicto M^2A: dicto P(11): indicto Alschefski.
[2] forsan Madvig: fors P(1).

---

[1] I.e. Varro, defeated at Cannae.

[2] Minucius, master of the horse, had finally been given by the people equal authority with Fabius, but that did not make him legally a dictator; XXII. xxvi. 7; xxvii. 3.

in the senate, this above all others must be covered, B.C. 216 concealed, forgotten, considered unsaid. So mention of the matter was suppressed.

It was decided that as dictator, to draw up the list of the senate, a man should be appointed who had previously been censor and was senior to all the other living ex-censors. And they ordered that Gaius Terentius,[1] the consul, be summoned that he might name a dictator. He returned to Rome by long stages from Apulia, leaving a garrison there; and that night, as was the custom, in accordance with the decree of the senate he named Marcus Fabius Buteo dictator for six months without master of the horse. XXIII. Fabius mounted the Rostra with his lictors and said that he did not approve of two dictators at the same time, an unprecedented thing,[2] nor of a dictator without master of the horse, nor of conferring a censor's power upon one man, and in fact to the same man a second time, nor of giving the full military authority for six months to a dictator not appointed for the conduct of affairs. He said that he would set a limit to such possible irregularities as the crisis and necessity had occasioned. For he would not eject from the senate any of those whom Gaius Flaminius and Lucius Aemilius as censors had chosen into the senate, but would order their names merely to be copied and read out, that judgment and decision in regard to the reputation and character of a senator might not rest with one man. And in place of the deceased he would make his choice in such a way that rank should obviously have been preferred to rank, not man to man. After reading the list of the old senate, he chose in place of the deceased first those who since the censorship of Lucius Aemilius sores curulem magistratum cepissent necdum in senatum lecti essent, ut quisque eorum primus creatus

a.u.c. 538

6 erat; tum legit, qui aediles, tribuni plebis, quaestoresve fuerant; tum ex iis qui magistratus non[1] cepissent, qui spolia ex hoste fixa domi haberent aut
7 civicam coronam accepissent. Ita centum septuaginta septem cum ingenti adprobatione hominum in senatum lectis, extemplo se magistratu abdicavit privatusque de rostris descendit lictoribus abire
8 iussis, turbaeque se inmiscuit privatas agentium res, tempus hoc sedulo terens, ne deducendi sui causa populum de foro abduceret. Neque tamen elanguit cura hominum ea mora, frequentesque eum domum
9 deduxerunt. Consul nocte insequenti ad exercitum redit non facto certiore senatu, ne comitiorum causa in urbe retineretur.

XXIV. Postero die consultus a M. Pomponio praetore senatus decrevit dictatori scribendum uti, si e re publica censeret esse, ad consules subrogandos veniret
2 cum magistro equitum et praetore M. Marcello, ut ex iis praesentibus nosceere patres possent quo statu res publica esset, consiliaque ex rebus caperent. Qui acciti erant, omnes venerunt relictis legatis qui
3 legionibus praecessent. Dictator de se pauca ac

[1] non Sigonius: om. P(1): non (magistratus) Conway: minores (magistratus) Stroth.

[1] In 220 B.C.; Periocha 20.

[2] Pending the revision of the list by the censors, once in five years in the normal course of things.

and Gaius Flaminius [1] had held a curule office and had B.C. 216 not yet been chosen into the senate,[2] in each case in the order of his election. Then he chose those who had been aediles,[3] tribunes of the people or quaestors; then, from the number of those who had not held offices, the men who had spoils of the enemy affixed to their houses or had received the civic wreath.[4] Having thus chosen a hundred and seventy-seven into the senate with great approval, he at once abdicated his office and came down from the Rostra a private citizen, after ordering his lictors to leave him. And he mingled with the crowd of those engaged in private business, deliberately killing time, in order not to draw the people away from the forum for the purpose of escorting him. Yet men's attention was not relaxed by that delay, and so in large numbers they escorted him home. The consul returned that night to the army without informing the senate, for fear of being detained in the city to conduct the elections.

XXIV. On the next day the senate, presided over by Marcus Pomponius, the praetor, decreed that the dictator should be informed by letter that, if he thought it to the public interest, he should come with the master of the horse and the praetor, Marcus Marcellus, for the election of consuls, in order that from them in person the fathers could learn what was the condition of the state and make their plans in accordance with the facts. All of those summoned came, leaving their lieutenants to command the legions. The dictator spoke briefly and [3] I.e. plebeian aediles.

[4] The reward of a soldier who had saved the life of a fellow-citizen.

A.U.C. 538

modice locutus in magistrum equitum Ti. Sempronium Gracchum magnam partem gloriae vertit, comitiaque edixit, quibus L. Postumius tertium absens, qui tum Galliam provinciam obtinebat, et Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, qui tum magister equitum et aedilis curulis 4 erat, consules creantur. Praetores inde creati M. Valerius Laevinus iterum, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, 5 Q. Fulvius Flaccus, Q. Mucius Scaevola. Dictator creatis magistratibus Teanum in hiberna ad exercitum redit relicto magistro equitum Romae, qui, cum post paucos dies magistratum initurus esset, de exercitibus scribendis conparandisque in annum patres consuleret.

6 Cum eae res maxime agerentur, nova clades nuntiata, aliam super aliam cumulante in eum annum fortuna, L. Postumium consulem designatum in 7 Gallia ipsum atque exercitum deletos. Silva erat vasta—Litanam Galli vocabant—qua exercitum traducturus erat. Eius silvae dextra laevaque circa viam Galli arbores ita inciderunt ut inmotae starent,
8 momento levi inpulsae occiderent. Legiones duas Romanas habebat Postumius, sociumque ab supero mari tantum conscripserat ut viginti quinque milia
9 armatorum in agros hostium induxerit. Galli oram extremae silvae cum circumsedissent, ubi intravit

---

[1] What were the special achievements of M. Junius Pera we are not told. Probably "glory" is only conventional for "credit." The consul is absent with the army.

[2] The northernmost town in Campania was Teanum Sidicinum, an important road centre in a strong position.

modestly of himself, and then diverted a large share B.C. 216 of the glory [1] to the master of the horse, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus; and he ordered the elections at which these consuls were named: Lucius Postumius for the third time, then absent with Gaul as his sphere of action, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was at that time master of the horse and curule aedile. Then the following men were elected as praetors: Marcus Valerius Laevinus for the second time, Appius Claudius Pulcher, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, Quintus Mucius Scaevola. The dictator, after the election of magistrates, returned to the army and the winter quarters at Teanum,[2] leaving the master of the horse at Rome, in order that he, inasmuch as he was to enter upon office a few days later, might advise with the fathers in regard to enrolling and providing armies for the year.

Just as these measures were being taken, a fresh disaster was reported—for fortune was piling one upon another for that year—namely, that the consul designate, Lucius Postumius, had perished, himself and his army, in Gaul. There was a huge forest,[3] called Litana by the Gauls, by way of which he was about to lead his army. In that forest the Gauls hacked the trees to right and left of the road in such a way that, if not disturbed, they stood, but fell if pushed slightly. Postumius had two Roman legions, and had enlisted from the coast of the Upper Sea [4] such numbers of allies that he led twenty-five thousand armed men into the enemy's territory. The Gauls had surrounded the very edge of the forest,

[3] Near Mutina (Modena), and northwest of Bononia (Bologna).

[4] Cf. xxxviii. 1; contrast i. 5.

A.U.C. 558

agmen saltum, tum extremas arborum succisarum impellunt. Quae alia in aliam, instabilem per se ac male haerentem, incidentes ancipiti strage arma, viros, equos obruerunt, ut vix decem homines effu-
10 gerent. Nam cum exanimati plerique essent arborum truncis fragmentisque ramorum, ceteram multitudinem inopinato malo trepidam Galli saltum omnem armati circumsedentes interfecerunt, paucis e tanto numero captis, qui pontem fluminis petentes,
11 obsesso ante ab hostibus ponte, interclusi sunt. Ibi Postumius omni vi ne caperetur dimicans occubuit. Spolia corporis caputque praecisum ducis Boii ovantes templo quod sanctissimum est apud eos
12 intulere. Purgato inde capite, ut mos iis est, calvam auro caelavere, idque sacrum vas iis erat quo sollemnibus libarent poculumque idem sacerdotibus [1] 13 esset ac templi antistitibus. Praeda quoque haud minor Gallis quam victoria fuit; nam etsi magna pars animalium strage silvae oppressa erat, tamen ceterae res, quia nihil dissipatum fuga est, stratae per omnem iacentis agminis ordinem inventae sunt.

XXV. Hac nuntiata clade cum per dies multos in tanto pavore fuisset civitas ut tabernis clausis velut

[1] sacerdotibus Alschefski: saecerdotis P(1): saecerdoti x Sigonius.

---

[1] The particular spot chosen for the trap. Although saltus often = silva, the hacking of trees must have been confined to some stretch of the road offering special advantages to the enemy, and near the point where the road emerged into open country. Cf. xxxiii. 8.

[2] Here also it is difficult to believe that saltus is used as another word for "forest," since the whole silva vasta (§ 7) could hardly be surrounded by the Gauls. Cf. Frontinus I. vi. 4.

and when the column entered a defile [1] they pushed B.C. 216 against the outermost of the trees that had been hacked near the ground. As these fell, each upon the next tree, which was in itself unsteady and had only a slight hold, piling up from both sides they overwhelmed arms, men and horses, so that hardly ten men escaped. For after very many had been killed by tree-trunks and broken branches, and the rest of the troops were alarmed by the unforeseen calamity, the Gauls under arms, surrounding the whole defile [2] slew them, while but few out of so many were captured,—the men who were making their way to a bridge over a river, but were cut off, since the bridge had by that time been occupied by the enemy. There Postumius fell fighting with all his might to avoid capture. Spoils taken from his body and the severed head of the general were carried in triumph by the Boians to the temple which is most revered in their land. Then after cleaning the head they adorned the skull with gold according to their custom. And it served them as a sacred vessel from which to pour libations at festivals and at the same time as a drinking cup for the priests and keepers of the temple. The booty also meant no less to the Gauls than the victory. For although a large part of the cattle had been crushed by fallen trees, still everything else was found strewn the whole length of the column of the slain, since nothing was scattered by flight.

XXV. When this disaster was reported, the city was for many days in such alarm that, in view of the stillness, like that of night, produced

[1] Even in 43 B.C. there were still remnants of forest along the Aemilian Way; ib. II. v. 39.

A.U.C. 538

noctuma solitudine per urbem acta senatus aedilibus
2 negotium daret ut urbem circumirent aperirique tabernas et maestitiae publicae speciem urbi demi iuberent, tum Ti. Sempronius senatum habuit
3 consolatusque patres est, et adhortatus ne qui Cannensi ruinae non succubuissent ad minores calami-
4 tates animos summitterent. Quod ad Carthaginienses hostes Hannibalemque attineret, prospera modo essent, sicut speraret, futura, Gallicum bellum et omitti tuto et differri posse, ultionemque eam fraudis in deorum ac populi Romani potestate fore. De hoste Poeno exercitibusque, per quos id bellum
5 gereretur, consultandum atque agitandum. Ipse primum quid peditum equitumque, quid civium, quid sociorum in exercitu esset dictatoris, disseruit; tum Marcellus suarum copiarum summam exposuit.
6 Quid in Apulia cum C. Terentio consule esset a peritis quaesitum est; nec unde [1] consulares exercitus satis firmi ad tantum bellum efficerentur inibatur ratio. Itaque Galliam, quamquam stimulabat iusta ira, omitti eo anno placuit. Exercitus dictatoris con-
7 suli decretus est. De exercitu M. Marcelli, qui eorum ex fuga Cannensi essent, in Siciliam eos traduci atque ibi militare donec in Italia bellum esset
8 placuit; eodem ex dictatoris legionibus reici militem minimi quemque roboris, nullo praestituto militiae tempore nisi quod stipendiorum legitimorum esset.

[1] nec unde Gronovius: necundo P: ne secundo P^2R^2(14): nec secundo C: nec unde duo Madvig.

[1] This he did as magister equitum. His consulship would begin at the Ides of March; xxx. 17.

throughout the city by the closing of the shops, the B.C. 216 senate charged the aediles with the duty of going about the city and ordering that shops be opened and the appearance of public mourning removed from the city. And then Tiberius Sempronius held a session of the senate ; [1] and he comforted the fathers, and urged that men who had not given way to the catastrophe at Cannae should not lose heart in the face of lesser disasters. So far as concerned the Carthaginian enemy and Hannibal, he said that, if only coming events should prove favourable, as he hoped, a Gallic war could be both safely neglected and postponed, and punishment for that treachery would be in the power of the gods and of the Roman people. It was in regard to the Carthaginian enemy and the armies with which to carry on that war that they must deliberate and debate. He himself first stated what number of infantry and cavalry, of citizens and allies, were in the dictator's army. Then Marcellus set forth the total of his forces. What troops were in Apulia with the consul Gaius Terentius was a question asked of those who knew ; and no method of making up consular armies strong enough for so great a war was found. And so, although righteous indignation goaded them, it was decided that Gaul should be left out of account that year. The dictator's army was assigned to the consul. As for the army of Marcus Marcellus, it was voted that those of them who were survivors of the rout at Cannae should be transported to Sicily and serve there so long as there should be war in Italy ; also that from the dictator's legions all the least efficient soldiers should be sent away to the same province, with no definite term of service except that of the campaigns

A.U.C. 538

9 Duae legiones urbanae alteri consuli, qui in locum L. Postumi suffectus esset, decretae sunt, eumque, cum primum salvis auspiciis posset, creari placuit; 10 legiones praeterea duas primo quoque tempore ex Sicilia acciri, atque inde consulem, cui legiones urbanae evenissent, militum sumere quantum opus esset: C. Terentio consuli propagari[1] in annum imperium, neque de eo exercitu quem ad praesidium Apuliae haberet quicquam minui.

XXVI. Dum haec in Italia geruntur apparanturque, nihilo segnius in Hispania bellum erat, sed ad eam 2 diem magis prosperum Romanis. P. et Cn. Scipionibus inter se partitis copias, ut Gnaeus terra, Publius navibus rem gereret, Hasdrubal Poenorum imperator, neutri parti virium satis fidens, procul ab hoste intervallo ac locis tutus tenebat se, quoad multum ac diu obtestanti quattuor milia peditum et quingenti[2] 3 equites in supplementum missi ex Africa sunt. Tum refecta tandem spe castra propius hostem movit, classemque et ipse instrui pararique iubet ad insulas 4 maritimamque oram tutandam. In ipso impetu movendarum de integro rerum perculit eum praefectorum navium transitio, qui post classem ad Hiberum per pavorem desertam graviter inrepiti nunquam

[1] propagari P(1): prorogari A^{x}Madvig.
[2] et quingenti (i.e. D) $A^{2}z$: et P(4): mille Alschefski (the numeral ∞ is often omitted in P).

---

[1] The usual word would be prorogari. But Cicero has provinciae propagator, Att. VIII. iii. 3, and uses the verb in the sense of "prolong" in Cat. iii. 26; so Suetonius Aug. 23.
[2] I.e. than in Italy.
[3] As voted by the Carthaginian senate, xiii. 7.
[4] Cf. XXII. xix. 11 f. Their desertion now consisted in going over to native tribes which sided with the Romans, fixed by law. The two city legions were assigned to B.C. 216

the other consul, to be elected in place of Lucius Postumius; and it was voted that he be elected as soon as possible with due regard to the auspices; further, that two legions be summoned as soon as might be from Sicily, and that from them the consul to whom the city legions fell should take as many soldiers as he needed; also that the command of Gaius Terentius, the consul, should be extended [1] for one year and no reduction made in the army which he had for the defence of Apulia.

XXVI. During these operations and these preparations in Italy the war in Spain was no less active, but up to that time more successful [2] for the Romans. Publius and Gnaeus Scipio had divided the forces between them, so that Gnaeus should carry on the war on land, Publius with the fleet; and Hasdrubal, commander-in-chief of the Carthaginians, since he could not fully depend upon either arm of his forces, remained far from the enemy, being protected by distance and position, until, in answer to pleas urgent and long-continued, four thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry were sent from Africa to reinforce him.[3] Then, with hopes at last renewed, he moved his camp nearer to the enemy, and he too ordered that a fleet should be built and equipped, in order to protect the islands and the sea-coast. In the very flush of renewed operations he met a blow in the desertion of the commanders of his ships, who, being severely reprimanded after their abandonment of the fleet at the Hiberus in their fright,[4] had never especially to the Tartesii (Turdetani), on the lower Baetis (Guadalquivir).

A.U.C. 538

deinde satis fidi aut duci aut Carthaginiensium rebus fuerant. Fecerant hi transfugae motum in Tartesiorum gente, desciverantque iis auctoribus urbes aliquot; una etiam ab ipsis vi capta fuerat.

6 In eam gentem versum ab Romanis bellum est, infestoque exercitu Hasdrubal ingressus agrum hostium pro captae ante dies paucos urbis moenibus Chalbum, nobilem Tartesiorum ducem, cum valido exercitu castris se tenentem, adgredi statuit. 7 Praemissa igitur levi armatura quae eliceret hostis ad certamen, equitum partem ad populandum per agros 8 passim dimisit et [1] ut palantis exciperent. Simul et ad castra tumultus erat et per agros fugaque et caedes; deinde undique diversis itineribus cum in castra se recepissent, adeo repente decessit animis pavor ut non ad munimenta modo defendenda satis animorum esset sed etiam ad lacessendum proelio 9 hostem. Erumpunt igitur agmine e castris tripudiantes more suo, repentinaque eorum audacia terrorem hosti paulo ante ultro lacessenti incussit. 10 Itaque et ipse Hasdrubal in collem satis arduum, flumine etiam obiecto tutum,[2] copias subducit et praemissam levem armaturam equitesque palatos eodem recipit, nec aut colli aut flumini satis fidens, 11 castra vallo permunit. In hoc alterno pavore certamina aliquot sunt contracta; nec Numida Hispano

[1] et Heusinger: om. P(1).
[2] tutum Heerwagen: tum P(1), with tutum before flumine.

since been entirely loyal either to the general or to B.C. 216
the cause of Carthage. These deserters had made trouble in the tribe of the Tartesii, and at their instigation a number of cities had rebelled. One city had even been stormed by them.

It was against this tribe that the war was now diverted from the Romans, and Hasdrubal, having entered the territory of the enemy with a hostile army, resolved to attack a noble in command of the Tartesii, Chalbus, who with a strong army was keeping to his camp before the walls of a city captured a few days before. Therefore Hasdrubal, sending the light-armed in advance, to draw out the enemy to battle, scattered part of his cavalry over the farms to ravage them and to capture stragglers. There was confusion at the camp and at the same time flight and slaughter in the country around. Then, after they had made their way from all sides back to the camp by different roads, fear was so suddenly banished from their hearts that they had sufficient spirit not only to defend the fortifications but also to attack the enemy. Accordingly they sallied out of the camp in a column, dancing, as is their custom; and their sudden boldness inspired alarm in the enemy, who a little before had been the aggressor. And so Hasdrubal likewise led his forces up a very steep hill, further defended by a river in front. Also he got back the light-armed who had been sent ahead and the scattered cavalry to the same position. Unable to put sufficient confidence in either the hill or the river, he strongly fortified his camp with an earthwork. While fear was shifting thus from one side to the other, a number of engagements took place, and the Numidian horseman was no match for the

A.U.C. 538 eques par fuit nec iaculator Maurus caetrato, velocitate pari, robore animi viriumque aliquantum praestanti.

XXVII. Postquam neque eliecre Poenum ad certamen obversati castris poterant neque castrorum 2 oppugnatio facilis erat, urbem Ascuam, quo finis hostium ingrediens Hasdrubal frumentum commeatusque alios convexerat, vi capiunt omnique circa agro potiuntur; nec iam aut in agmine aut in castris 3 ullo imperio contineri. Quam ubi neglegentiam ex re, ut fit, bene gesta oriri senserat Hasdrubal, cohortatus milites ut palatos sine signis hostes adgrederentur, degressus colle pergit ire acie instructa ad castra. 4 Quem ut adesse tumultuose nuntii refugientes [1] ex speculis stationibusque attulere, ad arma conclamatum est. 5 Ut quisque arma ceperat, sine imperio, sine signo, incompositi, inordinati in proelium ruunt. Iam primi conseruerant manus, cum alii catervatim 6 currerent, alii nondum e castris exissent. Tamen primo ipsa audacia terruere hostem; deinde rari in confertos inlati, cum paucitas parum tuta esset, respiecre alii alios et undique pulsi coire in orbem, 7 et dum corpora [2] corporibus applicant armaque armis iungunt, in artum compulsi, cum vix movendis armis satis spatii esset, corona hostium cineti ad

[1] nuntii refugientes A^2z: nuntiares fugientes $PC?(11)$ (with nuntiare $M^1?A$).

[2] corpora x: om. $P(1)$.

Spaniard, nor the Moorish dart-thrower for the man with the wicker shield, the Spaniard in both cases being an equal in speed and quite superior in spirit and strength. B.C. 216

XXVII. After the Tartesii had repeatedly failed to draw the Carthaginian out to battle by facing his camp, and it was also not easy to assault the camp, they took by storm the city of Ascua, to which Hasdrubal, on entering the land of the enemy, had brought grain and other supplies; and they gained possession of all the country around. And they could no longer be restrained by any authority either on the march or in camp. Hasdrubal, perceiving that this carelessness came, as usually happens, from success, exhorted his soldiers to attack the enemy while dispersed and in no formation, and coming down from the hill he proceeded to their camp in battle order. When his approach was reported by messengers fleeing wildly from the watch-towers and guard-posts, they shouted "To arms!" Snatching up arms, each man for himself, without commanders, without orders, in no units or formations, they dashed into battle. Already the first men had engaged, while some charged in separate masses and others had not yet left the camp. Nevertheless they at first frightened the enemy by sheer audacity. Then, as stragglers advancing against dense ranks, finding no safety in small numbers, they looked to one another for help; and, beaten back from every side, they formed a circle. And as they crowded bodies against bodies and touched arms to arms, they were forced into close quarters. Having hardly room enough to move their weapons, they were encircled by the enemy, and the slaughter continued until late in the 8 multum diei caeduntur: exigua pars eruptione facta silvas ac montis petit. Parique terrore et castra sunt deserta et universa gens postero die in deditionem venit.

A.U.C. 538

9 Nec diu in pacto [1] mansit; nam subinde ab Carthagine allatum est ut Hasdrubal primo quoque tempore in Italiam exercitum duceret, quae volgata res per Hispaniam omnium ferme animos ad Romanos avertit.

10 Itaque Hasdrubal extemplo litteras Carthaginem mittit, indicans quanto fama profectionis suae damno fuisset; si vero inde pergeret, priusquam Hiberum

11 transiret Romanorum Hispaniam fore; nam praeterquam quod nec praesidium nec ducem haberet quem relinqueret pro se, eos imperatores esse Romanos quibus vix aequis viribus resisti possit.[2]

12 Itaque si ulla Hispaniae cura esset, successorem sibi eum valido exercitu mitterent; cui ut [3] omnia prospere evenirent, non tamen otiosam provinciam fore.

XXVIII. Eae litterae quamquam primo admodum moverunt senatum, tamen, quia Italiae cura prior potiorque erat, nihil de Hasdrubale neque de copiis

2 eius mutatum est; Himilco cum exercitu iusto et aucta classe ad retinendam terra marique ac tuen-

3 dam Hispaniam est missus. Qui ut pedestris navalisque copias traiecit, castris communitis navibusque subductis et vallo circumdatis, cum equitibus delectis ipse, quantum maxime adcelerare poterat,

[1] pacto Stroth: pacato P(1).
[2] possit P(1) Walters: posset Forchhammer, Madvig.
[3] ut Gronovius: si A^2: om. P(1).

[1] Evidently exaggerated, as in xxix. 16 and xxxii. 6. A prosperous city near the Hiberus is mentioned in xxviii. 10 as still loyal to the Carthaginians.

day. A very small part of them sallied out and made B.C. 216 for the woods and the mountains. In no less alarm the camp was abandoned, and on the next day the whole tribe surrendered.

Yet not for long did the tribe abide by the agreement. For soon came the order from Carthage that Hasdrubal should at the first opportunity lead his army into Italy. And the spreading of this news throughout Spain made nearly all incline to the side of the Romans.[1] Accordingly Hasdrubal at once sent a letter to Carthage, showing what a loss the mere report of his departure had caused; that if he were actually to leave the country, Spain would belong to the Romans before he should cross the Hiberus.[2] For besides the lack of both an army and a general to leave in his place, so able were the Roman generals that they could scarcely be resisted if the forces were evenly matched. And so, if they had any regard for Spain, they should send him a successor with a strong army. Even if all should go well, that man would still find it no peaceful province.

XXVIII. Though this letter at first greatly stirred the senate, nevertheless, since concern for Italy was older and stronger, no change was made either in regard to Hasdrubal or to his forces. But Himilco was sent with a complete army and an enlarged fleet to hold and defend Spain by land and sea. After transporting his land and naval forces, Himilco fortified a camp, beached his ships and surrounded them with an earthwork. Then he himself with picked horsemen, making his way with all possible speed, and with equal alertness through the

[2] The Ebro was the treaty boundary; XXI. ii. 7.

A.U.C. 538

per dubios infestosque populos iuxta intentus ad
4 Hasdrubalem pervenit. Cum decreta senatus mandataque exposuisset atque edoctus esset [1] ipse in vicem quem ad modum tractandum bellum in Hispania foret, retro in sua castra redit [2] nulla re quam celeritate tutior, quod undique abierat ante-
5 quam consentirent. Hasdrubal priusquam moveret castra pecunias imperat populis omnibus suae dicionis, satis gnarus Hannibalem transitus quosdam
6 pretio mercatum nec auxilia Gallica aliter quam conducta habuisse; inopem tantum iter ingressum vix penetraturum ad Alpis fuisse. Pecuniis igitur raptim exactis ad Hiberum descendit.

7 Decreta Carthaginiensium et Hasdrubalis iter ubi ad Romanos sunt perlata, omnibus omissis rebus ambo duces iunctis copiis ire obviam coeptis atque
8 obsistere parant, rati, si Hannibali, vix per se ipsi tolerando Italiae hosti, Hasdrubal dux atque Hispaniensis exercitus esset iunctus, illum finem Ro-
9 mani imperii fore. His anxii curis ad Hiberum contrahunt copias, et transito amne cum diu consultassent utrum castra castris conferrent an satis [3] haberent sociis Carthaginiensium oppugnandis mo-
10 rari ab itinere proposito hostem, urbem a propinquo flumine Hiberam appellatam, opulentissimam ea
11 tempestate regionis eius, oppugnare parant. Quod ubi sensit Hasdrubal, pro ope ferenda sociis pergit ire ipse ad urbem deditam nuper in fidem Romanorum

[1] edoctus esset A^{γ} Valla : edocuisset $P^{2?}(1)$: -uisse P.
[2] redit P : rediit $P^{3}(1)$.
[3] an satis A^{γ} Valla : antis PR : an iis C : tantis (14).

wavering and the hostile tribes, reached Hasdrubal. B.C. 216
After setting forth the decrees and instructions of the senate, and being himself informed in turn how the war in Spain must be conducted, he went back to his own camp, being protected by his quickness more than anything else, since he had left each place before the enemy could agree upon action. Hasdrubal, before breaking camp, exacted money from all the tribes under his rule, knowing well that Hannibal had repeatedly bought the right of passage, and that he had Gallic auxiliaries only by hiring them; but that if he had set out on so long a march without funds, he would scarcely have made his way to the Alps. Therefore he exacted money in haste and came down to the Hiberus.

When news of the decrees of the Carthaginians and Hasdrubal's expedition reached the Roman commanders, both dropped everything, and uniting their forces prepared to meet and resist his efforts, thinking that if Hannibal, who was himself an enemy Italy could scarcely endure, should be joined by Hasdrubal as a general and by an army from Spain, that would be the end of the Roman power. Troubled by these apprehensions, they concentrated their troops at the Hiberus, crossed the river, and after protracted deliberation, whether to pitch camp near that of the enemy or to be satisfied with keeping him from his projected march by attacking allies of the Carthaginians, they prepared to attack a city which had its name Hibera from the river near by, the richest city of the region at that time. On learning this Hasdrubal, instead of bringing aid to his allies, proceeded likewise to attack a city which had recently surrendered to the Romans. Thus the siege

A.U.C. 538 12 oppugnandam. Ita iam coepta obsidio omissa ab Romanis est et in ipsum Hasdrubalem versum bellum.

XXIX. Quinque milium intervallo castra distantia habuere paucos dies, nec sine levibus proeliis nec ut 2 in aciem exirent; tandem uno eodemque die velut ex composito utrimque signum pugnae propositum est atque omnibus copiis in campum descensum. 3 Triplex stetit Romana acies: velitum pars inter antesignanos locata, pars post signa accepta: equites 4 cornua cinxere. Hasdrubal mediam aciem Hispanis firmat; in cornibus, dextro Poenos locat, laevo Afros mercenariorumque auxilia; equitum Numidas Poenorum peditibus, ceteros Afris pro cornibus apponit. 5 Nec omnes Numidae in dextro locati cornu, sed quibus desultorum in modum binos trahentibus equos inter acerrimam saepe pugnam in recentem equum ex fesso armatis transultare mos erat; tanta velocitas ipsis tamque docile equorum genus est. 6 Cum hoc modo instructi starent, imperatorum utriusque partis haud ferme dispares spes erant; nam ne multum [1] quidem aut numero aut genere militum [2] hi aut illi praestabant; militibus longe 7 dispar animus erat. Romanis enim, quamquam procul a patria pugnarent, facile persuaserant duces pro Italia atque urbe Romana eos pugnare; itaque, velut quibus reditus in patriam in [3] eo discrimine pugnae verteretur, obstinaverant animis vincere aut

[1] multum P(1): militum Harant, Conway: minimum Koch.
[2] militum P(3): multum D Conway.
[3] in Madvig: om. P(1).

[1] Cf. XXXV. xxviii. 8.

already begun was abandoned by the Romans and the war directed against Hasdrubal himself. B.C. 216

XXIX. They had their camps five miles apart for a few days, not without skirmishes, but without drawing up lines of battle. Finally on one and the same day, as though by agreement, the signal for battle was raised on both sides and with all their forces they went down into the plain. The Roman line stood in triple ranks. Some of the light-armed were posted in the intervals between the maniples in advance of the standards, some placed behind the standards. Cavalry covered the wings. Hasdrubal made a strong centre of Spanish troops; on the right wing he placed Carthaginians, on the left Africans and mercenary auxiliaries. Of the cavalry he stationed the Numidians on the wing of the Carthaginian infantry, the rest on that of the Africans. And not all of his Numidians were placed on the right wing, but only those who, taking two horses apiece[1] after the manner of performers, had the custom of leaping armed from the tired horse to the fresh, often in the very heat of battle; such was the agility of the men, and so well-trained their breed of horses. While they were standing in this array, the hopes of the generals on the two sides were fairly balanced; for there was also not much superiority for the one army or the other either in the number or the type of its soldiers. But the spirit of the soldiers was far from being matched. For the Romans, although fighting far from their country, had been easily persuaded by their generals that they were fighting in defence of Italy and the city of Rome. And so, as men whose return to their native land would depend upon the issue of that battle, they had made up their

A.U.C. 538

8 mori. Minus pertinaces viros habebat altera acies; nam maxima pars Hispani erant, qui vinci in Hispania
9 quam victores in Italiam trahi malebant. Primo igitur concursu, cum vix pila conlecta essent, rettulit pedem media acies, inferentibusque se magno impetu 10 Romanis verlit terga. Nihilo segnius in[1] cornibus proelium fuit. Hinc Poenus, hinc Afer urguet, et 11 velut in circumventos proelio ancipiti pugnant; sed cum in medium tota iam coisset Romana acies, satis
12 virium ad dimovenda hostium cornua habuit. Ita duo diversa proelia erant. Utroque Romani, ut qui pulsis iam ante mediis et numero et robore virorum
13 praestarent, haud dubie superant. Magna vis hominum ibi occisa, et nisi Hispani vixdum conserto proelio tam effuse fugissent, perpauci ex tota super-
14 fuissent acie. Equestris pugna nulla admodum fuit, quia, simul inclinatam mediam aciem Mauri Numidaeque videre,[2] extemplo fuga effusa nuda cornua
15 elephantis quoque prae se actis deseruere. Hasdrubal usque ad ultimum eventum pugnae moratus e media caede cum paucis effugit. Castra Romani
16 cepere atque diripuere. Ea pugna si qua dubia in Hispania erant Romanis adiunxit, Hasdrubalique non modo in Italiam traducendi exercitus sed ne manendi quidem satis tuto in Hispania spes[3] reliqua

[1] in A^1 : om. P(1) Frigell.
[2] videre Riemann, Luchs : viderent P : viderunt P^3(1).
[3] spes C^1 Gronovius : spe P(4) : spem M^2D.

[1] As many as 25,000 according to Eutropius III. 11.

minds to win or die. The other battle-line had men B.C. 216 less firmly resolved. For the majority were Spaniards, who preferred to be vanquished in Spain, rather than as victors to be dragged to Italy. Therefore at the first clash, when they had barely hurled their javelins, the centre fell back, and, as the Romans advanced with a great charge, retreated. On the wings, however, there was more spirited fighting. On the one hand the Carthaginians pressed them hard, on the other hand the Africans; and it was a double conflict against men presumed to have been surrounded. But, although the whole Roman line had by this time crowded into the centre, it had sufficient strength to force apart the wings of the enemy. Thus there were two battles in opposite directions. In both the Romans were unquestionably victorious, since, once the centre had been routed, they were superior both in the numbers and in the strength of their men. A great number of men[1] were slain there, and if the Spaniards had not fled in such confusion when the battle had scarcely begun, very few out of that entire line would have survived. The cavalry were not engaged at all, since, as soon as the Mauri and the Numidians saw the centre giving way, they at once abandoned the wings, exposed by their wild flight as they drove the elephants also before them. Hasdrubal, after waiting for the final outcome of the battle, escaped with a few men out of the midst of the slaughter. His camp the Romans captured and plundered. That battle brought to the Roman side all that still wavered in Spain, and Hasdrubal had left to him no hope, not only of leading his army over into Italy, but not even of remaining with any safety in Spain. When these facts were generally known

A.U.C. 538

17 erat.[1] Quae posteaquam litteris Scipionum Romae volgata sunt, non tam victoria quam prohibito Hasdrubalis in Italiam transitu laetabantur.

XXX. Dum haec in Hispania geruntur, Petelia in Bruttiis aliquot post mensibus quam coepta oppugnari erat ab Himilcone praefecto Hannibalis expu-
2 gnata est. Multo sanguine ac volneribus ea Poenis victoria stetit, nec ulla magis vis obsessos quam
3 fames expugnavit. Absumptis enim frugum alimentis carnisque omnis generis quadrupedum suetae insuetaeque,[2] postremo coriis herbisque et radicibus
4 et corticibus teneris strictisque foliis vixere, nec ante quam vires ad standum in muris ferendaque arma
5 decrant expugnati sunt. Receepta Petelia Poenus ad Consentiam copias traducit, quam minus pertinaciter defensam intra paucos dies in deditionem
6 aeeepit. Isdem ferme diebus et Bruttiorum exercitus Crotonem, Graecam urbem, circumsedit, opulentam quondam armis virisque, tum iam adeo multis magnisque cladibus adflictam ut omnis aetatis minus
7 duo milia civium superessent. Itaque urbe a defensoribus vasta[3] facile potiti hostes sunt; arx tantum retenta, in quam inter tumultum eaptae
8 urbis e media caede quidam effugere. Et Locrenses descivere ad Bruttios Poenosque prodita multitudine
9 a principibus. Regini tantummodo regionis eius et in fide erga Romanos et potestatis suae ad ultimum

[1] reliqua erat Gronovius: relinquerat P(11): reliquerat CM[3].

[2] insuetae Fabri: om. P(1).

[3] vasta P: vastata P2.

---

[1] Hasdrubal's invasion of Italy was carried out nine years later to a fatal conclusion at the Metaurus, XXVII. xlix. 4.

[2] For the long siege of Petelia cf. the note on xx. 10.

at Rome through the letter of the Scipios, people rejoiced, not so much over the victory, as that Hasdrubal's crossing into Italy had been prevented.[1] B.C. 216

XXX. While these things were going on in Spain, Petelia,[2] in the land of the Bruttii, was taken by Himilco, Hannibal's prefect, some months after the siege began. That victory cost the Carthaginians much blood and many wounds, and starvation[3] more than any assault overpowered the besieged. For after they had consumed their food-supply in cereals and flesh, the familiar and the unfamiliar, of four-footed beasts of every kind, they finally lived on hides and grasses and roots and tender bark and leaves stripped off. And they were not overpowered until they had no strength left to stand on the walls and bear arms. Having taken Petelia, the Carthaginian led his troops across to Consentia, and as it was less obstinately defended, he received its surrender within a few days. About the same time an army of the Bruttians also besieged Croton,[4] a Greek city formerly rich in arms and men, but even then so crushed by many great disasters that, including all ages, less than two thousand citizens remained. And so the enemy easily gained possession of the city bereft of its defenders. Only the citadel was still held, and to it some, in the uproar of a captured city, made their escape out of the midst of slaughter. And Locri went over to the Bruttians and Carthaginians, the populace having been betrayed by the leading men. Regium alone in that region remained loyal to the Romans and to the very last independent.

[3] Polybius also (VII. i. 3) gave such details as follow.

[4] The story of the siege and capture of Croton, on the Gulf of Tarentum, is told in some detail in XXIV. ii f.

A.U.C. 538
10 manserunt. In Siciliam quoque eadem inclinatio animorum pervenit, et ne domus quidem Hieronis
11 tota ab defectione abstinuit. Namque Gelo, maximus stirpis, contempta simul senectute patris simul post Cannensem cladem Romana societate ad Poenos
12 defecit, movissetque in Sicilia res, nisi mors adeo opportuna ut patrem quoque suspicione aspergeret, armantem cum multitudinem sollicitantemque socios
13 absumpsisset. Haec eo anno in Italia, in Africa, in Sicilia, in Hispania vario eventu acta.

Exitu anni Q. Fabius Maximus a senatu postulavit ut aedem Veneris Erycinae, quam dictator vovisset, 14 dedicare liceret. Senatus decrevit ut Ti. Sempronius consul designatus, cum primum [1] magistratum [2] inisset, ad populum ferret ut Q. Fabium duumvirum 15 esse iuberent aedis dedicandae causa. Et M. Aemilio Lepido, qui bis [3] consul augurque fuerat, filii tres, Lucius, Marcus, Quintus, ludos funebres per triduum et gladiatorum paria duo et viginti in 16 foro dederunt. Aediles curules C. Lactorius et Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, consul designatus, qui in aedilitate magister equitum fuerat, ludos Romanos 17 fecerunt, qui per triduum instaurati sunt. Plebei ludi aedilium M. Aurelii Cottae et M. Claudii Marcelli ter instaurati.

[1] primum z : om. P(1) Madvig.
[2] magistratum xz : honorem $C^{4}x$ Madvig : ibo P : ibono $P^{1}?$(3) ; bono D.
[3] qui bis $C^{4}M^{1}?DA^{y}$ Valla : quib. (quibus) P(3).

---

[1] Polybius makes him a model of filial devotion (VII. viii. 9). Coins prove that he was king with his father.
[2] This brief résumé covers the events narrated from XXII. xxxviii up to this point. An eventful year.

The same trend of feeling reached Sicily also, and B.C. 216 even the house of Hiero did not hold aloof entirely from the revolt. For Gelo, the eldest son, scorning both the old age of his father and the Roman alliance since the disaster at Cannae, went over to the Carthaginians.[1] And he would have caused an uprising in Sicily, had not death, so timely as to besmirch even his father with suspicion, carried him off as he was arming the populace and trying to gain allies. Such were the checkered events of that year in Italy, in Africa, in Sicily, in Spain.[2]

At the end of the year Quintus Fabius Maximus requested of the senate that he be permitted to dedicate the Temple of Venus of Eryx[3] which he had vowed in his dictatorship. The senate decreed that Tiberius Sempronius, consul designate, as soon as he entered upon his office should propose to the people that they order that Quintus Fabius should be a duumvir for the purpose of dedicating the temple. And in honour of Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, who had been consul twice and augur, his three sons, Lucius, Marcus, Quintus, gave funeral games for three days and showed twenty-two pairs of gladiators in the Forum.[4] The curule aediles, Gaius Laetorius and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, consul designate, who in his aedileship had been master of the horse, celebrated the Roman Games, and on three of the days they were repeated. The Plebeian Games of the aediles, Marcus Aurelius Cotta and Marcus Claudius Marcellus, were repeated three times.

[3] Where the temple was we learn presently, xxxi. 9. Her chief temple was on the western headland of Sicily, Mt. Eryx.

[4] The earliest known example of a gladiatorial combat at Rome was in 264 B.C. That also was on the occasion of a funeral, and the gift of sons.

A.U.C. 539

Circumacto tertio anno Punici belli Ti. Sempronius consul idibus Martiis magistratum init. 18 Praetores Q. Fulvius Flaccus, qui antea consul censorque fuerat, urbanam, M. Valerius Laevinus peregrinam sortem in iuris dictione habuit; Ap. Claudius Pulcher Siciliam, Q. Mucius Scaevola 19 Sardiniam sortiti sunt. M. Marcello pro consule imperium esse populus iussit, quod post Cannensem cladem unus Romanorum imperatorum in Italia prospere rem gessisset.

XXXI. Senatus quo die primum est in Capitolio consultus decrevit ut eo[1] anno duplex tributum 2 imperaretur, simplex confestim exigeretur, ex quo stipendium praesens omnibus militibus daretur 3 praeterquam qui milites ad Cannas fuissent. De exercitibus ita decreverunt ut duabus legionibus urbanis Ti. Sempronius consul Cales ad conveniendum diem ediceret; inde eae legiones in castra 4 Claudiana supra Suessulam deducerentur. Quae ibi legiones essent—erant autem Cannensis maxime exercitus—eas Appius Claudius Pulcher praetor in Siciliam traiceret, quaeque in Sicilia essent Romam 5 deportarentur. Ad exercitum cui ad conveniendum Cales edicta dies erat, M. Claudius Marcellus missus, isque iussus in castra Claudiana deducere urbanas 6 legiones. Ad veterem exercitum accipiendum deducendumque inde in Siciliam Ti. Maecilius Croto legatus ab Ap. Claudio est missus.

7 Taciti primo expectaverant homines uti consul

[1] eo C^{x}: quo eo $P(5)$: quod eo A^{y}: quo die eo M.

---

[1] In fact twice, 237 and 224 B.C.
[2] Named after Marcellus; cf. xvii. 3.

The third year of the Punic War being at an end, B.C. 215
Tiberius Sempronius entered upon office as consul on the Ides of March. Of the praetors Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, who had previously been consul [1] and censor, had by lot his assignment as judge between citizens, Marcus Valerius Laevinus had his as judge in the cases of strangers, while to Appius Claudius Pulcher Sicily was allotted, and Sardinia to Quintus Mucius Scaevola. That Marcus Marcellus should have full military authority as proconsul was ordered by the people, because he alone of the Roman commanders since the disaster at Cannae had met with success in Italy.

XXXI. The senate on the first day on which it was in session on the Capitol, decreed that a double tax should be imposed that year and the normal tax collected at once; that from it pay should be given in cash to all the soldiers except those who had been soldiers at Cannae. As for the armies, they decreed that Tiberius Sempronius, the consul, should set for the two city legions a date for mobilization at Cales; that these legions should be led thence to the Claudian Camp [2] above Suessula; that the legions already there—it was chiefly the army of Cannae—should be taken over into Sicily by Appius Claudius Pulcher, the praetor, and that those which were in Sicily should be brought to Rome. Marcus Claudius Marcellus was sent to the army for which a date of mobilization at Cales had been set; and he was ordered to conduct the city legions to the Claudian Camp. To take over the old army and conduct it thence to Sicily, Appius Claudius sent his lieutenant, Tiberius Maecilius Croto.

At first men had been waiting in silence for the comitia collegae creando haberet; deinde ubi ablegatum velut de industria M. Marcellum viderunt, quem maxime consulem in eum annum ob egregie in praetura res gestas creari volebant, fremitus in 8 curia ortus. Quod ubi sensit consul, "Utrumque" inquit "e re publica fuit, patres conscripti, et M. Claudium ad permutandos exercitus in Campaniam proficisci et comitia non prius edici quam is inde confecto quod mandatum est negotio revertisset, ut vos consulem, quem tempus rei publicae postularet, 9 quem maxime voltis, haberetis." Ita de comitiis donec rediit Marcellus silentium fuit. Interea duumviri creati sunt Q. Fabius Maximus et T. Otacilius Crassus aedibus dedicandis, Menti Otacilius, Fabius Veneri Erucinae; utraque in Capitolio

A.C.C. 539

10 est, canali uno discretae. Et de trecentis equitibus Campanis qui in Sicilia cum fide stipendiis emeritis Romam venerant latum ad populum ut cives Romani essent; item uti municipes Cumani essent pridie quam populus Campanus a populo Romano defecisset.
11 Maxime ut hoc ferretur moverat quod quorum hominum essent scire se ipsi negabant, vetere patria relicta, in eam in quam redierant nondum adsciti.
12 Postquam Marcellus ab exercitu rediit, comitia consuli uni [1] rogando in locum L. Postumii edicuntur.

[1] uni P(1): sub- Madvig.

---

[1] Exact situation of the temples is unknown; cf. xxxii. 20; XXII. ix. 10; x, 10.

[2] Mentioned in iv. 8 and vii. 2.

[3] The Roman citizenship which they had lost with the revolt of Capua was restored, while their municipal rights and privileges were transferred to loyal Cumae and made to antedate the Campanian secession.

consul to preside over an election for the naming of B.C. 215 his colleague. Then, when they saw that Marcus Marcellus, whom they particularly desired to have elected consul for that year, on account of remarkable successes in his praetorship, had been sent away, apparently on purpose, murmurs began to be heard in the Senate House. Noting this the consul said: "Both acts were to the advantage of the state, fellow-senators, that Marcus Claudius should be sent to Campania to make the change of armies, and that the coming election should not be proclaimed until he, after accomplishing the task which was assigned him, should return thence, so that you might have the consul whom the critical situation in the state requires and whom you particularly desire." So until Marcellus returned, nothing was said about an election. Meanwhile Quintus Fabius Maximus and Titus Otacilius Crassus were made duumvirs for the dedication of temples, Otacilius for that of Mens, Fabius for that of Venus of Eryx. Both are on the Capitol,[1] separated by a single water-channel. And in regard to the three hundred Campanian knights[2] who, after loyally serving their terms in Sicily, had come to Rome, a bill was brought before the people that they should be Roman citizens; further, that they should be townsmen of Cumae from the day before that on which the Campanian people had revolted from the Roman people.[3] What had chiefly prompted the making of this proposal was that they said they did not themselves know with whom they belonged, having given up their old home-city, and not being enrolled as yet in the city to which they had returned. After Marcellus returned from the army, an election to name one consul in place of Lucius

A.U.C. 539
13 Creatur ingenti consensu Marcellus, qui extemplo magistratum occiperet. Cui ineunti consulatum cum tonuisset, vocati augures vitio creatum videri pronuntiaverunt: volgoque patres ita fama ferebant, quod tum primum duo plebeii consules facti essent, 14 id deis cordi non esse. In locum Marcelli, ubi is se magistratu abdicavit, suffectus Q. Fabius Maximus tertium.

15 Mare arsit eo anno; ad Sinuessam bos eculeum peperit: signa Lanuvii ad Iunonis Sospitae cruore manavere, lapidibusque circa id templum pluit. Ob quem imbrem novemdiale, ut adsolet, sacrum fuit, ceteraque prodigia cum cura expiata.

XXXII. Consules exercitus inter sese diviserunt. Fabio exercitus Teani, cui M. Iunius dictator praefuerat, evenit; Sempronio volones qui ibi erant [1] et
2 sociorum viginti quinque milia. M. Valerio praetori legiones quae ex Sicilia redissent decretae; M. Claudius pro consule ad eum exercitum qui supra Suessulam Nolae praesideret missus; praetores in Siciliam
3 ac Sardiniam profecti. Consules edixerunt, quotiens in senatum vocassent, uti senatores quibusque in senatu dicere sententiam liceret ad portam

[1] qui ibi erant Madvig: que fierent P(1): qui fierent (forent) x.

---

[1] A very short list of portents and expiations, compared with those in XXI. lxii., XXII. i. and elsewhere.

[2] I.e. the slaves who, after the battle of Cannae, volunteered and were purchased by the state. By good service as soldiers they earned their freedom; xxxv. 6; XXII. lvii. 11; XXIV. x. 3; xiv. 4 f., etc.

Postumius was ordered by edict. With great B.C. 215 unanimity Marcellus was elected, to assume office at once. Just as he was entering upon his consulship it thundered, and thereupon the augurs, being summoned, declared that there seemed to be a defect in his election. And the fathers widely circulated the statement that it did not meet the approval of the gods that two plebeians had then for the first time been elected consuls. In place of Marcellus, after he had abdicated, Quintus Fabius Maximus was substituted as consul for the third time.

The sea was aflame in the course of that year. At Sinuessa a cow gave birth to a colt. At the Temple of Juno Sospita at Lanuvium images of the gods dripped blood, and it rained stones around the temple—a shower on account of which there were ceremonies, as usual, for nine days. And the rest of the portents were duly expiated.[1]

XXXII. The consuls divided the armies between them. To Fabius fell the army at Teanum, formerly commanded by Marcus Junius, the dictator; to Sempronius the slave volunteers[2] who were at that place and twenty-five thousand of the allies. To Marcus Valerius, the praetor, were assigned the legions which had returned from Sicily. Marcus Claudius was sent as proconsul to the army which was above Suessula, in order to guard Nola. The praetors set out for Sicily and Sardinia. The consuls issued an edict that, whenever they might call a meeting of the senate, the senators and any who had the right to give an opinion in the senate[3] should assemble at the [3] In the present case the persons meant can only be the newly-elected magistrates, since the list has just been revised, and none can be waiting for a new lectio senatus. Cf. xxiii. 5.

A.U.C. 539

4 Capenam convenirent. Praetores quorum iuris dictio erat tribunalia ad Piscinam publicam posuerunt; eo vadimonia fieri iusserunt, ibique eo anno ius dictum est.

5 Interim Carthaginem, unde Mago, frater Hannibalis, duodecim milia peditum et mille[1] quingentos equites, viginti elephantos, mille argenti talenta in Italiam transmissurus erat cum praesidio sexaginta 6 navium longarum, nuntius adfertur in Hispania rem male gestam omnesque ferme eius provinciae populos 7 ad Romanos defecisse. Erant, qui Magonem cum classe ea copiisque omissa Italia in Hispaniam averterent, cum Sardiniae recipiendae repentina 8 spes adfulsit: parvum ibi exercitum Romanum esse; veterem praetorem inde A. Cornelium provinciae 9 peritum decedere, novum exspectari; ad hoc fessos iam animos Sardorum esse diuturnitate imperii Romani,[2] et proximo iis anno acerbe atque avare imperatum; gravi tributo et conlatione iniqua frumenti pressos: nihil deesse aliud quam auc to- 10 rem ad quem deficerent. Haec clandestina legatio per principes missa erat, maxime eam rem moliente Hampsicora, qui tum auctoritate atque opibus longe 11 primus erat. His nuntiis prope uno tempore turbati

[1] mille A^{γ} Alblus: om. $P(1)$.
[2] Romani Luchs: r P; om. $P^{2}(1)$.

---

[1] By this gate in the "Servian Wall" the Via Appia left the city, near the east end of the Circus Maximus. Meeting probably in the nearby Temple of Honos, the senate could confer with returning generals outside the city.

[2] This swimming-pool of uncertain location was also outside the gate.

Porta Capena.[1] The praetors who had judicial duties B.C. 216 set up their tribunals at the Piscina Publica.[2] That place should be named—so they ordered—in recognizances,[3] and there justice was rendered that year.

Meanwhile Carthage, from which Mago,[4] Hannibal's brother, was on the point of transporting into Italy twelve thousand infantry and fifteen hundred cavalry, twenty elephants and a thousand talents of silver, with a convoy of sixty warships, received the news that in Spain operations had failed and nearly all the tribes in that province had revolted to the Romans. There were some who, neglecting Italy, were ready to divert Mago to Spain with that fleet and those forces, when there suddenly appeared a ray of hope of recovering Sardinia. It was reported that the Roman army there was small; that the old praetor, Aulus Cornelius, who was well acquainted with the province, was retiring, and a new praetor expected; further, that the Sardinians were now weary of the long continuance of Roman rule, and in the previous year had been ruled with harshness and greed; that they were burdened by a heavy tribute and an unfair requisition of grain; that nothing was lacking but a leader to whom they might go over. Such was the report of a secret embassy sent by the leading men at the special instigation of Hampsicora, who at that time was far above the rest in prestige and wealth. By such news they were almost at the [3] The defendant was bound to give assurances (in one of the various forms prescribed by the praetor's edict) that he would appear on the day and at the place named—here at the Piscina instead of in the Forum.

[4] He had not yet gone to Spain, as was intended in xiii. 8.

A.U.C. 539

erectique Magonem cum classe sua copiisque in 12 Hispaniam mittunt, in Sardiniam Hasdrubalem deligunt ducem et tantum ferme copiarum quantum Magoni decernunt.

13 Et Romae consules transactis rebus quae in urbe
14 agendae erant movebant iam sese ad bellum. Ti. Sempronius militibus Sinuessam diem ad conveniendum edixit, et Q. Fabius, consulto prius senatu, ut frumenta omnes ex agris ante kal. Iunias primas in 15 urbes munitas conveherent; qui non invexisset eius se agrum populaturum, servos sub hasta venditurum, villas incensurum. Ne praetoribus quidem qui ad ius dicendum creati erant vacatio a belli administra-
16 tione data est. Valerium praetorem in Apuliam ire placuit ad exercitum a Terentio accipiendum; cum ex Sicilia legiones venissent, iis potissimum uti ad regionis eius praesidium, Terentianum exercitum
17 Tarentum [1] mitti cum aliquo legatorum; et viginti quinque naves datae quibus oram maritimam inter
18 Brundisium ac Tarentum tutari posset. Par navium numerus Q. Fulvio praetori urbano decretus ad
19 suburbana litora tutanda. C. Terentio proconsuli negotium datum ut in Piceno agro conquisitionem 20 militum haberet locisque iis praesidio esset. Et T. Otacilius Crassus, postquam aedem Mentis in Capitolio dedicavit, in Siciliam cum imperio qui classi praeesset missus.

[1] exercitum Tarentum Madvig: om. P(1)F.

---

[1] Either ripe or ripening, to be threshed in towns of such regions as were named in the order.

[2] In normal times short absences only from the city were permissible for the urbanus and the peregrinus.

same moment dejected and encouraged, and sent B.C. 215
Mago with his fleet and his forces to Spain. For Sardinia they chose Hasdrubal as general, and voted him about the same number of troops as to Mago.

And at Rome the consuls did what had to be done in the city, and were now bestirring themselves for the war. Tiberius Sempronius set his soldiers a date for mobilization at Sinuessa, and Quintus Fabius, after first consulting the senate, gave orders that all should bring their grain crops [1] from the farms into fortified cities before the next Kalends of June; that if any man should fail to do so, he would lay waste his farm, sell his slaves at auction and burn the farm buildings. Not even those praetors who had been appointed to administer justice [2] were granted exemption from the conduct of the war. It was decided that Valerius, the praetor, should go to Apulia, to take over the army from Terentius; that when the legions should arrive from Sicily, he should chiefly use these troops for the defence of that region; that Terentius' army should be sent to Tarentum under some one of the lieutenants. And twenty-five ships were given him, that with them he might be able to defend the coast between Brundisium and Tarentum. An equal number of ships was assigned by decree to Quintus Fulvius, the city praetor, for the defence of the shore near the city. Gaius Terentius as proconsul was given the task of conducting a levy of troops in the Picene territory and defending that region. And Titus Otacilius Crassus, after dedicating the Temple of Mens on the Capitol, was sent with full authority to Sicily, where he was to command the fleet.

A.U.C. 539

XXXIII. In hanc dimicationem duorum opulentissimorum in terris populorum omnes reges gentesque animos intenderant, inter quos Philippus Macedonum rex eo magis quod[1] propior Italiae ac mari tantum Ionio discretus erat. Is ubi primum fama accepit Hannibalem Alpis transgressum, ut bello inter Romanum Poenumque orto laetatus erat, ita utrius populi mallet victoriam esse incertis adhuc viribus fluctuatus animo fuerat. Postquam tertia iam pugna, tertia[2] victoria eum Poenis erat, ad fortunam inclinavit legatosque ad Hannibalem misit; qui vitantes portus Brundisinum Tarentinumque quia custodiis navium Romanarum tenebantur, ad Laciniae Iunonis templum in terram egressi sunt. Inde per Apuliam petentes Capuam media in praesidia Romana inlati sunt deductique ad Valerium Laevinum praetorem, circa Luceriam castra habentem. Ibi intrepide Xenophanes legationis princeps a Philippo rege se missum ait ad amicitiam societatemque iungendam cum populo Romano; mandata habere ad consules ac senatum populumque Romanum. Praetor[3] inter defectiones veterum sociorum nova societate tam clari regis laetus admodum hostes pro hospitibus comiter accepit; dat qui prosequantur, itinera cum cura demonstrent,[4] quae loca quosque saltus aut Romanus aut hostes teneant. Xenophanes per praesidia Romana in Campaniam,

[1] quod $P(1)F$: quo Aldus, Madvig.
[2] tertia M^1DAF: tertiam $P(4)$: tertium Conway.
[3] praetor A^2 Muretus: om. $P(1)F$ (i.e. pr. after r.).
[4] demonstrent $P(1)F$: demonstrat Gronovius (with et Luchs).

XXXIII. To this conflict of the two richest peoples B.C. 215 in the world all kings and nations had turned their attention, among them Philip, king of the Macedonians, all the more since he was nearer to Italy and separated from it only by the Ionian Sea. On first learning by report that Hannibal had crossed the Alps, although he had rejoiced at the outbreak of war between the Romans and the Carthaginians, still, as their resources were not yet known, he had wavered, uncertain which of the two peoples he wished to have the victory. Now that a third battle, a third victory, favoured the Carthaginians, he inclined to the side of success and sent ambassadors to Hannibal. These avoided the ports of Brundisium and Tarentum, because they were kept guarded by Roman ships, and landed at the Temple of Lacinian Juno.[1] Making their way thence toward Capua by way of Apulia, they encountered the centre of the Roman forces and were brought before Valerius Laevinus, the praetor, whose camp was near Luceria. There Xenophanes, the leader of the embassy, boldly said that he had been sent by King Philip to negotiate a friendly alliance with the Roman people; that he had communications for the consuls and for the senate and the Roman people. The praetor, who in the midst of the revolts of old allies was greatly delighted by a new alliance with so famous a king, hospitably received enemies as guests. He furnished men to escort them, to indicate the roads carefully, and what positions and what passes were held either by the Romans or by the enemy. Xenophanes made his way through the Roman forces into [1] A famous temple on a promontory near Croton; cf. XXIV. iii. 3 ff.; XLII. iii. 2 ff.; Strabo VI. i. 11.

A.U.C. 539

inde qua proximum fuit in castra Hannibalis pervenit foedusque cum eo atque amicitiam iungit legibus
10 his: ut Philippus rex quam maxima classe—ducentas autem naves videbatur effecturus—in Italiam traiceret et vastaret maritimam oram, bellum pro parte
11 sua terra marique gereret; ubi debellatum esset, Italia omnis cum ipsa urbe Roma Carthaginiensium atque Hannibalis esset praedaque omnis Hannibali
12 cederet; perdomita Italia navigarent in Graeciam bellumque cum quibus regi[1] placeret gererent[2]; quae civitates continentis quaeque insulae ad Macedoniam vergunt, eae Philippi regnique eius essent.

XXXIV. In has ferme leges inter Poenum ducem
2 legatosque Macedonum ictum foedus; missique cum iis ad regis ipsius firmandam fidem legati, Gisgo et Bostar et Mago, eodem, ad Iunonis Laciniae, ubi
3 navis occulta in statione erat, perveniunt. Inde profecti cum altum tenerent, conspecti a[3] classe Romana sunt quae praesidio erat Calabriae litoribus;
4 Valeriusque Flaccus cercuros ad persequendam retrahendamque navem cum misisset, primo fugere regii conati; deinde, ubi celeritate vinci senserunt, tradunt se Romanis et ad praefectum classis adducti,
5 cum quaereret qui et unde et quo tenderent cursum, Xenophanes primo satis iam semel felix mendacium struere, a Philippo se ad Romanos missum ad M.

[1] regi Gronovius: regibus $P(1)F$.
[2] placeret gererent A^2: placerent PC^1RM: placeret $CM^{1?}DAF$.
[3] a M^1A^x: om. $P(1)$.

Campania and thence by the shortest road to the B.C. 215 camp of Hannibal, and arranged a treaty of friendship with him on the following terms: that King Philip with the largest possible fleet—and it was thought that he would make it two hundred ships—should cross to Italy and ravage the coast, and should carry on the war on land and sea with all his might: that after the war was over all Italy with the city of Rome itself should belong to the Carthaginians and Hannibal, and all the booty fall to Hannibal: that after the complete subjugation of Italy they should sail to Greece and wage war with such enemies as the king might choose; and that such states on the mainland and such islands as face Macedonia should belong to Philip and be a part of his kingdom.

XXXIV. On terms such as these a treaty was made between the Carthaginian general and the ambassadors of the Macedonians. And Gisgo and Bostar and Mago, who were sent with them as ambassadors, to reassure the king himself, reached the same place, the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where a ship lay in a hidden anchorage. Setting out thence and making for the open sea, they were sighted by the Roman fleet which was defending the coasts of Calabria. And Valerius Flaccus sent light craft to pursue the ship and bring her back; whereupon the king's ambassadors at first attempted to flee. Then, when they saw that they were being outstripped in speed, they surrendered to the Romans and were brought before the admiral of the fleet. When he asked who they were and whence, and whither they were bound, Xenophanes at first set up the false pretence which had been quite successful once before: that, being sent by Philip to the Romans, he had made his way

A.U.C. 539

Valerium, ad quem unum iter tutum fuerit, pervenisse, Campaniam superare nequisse, saeptam
6 hostium praesidiis. Deinde, ut Punicus cultus habitusque suspectos legatos fecit Hannibalis inter-
7 rogatosque sermo prodidit, tum comitibus eorum seductis ac metu territis, litterae quoque ab Hannibale ad Philippum inventae et pacta inter regem
8 Macedonum Poenumque ducem. Quibus satis cognitis optimum visum est captivos comitesque eorum Romam ad senatum aut ad consules, ubicumque
9 essent, quam primum deportare. Ad id celerrimae quinque naves delectae ac L. Valerius Antias, qui praecesset, missus, eique mandatum ut in omnis navis legatos separatim custodiendos divideret daretque operam ne quod iis conloquium inter se neve quae communicatio consilii esset.

10 Per idem tempus Romae cum A. Cornelius Mammula, ex Sardinia provincia decedens, rettulisset qui status rerum in insula esset: bellum ac defectionem
11 omnis spectare; Q. Mucium, qui successisset sibi, gravitate caeli aquarumque advenientem exceptum, non tam in periculosum quam longum morbum
12 implicitum, diu ad belli munia sustinenda inutilem fore, exercitumque ibi ut satis firmum pacatae provinciae praesidem esse, ita parum[1] bello quod
13 motum iri videretur, decreverunt patres ut Q. Fulvius Flaccus quinque milia[2] peditum, quad-

[1] parum $P(1)F$: parvum $M^2?A^{vg}x$: imparem Madvig: parum aptum H. J. Müller.

[2] quinque milia (= $\bar{v}$) z: vel $PRMF$ (cf. xxxvii. 13; xlvi. 4): vi C^4: mille DA^2.

to Marcus Valerius, the one man to whom there was B.C. 215 a safe road; that he had been unable to get across Campania, which was blocked by the enemy's forces. Then, when Carthaginian dress and appearance cast suspicion on Hannibal's ambassadors, and, being questioned, they were betrayed by their speech. Thereupon their attendants were led aside and frightened by threats; and a letter also from Hannibal to Philip was found, along with agreements between the king of the Macedonians and the Carthaginian general. So much being established, it seemed best to send the captured men and their attendants as soon as possible to the senate at Rome, or else to the consuls, wherever they might be. For that purpose five very swift ships were selected and Lucius Valerius Antias was sent to command them. And instructions were given him to distribute the ambassadors among all his ships, to be separately guarded; and he was to see to it that there should be no conversation among them or any interchange of plans.

About the same time at Rome Aulus Cornelius Mammula, on retiring from his province of Sardinia, reported what was the condition of affairs in the island: that all were aiming at war and rebellion; that Quintus Mucius, his successor, upon arriving was affected by the unwholesome climate and bad water, and having contracted an illness not so dangerous as protracted, would for a long time be useless for the performance of war duties; also that the army there, while strong enough to garrison a peaceful province, was not so for the war which seemed on the point of breaking out. The senate thereupon decreed that Quintus Fulvius Flaccus should enlist five thousand ringentos equites scriberet eamque legionem primo quoque tempore in Sardiniam traiciendam curaret, 14 mitteretque cum imperio quem ipsi videretur, qui 15 rem gereret quoad Mucius convaluisset. Ad eam rem missus est T. Manlius Torquatus, qui bis consul et censor fuerat subegeratque in consulatu Sardos. 16 Sub idem fere tempus et a Carthagine in Sardiniam classis missa duce Hasdrubale, cui Calvo cognomen erat, foeda tempestate vexata ad Balearis insulas 17 deicitur, ibique—adeo non armamenta modo sed etiam alvei navium quassati erant—subductae naves dum reficiuntur aliquantum temporis triverunt.

A.U.C. 539

XXXV. In Italia cum post Cannensem pugnam, fractis partis alterius viribus, alterius mollitis animis, 2 segnius bellum esset, Campani per se adorti sunt rem Cumanam suae dicionis facere, primo sollicitantes ut ab Romanis deficerent; ubi id parum processit, dolum ad capiendos eos comparant. 3 Campanis omnibus statum sacrificium ad Hamas erat.[1] Eo senatum Campanum venturum certiores Cumanos fecerunt petieruntque ut et Cumanus eo senatus veniret ad consultandum communiter, ut eosdem uterque populus socios hostesque haberet; 4 praesidium ibi armatum se habituros, ne quid ab Romano Poenove periculi esset. Cumani, quamquam suspecta fraus erat, nihil abnuere, ita tegi fallax consilium posse rati.

[1] erat Madvig (before Campanis Weissenborn) : om. P(1).

---

[1] In his first consulship, 235 B.C.; cf. xxii. 7.

[2] To the north-east of Cumae. An inscription gives some clue to its location.

[3] Their plan to aid the consul against the Campanians.

infantry and four hundred cavalry, and should see B.C. 215 to it that that legion should be transported to Sardinia at the first opportunity; also that he should send whomever he thought best with full authority, to carry on the war until Mucius should recover. For that duty Titus Manlius Torquatus was sent, a man who had been consul twice and censor, and in his consulship had conquered the Sardinians.[1] About the same time a fleet which had been sent from Carthage also to Sardinia, under command of the Hasdrubal who was surnamed Calvus, was damaged by a terrible storm and driven to the Balearic Islands. And there the ships were beached, to such an extent had not only the rigging but also the hulls been injured; and while undergoing repairs they caused a considerable loss of time.

XXXV. In Italy, while the war was less active after the battle of Cannae, since the resources of one side had been broken and the spirit of the other sapped, the Campanians attempted without assistance to reduce the state of Cumae to subjection, at first tempting them to revolt from the Romans. When that failed, they contrived a ruse to entrap them. All the Campanians had a regular sacrifice at Hamae.[2] To it they informed the men of Cumae that the Campanian senate would come, and requested that the senate of Cumae should come thither to deliberate together, so that both peoples might have the same allies and enemies. They said they would have an armed guard there, lest there be any danger from the Roman or the Carthaginian. The Cumaeans, though they had suspected guile, made no objections, thinking that a ruse of their own[3] to outwit them could thus be concealed.

A.U.C. 539

5 Interim Ti. Sempronius consul Romanus Sinuessae, quo ad conveniendum diem edixerat, exercitu lustrato transgressus Volturnum flumen circa Liter-
6 num posuit castra. Ibi quia otiosa stativa erant, crebro decurrere milites cogebat, ut tirones—ea maxima pars volonum erant—adsuescerent signa
7 sequi et in acie agnoscere ordines suos. Inter quae maxima erat cura duci, itaque legatis tribunisque praeceperat, ne qua exprobratio cuiquam veteris fortunae discordiam inter ordines sereret; vetus miles tironi, liber voloni sese exaequari sineret;
8 omnis satis honestos generososque ducerent quibus arma sua signaque populus Romanus commisisset; quae fortuna coegisset ita fieri, eandem cogere
9 tueri factum. Ea non maiore cura praecepta ab ducibus sunt quam a militibus observata, brevique tanta concordia coaluerant omnium animi ut prope in oblivionem veniret qua ex condicione quisque esset miles factus.

10 Haec agenti Graccho legati Cumani nuntiarunt quae a Campanis legatio paucos ante dies venisset
11 et quid iis ipsi respondissent: triduo post eum diem festum esse; non senatum solum omnem ibi futurum
12 sed castra etiam et exercitum Campanum. Gracchus iussis Cumanis omnia ex agris in urbem convehere

Meanwhile Tiberius Sempronius, the Roman consul, B.C. 215 after reviewing his army at Sinuessa, at which place he had announced a date for mobilization, crossed the river Volturnus and pitched camp near Liternum. There, since the permanent camp lacked occupation, he required the soldiers to manœuvre frequently, that the recruits—they were most of the slave-volunteers—might learn to follow the standards and to recognize their own ranks in the battle-line. In this it was the commander's greatest care, and he had instructed the lieutenants and tribunes to the same effect, that no reproach of any man's previous lot should sow strife between the different classes of soldiers; that the old soldier should allow himself to be rated with the recruit, the freeman with the slave-volunteer; that they should consider all to whom the Roman people had entrusted its arms and standards as sufficiently honoured and well-born. He said that the same fortune which had compelled them to do so now compelled them to defend what had been done. These injunctions were not given with greater care by the commanders than that with which they were followed by the soldiers. And soon they were all united in a harmony so great that it was almost forgotten from what status each man had been made a soldier.

While Gracchus was thus employed, legates from Cumae reported to him on what mission an embassy had come a few days before from the Campanians, and what answer they had themselves given them; that the festival was to be three days later, and not only would the whole senate be there, but a camp also and a Campanian army. Gracchus, having ordered the Cumaeans to bring everything from the et manere intra muros, ipse pridie quam statum sacrificium Campanis esset Cumas movet castra.

A.U.C. 539

13 Hamae inde tria milia passuum absunt. Iam Campani eo frequentes ex composito convenerant, nec procul inde in occulto Marius Alfius medix tuticus—is [1] summus magistratus erat Campanis—cum
14 quattuordecim milibus armatorum habebat castra, sacrificio adparando et inter id instruendae fraudi aliquanto intentior quam muniendis castris aut ulli
15 militari operi.[2] Nocturnum erat sacrum, ita ut ante
16 mediam noctem compleretur. Huic Gracchus insidiandum tempori ratus, custodibus ad portas positis, ne quis enuntiare posset coepta, et ab decuma diei hora coactis militibus corpora curare somnoque
17 operam dare, ut primis tenebris convenire ad signum
18 possent, vigilia ferme prima tolli iussit signa, silentique profectus agmine cum ad Hamas media nocte pervenisset, castra Campana ut in pervigilio negleeta simul omnibus portis invadit; alios somno stratos, alios perpetrato sacro inermis redeuntis obtruncat.
19 Hominum eo tumultu nocturno caesa plus duo milia cum ipso duce Mario Alfio, capta . . . et [3] signa militaria quattuor et triginta.

[1] is Fabri: om. P(1).

[2] operi, here P(1) add triduum sacrificatum ad Hamas (gloss on § 11?)

[3] capta . . . et Weissenborn: capta est PCR: capta sunt R1; capti * et Madvig.

---

[1] For this Oscan term cf. XXIV. xix. 2.

farms into the city and to remain inside the walls, B.C. 215 moved his own camp to Cumae the day before the Campanians had their regular sacrifice. Hamae is three miles distant. Already the Campanians in large numbers had gathered there according to agreement. And in concealment, not far from there, Marius Alfius, the medix tuticus,[1] that is, the chief magistrate of the Campanians, had his camp, with fourteen thousand armed men, he being decidedly more intent upon preparing the sacrifice and contriving treachery during the same than upon fortifying his camp or upon any task of the soldier. The sacrifice took place at night, but it was to be finished before midnight. Gracchus, thinking he must be in waiting for that moment, placed guards at the gates, that no one might be able to carry away news of his undertaking. And having assembled his soldiers as early as the tenth hour of the day, he ordered them to get themselves in condition and take care to sleep, so that, as soon as it was dark, they might come together at the signal; and at about the first watch he ordered that the standards be taken up. And setting out with a silent column, he reached Hamae at midnight and entered the Campanian camp by all its gates at once; for, as was to be expected in view of the vigil, it was carelessly guarded. Some they slew as they lay asleep, others as they were returning unarmed after the rite had been completed. More than two thousand men were slain in that affray by night, including Marius Alfius, the commander himself. Captured were . . . thousand men[2] and thirty-four military standards.

[2] The large number makes the correctness of capta (sc. milia) doubtful; cf. xxxvii. 11.

A.V.C. 539

XXXVI. Graechus minus centum militum iactura castris hostium potitus Cumas se propere recepit, ab Hannibale metuens, qui super Capuam in Tifatis
2 habebat castra. Nec eum provida futuri fefellit opinio. Nam simul Capuam ea clades est nuntiata, ratus Hannibal ab re bene gesta insolenter laetum exercitum tironum, magna ex parte servorum, spoliantem victos praedasque agentem ad Hamas
3 se inventurum, citatum agmen praeter Capuam rapit, obviosque ex fuga Campanorum dato praesidio
4 Capuam duci, saucios vehiculis portari iubet. Ipse Hamis vacua ab hostibus castra nec quicquam praeter recentis vestigia caedis strataque passim corpora
5 sociorum invenit. Auctores erant quidam ut protinus inde Cumas duceret urbemque oppugnaret.
6 Id quamquam haud modice Hannibal cupiebat, ut, quia Neapolim non potuerat, Cumas saltem maritimam urbem haberet, tamen, quia praeter arma nihil secum miles raptim acto agmine extulerat,
7 retro in castra super Tifata se recepit. Inde fatigatus Campanorum precibus sequenti die cum omni apparatu oppugnandae urbis Cumas redit, perpopulatoque agro Cumano mille passus ab urbe castra
8 locat, cum Graechus magis verecundia in tali necessitate deserendi socios implorantis fidem suam populique Romani substitisset quam satis fidens exercitui.
9 Nec alter consul Fabius, qui ad Cales castra habebat, Volturnum flumen traducere audebat exercitum,

XXXVI. Graechus, having captured the camp of B.C. 215 the enemy with the loss of less than a hundred soldiers, hastily withdrew to Cumae in fear of Hannibal, who had his camp on Mount Tifata above Capua. And he was not mistaken in his forecast. For as soon as the defeat was reported at Capua, Hannibal, thinking he would find the army of recruits, largely slaves, at Hamae gloating for once over a success, spoiling the defeated and driving off the booty, rushed his column with all speed past Capua, and ordered that those of the fleeing Campanians whom he met should be furnished with an escort and led to Capua, and the wounded carried on wagons. As for himself, he found at Hamae a camp deserted by the enemy, and nothing except the traces of recent slaughter and corpses of his allies scattered everywhere. Some advised him to lead his troops away forthwith to Cumae and to attack the city. Although Hannibal was very eager to do so, in order that he might have Cumae at least as a seaport, since he had been unable to gain one at Neapolis, nevertheless, as his soldiers in their rapidly moving column had brought out nothing but their arms with them, he withdrew again to his camp on Tifata. Moved by the importunities of the Campanians, he returned thence on the following day to Cumae with all the equipment for besieging the city, and after ravaging the territory of Cumae, pitched his camp a mile from the city. Meanwhile Graechus, ashamed to desert allies in such straits and begging for his help and that of the Roman people, rather than because he had full confidence in his army, had remained there. Nor did the other consul, Fabius, who had his camp at Cales, venture to lead his army across the river Volturnus, being

A.U.C. 539 10 occupatus primo auspiciis repetendis, dein prodigiis quae alia super alia nuntiabantur; expiantique ea haud facile litari haruspices respondebant.

XXXVII. Eae causae cum Fabium tenerent, Sempronius in obsidione erat et iam operibus oppugna- 2 batur. Adversus ligneam ingentem admotam urbi turrem aliam[1] ex ipso muro excitavit consul Romanus, aliquanto altiorem, quia muro satis per se alto 3 subiectis validis sublicis pro solo usus erat. Inde primum saxis sudibusque et ceteris missilibus propugnatores moenia atque urbem tuebantur; 4 postremo, ubi promovendo adiunctam muro viderunt turrem, facibus ardentibus plurimum simul ignem 5 coniecerunt. Quo incendio trepida armatorum multitudo cum de turre sese praecipitaret, eruptio ex oppido simul duabus portis stationes hostium fudit fugavitque in castra, ut eo die obsesso quam obsidenti 6 similior esset Poenus. Ad mille trecenti Carthaginiensium caesi et undesexaginta vivi capti, qui circa muros et in stationibus solute ac neglegenter agentes, cum nihil minus quam eruptionem timuis- 7 sent, ex improviso oppressi fuerant. Gracchus, priusquam se hostes ab repentino pavore colligerent, receptui signum dedit ac suos intra muros recepit. 8 Postero die Hannibal, laetum[2] secunda re consulem iusto proelio ratus certaturum, aciem inter castra employed at first in taking new auspices and then B.C. 215 with the portents which were being reported one after another. And as he was making expiation, the soothsayers kept repeating their opinion that it was not easy to obtain favourable omens.

[1] turrem aliam Madvig: aliam turrem P(1).

[2] laetum Gronovius: etum P(4): elatum Aldus (after re A^2x): tum P^3C^xD: cum A.

XXXVII. While these reasons detained Fabius, Sempronius was blockaded and already beset by siege-works. As a defence against a great wooden tower which was moved up to the city, the Roman consul reared from the wall itself another tower considerably higher. For he had used the wall, which in itself was quite high, as a base, shoring it up with stout timbers. From that tower the defenders first held the wall and the city by hurling stones and stakes and every other missile. Finally, seeing that the enemy's tower had been pushed close against the wall, they hurled a vast amount of fire all at once from their blazing torches. While great numbers of armed men, alarmed by the fire, were leaping down from the tower, a sally out of two gates of the town at the same time routed the enemy's guards and sent them in flight to the camp, so that on that day the Carthaginian resembled a besieged army more than a besieger. About one thousand and three hundred were slain and fifty-nine captured alive of the Carthaginians, who were relaxing and idling along the walls and at guard-posts, and, having feared anything rather than a sally, had unexpectedly been overpowered. Graechus, before the enemy could recover from their sudden fright, gave the signal for the recall and withdrew his men inside the walls. On the next day Hannibal, supposing that the consul, elated by success, would engage in a regular battle, drew up his line between the camp and the city.

A.U.C. 539

9 atque urbem instruxit; ceterum postquam neminem moveri ab solita custodia urbis vidit nec committi quicquam temerariae spei, ad Tifata redit infecta re.

10 Quibus diebus Cumae liberatae sunt obsidione, iisdem diebus et in Lucanis ad Grumentum Ti. Sempronius, cui Longo cognomen erat, cum Han-
11 none Poeno prospere pugnat. Supra duo milia hominum occidit, et ducentos octoginta milites,[1] signa militaria ad quadraginta unum cepit. Pulsus finibus Lucanis Hanno retro in Bruttios sese recepit.
12 Et ex Hirpinis oppida tria, quae a populo Romano defecerant, vi recepta per M. Valerium praetorem, Vercellium, Vescellium, Sicilinum, et auctores defec-
13 tionis securi percussi. Supra quinque milia[2] captivorum sub hasta venierunt; praeda alia militi concessa, exercitusque Luceriam reductus.

XXXVIII. Dum haec in Lucanis atque in Hirpinis geruntur, quinque naves, quae Macedonum atque Poenorum captos legatos Romam portabant, ab supero mari ad inferum circumvectae prope omnem
2 Italiae oram, cum praeter Cumas velis ferrentur neque hostium an sociorum essent satis sciretur,
3 Graechus obviam ex classe sua naves misit. Cum percunctando invicem cognitum esset consulem Cumis esse, naves Cumas adpulsae captivique ad consulem
4 deducti et litterae datae. Consul litteris Philippi atque Hannibalis perlectis consignata omnia ad senatum itinere terrestri misit, navibus devehi

[1] milites, here P(1) add amisit.
[2] quinque milia Alschefski: vel (for v̄) P(2): cf. xxxiv. 13.

---

[1] This Sempronius was consul with P. Scipio in 218 B.C., and defeated by Hannibal at the Trebia; XXI. vi. 3 and liv ff.
[2] I.e. from the Adriatic to the Mare Tuscum; cf. i. 5; xxiv. 8.

But on seeing that no one stirred from the usual B.C. 215 defence of the city and that nothing was entrusted to a rash hope, he returned with nothing accomplished to Tifata.

At the same time that the siege of Cumae was raised, Tiberius Sempronius, surnamed Longus,[1] also fought successfully in Lucania, near Grumentum, with Hanno the Carthaginian. He slew above two thousand men, and captured two hundred and eighty soldiers and some forty-one military standards. Driven out of Lucanian territory, Hanno withdrew into the land of the Bruttians. And three towns of the Hirpini, Vercellium, Vescellium and Sicilinum, which had revolted from the Roman people, were forcibly recovered by Marcus Valerius, the praetor, and those who had advised revolt were beheaded. Over five thousand captives were sold at auction; the rest of the booty was given over to the soldiers, and the army led back to Luceria.

XXXVIII. While these things were going on in Lucania and among the Hirpini, the five ships which were carrying to Rome the captured ambassadors of the Macedonians and the Carthaginians cruised along nearly the whole coast of Italy from the Upper Sea to the Lower.[2] And when they were passing Cumae under sail, and it was uncertain whether they belonged to enemies or friends, Graechus sent ships from his fleet to meet them. When in the course of questioning on both sides it was learned that the consul was at Cumae, the ships put in at Cumae and the prisoners were brought before the consul and the letters handed over to him. The consul, after reading the letters of Philip and Hannibal, sent everything under seal by land to the senate, and ordered the

A.U.C. 539

5 legatos iussit. Cum eodem fere die litterae legatique Romam venissent et pernunctatione facta dicta cum scriptis congruerent, primo gravis cura patres incessit, cernentes quanta vix tolerantibus Punicum
6 bellum Macedonici belli moles instaret. Cui tamen adeo non succubuerunt ut extemplo agitaretur quem ad modum ultro inferendo bello averterent ab Italia
7 hostem. Captivis in vincula condi iussis comitibusque eorum sub hasta venditis, ad naves viginti quinque, quibus P. Valerius Flaccus praefectus praecerat,
8 viginti quinque[1] parari[2] alias decernunt. His comparatis deductisque et additis quinque navibus,
9 quae advexerant captivos legatos, triginta naves ab Ostia Tarentum profectae, inssusque P. Valerius militibus Varronianis, quibus L. Apustius legatus Tarenti praecerat, in naves impositis quinquaginta quinque navium classe non tueri modo Italiae oram
10 sed explorare de Macedonico bello; si congruentia litteris legatorumque indiciis Philippi consilia essent, ut M. Valerium praetorem litteris certiorem faceret, 11 isque L. Apustio legato exercitui praeposito Tarentum ad classem profectus primo quoque tempore in Macedoniam transmitteret daretque operam ut
12 Philippum in regno contineret. Pecunia ad classem tuendam bellumque Macedonicum ea decreta est quae Ap. Claudio in Siciliam missa erat, ut redderetur ambassadors to be carried on the ships. Letters B.C. 215 and ambassadors arrived at Rome on about the same day, and upon enquiry their words and the texts were in agreement. Thereupon the senators were at first gravely concerned, seeing how serious a war with Macedonia threatened, at a time when they could scarcely endure that with the Carthaginians. However, they were so far from giving way to that concern that they at once discussed how by actual aggressive warfare they might keep the enemy away from Italy. The prisoners were ordered put in chains, their attendants were sold at auction, and it was decreed that, in addition to the twenty-five ships which Publius Valerius Flaccus commanded as admiral, twenty-five others should be made ready. The latter being now ready and launched, with the addition of the five ships which had brought the ambassadors as captives, thirty ships sailed from Ostia for Tarentum. And Publius Valerius was ordered to put on board the soldiers who had been Varro's, and at Tarentum were commanded by Lucius Apustius, the lieutenant, and then with a fleet of fifty-five [1] ships not merely to defend the coast of Italy, but to get information in regard to the Macedonian war. If the designs of Philip should agree with the letters and with the statements of the ambassadors, then he was to inform Marcus Valerius, the praetor, by letter; and Valerius, after placing his lieutenant, Lucius Apustius, in command of the army, was to proceed to the fleet at Tarentum, and as soon as possible to cross into Macedonia and take steps to keep Philip within his kingdom. For the maintenance of the fleet and for the Macedonian war there was voted the money which had been sent to Appius Claudius in Sicily, to

[1] quinque Jac. Gronovius : om. P(1).
[2] parari M^2 Gronovius : paratis P(1).

[1] The total should be fifty; the five which carried the captives are counted twice; cf. xxxiv. 9.

A.U.C. 539

Hieroni regi: ea per L. Antistium legatum Tarentum
13 est devecta. Simul ab Hierone missa ducenta milia modium tritici et hordei centum.

XXXIX. Dum haec Romani parant aguntque, ad Philippum captiva navis una, ex iis quae Romam missae erant, ex cursu refugit: inde scitum legatos
2 cum litteris captos. Itaque ignarus rex quae cum Hannibale legatis suis convenissent quaeque legati eius ad se adlaturi fuissent, legationem aliam cum
3 eisdem mandatis mittit. Legati ad Hannibalem missi Heraclitus, cui Scotino cognomen erat,[1] et Crito Boeotus et Sositheus Magnes. Hi prospere tulerunt
4 ac rettulerunt mandata; sed prius se aestas circumegit quam movere ac moliri quicquam rex posset: tantum navis una capta cum legatis momenti fecit ad dilationem imminentis Romanis belli.

5 Et circa Capuam, transgresso Volturnum Fabio post expiata tandem prodigia, ambo consules rem
6 gerebant. Combulteriam et Trebulam et Austiculam urbes, quae ad Poenum defecerant, Fabius vi cepit: praesidiaque in his Hannibalis Campanique
7 permulti capti. Et Nolae,[2] sicut priore anno, senatus Romanorum, plebs Hannibalis erat, consiliaque

[1] cui . . . erat spurious according to Gronovius.
[2] et Nolae $P(2)A^{y}$: Nolae M^{1}.

---

[1] Pay for the soldiers had been lent by him in the previous year; cf. xxi. 5. His successor presently took the Carthaginian side: XXIV. vi f.

[2] Cf. xxxiv. 8 f.

[3] This term ("The Obscure") had been applied to the early philosopher of Ephesus of the same name, ca. 500 B.C. A pointless marginal note may have got into the text here, displacing the adjective of place which would be expected with this unknown Heraclitus.

be repaid to king Hiero.[1] This money was carried B.C. 215 to Tarentum by Lucius Antistius, the lieutenant. At the same time two hundred thousand pecks of wheat and a hundred thousand of barley were sent by Hiero.

XXXIX. While the Romans were engaged in these preparations and activities, the one captured ship escaped while under weigh from those which had been sent to Rome,[2] and returned to Philip. Thus it became known that the ambassadors had been captured with the letter. And so the king, not knowing what had been agreed upon between his ambassadors and Hannibal, and what message the latter's ambassadors were to have brought to him, sent another embassy with the same instructions. As ambassadors to Hannibal there were sent Heraclitus, surnamed Scotinus,[3] and Crito, the Boeotian, and Sositheus, of Magnesia. These succeeded in carrying and in bringing back instructions; but the summer was over before the king could make any active preparations. So effectual was the capture of a single ship and ambassadors in postponing a war which threatened the Romans.

Also in the vicinity of Capua both consuls were carrying on the war, now that Fabius, after finally making atonement for the prodigies,[4] had crossed the Volturnus. The cities of Combulteria and Trebula and Austicula, which had revolted to the Carthaginian, were forcibly taken by Fabius, and in them Hannibal's garrisons and very many Campanians were captured. And at Nola, just as in the previous year, the senate sided with the Romans, the common people with Hannibal, and secret plans were being formed for the [4] Mentioned in xxxi. 15.

A.U.C. 539

occulta de caede principum et proditione urbis
8 inibantur. Quibus ne incepta procederent, inter Capuam castraque Hannibalis, quae in Tifatis erant, traducto exercitu Fabius super Suessulam in castris Claudianis consedit; inde M. Marcellum propraetorem cum iis copiis quas habebat Nolam in praesidium misit.

XL. Et in Sardinia res per T. Manlium praetorem administrari coeptae, quae omissae erant postquam Q. Mucius praetor gravi morbo est implicitus.
2 Manlius navibus longis ad Carales subductis navalibusque sociis armatis, ut terra rem gereret, et a praetore exercitu accepto duo et viginti milia
3 peditum, mille ducentos equites confecit. Cum his equitum peditumque copiis profectus in agrum hostium haud procul ab Hampsicorae castris castra posuit. Hampsicora tum forte profectus erat in Pellitos Sardos ad iuventutem armandam, qua
4 copias augeret; filius nomine Hostus castris praeerat. Is adulescentia ferox temere proelio inito fusus fugatusque. Ad tria milia Sardorum eo proelio
5 caesa, octingenti ferme vivi capti; alius exercitus primo per agros silvasque fuga palatus, dein, quo ducem fugisse fama erat, ad urbem nomine Cornum,
6 caput eius regionis, confugit; debellatumque eo proelio in Sardinia esset, ni classis Punica cum duce

---

[1] Cf. xxxi. 3 and 5; xlvi. 9.

[2] Really proconsul; cf. xxx. 18; xxxii. 2; xlviii. 2.

[3] Acting in place of the regular praetor; cf. xxxiv. 15.

[4] Regularly called socii navales, from the time when seamen and oarsmen were allies, while the soldiers on board were Romans.

murder of the leading men and the betrayal of the city. That their undertaking should go no farther, Fabius led his army between Capua and the camp of Hannibal, which was on Tifata, and established himself above Suessula in the Claudian Camp.[1] From there he sent Marcus Marcellus, the propraetor,[2] with the forces which he had to Nola, to serve as a garrison. B.C. 215

XL. And in Sardinia under the direction of Titus Manlius, the praetor,[3] the operations which had been neglected ever since Quintus Mucius, the praetor, was attacked by a serious malady, were resumed. Manlius, after beaching his warships at Carales and arming their crews,[4] in order to wage war on land, and receiving an army from the praetor, made up a total of twenty-two thousand infantry and twelve hundred cavalry. With these cavalry and infantry forces he set out for the enemy's territory and pitched camp not far from the camp of Hampsicora. At that time Hampsicora, as it happened, had gone to the region of the Skin-clad Sardinians,[5] to arm their young men, in order to enlarge his forces. His son named Hostus was in command of the camp. He with the overconfidence of youth rashly went into battle, was routed and put to flight. About three thousand Sardinians were slain in that battle, some eight hundred taken alive. The rest of the army, at first wandering in flight through the farms and woods, then fled to the place to which it was reported that the commander had fled, a city named Cornus, the capital of that region. And the war in Sardinia would have been ended by that battle, had not the [5] An earlier population living in the mountainous interior of the island and wearing goat-skins.

A.U.C. 539 Hasdrubale, quae tempestate deiecta ad Baliaris erat, 7 in tempore ad spem rebellandi advenisset. Manlius post famam adpulsae Punicae classis Carales se recepit: ea occasio Hampsicorae data est Poeno se
8 iungendi. Hasdrubal, copiis in terram expositis et classe remissa Carthaginem, duce Hampsicora ad sociorum populi Romani agrum populandum profectus Carales perventurus erat, ni Manlius obvio exercitu ab effusa cum populatione continuisset.
9 Primo castra castris modico intervallo sunt obiecta; deinde per[1] procursationes levia certamina vario eventu inita; postremo descensum in aciem. Signis conlatis insto proelio per quattuor horas pugnatum.
10 Diu pugnam ancipitem Poeni, Sardis facile vinci adsuetis, fecerunt; postremo et ipsi, cum omnia circa strage ac fuga Sardorum repleta essent, fusi;
11 ceterum terga dantes circumducto cornu quo pepulerat Sardos inclusit Romanus. Caedes inde magis
12 quam pugna fuit. Duodecim milia hostium caesa, Sardorum simul Poenorumque, ferme tria milia et septingenti capti et signa militaria septem et viginti.

XLI. Ante omnia claram et memorabilem pugnam fecit Hasdrubal imperator captus et Hanno et Mago,
2 nobiles Carthaginienses. Mago ex gente Barcina, propinqua cognatione Hannibali iunctus, Hanno

[1] deinde per Madvig: deinceps P(1).

Carthaginian fleet commanded by Hasdrubal, which B.C. 215 had been carried by a storm to the Balearic Islands, arrived at the right moment to revive hopes for the rebellion. Manlius, when the arrival of the Punic fleet was reported, withdrew to Carales. By so doing he gave Hampsicora the opportunity to unite with the Carthaginian. Hasdrubal, after landing his forces and sending the fleet back to Carthage, set out with Hampsicora as his guide to lay waste the lands of allies of the Roman people. And he would have reached Carales, had not Manlius by confronting him with an army restrained him from his widespread devastation. At first camp faced camp at no great distance. Then charges led to skirmishes with varying results. Finally they went into line of battle. With standards against standards they fought a regular engagement for four hours. For a long time the Carthaginians made the issue uncertain, while the Sardinians were used to being easily defeated. Finally, when the slain and the fleeing Sardinians had covered the whole field, the Carthaginians also were routed. But when they tried to flee, the Roman general hemmed them in by a flank movement of the wing with which he had beaten back the Sardinians. It was a slaughter after that, rather than a battle. Twelve thousand of the enemy were slain, Sardinians and Carthaginians reckoned together. About three thousand seven hundred were captured, and twenty-seven military standards.

XLI. What more than all made it a famous and memorable battle was the capture of Hasdrubal, the commander, and Hanno and Mago, Carthaginian nobles, Mago being of the Barca family and nearly related to Hannibal, while Hanno had advised the auctor rebellionis Sardis bellique eius haud dubie

A.U.C. 539

3 conciitor. Nec Sardorum duces minus nobilem eam pugnam cladibus suis fecerunt: nam et filius Hampsicorae Hostus in acie cecidit, et Hampsicora cum
4 paucis equitibus fugiens, ut super adflictas res necem quoque filii audivit, nocte, ne cuius interventus
5 coepta impediret, mortem sibi conscivit. Ceteris urbs Cornus eadem quae ante fugae receptaculum fuit; quam Manlius victore exercitu adgressus intra
6 dies paucos recepit. Deinde aliae quoque civitates, quae ad Hampsicoram Poenosque defecerant, obsidibus datis dediderunt sese; quibus stipendio frumentoque imperato pro cuiusque aut viribus aut
7 delicto Carales exercitum reduxit. Ibi navibus longis deductis inpositoque quem secum advexerat milite Romam navigat Sardiniamque perdomitam nuntiat patribus; et stipendium quaestoribus, frumentum aedilibus, captivos Q. Fulvio praetori tradit.

8 Per idem tempus T. Otacilius praetor ab Lilybaeo classi in Africam transvectus depopulatusque agrum
9 Carthaginiensem, cum Sardiniam inde peteret, quo fama erat Hasdrubalem a Balearibus nuper traiecisse, classi Africam repetenti occurrit, levique certamine in alto commisso septem inde naves cum sociis navalibus cepit. Ceteras metus haud secus quam tempestas passim disiecit.

Sardinians to rebel and had undoubtedly fomented B.C. 215 that war. And the Sardinians' generals made the battle no less notable by their deaths. For Hostus, the son of Hampsicora, fell in battle, and also Hampsicora as he fled with a few horsemen, on hearing, not of the defeat only, but also of the death of his son, took his own life, doing this at night, that no one might come upon him and interfere with his attempt. For all the rest the same city of Cornus was a place of refuge, as before. Manlius with his victorious army attacked it and took it within a few days. Then other cities also which had revolted to Hampsicora and the Carthaginians gave hostages and surrendered. From these cities Manlius exacted tribute and grain in proportion to the resources of each or its guilt, and led his army back to Carales. There he launched his warships, took on board the soldiers he had brought with him, sailed for Rome, and reported to the senate the complete subjugation of Sardinia. He also turned over the tribute to the quaestors, the grain to the aediles, the captives to Quintus Fulvius, the praetor.

About the same time Titus Otacilius, the praetor,[1] sailed with his fleet from Lilybaeum across to Africa, and after laying waste the country about Carthage, was steering thence toward Sardinia, to which it was reported that Hasdrubal had recently crossed from the Balearic Islands, when he encountered the fleet returning to Africa; and in a slight engagement fought in open water he captured seven of their ships together with their crews. The rest were widely scattered by their fear quite as much as they had been by the storm.

[1] Here = praefectus, commander of the fleet.

A.U.C. 539
10 Per eosdem forte dies et Bomilcar cum militibus ad supplementum Carthagine missis elephantisque 11 et commeatu Locros accessit. Quem ut incautum opprimeret, Ap. Claudius per simulationem provinciae circumeundae Messanam raptim exercitu 12 ducto vento aestuque suo[1] Locros traiecit. Iam inde Bomilcar ad Hannonem in Bruttios profectus erat, et Locrenses portas Romanis clauserunt; Appius magno conatu nulla re gesta Messanam repetit.
13 Eadem aestate Marcellus ab Nola, quam praesidio obtinebat, crebras excursiones in agrum Hirpinum 14 et Samnites Caudinos fecit adeoque omnia ferro atque igni vastavit ut antiquarum cladium Samnio memoriam renovaret. XLII. Itaque extemplo legati ad Hannibalem missi simul ex utraque gente ita Poenum adlocuti sunt: "Hostes populi Romani,
2 Hannibal, fuimus primum per nos ipsi quoad nostra arma, nostrae vires nos tutari poterant. Postquam his parum fidebamus, Pyrrho regi nos adiunximus; 3 a quo relicti pacem necessariam accepimus, fuimusque in ea per annos prope quinquaginta ad id tempus quo 4 tu in Italiam venisti. Tua nos non magis virtus fortunaque quam unica comitas ac benignitas erga cives nostros, quos captos nobis remisisti, ita con ciliavit tibi ut te salvo atque incolumi amico non modo populum Romanum sed ne deos quidem iratos,
5 si fas est dici, timeremus. At hercule non solum

[1] vento aestuque suo Weissenborn: aestuquaesuo PR: aestuque suo R^1?(7).

---

[1] In the Samnite Wars, as narrated in books VII to X, especially their defeats at Suessula, 343 B.C., and at Sentinum, 295.

[2] The speech is, of course, that of their leader.

About the same time, moreover, as it happened, B.C. 215
Bomilcar arrived at Locri with the soldiers sent as reinforcements from Carthage and with elephants and supplies. In order to take him unawares Appius Claudius, with the pretence of making the round of his province, led his army in haste to Messana, and with wind and current in his favour crossed over to Locri. Already Bomilcar had left that place, to join Hanno among the Bruttii, and the Locrians closed their gates against the Romans. Appius, having accomplished nothing by his great effort, returned to Messana.

The same summer Marcellus from Nola, which he held with a garrison, made frequent raids into the country of the Hirpini and the Samnites about Caudium and laid waste the whole region with fire and sword so completely that he revived the Samnites' memory of their old disasters.[1] XLII. Accordingly ambassadors were sent at once to Hannibal from both tribes, and they addressed the Carthaginian thus:[2] "We were enemies of the Roman people, Hannibal, at first by ourselves, so long as our arms and our resources were able to defend us. When we had lost confidence in these, we attached ourselves to Pyrrhus, the king. Abandoned by him we accepted an inevitable peace, and have remained in that peace for about fifty years, down to the time when you came to Italy. It is not more your courage and success than your singular kindness and consideration toward our citizens, whom you captured and then sent back to us, that so won us over to you that, so long as you were a friend safe and sound, we not only did not fear the Roman people, but not even the anger of the gods, if it is right to say so. But in fact, incolumi et victore sed praesente te, cum ploratum prope coniugum ac liberorum nostrorum exaudire et flagrantia tecta posses conspicere, ita sumus aliquotiens hac aestate devastati ut M. Marcellus, non Hannibal, vicisse ad Cannas videatur, glorianturque Romani te, ad unum modo ictum vigentem, velut

A.U.C. 539

6 aculeo emisso torpere. Per annos centum [1] cum populo Romano bellum gessimus, nullo externo adiuti nec duce nec exercitu, nisi quod per biennium Pyrrhus nostro magis milite suas auxit vires quam
7 suis viribus nos defendit. Non ego secundis rebus nostris gloriabor, duos consules ac duos consulares exercitus ab nobis sub iugum missos, et si qua alia
8 aut laeta aut gloriosa nobis evenerunt. Quae aspera adversaque tunc acciderunt minore indignatione re-
9 ferre possumus quam quae hodie eveniunt. Magni dictatores cum magistris equitum, bini consules cum binis consularibus exercitibus ingrediebantur finis nostros: ante explorato et subsidiis positis et sub
10 signis ad populandum ducebant; nunc propraetoris unius et parvi ad tuendam Nolam praesidii praeda sumus; iam ne manipulatim quidem sed latronum modo percursant totis finibus nostris neglegentius
11 quam si in Romano vagarentur agro. Causa autem haec est quod neque tu defendis et nostra iuventus, quae si domi esset tutaretur, omnis sub signis militat
12 tuis. Nec te nec exercitum tuum norim nisi, a quo

[1] centum x: prope centum A^2x: om. P(1).

[1] E.g. Papirius Cursor, VIII. xxix ff.; again IX. xxxviii; five times consul.

[2] In disparagement of Marcellus, a proconsul; cf. xliii. 12.

while you are not merely safe and victorious, but also B.C. 215 here present, although you could almost hear the wailing of our wives and children and could see the blazing houses, we have been so ravaged several times this summer that Marcus Marcellus, not Hannibal, appears to have been the victor at Cannae, and the Romans are boasting that you, having strength for but a single stroke, are inactive, as if you had spent your sting. For a hundred years we waged war with the Roman people, unaided either by commander or army from abroad, except that for two years Pyrrhus did not so much defend us with his resources as enlarge these by adding our soldiers. I shall not boast of our successes, that two consuls and two consular armies were sent under the yoke by us, nor of any other events which have brought us either joy or fame. But the hardships and defeats which then befel us we can relate with less indignation than the things that are happening today. Great dictators[1] and masters of the horse, two consuls and two consular armies, used each time to enter our territory. After first reconnoitring and posting reserves, and in regular array they would lead out for a raid. But now we are the prey of a single propractor[2] and a small garrison assigned to the defence of Nola. Already they roam over our whole territory, not even in maniples, but after the manner of brigands, with less caution than if they were wandering in the country around Rome. The reason moreover is this: that you are not defending us, and at the same time our young men, who would be protecting us if they were at home, are all serving under your standards. I should be unacquainted both with you and your army if I were not to hold

A.U.C. 539

tot acies Romanas fusas stratasque esse sciam, ei facile esse ducam[1] opprimere populatores nostros vagos, sine signis palatos quo quemque trahit quamvis 13 vana praedae spes. Numidarum paucorum illi quidem praeda erunt praesidiumque miseris simul[2] nobis et Nolae ademeris, si modo, quos ut socios haberes dignos duxisti, haud[3] indignos iudicas quos in fidem receptos tuearis."

XLIII. Ad ea Hannibal respondit, omnia simul facere Hirpinos Samnitesque, et indicare clades suas et petere praesidium et queri indefensos se neglectos-
2 que. Indicandum autem primum fuisse, dein petendum praesidium, postremo ni impetraretur, tum denique querendum frustra opem inploratam.
3 Exercitum sese non in agrum Hirpinum Samnitemve, ne et ipse oneri esset, sed in proxima loca sociorum populi Romani adducturum. Iis populandis et militem suum repleturum se et metu procul ab his[4]
4 summoturum hostis. Quod ad bellum Romanum attineret, si Trasumenni quam Trebiae, si Cannarum quam Trasumenni pugna nobilior esset, Cannarum quoque se[5] memoriam obscuram maiore et clariore victoria facturum.

5 Cum hoc responso muneribusque amplis legatos dimisit; ipse praesidio modico relicto in Tifatis pro-
6 fectus cetero exercitu ire Nolam pergit. Eodem Hanno ex Bruttiis cum supplemento Carthagine advecto atque elephantis venit. Castris haud procul

[1] ducam z : dicam P(1).

[2] miseris simul Madvig : misul P : misum P^3?R : missum R^1(7)z : simul erit Gronovius.

[3] haud A^y Valla : at it PR : ad id C : ad id R^2(14).

[4] his P Walters, without comment : iis vulgate.

[5] quoque se Siesbye : se quoque P(1).

it easy for one who, I know, has routed and laid low B.C. 215 so many Roman battle-lines to surprise our scattered plunderers, roaming without their standards wherever a man is drawn by even the vain hope of booty. To a few Numidians they will in any case fall a prey, and you will have sent us troops and at the same time will have rid Nola of its garrison, if only men whom you have considered worthy to be your allies are not judged by you unworthy to be taken under your protection and defended."

XLIII. To this Hannibal replied that the Hirpini and Samnites were doing everything at once, reporting their losses, and asking for troops, and complaining that they were undefended and neglected. But they ought first to have reported, then asked for protection, finally, if this was not obtained, they should then, and not sooner, have complained that help had been besought in vain. He would lead his army, not into the territory of the Hirpini or the Samnites, in order not to be another burden, but into the nearest lands of allies of the Roman people. By devastating these he would satisfy his own army and drive the frightened enemy to a distance from them. As for the Roman war, if the battle of the Trasumennus was more celebrated than that of the Trebia, if Cannae than Trasumennus, he would overshadow the memory even of Cannae by a greater and more famous victory.

With this answer and also with ample gifts he sent the ambassadors away. He himself set out, leaving a moderate force on Tifata, and proceeded with the rest of his army to Nola. Hanno also came thither from the land of the Bruttii with reinforcements brought from Carthage and with the elephants.

A.U.C. 539

positis longe alia omnia inquirenti comperta sunt
7 quam quae a legatis sociorum audierat. Nihil enim Marcellus ita egerat ut aut fortunae aut temere hosti commissum dici posset. Explorato cum firmisque praesidiis tuto receptu praedatum ierat, omniaque velut adversus praesentem Hannibalem cauta
8 provisaque fuerant. Tum, ubi sensit hostem adventare, copias intra moenia tenuit; per muros inambulare senatores Nolanos iussit et omnia circa explorare
9 quae apud hostes fierent. Ex his Hanno, cum ad murum successisset, Herennium Bassum et Herium Pettium ad conloquium evocatos permissuque Mar-
10 celli egressos per interpretem adloquitur. Hannibalis virtutem fortunamque extollit: populi Romani
11 obterit senescentem cum viribus maiestatem. Quae si paria essent, ut quondam fuissent, tamen expertis quam grave Romanum imperium sociis, quanta indulgentia Hannibalis etiam in captivos omnis Italici nominis fuisset, Punicam Romanae societatem
12 atque amicitiam praeoptandam esse. Si ambo consules cum suis exercitibus ad Nolam essent, tamen non magis pares Hannibali futuros quam ad Cannas fuissent, nedum praetor unus cum paucis et 13 novis militibus Nolam tutari possit. Ipsorum quam Hannibalis magis[1] interesse capta an tradita Nola poteretur; potiturum enim, ut Capua Nuceriaque

[1] magis Harant (after ipsorum in A^{rz}) : om. $P(1)$.

Having pitched his camp not far away, Hannibal B.C. 215 found on enquiry that everything was very different from what he had heard from the legates of his allies. For Marcellus had not done anything in such a way that it could be said to have been left to fortune or rashly left to the enemy. After reconnoitring, having strong forces and a safe refuge, he had gone out to forage, and every possible precaution had been taken, as though against Hannibal in person. Then on learning of the approach of the enemy, he kept his troops inside the walls. He ordered the senators of Nola to walk up and down on the walls, and to observe everything that went on among the enemy all around. Hanno, having come close to the wall, called out from their number Herennius Bassus and Herius Pettius to a conference, and when they came out with Marcellus' permission, he addressed them through an interpreter. He lauded Hannibal's courage and success. He belittled the majesty of the Roman people, as wasting away along with their resources. And if these qualities were evenly matched, he said, as once they had been, nevertheless those who had found out how burdensome was Roman rule to the allies, how great had been Hannibal's indulgence even to all captives who called themselves Italians, these were bound to prefer Carthaginian alliance and friendship to Roman. If both consuls were at Nola with their armies, still they would be no more a match for Hannibal than they had been at Cannae; much less could one praetor with a few raw soldiers defend Nola. It was their own concern more than Hannibal's whether he took Nola by capture or by surrender. For he would take it, as he had taken Capua and Nuceria. But what a difference

A.U.C. 539

potitus esset; sed quid inter Capuae ac Nuceriae fortunam interesset ipsos prope in medio sitos 14 Nolanos scire. Nolle ominari quae captae urbi casura[1] forent, et potius spondere, si Marcellum cum praesidio ac Nolam tradidissent, neminem alium quam ipsos legem qua in societatem amicitiamque Hannibalis venirent dicturum.

XLIV. Ad ea Herennius Bassus respondit multos annos iam inter Romanum Nolanumque populum amicitiam esse, cuius neutros ad eam diem paenitere, et sibi, si cum fortuna mutanda fides fuerit, sero
2 iam esse mutare. An dedituris se Hannibali fuisse accersendum Romanorum praesidium? Cum iis qui ad sese tuendos venissent omnia sibi et esse consociata et ad ultimum fore.

3 Hoc conloquium abstulit spem Hannibali per proditionem recipiendae Nolae. Itaque corona oppidum circumdedit, ut simul ab omni parte moenia adgrede-
4 retur. Quem ut successisse muris Marcellus vidit, instructa intra portam acie cum magno tumultu erupit. Aliquot primo impetu perculsi caesique sunt; dein concursu ad pugnantis facto aequatisque viribus atrox esse coepit pugna, memorabilisque inter paucas fuisset, ni ingentibus procellis effusus
5 imber diremisset pugnantis. Eo die commisso modico certamine atque inritatis animis in urbem Romani, Poeni in castra receperunt sese; nam[2]

[1] casura Nipperdey: cessura $P(11)A^{z}$.
[2] nam Weissenborn: tam $P(1)$: tamen M^{1}.

there was between the lot of Capua and that of B.C. 215
Nuceria the men of Nola themselves knew, being situated about half-way between them. He did not wish to forecast what would happen to the city if captured, but assured them instead that if they surrendered Marcellus and Nola with the garrison, no one but themselves should name the terms on which they might enter alliance and friendship with Hannibal.

XLIV. To this Herennius Bassus replied that for many years there had been friendship between the Roman people and that of Nola; that down to that time neither party regretted it, and for themselves, if with altered fortune they ought to have changed their loyalty, it was now too late to change. If they were going to surrender to Hannibal, had they needed to send for a Roman garrison? With the men who had come to defend them they had allied themselves in everything, and it would be so to the end.

This conference deprived Hannibal of the hope of getting Nola by treachery. And so he completely invested the town, in order to attack the walls from all sides at once. Marcellus, on seeing that Hannibal had approached the walls, drew up his line inside the gate and sallied out with a great uproar. Not a few were terrified by the first attack and slain. Then, when they had charged the attacking force and brought up equal numbers, the battle began to be a fierce one, and would have been among the most memorable, if a downpour of rain in heavy squalls had not separated the combatants. That day, after beginning an engagement of no importance and merely inflaming their passions, they withdrew, the Romans into the city, the Carthaginians to the camp. For of

A.U.C. 539

Poenorum prima eruptione perculsi ceciderunt haud
6 plus quam triginta,[1] Romani quinquaginta.[2] Imber[3] continens per noctem totam usque ad horam tertiam diei insequentis tenuit. Itaque, quamquam utraque pars avidi certaminis erant, eo die tenuerunt sese tamen munimentis.

Tertio die Hannibal partem copiarum praedatum
7 in agrum Nolanum misit. Quod ubi animadvertit Marcellus, extemplo in aciem copias eduxit; neque Hannibal detractavit. Mille fere passuum inter urbem erant castraque; eo spatio—et sunt omnia
8 campi circa Nolam—concurrerunt. Clamor ex parte utraque sublatus proximos ex cohortibus iis quae in agros praedatum exierant ad proelium iam com-
9 missum revocavit. Et Nolani aciem Romanam auxerunt, quos conlaudatos Marcellus in subsidiis stare et saucios ex acie efferre iussit, pugna abstinere, ni ab se signum accepissent. XLV. Proelium erat anceps; summa vi et duces hortabantur et milites pugnabant. Marcellus victis ante diem tertium, fugatis ante paucos dies a Cumis, pulsis priore anno ab Nola ab eodem se duce, milite alio, instare iubet.
2 Non omnis esse in acie; praedantis vagari in agro; et[4] qui pugnent, marcere Campana luxuria, vino et scortis omnibusque lustris per totam hiemem con-
3 fectos. Abisse illam vim vigoremque, dilapsa[5] esse robora corporum animorumque quibus Pyrenaei Alpiumque superata sint iuga. Reliquias illorum

[1] triginta (XXX) PC^{x}(14) : XXXX R : trecenti Gronovius.
[2] quinquaginta Gronovius (see next note).
[3] imber R^{2}(7) : liber (i.e. L = 50 + iber) P : inber P^{1}?.
[4] agro; et Alschefski : agro sed P(1) : agris; et Luchs.
[5] dilapsa z : delapsa P(1).

[1] The small number is probably an error of the copyists.

the Carthaginians not more than thirty,[1] who were B.C. 215 terrified by the first sally, fell, of the Romans fifty. The rain continued incessantly throughout the night to the third hour of the next day. And so, although both sides were eager for the fray, they nevertheless kept within their fortifications that day.

On the third day Hannibal sent a part of his forces into the country about Nola to plunder. On observing this Marcellus at once drew up his troops in line. And Hannibal did not refuse battle. There was about a mile between the city and the camp. In that space—and there is only a plain around Nola—they met each other. A shout raised on both sides recalled to a battle already begun the nearest men of the cohorts which had gone out to the farms for booty. And the men of Nola reinforced the Roman line. Marcellus praised them and ordered them to keep their place among the reserves and to carry off the wounded from the field; to refrain from fighting unless they should receive a signal from him. XLV. The battle was doubtful. The generals were doing their utmost in cheering on their men, the soldiers in fighting. Marcellus bids them attack men defeated two days before, driven from Cumae in flight a few days earlier, beaten back from Nola the previous year by himself, the same commander, and other soldiers. Not all of the enemy, he said, were in the line of battle; the booty-hunters were roaming about the country, and those who were fighting were weakened by Campanian luxury, exhausted by wine and harlots and every kind of dissipation the whole winter through. Gone was that force and energy, lost the strength of body and spirit with which they had crossed the ranges of the Pyrenees and the Alps.

A.U.C. 539

virorum vix arma membraque sustinentis pugnare.
4 Capuam Hannibali Cannas fuisse: ibi virtutem bellicam, ibi militarem disciplinam, ibi praeteriti temporis
5 famam, ibi spem futuri exstinctam. Cum haec exprobrando hosti Marcellus suorum militum animos erigeret, Hannibal multo gravioribus probris increpa-
6 bat: arma signaque eadem se noscere quae ad Trebiam Trasumennumque, postremo ad Cannas viderit habueritque; militem alium profecto se in hiberna Capuam duxisse, alium inde eduxisse.
7 "Legatumne Romanum et legionis unius atque alae magno certamine vix toleratis pugnam, quos binae
8 acies consulares numquam sustinuerunt? Marcellus tirone milite ac Nolanis subsidiis inultus nos iam iterum lacessit! Ubi ille miles meus est qui derepto ex equo C. Flaminio consuli caput abstulit? Ubi, 9 qui L. Paulum ad Cannas occidit? Ferrum nunc hebet? an dextrae torpent? an quid prodigii est aliud? Qui pauci plures vincere soliti estis, nunc paucis plures vix restatis? Romam vos expugna-
10 turos, si quis duceret, fortes lingua iactabatis: en,[1] in minore re[2] hic experiri vim virtutemque volo. Expugnate Nolam, campestrem urbem, non flumine, non mari saeptam. Hinc vos ex tam opulenta urbe

[1] en A^{γ} Valla, Madvig: enim P(10).
[2] in minore re Madvig: minor res est $PM^{2}?A^{\gamma}$(13) Valla.

---

[1] Again disparagement of Marcellus, as in xlii. 10.
[2] A somewhat different account in XXII. vi. 4.
[3] Cf. XXII. xlix. 12.

Remnants only of those men were fighting, scarcely B.C. 215 able to hold up their weapons and their limbs. Capua had been Hannibal's Cannae. It was there that warlike courage had been extinguished, there the discipline of the soldier, there the past reputation, there the hope for the future. While by thus reviling the enemy Marcellus was raising the spirits of his soldiers, Hannibal was uttering much more serious reproaches; he recognized the same arms and standards which he had seen and had at the Trebia and Trasumennus, finally at Cannae; but as for the soldier, he had certainly led one man into winter quarters at Capua, and out of them a different man. "Are you," he said, "hardly able with great effort to hold out against a mere Roman lieutenant,[1] and an engagement with a single legion and its auxiliaries —you, whom two consular armies combined have never withstood? Marcellus with recruits and with reserves from Nola is now attacking us for the second time with impunity! Where is that soldier of mine who pulled Gaius Flaminius, the consul, down from his horse and carried away his head?[2] Where the man who slew Lucius Paulus at Cannae?[3] Is the sword now blunted? Or are your right hands benumbed? Or is it some other portent? You who, though few, were wont to defeat larger numbers, now in larger numbers with difficulty resist the few? You used to boast, brave men in speech, that if some one led you, you would take Rome by storm. Look you, in a less difficult situation, here and now I wish to test your might and courage. Take Nola by storm, a city of the plain, not fenced by a river nor by the sea. From this place, a city of such wealth, I will either lead you, laden with booty and praeda spoliisque onustos vel ducam quo voletis vel sequar."

A.U.C. 539

XLVI. Nec bene nec male dicta profuerunt ad
2 confirmandos animos. Cum omni parte pellerentur, Romanisque crescerent animi, non duce solum adhortante sed Nolanis etiam per clamorem favoris indicem accendentibus ardorem pugnae, terga Poeni dederunt
3 atque in castra compulsi sunt. Quae oppugnare capientis milites Romanos Marcellus Nolam reduxit cum magno gaudio et gratulatione etiam plebis, quae
4 ante inclinatior ad Poenos fuerat. Hostium plus quinque milia [1] caesa eo die, vivi capti sescenti et signa militaria undeviginti et duo elephanti, quattuor in acie occisi; Romanorum minus mille interfecti.
5 Posterum diem indutiis tacitis sepeliendo utrimque caesos in acie consumpserunt. Spolia hostium
6 Marcellus Volcano votum cremavit. Tertio post die, ob iram, credo, aliquam aut spem liberalioris militiae, ducenti septuaginta duo equites, mixti Numidae et Hispani, ad Marcellum transfugerunt. Eorum forti fidelique opera in eo bello usi sunt saepe Romani.
7 Ager Hispanis in Hispania et Numidis in Africa post bellum virtutis causa datus est.

8 Hannibal, ab Nola remisso in Bruttios Hannone cum quibus venerat copiis, ipse Apuliae hiberna petit 9 circaque Arpos consedit. Q. Fabius ut profectum in [1] quinque milia Gronovius: vel P(1); cf. xxxiv. 13.

spoils, or I will follow you whithersoever you shall B.C. 215 desire."

XLVI. Neither encouragement nor reproaches had any effect in steadying their spirits. Since they were everywhere beaten back, while the Romans' courage rose, as not only the general exhorted them, but the men of Nola also kindled their ardour for battle by shouting as evidence of their support, the Carthaginians retreated and were forced back into the camp. The Roman soldiers were eager to assault the camp, but Marcellus led them back to Nola, in the midst of great rejoicing and congratulation on the part of the common people as well, who had previously been more inclined to the Carthaginians. Of the enemy more than five thousand were slain that day, six hundred captured alive, and nineteen military standards and two elephants were taken, four killed in battle. Of the Romans less than a thousand were slain. The next day they spent under a tacit armistice, burying those slain in the battle on both sides. Marcellus burned the spoils of the enemy, paying a vow to Vulcan. Two days later in anger on some account, I suppose, or in the hope of a more generous service, two hundred and seventy-two horsemen, partly Numidians, partly Spaniards, deserted to Marcellus. Their brave and loyal services were repeatedly employed by the Romans in that war. As a reward for their courage farm land was given after the war to the Spaniards in Spain, to the Numidians in Africa.

Hannibal, sending Hanno back from Nola into the country of the Bruttii with the forces with which he had come, himself sought winter quarters in Apulia and established himself near Arpi. Quintus Fabius,

A.U.C. 539

Apuliam Hannibalem audivit, frumento ab Nola Neapolique in ea castra convecto quae super Suessulam erant, munimentisque firmatis et, praesidio quod per hiberna ad obtinendum[1] locum satis esset relicto, ipse Capuam propius movit castra agrumque Campanum ferro ignique est depopulatus, donec coacti sunt Campani, nihil admodum viribus suis fidentes, egredi portis et castra ante urbem in aperto com-
11 munire. Sex milia armatorum habebant, peditem inbellem, equitatu plus poterant; itaque equestribus proeliis lacessebant hostem.

12 Inter multos nobiles equites Campanos Cerrinus Vibellius erat, cognomine Taurea. Civis indidem erat, longe omnium Campanorum fortissimus eques, adeo ut, cum apud Romanos militaret, unus eum Romanus Claudius Asellus gloria equestri aequaret.
13 Tunc[2] Taurea, cum diu perlustrans oculis obequitasset hostium turmis, tandem silentio facto, ubi
14 esset Claudius Asellus quaesivit et, quoniam verbis secum de virtute ambigere solitus esset, cur non ferro decerneret daretque opima spolia victus aut victor caperet.

XLVII. Haec ubi Asello sunt nuntiata in castra, id modo moratus ut consulem pereunetaretur liceretne extra ordinem in provocantem hostem pugnare,

[1] obtinendum Madvig: tenendum x Gronovius: petendum P(1).

[2] tunc Walch: hunc P(4): hic DA.

on hearing that Hannibal had gone into Apulia, B.C. 215 brought in grain from Nola and Neapolis to the camp above Suessula, strengthened the fortifications, and left a garrison which was strong enough to hold the place through the winter season. He then moved his camp nearer to Capua and ravaged the Campanian territory with fire and sword, until the Campanians, who had no confidence at all in their own resources, were compelled to come out of the gates and fortify a camp in the open before the city. They had six thousand armed men, infantry unfit for war; but in cavalry they were more effective. Accordingly they kept harassing the enemy by cavalry battles.

Among the many distinguished Campanian horsemen was Cerrinus Vibellius, surnamed Taurea. A citizen of that state, he was far the bravest horseman of all the Campanians, so much so that while he served with the Romans only one Roman, Claudius Asellus, rivalled him in reputation as a cavalryman. At this time Taurea, looking all around again and again, rode up to the squadrons of the enemy's cavalry and, when silence was at last obtained, asked where Claudius Asellus was, and why, since he had been in the habit of disputing with him about their courage, did he not settle the matter with the sword and, if vanquished, give, or if victorious, take, the splendid spoils.[1]

XLVII. When this was reported to Asellus in the camp, he waited only to ask the consul whether he might fight out of the ranks against an enemy who

[1] Strictly speaking the opima spolia were those taken by a Roman general in command from the general of the enemy after a single combat; I. x. 4–7 (Romulus); IV. xx. 2 and 5–6 (Cossus); Periocha 20 (Marcellus).

A.U.C. 739

2 permissu eius arma extemplo cepit, provectusque ante stationes equo Tauream nomine compellavit
3 congredique ubi vellet iussit. Iam[1] Romani ad spectaculum pugnae eius frequentes exierant, et Campani non vallum modo castrorum sed moenia
4 etiam urbis prospectantes repleverant.[2] Cum iam ante ferocibus dictis rem nobilitassent, infestis hastis concitarunt equos: dein libero spatio inter se ludi-
5 ficantes sine vulnere pugnam extrahebant.[3] Tum Campanus Romano "Equorum" inquit "hoc non equitum erit certamen, nisi e campo in cavam hanc viam demittimus equos. Ibi nullo ad evagandum
6 spatio comminus conserentur manus." Dicto prope citius equum in viam Claudius deiecit.[4] Taurea verbis ferocior quam re "Minime sis" inquit "cantherium in fossam"; quae vox in rusticum inde proverbium
7 prodita est. Claudius, cum ea via[5] longe perequitasset,[6] nullo obvio hoste in campum rursus evectus, increpans ignaviam hostis, cum magno gaudio et 8 gratulatione victor in castra redit. Huic pugnae equestri rem—quam vera sit,[7] communis existimatio est—mirabilem certe adiciunt quidam annales: cum refugientem ad urbem Tauream Claudius sequeretur, patenti hostium porta[8] invectum per alteram, stupentibus miraculo hostibus, intactum evasisse.

[1] iam (13): hinc C^4M^1: in PCMF.
[2] repleverant A^{vz} Madvig: -erunt $P(1)F$.
[3] extrahebant $P^1?(1)F$: extraherebant P: extrahere Gronovius.
[4] deiecit A^2 Madvig: delegit $PA?(2)F$: egit A^3x Aldus.
[5] ea via Perizonius, Madvig: exva P: ex via $P^2?(1)F$: cava Madvig (later).
[6] perequitasset, $P(1)F$ add quia, $P^1?$ via.
[7] quam vera sit Gronovius: quam vetatis $P(4)F$: quam etatis DA.
[8] porta Ingerslev: portae $P(1)F$.

challenged him. With the consul's permission he at B.C. 215 once took up his arms, and riding out in front of the guard-posts he addressed Taurea by name and bade him engage wherever he pleased. Already the Romans had gone out in crowds to that spectacle of a combat, and the Campanians who looked on had filled not only the earthwork of the camp but also the walls of the city. First calling attention to the affair by high-spirited words, they levelled spears and spurred their horses. Then, eluding each other in the open space, they prolonged the bloodless fray. Then the Campanian said to the Roman: "This will be a contest of horses, not of horsemen, unless we let our horses go down from the open field into this deep-cut road. There, with no room to avoid each other, we shall fight hand to hand." Almost sooner than said Claudius put his horse into the road. Taurea, more spirited in words than in action, said: "Never a nag, please, into a ditch!"[1]—words which have come down from that time as a farmer's parable. Claudius rode a long way on that road, and then riding back to the field without meeting any enemy, returned as victor to the camp, reviling the cowardice of his enemy in the midst of great rejoicing and congratulations. To this combat of horsemen some annals add what is certainly marvellous—how true, it is for everyone to judge—that, as Claudius was pursuing Taurea fleeing to the city, he rode in through the enemy's open gate and, while they were spellbound in amazement, escaped unharmed by the opposite gate.

[1] To be supplied is a verb, probably demiseris. Colloquial sis (= si vis, an insistent "please") merely strengthens the prohibition.

A.U.C. 539

XLVIII. Quieta inde stativa fuere, ac retro etiam consul movit castra, ut sementem Campani facerent, nec ante violavit agrum Campanum quam iam altae 2 in segetibus herbae pabulum praebere poterant. Id convexit in Claudiana castra super Suessulam ibique hiberna aedificavit. M. Claudio proconsuli imperavit ut, retento Nolae necessario ad tuendam urbem praesidio, ceteros milites dimitteret Romam, ne 3 oneri sociis et sumptui rei publicae essent. Et Ti. Graechus, a Cumis Luceriam in Apuliam legiones cum duxisset, M. Valerium inde praetorem Brundisium cum eo quem Luceriae habuerat exercitum misit tuerique oram agri Sallentini et providere quod ad Philippum bellumque Macedonicum attineret iussit.

4 Exitu aestatis eius qua haec gesta perscripsimus litterae a P. et Cn. Scipionibus venerunt, quantas quamque prosperas in Hispania res gessissent; sed pecuniam in stipendium vestimentaque et frumentum 5 exercitui et sociis navalibus omnia deesse. Quod ad stipendium attineat, si aerarium inops sit, se aliquam rationem inituros quomodo ab Hispanis sumatur;[1] cetera utique ab Roma mittenda esse, nec aliter aut 6 exercitum aut provinciam teneri posse. Litteris recitatis nemo omnium erat quin et vera scribi et postulari aequa fateretur; sed occurrebat animis quantos exercitus terrestris navalisque tuerentur, quantaque nova classis mox paranda esset, si bellum

[1] sumatur (sumat') $P^{1?}$ Alschefski, Walters: summat'q. P: sumant' $P^{2?}R^{1?}(7)F$.

---

[1] The time is early autumn.

[2] In the extreme south of Calabria; XXIV. xx. 16; XXV. i. 1.

[3] As told in XXII. xxii. and XXIII. xxvi ff.

[4] I.e. the senators present.

XLVIII. Thereafter the winter quarters were undisturbed, and the consul moved his camp back again, that the Campanians might do their sowing.[1] And he did not ravage the Campanian country until the growing grain in the fields was tall enough to furnish fodder. This he transported to the Claudian Camp above Suessula and there built winter barracks. He ordered Marcus Claudius, the proconsul, to keep at Nola only the garrison needed to defend the city, and to send away the rest of the soldiers to Rome, lest they be a burden to the allies and an expense to the state. And Tiberius Gracchus, after leading his legions from Cumae to Luceria in Apulia, sent thence Marcus Valerius, the praetor, to Brundisium with the army which he had had at Luceria, and ordered him to defend the coast of the Sallentine region[2] and to take measures concerning Philip and the Macedonian war. B.C. 215

At the end of the summer in which occurred the events I have described, there came a letter from Publius and Gnaeus Scipio, reporting how great and how successful had been their operations in Spain;[3] but that money for pay, also clothing and grain, were lacking for the army, and for the crews everything. So far as pay was concerned, if the treasury was empty, they would find some method of getting it from the Spaniards. Everything else, they said, must in any case be sent from Rome, and in no other way could either the army or the province be kept. After the reading of the letter, there was no one among them all[4] who did not admit that the statements were true and the demands fair. But they reflected what great forces on land and sea they were maintaining, and how large a new fleet must soon be made ready

A.U.C. 539

7 Macedonicum moveretur: Siciliam ac Sardiniam, quae ante bellum vectigales fuissent, vix praesides provinciarum exercitus alere; tributo sumptus
8 suppeditari; ipsum [1] tributum conferentium numerum tantis exercituum stragibus et ad Trasumennum lacum et ad Cannas imminutum; qui superessent pauci, si multiplici gravarentur stipendio, alia peri-
9 turos peste. Itaque nisi fide staretur,[2] rem publicam [3]
10 opibus non staturam. Prodeundum in contionem Fulvio praetori esse, indicandas populo publicas necessitates cohortandosque, qui redempturis auxissent patrimonia, ut rei publicae, ex qua crevissent,
11 tempus commodarent conducerentque ea [4] lege praebenda quae ad exercitum Hispaniensem opus essent, ut, cum pecunia in aerario esset, iis primis
12 solveretur. Haec praetor in contione; edixitque diem [5] quo vestimenta frumentum Hispaniensi exercitui praebenda quaeque alia opus essent navalibus sociis esset locaturus. XLIX. Ubi ea dies venit, ad conducendum tres societates aderant hominum undeviginti, quorum duo postulata fuere:
2 unum ut militia vacarent, dum [6] in eo publico essent, alterum ut quae in naves inposuissent ab hostium
3 tempestatisque vi publico periculo essent. Utroque impetrato conduxerunt, privataque pecunia res publica administrata est. Ii mores eaque caritas patriae per omnes ordines velut tenore uno pertine-

[1] ipsum, P(1)F have eum ipsum.
[2] staretur (staret') P Walters: staret (1)F vulgate.
[3] rem publicam P(2)F: res publica Az.
[4] ea Sigonius: ex P(1)F.
[5] -que diem Riemann: om. P(1).
[6] ut militia vacarent dum Gronovius: hopeless confusion in P(1)F.

[1] A direct tax paid by Roman citizens.

if a Macedonian war should begin; that Sicily and Sar- B.C. 215 dinia, which before the war had paid taxes in kind, were hardly feeding the armies that garrisoned those provinces; that necessary expenses were met only by the property tax;[1] that the number of those who paid that particular tax had been diminished by such great losses of troops at Lake Trasumennus and also at Cannae; that if the few who survived should be burdened by a much greater levy, they would perish by another malady. And so they thought that, unless support should be found in credit, the state would not be sustained by its assets; that Fulvius, the praetor, must go before the assembly, inform the people of the public needs and exhort those who by contracts had increased their property to allow the state, the source of their wealth, time for payment, and to contract for furnishing what was needed for the army in Spain, on the condition that they should be the first to be paid, as soon as there was money in the treasury. To this effect the praetor addressed the people, and named a date on which he would let the contracts for furnishing clothing and grain to the army in Spain and whatever else was needed for the crews. XLIX. When that day came, three companies of nineteen members presented themselves to take the contracts. And their demands were two: one, that they should be exempt from military duty so long as they were in that public service, the other, that the cargoes which they shipped should be at the risk of the state, so far as concerned the violence of enemies and of storms. Both demands being obtained, they contracted, and the state was carried on by private funds. Such character and such love of country pervaded all the classes virtually without

A.U.C. 539

4 bat. Quemadmodum conducta omnia magno animo sunt, sic summa fide praebita, nec quicquam parcius militibus quam [1] si ex opulento aerario, ut quondam, alerentur.

5 Cum hi commeatus venerunt, Iliturgi oppidum ab Hasdrubale ac Magone et Hannibale Bomilcaris filio
6 ob defectionem ad Romanos oppugnabatur. Inter haec trina castra hostium Scipiones cum in urbem sociorum magno certamine ac strage obsistentium pervenissent, frumentum, cuius inopia erat, advexe-
7 runt, cohortatique oppidanos ut eodem animo moenia tutarentur quo pro se pugnantem Romanum exercitum vidissent, ad castra maxima oppugnanda,
8 quibus Hasdrubal praecerat, ducunt. Eodem et duo duces et duo exercitus Carthaginiensium, ibi rem
9 summam agi cernentes, convenerunt. Itaque eruptione e castris pugnatum est. Sexaginta hostium milia eo die in pugna fuerunt, sedecim circa
10 a Romanis. Tamen adeo haud dubia victoria fuit ut plures numero quam ipsi erant Romani hostium
11 occiderint, ceperint amplius tria milia hominum, paulo minus mille equorum, undesexaginta militaria signa, septem elephantos, quinque in proelio occisis,
12 trinisque eo die castris potiti sint. Iliturgi obsidione liberato ad Intibili oppugnandum Punici exercitus traducti suppletis copiis ex provincia, ut quae maxime

[1] parcius militibus quam Madvig (one line), but he added datum (before quam) with Weissenborn : om. P(1)F.

[1] In southern Spain, on the upper course of the Baetis (Guadalquivir), destroyed by Scipio Africanus in 206 B.C.; XXVIII. XX.

exception. As all the supplies were magnanimously contracted for, so they were delivered with great fidelity, and nothing was furnished to the soldiers less generously than if they were being maintained, as formerly, out of an ample treasury. B.C. 215

When these supplies arrived, the town of Iliturgi,[1] because of its revolt to the Romans, was being besieged by Hasdrubal and Mago and Hannibal, the son of Bomilcar. Between these three camps of the enemy the Scipios made their way into a city of their allies with great effort and great loss to those that opposed them. And they brought grain, of which it had no supply, and encouraged the townspeople to defend their walls with the same spirit with which they had seen the Roman army fighting for them. Then they led their troops to an attack upon the largest camp, which Hasdrubal commanded. To it also came the other two generals and two armies of the Carthaginians, seeing that the whole issue was at stake there. Accordingly a sally from the camp opened the battle. Sixty thousand of the enemy were in the battle that day, about sixteen thousand on the Roman side. Yet so far was the victory from being uncertain that the Romans slew more than their own number, captured more than three thousand men, a little less than a thousand horses, fifty-nine military standards, seven elephants, five having been slain in battle. And they took the three camps that day. The siege of Iliturgi having been raised, the Carthaginian armies were led over to attack Intibili,[2] while their forces were recruited from a province which, more than any [2] Apparently not far from Iliturgi; cf. Frontinus II. iii. 1. The only town of this name of which we hear elsewhere was on the east coast south of the Hiberus (Ebro).

A.U.C. 539

omnium belli avida, modo praeda aut merces esset, 13 et tum iuventute abundante. Iterum signis conlatis eadem fortuna utrinsque partis pugnatum. Supra tredecim milia hostium caesa, supra duo capta cum signis duobus et quadraginta et novem elephantis.
14 Tum vero omnes prope Hispaniae populi ad Romanos defecerunt, multoque maiores ea aestate in Hispania quam in Italia res gestae.

other, was eager for war, if only there was booty or B.C. 215 pay, and at that time was well supplied with young men. A second time there was a battle in regular line, with the same result for each side. Over thirteen thousand of the enemy were slain, over two thousand captured, with forty-two standards and nine elephants. Then indeed nearly all the peoples of Spain revolted to the Romans, and there were much greater achievements that summer in Spain than in Italy.

LIBRI XXIII PERIOCHA[1]

CAMPANI ad Hannibalem defecerunt. Nuntius Cannensis victoriae Mago Carthaginem missus anulos aureos corporibus occisorum detractos in vestibulo curiae effudit, quos excessisse modii mensuram traditur. Post quem nuntium Hanno, vir ex Poenis nobilibus, suadebat senatui Carthaginiensium ut pacem a populo Romano peterent; nec tenuit obstrepente Barcina factione. Claudius Marcellus praetor ad Nolam eruptione adversus Hannibalem ex oppido facta prospere pugnavit. Casilinum a Poenis obsessum ita fame vexatum est ut lora et pelles scutis detractas et mures inclusi essent. Nucibus per Volturnum amnem a Romanis missis vixerunt. Senatus ex equestri ordine hominibus centum nonaginta septem suppletus est. L. Postumius praetor a Gallis cum exercitu caesus est. Cn. et P. Scipiones in Hispania Hasdrubalem vicerunt et Hispaniam suam fecerunt. Reliquiae Cannensis exercitus in Siciliam relegatae sunt, ne recederent inde nisi finito bello. Sempronius Graechus consul Campanos cecidit. Claudius Marcellus praetor Hannibalis exercitum ad Nolam proelio fudit et vicit, primusque tot cladibus fessis Romanis meliorem spem belli dedit. Inter Philippum Macedoniae regem et Hannibalem societas iuncta est. Praeterea in Hispania feliciter a P. et Cn. Scipionibus, in Sardinia a[2] T. Manlio praetore adversus Poenos res gestas continet, a quibus Hasdrubal dux et Mago et Hanno capti. Exercitus Hannibalis per hiberna ita luxuriatus est ut corporis animique viribus enervaretur.

[1] For the Periochae cf. Vol. I, pp. xvii f.

[2] The words Cn. . . . a, omitted in MSS., were added by O. Jahn.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIII

The Campanians revolted to Hannibal. Mago, who was sent to Carthage to report the victory at Cannae, poured out before the entrance of the Senate House golden rings taken from bodies of the slain; and the tradition is that there were more than a peck of them. After that report Hanno, one of the Carthaginian nobles, tried to persuade the Carthaginian senate to sue for peace from the Roman people. And he did not carry it through, since the Barca faction protested loudly. Claudius Marcellus, a praetor, fought with success at Nola, making a sally from the city against Hannibal. Casilinum, beset by the Carthaginians, suffered so much from starvation that the besieged ate thongs, hides stripped off from shields, and rats. They lived on nuts sent down the river Volturnus by the Romans. The senate was recruited by one hundred and ninety-seven men from the equestrian order. Lucius Postumius, the praetor, was slain with his army by the Gauls. Gnaeus and Publius Scipio defeated Hasdrubal in Spain and made Spain their own. The remnant of the army of Cannae was relegated to Sicily, not to leave it except after the end of the war. Sempronius Gracchus, the consul, utterly defeated the Campanians. Claudius Marcellus, a praetor, routed and worsted Hannibal's army in battle at Nola, and was the first to give the Romans, exhausted by so many disasters, a better hope for the war. An alliance was formed between Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hannibal. The book also contains the successes gained over the Carthaginians by Publius and Gnaeus Scipio in Spain and by Titus Manlius, the praetor, in Sardinia. Hasdrubal, the general, and Mago and Hanno were captured by them. The army of Hannibal lived in such indulgence in winter quarters as to be weakened in body and spirit.

BOOK XXIV

LIBER XXIV

A.U.C. 539

I. Ut ex Campania in Bruttios reditum est, Hanno adiutoribus et ducibus Bruttiis Graecas urbes temptavit, eo facilius in societate manentes Romana quod Bruttios, quos et oderant et metuebant, Car-
2 thaginiensium partis factos cernebant. Regium primum temptatum est diesque aliquot ibi nequiquam absumpti. Interim Locrenses frumentum lignaque et cetera necessaria usibus ex agris in urbem rapere, etiam ne quid relictum praedae hostibus esset, et in dies maior omnibus portis multitudo
3 effundi: postremo sescenti[1] modo relicti in urbe erant, qui reficere muros ac[2] portas, telaque in pro-
4 pugnacula congerere cogebantur. In permixtam omnium aetatium ordinumque multitudinem et vagantem in agris magna ex parte inermem Hamilcar Poenus[3] equites emisit, qui violare quemquam vetiti, tantum ut ab urbe excluderent fuga dissi-
5 patos, turmas obiecere. Dux ipse loco superiore capto, unde agros urbemque posset conspicere, Bruttiorum cohortem adire muros atque evocare

[1] sescenti (DC) W. Heraeus: ob P: oc P^{1}?: hoc (1): hi x: ii z.
[2] ac x: om. P(1).
[3] Poenus P(1): Poenos A^{2}.

---

[1] He had been with Hannibal around Nola, and was sent back to the country of the Bruttii; XXIII. xlvi. 8.

BOOK XXIV

I. Having returned from Campania to the land of B.C. 215 the Bruttii, Hanno,[1] with the Bruttii as supporters and guides, attacked the Greek cities,[2] which were all the more ready to remain in alliance with Rome because they saw that the Bruttii, whom they both hated and feared, had gone over to the side of the Carthaginians. Regium was the first city to be attacked, and some days were spent there to no purpose. Meantime the Locrians hastily brought grain and wood and the other things needed to supply their wants from the farms into the city, also that no booty might be left for the enemy. And every day a larger crowd poured out of all the gates. Finally there were left in the city only six hundred men, who were made to repair walls and gates and to carry arms to the battlements. Against the multitude made up of all ages and classes, wandering about the country, many of the unarmed, Hamilcar the Carthaginian sent out his cavalry. Forbidden to injure anyone, they interposed their squadrons merely to shut off from the city those who had scattered in flight. The commander himself, after capturing higher ground from which he could see the country and the city, ordered a cohort of Bruttii

[2] Operations against Regium, Locri and Croton, barely mentioned in XXIII. xxx. 6 ff., are given here in greater detail. It is late autumn, 215 B.C.

A.U.C. 559

principes Locrensium ad conloquium iussit et pollicentes amicitiam Hannibalis adhortari ad urbem tra-
6 dendam. Bruttiis in conloquio nullius rei primo fides est; deinde, ut Poenus apparuit in collibus et refugientes pauci aliam omnem multitudinem in potestate hostium esse adferebant, tum metu victi consulturos
7 se populum responderunt. Advocataque extemplo contione, cum et levissimus quisque novas res novamque societatem mallent et, quorum propinqui extra urbem interclusi ab hostibus erant, velut
8 obsidibus datis pigneratos haberent animos, pauci magis taciti probarent constantem fidem quam prolatam[1] tueri auderent, haud dubio in speciem
9 consensu fit ad Poenos deditio. L. Atilio praefecto praesidii quique cum eo milites Romani erant clam in portum deductis atque impositis in navis, ut Regium deveherentur, Hamilcarem Poenosque ea condicione ut foedus extemplo aequis legibus fieret in 10 urbem acceperunt. Cuius rei prope non servata fides deditis est, cum Poenus dolo dimissum Romanum incusaret, Locrenses profugisse ipsum cau-
11 sarentur. Insecuti etiam equites sunt, si quo casu in freto aestus morari aut deferre naves in terram posset. Et eos quidem quos sequebantur non sunt adepti: alias a Messana traicientis freto Regium 12 naves conspexerunt. Milites erant Romani a

[1] prolatam P(4) Conway: probatam DA: propalam Walch.

---

[1] Not directly opposite Messana, but about seven miles to the southeast.

to go up to the walls and call out the chief men of B.C. 215 the Locrians to a conference, and with a promise of Hannibal's friendship to encourage them to surrender the city. In the conference the Bruttians at first were not believed at all. Then, when the Carthaginians were seen on the hills, and a few returning fugitives repeatedly asserted that all the rest of the multitude were in the power of the enemy, overcome by fear, they answered that they would consult the people. An assembly being at once called, all the fickle preferred political change and a new alliance; also those whose relations had been shut off outside the city by the enemy had mortgaged their affections, having virtually given hostages. And the few silently approved of steadfast loyalty, rather than dared to declare and defend it. Hence surrender to the Carthaginians was voted with apparently unquestioned unanimity. After Lucius Atilius, commander of the garrison, and the Roman soldiers who were with him had been secretly led down to the harbour and put on ships to be carried to Regium, they admitted Hamilcar and the Carthaginians into the city on condition that a treaty be made at once on fair terms. The promise of such a treaty was almost broken after they surrendered, when the Carthaginian charged that the Roman had been allowed by trickery to go away, while the Locrians pleaded that he had escaped unaided. Also the cavalry pursued him in the hope that possibly the current in the strait might delay the ships or bring them to shore. They did not indeed overtake the men they were pursuing, but they sighted other ships crossing the strait from Messana to Regium.[1] It was the Roman soldiers sent by Claudius, the

A.U.C. 539

Claudio praetore missi ad obtinendam urbem praesidio. Itaque Regio extemplo abscessum est. Loerensibus iussu Hannibalis data pax ut liberi suis legibus viverent, urbs pateret Poenis, portus in potestate Loerensium esset, societas eo iure staret ut Poenus Loerensem Loerensisque Poenum pace ac bello iuvaret.

II. Sic a freto Poeni reducti frementibus Bruttiis quod Regium ac Loeros, quas urbes direpturos se destinaverant, intactas reliquissent. Itaque per se ipsi conscriptis armatisque iuventutis suae quindecim milibus ad Crotonem oppugnandum pergunt ire, Graecam et ipsam urbem et maritimam, plurimum accessurum opibus, si in ora maris urbem ac portum[1] moenibus validam tenuissent, credentes. Ea cura angebat quod neque non accersere ad auxilium Poenos satis audebant, ne quid non pro sociis egisse viderentur et, si Poenus rursus magis arbiter pacis quam adiutor belli fuisset, ne in libertatem Crotonis, sicut ante Loerorum, frustra pugnaretur. Itaque optimum visum est ad Hannibalem mitti legatos caverique ab eo ut receptus Croto Bruttiorum esset. Hannibal cum praesentium eam consultationem esse respondisset et ad Hannonem eos reiecisset, ab Hannone nihil certi ablatum. Nec[2] diripi volebat nobilem atque opulentam urbem et sperabat, cum Bruttius oppugnaret, Poenos nec

[1] ac portum P(1) : portu ac x.
[2] nec Riemann : nec eo P(1) : nec enim A^3.

praetor, to garrison and hold the city. And so the B.C. 215 siege of Regium was at once raised. Peace was granted the Locrians by Hannibal's order: they were, namely, to live in freedom under their own laws, the city to be open to the Carthaginians, the harbour in the power of the Locrians, the alliance to rest upon this basis : that the Carthaginian should help the Locrian, the Locrian the Carthaginian, in peace and in war.

II. Thus the Carthaginians were withdrawn from the strait, though the Bruttians were indignant because they had left Regium and Locri untouched, the cities which they had counted upon plundering. And so without aid they enlisted and armed 15,000 of their young men and set out to besiege Croton, another Greek city and on the sea, believing that it would be a great addition to their resources if they should hold a fortified city and harbour on the sea-coast. It troubled them that they did not quite dare not to call the Carthaginians to their aid, for fear they might seem to have failed to act as became allies. At the same time they feared that, if the Carthaginian should again be rather an arbiter of peace than a helper in war, fighting to secure freedom for Croton might be profitless, as previously for Locri. And thus it seemed best to send legates to Hannibal and gain assurance from him that Croton when captured should belong to the Bruttians. Hannibal having replied that decision in the matter lay with those on the ground, thus referring them to Hanno, they obtained no definite answer from Hanno. He did not wish a city well-known and rich to be plundered, and he was hoping that, while the Bruttian was besieging them and the Carthaginians probare nec iuvare eam oppugnationem appareret,

A.U.C. 539

8 eo maturius ad se defecturos. Crotone nec consilium unum inter populares nec voluntas erat. Unus velut morbus invaserat omnes Italiae civitates ut plebes ab optimatibus dissentirent, senatus Romanis
9 faveret, plebs ad Poenos rem traheret. Eam dissensionem in urbe perfuga nuntiat Bruttiis: Aristomachum esse principem plebis tradendaeque auctorem urbis, et in vasta urbe lateque moenibus disiectis[1] raras stationes custodiasque senatorum esse; quacumque custodiant plebis homines, ea patere aditum.
10 Auctore ac duce perfuga Bruttii corona cinxerunt urbem acceptique ab plebe primo impetu omnem
11 praeter arcem cepere. Arcem optimates tenebant praeparato iam ante ad talem casum perfugio. Eodem Aristomachus perfugit, tamquam Poenis, non Bruttiis auctor urbis tradendae fuisset.

III. Urbs Croto murum in circuitu patentem duodecim milia passuum habuit ante Pyrrhi in Italiam
2 adventum. Post vastitatem eo bello factam vix pars dimidia habitabatur: flumen, quod medio oppido fluxerat, extra frequentia tectis loca praeterfluebat,
3 et arx procul eis erat[2] quae habitabantur. Sex milia aberat ab[3] urbe nobili[4] templum ipsa urbe

[1] moenibus disiectis Jacobs: omnibus disiectis moenibus P(1).
[2] erat H. J. Müller (after arx Weissenborn; before et Walters): om. P(1).
[3] ab z: in P(1): inde Gronovius.
[4] nobili PM^{3}A^{1}: nobile P^{2}(1).

obviously neither approving nor helping the siege, B.C. 215 they would all the more promptly come over to his side. At Croton there was among the citizens no one policy or common preference. One malady, so to speak, had attacked all the city-states of Italy, that the common people were at odds with the upper class, the senate inclining to the Romans, the common people drawing the state to the side of the Carthaginians. This disagreement in the city was reported to the Bruttians by a deserter: that Aristomachus was the leader of the plebeians and advised surrender of the city; also that in the sparsely inhabited city, with its walls at a great distance, there were only scattered posts and guards of the senators; that wherever plebeians were on guard there was free access to the city. With the deserter as adviser and leader the Bruttians completely encircled the city, and being admitted by the plebeians, they took the whole city by assault, with the exception of the citadel. The optimates held the citadel, having previously prepared a place of refuge for such an emergency. To it Aristomachus also fled, as though he had advised surrendering the city to the Carthaginians, not to the Bruttians.

III. The city of Croton had a wall with a circuit of twelve miles before the coming of Pyrrhus to Italy. Since the desolation caused by that war scarcely half of the city was inhabited.[1] The river which had flowed through the middle of the city now flowed past, outside the quarters which had numerous houses, and the citadel was far from the inhabited portions. Six miles from the famous city was a temple more

[1] According to XXIII. xxx. 6 the city now had less than 2000 inhabitants.

A.U.C. 539

nobilius[1] Laciniae Iunonis, sanctum omnibus circa 4 populis. Lucus ibi frequenti silva et proceris abietis arboribus saeptus laeta in medio pascua habuit, ubi omnis generis sacrum deae pecus pascebatur sine
5 ullo pastore, separatimque greges sui cuiusque generis nocte remeabant ad stabula, numquam
6 insidiis ferarum, non fraude violati hominum. Magni igitur fructus ex eo pecore capti, columnaque inde aurea solida facta et sacrata est; inclitumque templum divitiis etiam, non tantum sanctitate fuit.
7 Ac miracula aliqua adfingunt, ut plerumque tam insignibus locis: fama est aram esse in vestibulo templi, cuius cinerem nullo[2] umquam moveri[3]
8 vento. Sed[4] arx Crotonis una parte imminens mari, altera vergente in agrum, situ tantum naturali quondam munita, postea et muro cincta est qua per aversas rupes ab Dionysio Siciliae tyranno per dolum
9 fuerat capta. Ea tum arce satis, ut videbatur, tuta Crotoniatum optimates tenebant se, circumsedente
10 eum Bruttiis eos etiam plebe sua. Postremo Bruttii, cum suis viribus inexpugnabilem viderent arcem, 11 coacti necessitate Hannonis auxilium implorant. Is condicionibus ad deditionem compellere Crotoniates

[1] nobilius, before this $P(1)$ have erat.
[2] nullo P Gronovius: nullus $P^3(1)$.
[3] moveri Gronovius: move P: movet $P^3(1)$: moveat z.
[4] vento. Sed Gronovius: ventos et PCR: vento et P^z: ventus et $C^zM^2D^1$.

[1] Cp. XXIII. xxxiii. 4. At that temple, the most celebrated shrine in Magna Graecia, Polybius found and used Hannibal's own inscription in Punic and Greek, recording his successes (Polyb. III. xxxiii. 18; lvi. 4), a document which Livy barely mentions (XXVIII. xlvi. 16). A single column of the temple still stands on the promontory. Livy is correct in regard to the distance from the city of Croton (ca. 9 km.).

famous than the city itself, that of Lacinian Juno,[1] B.C. 215 revered by all the surrounding peoples. There a sacred grove, which was enclosed by dense woods and tall fir-trees, had in its centre luxuriant pastures, where cattle of all kinds, being sacred to the goddess, used to pasture without any shepherd. And at night the flocks of each kind would return separately to their stalls, being never harmed by wild beasts lying in wait, nor by the dishonesty of men. Therefore great profits were made from the cattle, and out of the profits a massive golden column [2] was wrought and consecrated. And the temple was famous for its wealth also, not merely for its sanctity. They give it some pretended marvels also, as generally in places so noted. It is reported that in the space in front of the temple there is an altar whose ashes are never stirred by any wind. But the citadel of Croton, on one side overhanging the sea, while the other slopes down toward the country, was once protected merely by its natural situation, but later encircled with a wall also, where, along the cliffs on the farther side, it had been captured by Dionysius,[3] the tyrant of Sicily. In that citadel, sufficiently safe, as it seemed, the optimates of Croton were at the time maintaining themselves, besieged even by their own plebs as well as by the Bruttians. Finally the Bruttians, seeing that the citadel was for their resources impregnable, were of necessity constrained to beg aid of Hanno. He attempted to compel the Crotonians to surrender on condition that they

[2] Coelius the historian said that Hannibal, finding it was not merely plated, decided to carry it away, but was deterred by a dream; Cicero de Div. I. 48.

[3] Who captured Croton about 389 B.C. and is said to have held it twelve years.

A.U.C. 539

conatus ut coloniam Bruttiorum eo deduci antiquamque frequentiam recipere vastam ac desertam bellis urbem paterentur, omnium neminem praeter 12 Aristomachum movit. Morituros se adfirmabant citius quam immixti Bruttiis in alienos ritus mores
13 legesque ac mox linguam etiam verterentur. Aristomachus unus, quando nec suadendo ad deditionem satis valebat nec, sicut urbem prodiderat, locum prodendae arcis inveniebat, transfugit ad Hannonem.
14 Locrenses brevi post legati, cum permissu Hannonis arcem intrassent, persuadent ut traduci se in Locros
15 paterentur nec ultima experiri vellent. Iam hoc ut sibi liceret impetraverant et ab Hannibale missis ad id ipsum legatis. Ita Crotone excessum est deductique Crotoniatae ad mare naves conscendunt. Locros omnis multitudo abeunt.

16 In Apulia ne hiems quidem quieta inter Romanos atque Hannibalem erat. Luceriae Sempronius con-
17 sul, Hannibal haud procul Arpis hibernabat. Inter eos levia proelia ex occasione aut opportunitate huius aut illius partis oriebantur, meliorque eis Romanus et in dies cautior tutiorque ab insidiis fiebat.

IV. In Sicilia Romanis omnia mutaverat mors Hieronis regnumque ad Hieronymum nepotem eius translatum, puerum vixdum libertatem, nedum domi-
2 nationem modice laturum. Eam aetatem, id inge-

---

[1] The entire population, while "Crotonians" refers primarily to the optimates.

[2] For Hiero's family see the table on p. 338.

permit a colony of Bruttians to be established there, B.C. 215 and allow the city, desolate and depopulated by wars, to recover its old-time numbers. But among them all he prevailed upon no one except Aristomachus. They claimed that they would sooner die than mingle with the Bruttians and change to the rites, customs and laws, and presently even the language, of another people. Aristomachus, since he was unable by persuasion to bring them to surrender and could find no opportunity to betray the citadel, as he had betrayed the city, alone went over to Hanno. Soon after that the Locrian legates entered the citadel with Hanno's consent and persuaded them to allow themselves to be transferred to Locri, and not to risk desperate measures. Permission to that effect they had already obtained from Hannibal, having sent legates for that very purpose. So Croton was evacuated, and the Crotonians were led down to the sea and went on shipboard. They went, the whole number of them,[1] to Locri.

In Apulia even the winter was not without conflict between the Romans and Hannibal. Sempronius, the consul, was wintering at Luceria, Hannibal not far from Arpi. Skirmishes between them kept occurring as opportunity offered, or the favourable moment for one side or the other. And in consequence the Romans were better soldiers, daily more cautious and safer from surprise attacks.

IV. In Sicily everything had been changed for the Romans by the death of Hiero [2] and the transfer of the kingdom to his grandson Hieronymus, a boy hardly able to keep his independence under control, much less absolute power. Such was the age, such

A.U.C. 539

